How we were rescued, I never knew. I had a dim remembrance of a glittering blade flashing before my eyes, of making one faint appeal for mercy, and of feeling in the same moment the too tight link that bound me to my partner suddenly severed, while I stumbled to my feet, a new-made knight of the garter, with some dozen yards of pink-and-white fabric wound about my knee. The evening came to an end for me then and there. But fortunately the politeness of my host spared me any too marked mortification. He pronounced the room too small for dancing, that he knew all along that it would be foolish and hazardous; and refreshments being ordered in, the party shortly afterwards broke up.

The pursuit of Letitia Lufleigh became a thing of terror to me after that night. But the very next post brought me such a peremptory threatening letter from my aunt that I determined at all hazards to go through with the business, to rush at a proposal which I felt sure would be rejected, and thus, by my ready obedience, secure myself at least in the elder lady's good graces, however disgracefully I might fail with the younger.

CHAPTER III.
The Proposal.

Mild weather seemed to have had a balmy influence on all tempers and temperaments. My own feelings of irritation calmed and Miss Lufleigh's stateliness softened off into graciousness. I had seen her once or twice since the evening of the waltz; and now on a lovely midsummer day I found her alone in the little drawing-room. Could anything be more propitious? She seemed to be seated here awaiting some such confession as that which hovered on my lips. However that might be, I would put her to the test now; and seating myself by her side I clutched convulsively at my watch-chain, as if some means of inspiration or support might be gained thereby.

Digitized by Google

Miss Lufleigh remained silent, and I began to hate her for her impassibility.

"What a lovely, enticing day!" I essayed at last; "weather which no one can resist. I am most favoured to find you in."

"I was just going out," said Miss Lufleigh composedly.

"Don't—don't go!" I broke in with a sort of wildness, and then I stopped. I ought, of course, to have dashed ahead now, but I could not.

"I thought you pronounced the day tempting," she began, as the pause lasted.

"Yes, yes, for those—for any who are free—heart-free."

"I don't understand you," she interposed.

I might have re-echoed Marlow's exclamation with a vengeance. I went on, however, in desperation.

"No wonder! How could you? Words can't, won't, express a meaning like mine. They fade and fail at a moment like this. But, dearest Miss Lufleigh, loveliest Miss Lufleigh, you must have seen and known for yourself what I feel. Be pitiful then, be——"

At last I had moved her from her composure. A sudden flush rushed into her cheeks.

"Do you know what you are saying?" she interrupted in agitation. "Do you know whom you are addressing?"

"An angel," I began.

"Mr. Gorges, if this is a jest, it is an intolerable one. Such conduct is ungentlemanlike, unpardonable."

"How? Why? Wherefore?" I broke out vehemently. "With love like mine, who can hide it? Don't turn from me! Listen to me, believe me, receive me! Be my wife, Miss Lufleigh—be my one treasured wife!"

The repudiation of all Mormon views in the emphatic "one" was scarcely called for in an adjuration of the kind. Letitia, however, had alighted most happily on another expression, which seemed to give an electric shock to her system. At the word "wife" all her features relaxed, her eyes fell till the lashes had covered them with a bewitching veil of shyness. The magic colouring of emotion grew deeper on cheek and lip, and, incited by such unexpected tokens, I followed the prescribed formula, and clasped her suddenly in my arms.

"Be mine!" I breathed; "be mine for ever! Say it, whisper it, to your George!"

She did whisper something then. It was a little gulping "Yes," and, while I trembled at all it bound me to, another murmur came from her lips. "We must ask my uncle, dearest. You will speak to him!"

"Your uncle? who's he?" I cried.

"Dr. Lufleigh, my one guardian now—the generous parent of a poor orphan!" and there was a faint sound of the stirring of some filial emotion.

"What! are not you Miss Lufleigh? his eldest, his Letitia?"

"Only her cousin and namesake," was the reply. "She is away from home now, arranging matters about her legacy."

I sprang about midway up the platform, descried a small door, pushed violently against it, and, as it yielded to forcible pressure, I fell almost head foremost into a deep, cavernous abyss.

"Good gracious!" I gasped, and with a sudden and startling rapidity I sprang up, flung my fair burden to the other end of the sofa, and stood over her in a pose of horror, my hands half clenched, my eyes glaring, and terror and menace in my looks.

My aunt's face was before me, her fierce denunciatory tones rang in my ear, and it is no wonder if they reacted mesmerically upon my motions.

"What do you mean? George, George, Mr. Gorges, what can you mean?" was the exclamation of Letitia, and I felt her grasping at my arm.

"I'm—I'm ruined!" I had all but said; but catching up the word ere I was wholly disgraced, I substituted the first that came.

"I'm too, too happy!" I cried; "this rapture is driving me mad!" and I struck my forehead wildly.

"Calm yourself, collect yourself, dearest!" and Letitia, seizing me in a more tender clasp, drew me again upon the couch. The luckiest rap that ever resounded upon a knocker released me from the fatal position. The embarrassment of a lover naturally seized me at the sound. I sprang from the sofa, gained the hall, drew back the bolt of the door, and the next instant was in full collision with Dr. Lufleigh, who stood mildly on the doorstep.

A muttered word of apology, some dim hint of a coming explanation, and I had shot past him and sped like a madman along the street.

CHAPTER IV.
The Leap.

Certainly no innocent, unoffending fellow was ever placed in a position more critical than mine. I was trapped as neatly as any mere tuft-hunter, and yet I could not accuse myself of the propensity. Beyond the policy of pleasing my aunt, there had been nothing mercenary in my motives. I didn't want to be married, I didn't aspire to that fragile article "a jewel of a wife," however rich might be her setting.

Digitized by Google

I could never return to my aunt bearing my present tale of misadventure, and if I did not take some prompt step I was entangled for ever. It was plain to me now that Miss Letitia had been as cunning as cool, and had but rebuffed me at moments by her frigid demeanour to draw me on the more recklessly in the end.

At the first symptom of seriousness on my part she had snatched at the reality with an avidity which showed me how tight a tussle it would take to relax her grasp. I had gained my room in the hotel, and for nearly an hour I paced it up and down in a state of growing distraction, till suddenly, fleet as a meteor-ray, a thought flashed on me. I snatched at pen and ink, drew a sheet of paper from a blotter on the table, and in a second was seated before the latter, dashing off an epistle which I felt would be all the more natural and effective the greater the dispatch used in its penmanship. I was charmed with three blots which fell on the sheet at the wind up. I scarcely read it over; the more distracted and disconnected the effusion the better, and it should have no benefit from later amendment.

It was one of those wild, desolating farewells which bespeak utter despair of the mind, and blank hopelessness as to any brighter change for the future. Returning to my secret longing for a refusal, I determined now that I had been refused, and upbraided the fair Letitia.

Never, I said, could I claim a forced affection. Her manner had too plainly shown what her feelings were, and mine were such that a renewal of my suit was impossible under such circumstances. I must at once and for ever tear myself from her presence and her vicinity; and then, rising boldly to a climax, I alluded darkly to an instant departure for some deadly region of destruction; and signed myself, with the most emphatic and irrevocable of dashes, "Yours, in death, George Gorges."

If she thought me mad after perusal of this missive what did it matter? I was at least free, and that point gained I could have courage to face any later embarrassments.

The letter duly sealed and addressed, I inquired about the trains on the adjacent line of railway; and finding that one left in twenty minutes, I made arrangements for immediate departure. I determined to walk to the station to get rid of company or questioning in the omnibus, and before starting I left my letter with the waiter, with emphatic instructions to have it delivered safely at the doctor's house.

Once on my route my spirits rose. I recalled with a thrill of delight the mad manner in which I had rushed at Dr. Lufleigh, nearly knocking him over.

With the vision of a like exit before him, he must certainly confirm my own assertion that I was a rejected lover. Nothing but this state (or the insanity, which was an equally convenient attack) could explain such distracted conduct. I absolutely chuckled to myself at the remembrance; and my ruminations were so engrossing that it was not till a sharp whistle broke on my ear that I recalled that the conclusive step of escape was not yet accomplished.

Then I saw to my horror that I had taken the wrong turning, that the station was on another road, that the omnibus had already arrived there, and that the engine of the train was even now dashing up to the platform. There was nothing for it but a steeplechase across hedges and ditches; and finally, when I came up panting to my destination, I was greeted by a second shrill shriek, and received the simultaneous shock of beholding the train puffing off at its best speed. Determined to foster the impression of my eccentricity, I rushed in wildly to the stationmaster, upbraided him furiously for my own stupidity, and only cooled down on the assurance that another train bound city-wards was due in an hour's time. Nothing could persuade me to emerge from the station in the interim; not even that tempting balminess of the air to which I had so touchingly alluded on a recent occasion. I sat down doggedly at the window of the one small waiting-room, watching the blank platform with the eye of a Cerberus, ready to make a pounce on the first locomotive that appeared, and take it by storm, in revenge for my late discomfiture. The driver of the omnibus had no doubt seen my escapade across the fields, and thus, should inquiries be made for me at the hotel, he would be prepared with information as to its vain result.

What if Letitia, vexed or vengeful, should send her uncle in search of me? A qualm came over me at the thought. Passionate impatience supervened, and up I got, and began such loud pacings and stampings in my small retreat that the stationmaster must have prayed as devoutly as myself for the providential arrival of the train.

An hour passed—the wretched conveyance was late. What business had it to pause anywhere but here? I would have a report drawn up to the directors; and full of my new grievance I emerged from confinement and strutted out, puffing and wrathful, towards the ticket office. The man at once popped in his head with a frightened gesture. But if I could not confront him by menacing looks, at least he should not shut out my stormy accents. These were rising ever higher and higher when an awful sight stopped them.

It was the face of Letitia in the doorway, backed up by that of her uncle. I dashed like a maniac in the opposite direction. This brought me right out on the platform—the bare, blank platform, without a sign of a train, without a haven of refuge in sight! I sprang about midway up, descried a small closed door, pushed violently against it, and as it yielded to the forcible pressure, my hat rolled off behind, and I fell almost head foremost into a deep cavernous abyss. Something sharp and shiny rose up around me and above me. It was pile upon pile of black glittering coal.

Bruised rather and battered, I scrambled like a sweep to my feet, and had just strength left to bound frantically towards the door, and hold it by the lock.

In the same instant a bell rang, I caught the whistle of the engine, and knew that the train was up. Loud above its noise rose another. It was the voice of Letitia Lufleigh.

"Where is he? Gracious, where is he gone to?"

"He's mad, wherever he is," said the doctor calmly.

"Stark, staring mad," echoed the station-master.

"But what has become of him? Do look, do think," cried the lady distractedly. "Oh good heavens, he's under the train!"

"No, no, Letitia."

"But he is, I say! I see his hat!"

In the terrible commotion that ensued a hope flashed upon me. Everyone had rushed to the far end of the carriages. I could hear them screaming, poking, and gesticulating. Slowly I released my grasp of the coal-hole door, peered out, and made one spring across the platform. The luggage van was directly in front. In a second I was in it, and had crept behind a big box. Safe here, I listened breathlessly for the start. Even though my crushed remains lay under the wheels, the train couldn't wait for ever for their recovery. The guard plainly was of my opinion. My heart gave a bound of delight as I heard him banging to the doors, though his cool remark at the moment would have made my blood curdle under less happy circumstances.

"Smashed to smithereens! Gone as clean as a cockle! Not a hair of him left but the hat!"

A tip to this feeling functionary ended my difficulties on my arrival in town; and a letter to my aunt, when I had gained the further haven of London, cut short any trouble with her. She indorsed, at last, all the latter steps of my career with the stamp of approval, and recommended a prolongation of the continental tour which I had promptly mapped out for myself.

On my return to her hospitable hearth, never again did the name of Letitia or Lucy vex my hearing. Her cautious consideration extended to other young ladies as well; and charmed at this release from matrimonial intermeddling, I have felt that credit rather than censure must ever attach to the dashing valour of my "lover's leap."

L. Thompson.

Digitized by Google

A Little Mistake.

"CONFOUND it!" exclaimed Jackson. "What a stupid fellow that jeweller is!" "How so?" inquired his friend. "Why, I told him the other day that I wanted engraved on the engagement ring the letters 'from A. to Z.'—'from Arthur to Zenobia,' you know—and the idiot went to work and put in the whole alphabet!"

Breaking Point.

A MAN may think he adores a woman; but his love is put to a terrible strain when she asks him to button her shoes with a hair-pin.

Then Inspiration Vanished.

SHE: "Henry!" He: "Horrors! Don't interrupt this inspiration. I am——" She: "My dear, I only wanted to say that you have dipped your pen into the coffee."

Very Unkind.

DORA: "That reminds me, I must inquire from my fiancé what business he is in." Clara: "I judge by the look of the ring he gave you he must be a glazier."

Why She Felt Miserable.

"MRS. GUGGINS is feelin' mighty miserable." "You don't say so! I thought she was lookin' in splendid health." "Yes, that's just it. She's feelin' so well that she can't think of nothin' to take patent medicines for, an' she jest sits and reads the advertisements and pines."

Plenty of Business.

"MUCH business this morning?" said the chemist to his new assistant as he entered the shop, which was also a post-office. "Yes, sir," replied the youth. "I have had a busy morning of it. There have been six women in to look at the directory, and I've obliged eight people with postage stamps, besides changing a sovereign."

Method in His Madness.

WIFE (fondly): "Do you remember, John, how you used of an evening to hold my hand—my sweet little roseleaf you used to call it, you funny boy—for hours and hours? How silly my old boy used to be." Old boy (grumpily): "Nonsense, Jane; don't be stupid. I was always practical and business like. I did that just to keep you from the piano."

The Twins' Names.

MRS. M'WIGGINS: "Oh, Archibald, I have such good news for you. I have finally selected names for our twin boys. The chosen appellations seemed to come to me as a sort of inspiration." Mr. M'Wiggins: "Thank goodness! Our days of constant searching after cognomens and our nights of sleepless anxiety are over. What are you going to call the babies?" Mrs. M'Wiggins: "Pete and Repeat." Mr. M'Wiggins: "Happy inspiration!"

A Brilliant Conversationalist.

RICHARD: "What kind of girl is Miss Zephyr? Is she much of a conversationalist?" Thomas: "That's where she excels. I played whist with her last evening, and if it had not been for her there would hardly have been any conversation at all. She was the life of the table. She always had something appropriate to say, such as 'What's trumps?' 'Is it my play?' 'Oh, dear! I didn't know it was yours,' and numerous other equally impertinent remarks. Oh, yes; she's a splendid conversationalist."

From a Gushing Pen.

EDNA: "What do you suppose makes Tom write such awfully gushing letters?" Kate: "Oh, I suppose he uses a fountain pen."

Angelic Praise.

MISS BUDD (to famous pianist): "That music was truly divine, monsieur." Monsieur: "Ah, mam'selle, zat is indeed praise; for who but an angel would know divine music!"

A Convenient Gift.

UNCLE: "And what are you going to give your little sister for a birthday present?" "I'm going to ask father to get her a football, and then I'll show her how to play."

Forcing a Smile.

"DEAR me!" cried mamma, "what is the baby crying for?" "He's cross with me, mamma," said Mollie. "I was trying to make him smile with the glove-stretcher."

Poor Papa.

LITTLE ETHEL: "Mamma, what does it rain for?" Mrs. DeHomely: "To make the trees and grass and everything grow pretty." Little Ethel: "Then why doesn't it rain on papa?"

Sure to Stay.

VOKES: "We have at last secured a cook who will stay with us." Carson: "Nonsense!" Vokes: "Not at all; I took her on the recommendation of the policeman on the beat."

The Tune that Haunted.

FIRST BALD HEAD: "That's a beautiful piece the orchestra is playing." Second Bald Head: "Ah, it is one that will always haunt me." "Why?" "It is the only one my daughter knows."

Overheard in a Crowd Watching a Balloon.

MRS. HARRIS: "How do they make the balloon go up?" Mrs. Gamp: "They toss some sand out to be sure." Mrs. Harris: "And what do they do when they want to come down?" Mrs. Gamp: "They put some more in, of course."

Pressed to Confess.

"You told me you didn't like smoke, George," she said reproachfully. "Who says I do?" he asked, indignantly. "Nobody; but I distinctly felt several cigars being crushed into dust in your vest pocket when you hugged me that time." And he owned up.

Saving them up.

"IF you think I'm such a conceited ass, why do you have anything to do with me? Why keep all my letters to you, for instance?" "My dear boy, I am keeping those letters to show you five years from now, just to convince you that you are what I say you are."

Not What She Wanted.

CLERK: "Here is a letter from that actress. She is willing to give us the testimonial, but she wants us to write her first giving definite information about terms." Successful Soap Man: "Terms?—yes. I wonder what we ought to charge her for publishing her name in connection with our soap. It's a big advertisement for her."

Very Much Alive.

"PAPA," said a beautiful girl, as the old gentleman came in late, "did you notice the dead body of a young man in the yard?" "Why, no; what's the matter?" "I refused young Mr. Paperware to-night, and from the hopeless, despairing look upon his face when he staggered from the house, I fear he may have killed himself." "Well, I'm glad you refused him," said the old man, spitefully; "he has just beaten me five times at billiards."

Digitized by Google

A Woman's Trust.

A Charming Little Tale of a Misunderstanding.

"The woman who gives herself to a man, who consents to be his wife, should feel the most absolute trust in him; otherwise she should not consent to share life with him!" declared Lilian Barham decisively.

"You are older than I, and more determined in character," sighed Alice Deed, her friend. "I always was timid, and I sometimes think that I shall never be bold and trusting enough to accept a man, supposing that a man ever cares enough for me to make a proposal. It must be nice to have such trust in anyone, and you must certainly have great faith in your lover, and be very fond of him, to face the smiles of your friends, who have not failed to remind you of your strongly-expressed vows of single-blessedness!"

Lilian Barham laughed happily.

"I do love Mark Amberley!" she said warmly. "It seems strange to me that he should have so thoroughly taken possession of my heart as to sweep away all my resolves so completely. That, Alice, shows the power of love! I do trust him——"

She was about to continue, but she stopped abruptly, and, to cover the sudden break in her sentence, she made pretence of having heard a knock at the door. A chill had fallen on her heart, for she realised a something which she had not been able to define. She had no time to analyse her feelings while Alice Deed was with her, for that feather-brained young lady kept up a constant chatter on topics connected with weddings, but after Alice's departure she sat still in a cosy arm-chair and tried to examine her heart.

While she was with Mark Amberley, she was in an ecstasy of joy; she felt bound up in him; she felt that she could not live without him. He was all in all, and she trusted him, as she had told Alice that a woman ought to trust her future husband, unreservedly, entirely. Yet——. A slight flush overspread her face as she remembered her recent expression of opinion. It was true; when she was away from him, there came over her a chill of—doubt! Yes, it was doubt; she realised it for the first time. She had wondered if this undefined sentiment were doubt, and she shuddered.

"It is foolish and unjustified!" she assured herself. "A punishment on me for my long defiance of the little god of love," she added with a laugh.

She went upstairs and looked at the trousseau and at the presents from her relatives and friends, as a kind of antidote to the poison, and then there came a letter from him and her chilly doubt vanished once more and she was unspeakably happy.

The following evening she was to meet Mark Amberley at a ball given by the Dowager Lady Amsden at her magnificent residence in Grosvenor Place, and she looked forward to the dances she would have with him. He was a superb dancer and she was so fond of dancing! Very few men nowadays can claim to be good dancers, and she was usually vexed with two or three of her partners whenever she went to a ball. The pity of it was that she could not have him to herself all the time!

The evening came and the first part of the programme was over. She had been obliged to give some dances to others, and Mark, finding that he had to yield his loved one to another for the last dance before the interval, resolved to have a quiet rest in a secluded corner. He left Lilian talking to her hostess, in order that it might not appear that he was monopolising her, and walked listlessly away.

It was with a mingled sentiment of vexation and satisfaction that Lilian awoke to the fact that her partner for the dance had not come to claim her; she was not sorry to sit out that dance, but it was vexing to be left and not to have the chance of sitting it out with Mark. Lady Amsden apologised, and would have sent her younger son in search of the truant, but Lilian interposed.

"I would prefer to sit out this dance, really!" she expostulated vigorously.

"It is unpardonable!" asserted Lady Amsden.

Her son, a young fellow of eighteen, was about to offer himself as a partner, but on hearing Lilian say that she would prefer to sit out the dance, he drew back. Lilian Barham's beauty and hauteur inspired him with something like dread.

After a few seconds, Lady Amsden was called to another part of the ball-room, and Lilian quietly moved off to a spot where she would not be so much within the view of the dancers. She had wandered from the ball-room, her thoughts busy with her lover, when she was startled by the sound of his voice. It came from the other side of some tall plants used for decoration purposes.

She did not make any movement towards him because she heard another voice and because of the words Mark had uttered.

"To tell you the plain truth, my dear fellow," Mark had said, and his tone struck her as light, almost flippant, "I think it is rather a bad bargain, and I would draw out of it if I could see a reasonable excuse."

"But a pledge is a pledge, Mark," said the other voice. "I can't see how you can back out of the engagement now. And I think you are wrong, too. More than one man I know would like to have your chance."

"Oh, I could get out of it for that very reason! If others would be glad of the chance——. I really don't see why I should stick to the engagement if I can do better; I don't take such things as seriously as you seem to do, Archie. And I believe that I can do better, in spite of what you and others may think! No offence, old fellow; I merely wish to say that I was off my head when I ran into that affair. But I can't see a decent excuse, confound it!"

The next words were lost to her, and then the man called Archie spoke.

"I am very sorry to hear you say it. It's so near the wedding. only four days. What . . . . . Miss Barham?"

The intermediate words of the sentence were lost to her, but she strained her ears now to catch her lover's reply to the question.

"Oh, I'll undertake to arrange matters with her! I don't think that she will be much upset by my backing out of the engagement! Why should she? 'There are as good fish in the sea, etc.' You know the proverb."

"You take things too lightly, Mark."

"And you take them too seriously, Archie! Look here, I take you along with me and ask her, before you, if she has any objection to my backing out of the engagement! Come on now!"

Lilian Barham's cheeks were flaming and her heart was beating at a great rate. The indignity of it! Scoffing at what should be the most sacred of ties, and speaking of backing out of it in front of a third party! He was so confident too!

Did he think a woman of her nature would treat such a matter lightly, without consideration, and be as ready as he was to throw it off and laugh at what the world might say? He could do better! She had great difficulty in repressing the tears of humiliation that were ready to surge to her eyes.

But he should find no obstacle to breaking the engagement

Digitized by Google

if he so desired; she would relieve him of the necessity of hunting about for a reasonable excuse! She passed swiftly from the back of the tall plants and stood before them.

"Miss Barham!" exclaimed Archie in surprise.

"Lilian!" cried Mark equally astonished, rising from his cuair.

Both men showed their surprise very plainly in their faces, as they gazed at the hotly-flushed cheeks and flashing eyes of the girl.

"Allow me to return this ring, Mr. Amberley!" said Lilian freezingly, taking off the engagement ring and holding it out to him.

"Lilian!" he exclaimed again, his cheeks paling.

"Miss Barham in future, if you please, Mr. Amberley!"

"But what does this mean?" he asked in perplexity. "I think there is some mistake."

"There is no mistake," she replied in the same icy tone. "I was an unwitting eavesdropper, and I desire to spare you the necessity of finding a decent excuse to enable you to back out of your engagement with me, as you vulgarly phrased it just now!"

"Lilian, I did not say that!" he declared hotly.

This contradiction, this transparent attempt to shield himself by a falsehood enraged her; it was adding insult to injury. She would have flung the ring at him had not his companion, a man of about thirty-five, stepped forward.

"Miss Barham, there is some terrible mistake, believe me!" he said earnestly. "Mark was not talking of his engagement with you at all. It was unfortunate that the word 'engagement' was used, but that is my fault; I am rather fond of using the word in connection with business undertakings or arrangements. I assure you most solemnly that the conversation which you have overheard concerns a splendid investment!"

Lilian Barham glanced from one man to the other in doubt; Archie was so earnest that she felt bound to believe what he had said.

"But why was I mentioned?"

"Lilian, I do not remember the exact words used by either of us, but I certainly never said anything about backing out of my engagement with you!" explained her lover, speaking in a manner that carried conviction with it. "I have engaged myself for a certain sum in an investment which Archie thinks is a splendid chance, but which I am now inclined to regard with less favour than I did when I went in for it. Moreover, I want the money, which is rather a lot, for an unexpected turn of my father's business—which is a very large one, as you know—has absorbed all the ready money he intended for me, and so I feel that I want the money I have so recently invested. When I told Archie that, he looked grave and said something about 'What will be thought by Miss Barham?' I forget exactly what he said. It's all very simple, Lilian, and there is no mystery about it. I feel inclined to kick Archie for his habit of using such words as 'engagement' and 'pledge' in such commonplace matters!"

"It's all perfectly true, Miss Barham," said Archie in confirmation.

Lilian's cheeks paled and she trembled. This was her trust! She sank to a chair and covered her face with her hands.

Archie discreetly withdrew.

"Don't cry, my darling!" whispered Mark. "It's all our fault!"

"No, no! I ought to have trusted you!" sobbed Lilian. "And instead, I—I——"

"Yes, you must trust me," said Mark, taking her hands from her face so that he could kiss the sweet lips, "and in future you will!"

"Fully and completely, Mark!" said the girl in a low voice. "I have learnt my lesson!"

She kept her word. She kept her engagement, as Archie would have said. And there is not a happier woman to-day than Mrs. Mark Amberley.

L. Payne.

Your Editor Chats.

I HAVE a big scheme coming along in which a number of Gramophones will be offered as prizes. Many of my readers will not, perhaps, feel very interested at this announcement, because they do not know exactly what a Gramophone is, or how it works. I will therefore tell you something about it.

A Gramophone is an instrument which exactly reproduces any sound which may be made. If you sing into it, or cough, or sneeze, or shout, the instrument will reproduce these sounds just as they were made. Therefore you can readily understand that it is possible for you to hear songs and musical pieces sung and played by the finest singers and bands of the day, without troubling to go out of your own parlour.

All you have to do is to take a flat disc and place it under the recorder. As the disc revolves, so the sounds come out of a trumpet, just as realistically as if the music were being sung or played for the first time. It is such instruments as this that we shall offer as prizes to our readers, and full particulars of the big scheme will appear next week.

OUR NEW SERIAL.

AND now as regards the new serial story which will start in a few weeks' time.

I think I may safely say that no story of such power and interest has ever appeared in SHORT STORIES. It is written by an author who has a great reputation for romance of this nature, but who will be introduced to readers of S. S. for the first time. It is a story in which the chief characters are depicted with great vividness, and their doings arouse your sympathy, your admiration, and your affection.

A NOVEL SERIES.

SHORT STORIES is essentially a paper of which the contents must, in conformity with the title, consist of narratives. Despite this, I am always receiving letters from readers who suggest that an article on a given subject would not be amiss.

There are so many subjects in which readers of SHORT STORIES are interested, which might quite well be dealt with in an article, that I am sometimes sorely tempted to create a precedent, and publish matter in other than narrative form. For example, everyone is interested in the subject: "SHOULD A MAN GIVE UP BACHELOR PURSUITS WHEN HE MARRIES?" An article on this matter in SHORT STORIES is, however, out of the question. But I have thought of a better way of discussing the point, and that is in the shape of a short, complete story.

I have selected a dozen problems of general interest, and have had short stories written on each—that is to say—each story is so produced as to form a solution of the problem. This is an entirely new way of dealing with facts, and I feel sure that readers will appreciate the innovation. I am always trying to keep SHORT STORIES well ahead of all its rivals, and I think you will not consider me egotistical when I say that I feel we are still in front. Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

As it Really Was.

A Pathetic Tale of Theatrical Life.

SYLVETTE, the "clever and beautiful chanteuse," was singing and the patrons of the fashionable vaudeville theatre, where for two weeks her name would continue to appear on the outside in electric lights, were agreeably conscious of the fact that she was in exceptionally fine voice and spirits to-night.

Sylvette had the best place on the programme, which means that she appeared at an hour neither too early, when people were arriving, nor too late, when the audience were weary and tired to hold.

All the lesser vaudeville lights had twinkled and disappeared from the horizon when the peerless Sylvette had arrived to dress for her act. And now this bright particular star could shine in all her glory, supreme in the consciousness of unrivalled splendour.

Sylvette's songs were of a various nature. She changed from a pathetic love ballad to a French ditty of the most sparkling, not to say naughty, character, and from this returned in a flash to face her delighted admirers with the latest and most approved "coon song," into which she threw herself with the utmost abandon.

Yes, Sylvette was astonishingly versatile. The array of grinning youths on the front row were unanimous in their expressions of approval, all agreeing that she was splendid, which in their vernacular signified the very climax of appreciation.

The baldheads used their opera-glasses in open admiration; not with more vigilance, however, than did the women of the audience, although their interest was of not so friendly a nature.

Two of them, seated in a box at the singer's left, seemed especially interested in that dainty individual.

"You can see the make-up so distinctly from here," whispered the younger of the two.

"Of course you can. Oh, she's heavily made up, that's plain enough. I wonder if she's as pretty off the stage?"

"No, she can't be. Who wouldn't be pretty under the same circumstances? And then, think of her gowns!"

"Just imagine, Marie," said the older one, "the frivolity of such a life, vanity, vanity, nothing but vanity. Her nature must essentially be extremely inferior to permit of her singing those horrid songs with such apparent enjoyment. How dreadful to live always a life of superficiality and sham—never to have a noble incentive! Oh, it's pitiful, it's shameful."

Marie's eyes were on the stage. She was but vaguely conscious of her aunt's words. "It is sad," she murmured absently. Sylvette was bowing for the last time, with a flashing of eyes and teeth and a swirl of rose-lined, ruffled skirts.

"There—she's off. What comes next? Let's see your programme, auntie."

"I can't forget that girl," pursued the older woman, still in her pitying mood. "Such an existence is saddening to think of. Life to her is nothing but a gay bubble, and when it bursts—what then?"

But Marie replied rather peevishly as she yawned behind her fan, "I'm sure, auntie, I don't know."

When Sylvette left the stage, she hurried at once to her dressing-room, ignoring the crowd of envious performers and admiring stage hands, who, according to their custom, had gathered to watch her "turn."

Her maid speedily divested her of the rosy finery which but a few moments ago had shimmered in the glare of the footlights.

A swift application of cold cream removed the roses from her cheeks, the fascinating shadows from her eyes—and in an incredibly short time she was ready for the smart tailor-made gown that Nancy was holding in readiness for her.

When dressed for the street Sylvette was still an attractive young woman, though her face was graver by far than anyone would have thought possible who had seen her on the stage.

An unopened letter, addressed in a woman's handwriting, lay on the table. As Sylvette caught it up with her gloves and purse the gravity of her face increased all at once to an expression almost of pain. She had carried the letter about with her all day, since its arrival at the hotel that morning, and had not yet found opportunity to read it—or was it that she shrank from opening it?

Dismissing Nancy as soon as she reached the hotel, she went straight to her room.

Even after her wraps were laid aside and she was settled in her comfortable armchair she still waited, handling the letter deliberately and musing over it, but making no attempt to open it.

For some time she meditated, her head thrown back against the cushion, her eyes half-closed. Finally she straightened up with a sharp sigh and resolutely tore the letter from its envelope. This is what she read:

> "My dear daughter Sylvia,—Why do you not write oftener? Messages from you are the bright spots in our monotonous existence. You are so generous, dear, to send us so many lovely things—but it is your letters we want! We know but little of your plans—your life. You make such vague mention of your musical work. You say you have engagements in various parts of London, and we know you must be well paid, for you are constantly remembering us with some lovely gift. Be careful, dear, not to try yourself too far. Don't think we ever forget what we owe to you. I pray that my daughter is the same sweet Sylvia she always was, and that she is happy. Won't your engagements ever allow you to come home? We could get you up a concert at the opera-house, as we used to in the old days. We simply must see you again, dear. You will write more fully, won't you, daughter Sylvia? Your loving "MOTHER."

Sylvette folded the letter carefully, her eyes staring vacantly before her. Suddenly she rose abruptly and went to the writing-desk in the corner, took out her diary, sat down and wrote: "Mother has asked again why I don't tell them all about myself. I suppose I shall have to tell them some time, but not now! No, it's out of the question. They would never understand."

She underlined the last sentence and again rose, pacing the room restlessly. What a strange mood she was in to-night.

Returning again to the desk she caught up the diary and began to turn its pages, reading them as she stood. A look of absorbed interest replaced the pained distress of her face. At length she sat down in the armchair and read on and on, as if she were reading the story of another person.

April 10th.

"I am almost discouraged; I do not know where to turn. There seems to be nothing for me here. I have sung, recited and played at concerts and similar functions, hoping that they would lead to something better. But I'm just as far from securing a paying engagement as ever. Mrs. Mills hints at my returning home. I dare say I have imposed upon her hospitality—but what can I do? I can't go home; I promised them I would succeed and send them relief and I will do it.

Digitized by Google

Oh, the complications at home; I dare not think of them. Poor mother, how does she stand it? No, no, I won't give up. I will find something."

"April 25th.

"Letter from mother. Alice is ill—poor little thing. I know why—it's from wearing those old thin shoes. My heart aches and aches. I know mother is keeping a great deal from me. I know what desperate straits they are in. Oh, I must find something. I will make one more mighty effort. Dear God, help me and show me the way."

"May 3rd.

"At last help has come. It is far below my ideal, but it means bread and butter and money for the folks. Once I would have scorned the offer, now I grasp at it as a dying man grasps a straw. I am going into vaudeville. I have had a trial and the manager offers me one week, with promise of the entire season if I succeed. The idea is popular now—quite the fad, and pays better than anything else, they say. Mrs. Mills says I ought to be thankful enough to get such an opportunity; that it is not to be sneered at. Mrs. Mills is a Londoner and she understands, but I can't let them at home know about it. In that little country town they would not look at it as Mrs. Mills does, I'm sure. No, it would never do; but I can send them money! Thank Heaven for this relief."

"May 30th.

"What a rush I've been in! No time for a diary. Well, I made a pretty fair success and they have promised me the season, but how the money flies! Photographs, costumes, everything! Couldn't send anything home for two weeks, but oh, how proud and happy I was when I did send £20. Now, if I can just keep booked up I'll be all right. Luckily the vaudeville houses keep open all summer, so I need not be idle during the hot weather."

"June 15th.

"The work is awfully hard—three performances a day. I'm losing flesh somewhat, but then it means money for them. How overjoyed they were when relief came! But why will they ask so many questions? They want to know all about my work. Well, there's no use thinking of that. They could not understand. The work is honest and I shall always keep myself from the real theatrical life. It need never hurt me."

"August 6th.

"I can't imagine what is the trouble. The agents don't give me any more engagements. I haven't a single one in prospect and I have been idle now for two weeks. What can it mean?"

"September 18th.

"I've trudged and trudged about this city in the heat until my feet ache with weariness. Every theatre is booked up. I haven't sent home money for a month. Oh, what shall I do. I'm nearly desperate again."

"October 3rd.

"At last I understand. A well-meaning manager has opened my eyes to my deficiencies. He says my act is tame—needs more ginger. With a coon song or two and a high kick thrown in. He says I must not wear long dresses. He advises me to get up some chic, dashing costume if I mean to make a real success in this business. He says my appearance and stage bearing are attractive enough (in fact he said a number of nice things about my looks), but that I need these other things to please the general public. He tells me I would command twice as much salary and play only twice a day, but how can I ever sing those songs and how can I—oh, I can't—I simply can't——"

"October 19th.

"Yes, yes, I can do it; I can do anything to save Alice. Mother writes that she has grown so delicate the doctor insists that she must have a change of climate during the coming winter. He urges them to send her—says it is absolutely necessary to her recovery. She has been ill ever since that first time mother wrote. Poor, patient little thing! Will I sing coon songs, French songs, and wear abbreviated skirts? Yes, I'm nerved up to it at last. I know I can do it and make a success. Applause shall be mine! For applause means money and money means a change of climate for dear Alice!"

"December 1st.

"Well, it is all done. I am a full-fledged variety actress of the most pronounced type. They have sent Alice away. At last the great stress is over."

Sylvette let the diary slip into her lap and read no more. After awhile she rose wearily to prepare for bed. As she did so she noticed a folded bit of paper on the floor, and picking it up, discovered it to be a postscript to her mother's letter.

"P. S.—I don't want to worry you, Sylvie, but Alice is not improving as we had hoped. Try not to worry, dear.

"MOTHER."

Sylvette slept wretchedly that night.

She had to force her spirits next day to appear as scintillant as was expected of the radiant Sylvette. A heavy hand seemed clutching at her throat, but she flung off the influence. She wrote home at once and sent a letter brimful of tenderness to Alice. She began to feel hopeful once more.

On the last night of her engagement, however, she grew restless and foreboding again. She was feverishly alert when night came. It was almost time for her turn and Nancy was adding a finishing touch to the jaunty costume when a telegram was brought in by one of the stage hands.

"For me?" questioned Sylvette. Again that hand clutching her throat. She opened the telegram slowly, in a dazed way, and stood reading the words over and over:

"Alice died this morning. Come at once.—MOTHER."

Sylvette stared dumbly.

"What is it, Miss Sylvette? Lord! look at her lips!"

She took the pencil and blank and wrote mechanically:

"Coming to-night. SYLVIE."

A loud rap sounded on the door and an alarmed voice—"Sylvette! Sylvette! your turn!"

She faced the stage manager with the same dazed, staring eyes.

"Must I go on? My sister is dead!" Her voice sounded strange to her, like that of another person.

"Great Scott! My dear girl, I can't let you off now, it's too late! They're waiting for you. The Thornley Sisters disappointed us, too—one of 'em's ill. I am sorry, but——"

Sylvette was on the stage, smiling, sparkling. Her hands were like ice. There was a roaring in her ears, but the habit of affected buoyancy asserted itself. She sang, she joked. Her eyes flashed with even more than their accustomed brilliancy. Her audience thought her amazingly spontaneous to-night. Gay, winning, rollicking, she captivated them as never before. It was all a nightmare to her. The rapturous applause, the sea of upturned faces. "Alice is dead; Alice is dead!" The words kept beating on her brain till it seemed the tension would snap.

When she reached the shelter of her dressing room she did not cry out or swoon. She heard as in a dream voices murmuring: "Poor Sylvette; it's very sad about your little sister." "Can't we help you?" "How brave you are."

Sylvette was flinging her things on a chair while Nancy packed the trunk. "Hurry, Nancy," she cried. One thing she would avoid. In a few turns a quartette would sing "The Lost Chord." She must get away before then. She would not, could not, endure it.

She was dumbly conscious that the stage manager spoke to her kindly and that the others pressed her hand and offered their sympathy.

She found herself gazing at the plump envelope just brought round from the box office.

"It will help pay"—she shuddered—"the expenses."

Suddenly a sweet, piercing tenor arose:

"Seated one day at the organ——"

"Oh, Nancy—come—I can't stand that! Quick—my bag—good-bye——"

Her voice broke. She was gone.

"It will do her good to cry," said the others pityingly.

Out in the box Marie and her aunt were sitting.

"The gay Sylvette was gayer than ever, wasn't she?" remarked the girl.

"And just as superficial. What a life! I wonder she never tires of it!"

Angela Morgan.

Digitized by Google

OUR . . THRILLING SERIAL.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By Henry Farmer.

Mr. Penworthy at Gurlston Bay.

When Esther asked that Mr. Penworthy might be sent for, it had seemed strange to her father; but he was only too willing to do anything that would please her. He himself had taken a great fancy to the homely little horticultural specialist. He knew him to be a great favourite with Esther. He had telegraphed for him; but Crump had already been on his way to Gurlston Bay. When the news of the series of catastrophes reached him, the accident to Esther, and her subsequent precarious state, and the recapture of Scarsdale, the little man had been distressed beyond description. He believed himself to be in a position to offer Esther more consolation than even her father could, and that the time had come to reveal his true identity to the banker. Benny Beard was under surveillance in London; Tom Jackson and Fred Wilton could be relied upon to look after Railton; Revelle had been so seriously damaged in his encounter with Scarsdale that he had been unable to leave Gurlston Bay, and was lying disabled at Winter's house.

Crump's heart had brought him to Gurlston Bay; at the same time, from a professional point of view, everything was in apple-pie order.

"Shall I be allowed to see Miss Mansfield at once?" he questioned.

"Yes," answered the banker.

"And then, Mr. Mansfield, I should like to have a confidential talk with you on a matter of very great importance."

The banker looked at him curiously, questioningly. Crump shook his head.

"It will be a long talk, and I am most anxious to see Miss Mansfield. Poor young lady, it has been very grievous; but it must be a source of some consolation to her to know that, though Alec Scarsdale has gone back to prison, he lives; and you, Mr. Mansfield, though I understand that you look upon him as a guilty person, yet you yourself must be filled with feelings of gratitude to the man, convict though he be, who saved your child's life!"

It was known now who the man was who had fallen from the cliff.

"He has brought untold misery into our lives," whispered the banker hoarsely, "but, for my child's sake, I would give worlds to be able to believe, to have proof of his innocence! I would——"

He stopped abruptly, as if suddenly realising that Mr. Penworthy, landscape gardener, was hardly the person with whom to discuss these matters; again he eyed the little man curiously. The situation was altogether incongruous.

"Mr. Mansfield," said the little man, reading his thoughts, "I shall explain presently. You will understand me better then. For some time past I have been sailing under false colours."

"What do you mean?"

"I will tell you this much now. I rely upon you to keep my communication absolutely secret. My real name is Crump. At one time I was connected with the detective staff at Scotland Yard."

John Mansfield stared at him with a look of blank amazement.

"Crump? Not the Crump?"

The little man nodded his head, and looked as if the emphasis on the "the" had embarrassed him.

"I have imposed upon you, Mr. Mansfield. I will tell you why briefly, more fully when we have our talk proper. Chance brought me to Warham on the morning following the robbery at your house. Even then I had my doubts about Alec Scarsdale's guilt. I was present at his trial, and witnessed an incident that convinced me of his innocence; though an old man, and very rusty, I felt that, this being my conviction, it was my duty to endeavour to prove Scarsdale's innocence. I did not take you into my confidence then because, rightly or wrongly, I believed that nothing would have shaken your belief in his guilt. You would have looked upon me as keeping open a wound in your daughter's heart that you wished to heal. You would have opposed me, tooth and nail. You would have been a source of great inconvenience to my plans. I am only revealing myself to you now because that dear, brave young lady, your daughter, is seriously ill, and I venture to believe that her mental anguish would be greatly relieved if she knew that her father believed in the innocence of the man she loves, and though I am not at present in a position to prove his innocence in a court of law—though, God willing, I hope to be before very long—I have gathered enough together by now to convince you, I trust, of his innocence."

"I would give worlds to believe it," whispered the banker hoarsely, "but——"

"There will be no 'but' presently," said Crump quietly. "You will please treat what has passed between us as absolutely confidential; and now might I be permitted to see Miss Mansfield?"

"Prove Alec Scarsdale's innocence," whispered the banker, his belief in his guilt shaken now by an indescribable something about the little man's manner, "and if you come to me and ask of me half my——"

"The only thing that I shall ask you for, Mr. Mansfield," said Crump, with a shadowy smile, "is an invitation to your daughter's wedding! And I may be asking you for that sooner than you anticipate!"

For before Crump had left Warham, a piece of information anent the future movements of Mr. Revelle and Mr. Faversham had reached him indirectly through Fred, and he was anticipating something happening. Mr. Seaton Revelle's creditors were beginning to clamour for money. Railton had heard from his master to the effect that he would be shortly returning to The Firs; also that Mr. Faversham was to be expected.

"And now, Mr. Mansfield, would you please lead the way. I shall not stay with Miss Mansfield long. After that we can talk more fully!"

"Esther," said John Mansfield, as he entered the darkened bedroom, "I have brought someone to see you—Mr. Penworthy!"

A faint cry came from the bed. Crump, his lips quivering a little, advanced very quietly, and, taking the thin hand outstretched to him, pressed it reverently to his lips; then, still holding the hand, he sat down beside the bed. For a few moments there was complete silence. Esther's big eyes were fastened on the homely face; but the little man could find no words. He seemed incapable of doing anything but swallow. The banker stood near the door, his arms folded, his head down-bent. Was it possible that he had been wrong? Had

Digitized by Google

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

Our Powerful Serial.

he been helping to persecute an innocent man? If he had done so, it had been in all good faith; but his conscience was torturing him how! And his child! If it were so, then he had persecuted her also.

"We must be thankful," whispered Crump unsteadily, breaking the silence at last, "that you are going to get well; we must be thankful that he—he is living and is well. I have inquired personally after him. He is well. And, for the rest, my dear child, we must put our trust in God! I venture to believe that we are nearer our goal than we were. I believe that, before long, we shall be in a position to strike. I am beginning to be very hopeful!"

He had not dwelt on all the horrors that she had been through, he had not even asked her how she was feeling; but this was not from any lack of sympathy. He wished to instil hope. He wished to cheer, not depress. He had spoken as though he took it for granted that she was on the high-road to recovery; yet not brusquely, nor with a there's-nothing-much-the-matter-with-you manner; but rather with an exceeding gentleness and tenderness. And what was not spoken in words, was conveyed by the pressure of the hand that held hers.

"I have told your father the truth about myself," he continued, "and presently we are going to have a long talk!"

Esther's eyes dilated. They sought the silent figure standing near the door.

"Does he believe now," she whispered, "that——"

"He will do after our talk. He will be altogether on our side."

Since that night of the robbery, there had been a little barrier between Esther and her father, raised up by his belief in Scarsdale's guilt, a barrier that had prevented perfect understanding, and had been a cause of secret heartache; but Crump was on the eve of removing it. He was about to open John Mansfield's eyes as to the real character of Mr. Seaton Revelle, the man on whose evidence Scarsdale had been convicted, the man whom the banker had hoped, one day, to welcome as his son-in-law.

Crump remained some little time longer, whispering words of hope and comfort; then, with a final pressure of Esther's hand, and a "God bless you," he quietly left the room with the banker.

More than an hour passed before the door of Esther's room was opened, and John Mansfield re-entered. He moved quickly to his daughter's bed. Stooping down, he gathered her up in his arms.

"Esther," he breathed out chokingly, "forgive me! My eyes have been opened. I can never forgive myself. I have wronged you, I have wronged him. I believe now that Alec is innocent!"

"Oh, father, father! Thank God for this!"

The kindly-faced little man, already on his way to the railway station, had brought this about. He had broken down the barrier that had stood between father and daughter, and brought them together again. He had revealed to John Mansfield the true characters of Revelle and his friend, Mr. Faversham.

"I feel," said the little man to himself, "comparatively speaking, quite light-hearted again, now that barrier has been swept away. Within the next few days my foreign correspondence ought to begin to bear fruit. I can't help thinking that we are on the eve of something happening at Warham."

A well-dressed young man, who had been advancing along the road from the opposite direction, had stopped suddenly in front of Crump.

"By Jove!" he ejaculated, "you've managed to change yourself considerably; but if you're not Mr. Crump, I'll eat my hat!"

People are eating less.

At the annual meeting of a well-known Refreshment House Company the other day, it was officially reported that the number of people served had not decreased, but the quantity of food consumed had. This means so much direct loss of strength; for as soon as the food supply is diminished the bodily strength declines. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans will keep an edge on your appetite during summer's trying weather, and will prevent you from being "run down" or becoming a sufferer from indigestion's evils. Mrs. Mary A. Dodsworth, of Shipyard Row, Selby, says: "I could take very little food because of indigestion. Meat was to me uneatable. Eggs caused me pain. Bread, tea, bacon, and ordinary articles of diet made me so sick that I hated to touch food at all. The result was I became so weak and jaded that I was hardly able to walk. To-day I am in robust health; and the difference in me is due solely to Bile Beans. I am a living example of what vast changes they can work."

Every man and woman who has no appetite should remember Mrs. Dodsworth. Bile Beans are sold by all chemists at one and three-half-pence or two and nine. Anæmia, debility, "summer-fag," constipation, headache, and all female ailments disappear wherever they are introduced.

"ALKAN" CURES IN ONE MINUTE

by inhalation, HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, FACIAL NEURALGIA, NEURALGIA OF THE EAR.

PRICES 2/9 AND 4/6 PER BOTTLE.

Of all Chemists and Stores, or of the Proprietors,

The "ALKAN" Ltd.,

General Depot, 150 STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

GIVEN AWAY

with next week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 452.)

PAPER PATTERN of this

GIRL'S COAT

for Autumn.

(Age 4 to 6.)

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

Crump, it will be remembered, on taking upon himself the character of Penworthy, had grown a beard and moustache that had very much altered his personal appearance, and had concealed the bald spot on his head, memento of a fierce struggle with a burglar, under a toupet.

The little man showed no signs of either embarrassment or annoyance at being thus suddenly unmasked.

"And you," he said, "are Mr. Gerald Phipps. How do you do! I hope I see you well. Dear me! The last time I saw you was when you came over from Dunnavon Chase with Sir Reginald Stanley to visit my little place. Perhaps you remember how beautiful my roses were looking?"

Gerald Phipps was shaking the little man's hand heartily. After his retirement Crump had settled down in a charming cottage on the estate of a Sir Reginald Stanley, a gentleman whose story has been told elsewhere, and who owed much to the detective.

"Mr. Crump," went on the young 'Varsity man, "last time I saw you, you assured me that you had done your last day's work. And yet I don't mind betting a fiver that you've some business on hand at this very moment!"

"I don't deny the impeachment, Mr. Phipps!"

Crump produced one of his "Penworthy" cards, and handed it to him.

"That is my present name and occupation. I can rely upon you not to give me away!"

"Trust me! And, look here! You're the last person in the world that I expected to knock across; but the man of all other that I wanted to. Mr. Crump, I've got a case for you!"

Crump glanced at his watch. He had a train to catch.

"You'll pardon me, Mr. Phipps, but I am rather pressed for time, and the matter that I am at present engaged upon demands all my attention; but if you should feel inclined to walk along the road with me, I should be very glad to hear the details of this case of yours, and give you my advice, such as it is!"

"It's a most serious business," said Phipps excitedly, "my hands have been tied, are tied now, in fact; but with you it's a different matter. You won't give me away, I know. I—I believe in Scarsdale's innocence. In fact—er—I did my best to help him to get clear, and if this got known, don't you see, I should stand a big chance of being run in!"

Crump's eyes had brightened.

"But this is what I'm coming to. You've read about that ghastly accident on the cliff—how the man who saved Miss Mansfield's life proved to be Scarsdale. In the papers it was stated that the rope broke. It was wrong. The rope was cut through. And I've got a piece of that rope. Scarsdale gave it to me!"

"Mr. Phipps," said Crump sharply, "this meeting with you is providentially opportune. Your business is my business. The train will go without me. I will thank you for the fullest details!"

It was late evening when Crump reached Warham. He carried with him a piece of rope that had been round Scarsdale's waist when he went over the cliff, the cleanly cut strands of which pointed to the fact that it had been severed by a knife.

The little man's face wore a singularly stern expression.

"I could prove attempted murder now, I believe. I hope to prove a charge of murder against him, the vile scoundrel! These things can wait. I want first to prove beyond doubt Scarsdale's innocence. So much happiness depends on this! And, I may be wrong, but I do believe that something is about to happen very shortly!"

THE DATE IS FIXED.

WHEN Seaton Revelle stepped into the closed brougham that awaited him outside Warham Station, the marks put upon him by Alec Scarsdale in that short, fierce struggle had not altogether subsided. For two days he had remained in his bedroom at Gurlston Bay. Again and again he had surveyed his battered features in the mirror, and every time blasphemy had escaped his lips. He hated anything approaching personal disfigurement. The sight of his own face had pained him more than his aching, bruised limbs. He had sent Scarsdale back to prison again, but even this only acted as a partial salve to his wounded self-esteem. He could not bear to be beaten or humiliated. And Scarsdale had thrashed him! He was conscious, too, that the goal was receding from him. He knew now that he had misunderstood Esther; that never for one moment, when he had been flattering himself that he was making progress, had Scarsdale been absent from her mind. And now there was another worry. Creditors were clamouring for money. He had posed as a rich man. He must stop his creditors' mouths. Let the news get abroad, and it meant social ruin; and he clung to the position into which he had raised himself.

Railton admitted him to The Firs. A quick glance at the marks still visible on his master's face, then he dropped his eyes to the ground.

"I am glad to see you back, sir!" he murmured. "Mr. Faversham is here. He has anticipated you by some three-quarters of an hour!"

Benny Beard was in the billiard-room, knocking the balls about. The dapper little man was wearing an uneasy, restless expression. He had heard of Scarsdale's re-capture, of Esther's illness, and the remorse that had been for so long gnawing at his heart-strings was gnawing yet more bitterly. Unprincipled scoundrel, thief, and perjurer he might be, but there was humanity somewhere in his composition. He loathed himself more than ever for his share in the business. He had tried to excuse himself. He had been dragged into it. Esther's white face and tearless eyes haunted him. He thought of her as she had been, all sympathy and tenderness, when she had tended him after his accident. What had she done that she should suffer thus?

"Heavens!" he muttered hoarsely, "and to think that I have had a hand in this! But I've done with the Marquis now—done with him for good. He can go his way; I'm going mine. God! but I've been a coward in the past, or I should have done this before now; but I'm going to do it now. I'm going to tell him so to his face!"

But he could not help a shudder. He was a moral coward. He dreaded breaking with this man who had been his master for so long. If he parted with the Marquis he might not be safe. The Marquis was unforgiving and vindictive. At the same time the Marquis had better be careful. They were both in the same boat.

Benny leant forward, played, missed and pocketed his own ball.

"If only that fellow Scarsdale were righted and that poor girl made happy, I should be able to sleep better at nights!"

But he was a coward. Yet he wondered if it would be possible, without incriminating himself.

When the door opened and Revelle entered, the expression on Benny's face was that of a guilty man. He did not look the former in the face as he shook hands. His words of greeting had a nervous ring.

"Had a good time, Benny?"

"Yes, Marquis, yes. And an innocent one. 'Pon my word! I think a quiet, innocent, respectable life suits me best. And you?"

Glancing at him shiftily he saw the traces of Scarsdale's handiwork on his face. Revelle winced.

"I say, Marquis, you ought to thank your stars that you came through that—that business at Gurlston Bay with your life!"

"I didn't send for you to talk over that," answered Revelle sharply. "I'm frightfully hard up. We must pull off the Normanhurst business at once. Fellows are howling for money. I'm in a desperate corner. We must pull it off this week!"

Benny Beard turned a little pale, and shifted his position nervously.

"Marquis," he stammered, "you'll excuse me, won't you, if I speak out; but I'm not having any this time. No—no more, thank you, if you don't very much mind!"

Revelle moved up to him deliberately, and laid a hand on his shoulder.

Digitized by Google

Deafness and Catarrh.
212 Cases Cured.

THE Semi-annual Report of the Drouet Institute lately published in the leading London daily papers gives a record of 212 cases of deafness, and ear, nose and throat diseases cured by the Drouet Method during the first six months of 1902. A brief analysis of these 212 cases shows results which are, to say the least, remarkable. Nearly one-half the patients before applying to the Institute had been under some form of treatment which had failed. There are numerous cases of deafness of 5, 10, 15, 20, and even 40 years duration in which restoration of hearing had been effected, and some of these patients had been "Stone Deaf." Then there are those astonishing cases, where deafness was cured at the age of 60, 65, 70, 75 and even 86 years. Again there are cases of sclerosis, or deafness from dry catarrh of the middle ear, pronounced incurable by many Aurists, which have yielded to the new treatment of the Drouet Institute, all of which give renewed hope to those who, after trying the older methods, have given up in despair. For those who suffer from catarrh of the nose and throat there are the histories of cures of cases of long standing in which the Drouet Method has been successful, even after operations and severe cauterizations of the nose and throat have failed.

Those who desire to read the complete details of the various cases can find very full descriptions in the latest number of the "Journal for the Deaf," a publication which is issued by the Institute as a means of assisting people who desire to gain a knowledge of the causes and the symptoms of deafness and diseases of the ear, nose and throat. Besides plain talks to the deaf, and to catarrhal sufferers, the "Journal" describes the method of treatment devised by Dr. Drouet, which consists chiefly of an external application placed on the prominent bony part of the skull just behind the ear. A free copy of the Journal with a "Supplement" containing an additional record of upwards of 40 cases cured during the past month, can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 72, Regent's Park Road, Primrose Hill, London, N.W.

A special feature of the Drouet Institute is the Correspondence Department which enables patients who cannot come to London for a personal consultation, to receive advice and all instructions for carrying on the treatment at home. This is accomplished by means of a Pathological Report Form which allows patients to give explicitly the details of their ailment. In fact all but a few of the 212 cases reported cured had treatment conducted by correspondence. The Report Form is always enclosed free with each copy of the Journal, and the advice by correspondence, as well as the consultation by means of the Form, is also absolutely free.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,
Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Cures in Ten Minutes
Never Fails!
Nothing "Like It" or "As Good"

KAPUTINE

The Safe Remedy for

HEADACHE & NEURALGIA

Supplied for use in the Field Hospitals of H.I.M. THE KING OF GREECE, the Red Cross Society in the South African War, the Anglo-Chinese Hospitals, &c., &c.

Recommended by many medical men, including Dr. Alexander, M.D., Dr. Thompson, M.D., Dr. Boyd Williams, M.D., &c., &c.

There is no similar preparation, nor anything as good.

All leading Chemists sell it at 1/-, packet of 18 doses, or for 12 stamps, from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." 1s and 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence,

Mrs. C. H.
(Room 8),
195 OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.

Digitized by Google

Good looks are assured, for beauty in the box is no exaggerated statement when made regarding David Macqueen's "Vegetine" Pills. These pills are universally acknowledged to be the GREATEST SPECIFIC OF THE AGE for clearing and beautifying the complexion through the purifying of the blood and the cleansing of the liver. THEY CONTAIN NOTHING BUT THE MOST BENEFICIAL AND HEALTH-GIVING PROPERTIES; all the elements being found in edible vegetables.

The pills are packed in the following size boxes, and forwarded post free:

1s. 1½d. (containing 30 pills)
2s. 9d. (,, 90 pills)
4s. 6d. (,, 180 pills)

To prove their priceless worth, a sample box containing 15 pills will be forwarded post free, on receipt of eight stamps. No further test will be required.

The David Macqueen's pills are privately and securely packed in turned wood boxes, and forwarded post free to any part of the world.

One of these small pills should be taken daily. They do not purge like other pills but afford that gentle laxative so beneficial to general health.

Remember, David Macqueen's "Vegetine" Pills will not cure every disease under the sun, but they will purify your blood, cleanse the liver, clear and beautify your complexion, and strengthen and invigorate the whole physical system.

A FEW RECENT TESTIMONIALS.

Mr. H. R. Francis, Beaulieu House, Shandon Road, Clapham Park, S.W., writes (May 15th, 1902): "You will be pleased to hear that after taking your pills my complexion has become most beautiful and clear. Though I am not vain, I find it difficult to abstain from seeing myself in every mirror I come across. I trust you will be able to make your remedy known to all the thousands of sufferers from sallowness and skin blemishes."

Miss M. A. B., of Brixton Hill, S.W., writes (May 5th, 1902): "I have much pleasure in informing you that since I have begun to use David Macqueen's Pills, a great change has come over me. My health has greatly improved, and my complexion (so my friends tell me) is charming, thanks to your pills. I shall certainly recommend them to my friends. P.S.—You can make what use you like of this, with the exception of the full name and number in address."

Miss A. K., Railway Road, King's Lynn (June 28th, 1902), writes: "I am very pleased to say that after taking your pills my complexion and health have improved wonderfully."

Miss Bertha H., of Stroud Green, N., writes (May 8th, 1902): "Gentlemen, I write to thank you for the pills which have certainly proved most beneficial. I intend to recommend them to my friends."

Mr. A. Kay, Chadwell Heath, Essex, writes (May 2nd 1902): "I have been taking your pills for a short time only but really must say they have a wonderful effect on my health. They do not purge or act violently in any way, but gently and surely bring about a most healthy state. Apparent outwardly and inwardly felt."

Mrs. S. Wilson, St. Margaret's Terrace, Station Road, Bognor (May 15th, 1902): "I enclose 1/1½ for your pills which please forward to me as before. I think it only right to let you know that I am more than satisfied with the results, and think that every word in your advertisements is true; as my complexion and skin was a great annoyance to me, but after taking one box of your pills my skin is getting simply lovely which I can only attribute to your wonderful blood purifying pills. I feel, when out, bound to stop everyone I see with a bad skin and tell them of your great remedy."

Order Form.

To the David Macqueen Company,

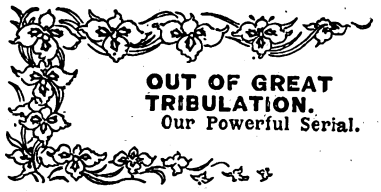
12 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Please forward me a box of David Macqueen's "Vegetine" Pills, for which I forward the sum of.....

Name_____

Address_____

Digitized by Google



"Benny, don't talk rot! You're in this business with me!"

The words had been spoken masterfully.

"But it isn't rot this time. I've had enough of it!"

"Don't talk nonsense!" said Revelle, again.

"It's not nonsense. The last business has sickened me. You've sent that poor chap back to prison; that poor girl's been lying on the brink of death. I've had enough, more than enough, I tell you. We'll part friends, and all that, Marquis, but I'm hanged if I'll go another inch along the road with you. It's no use you trying to argue with me, I've made up my mind!"

Revelle's lips were twitching. A hard look was in his eyes.

"I shouldn't break with me, Benny, if I were you," he whispered, with just a suspicion of a hiss in his voice, "or——"

His hand tightened on Benny's shoulder. Then Benny broke away from him, a nervous, but rather unpleasant expression in his eyes.

"Don't threaten me, Marquis, or I might be tempted to do the same. We're both in the same boat. If there's any sinking, we'd both sink together."

Revelle changed colour. He had looked upon Benny as completely under his thumb. He had never dreamt that he was really capable of breaking with him. He gave a little laugh. His whole manner had changed.

"Well, well, Benny, we don't want to quarrel. It won't make any difference to—er—our friendship. I shall miss you awfully—more than I can say. We've worked splendidly together. Of course, I've still got Railton; but he's not the same; but at the same time if you've made up your mind, it's no use discussing the matter further. But you won't be in a hurry to go, will you? Stay on here as long as you like. Glad to have you for your own sake!"

"It's awfully good of you!"—Benny did not seem any more at ease in consequence of the Marquis' change of manner—"but I think I shall be getting back to town this evening!"

"Very well, old chap. Please yourself. You're your own master, of course. I suppose you will be staying on at your old quarters. I shall be giving you a look up one of these days."

"Well, I'm not quite sure. I may travel for a bit. I haven't quite made up my mind. I'll let you know when I've definitely decided!"

"Very well. Come on, I'll play you a couple of hundred up, and give you fifty, that's about fair!"

Revelle took a cue from the rack, and proceeded to chalk it unconcernedly; all the same he was gravely exercised in his mind about Benny's future intentions.

"I am," he said rather inconsequently, "one of those fellows—you play first, Benny—who never forget and never forgive a bad turn. And I've had awful good luck in the past. I've never yet failed to get even with anybody who's played me a dirty trick."

Benny played his ball into baulk. Revelle stepped up to the table, leant forward, and glanced along his cue.

"I believe if a fellow played me false, I shouldn't think twice; I'd wipe him out of existence, and take my chance of the scaffold!"

He played a beautiful stroke, running his ball in off the red.

Benny's next stroke resulted in a bad miss. Revelle followed with a break of twenty-five.

"Yes"—Revelle was chalking his cue again—"the man who sells me will be signing his death-warrant at the same time."

"Marquis," suddenly snarled Benny, very white about the lips, "what the dickens are you driving at? Are you getting at me? Do—do you think that I should—should ever round on you?"

Revelle laughed.

"My dear Benny, you're hyper-sensitive! You round on me!"

He laughed again. But the situation was a strained one.

It was the haunting memory of a beautiful white face, an indescribable look of sadness in the dark eyes, that caused Benny to make a bad hash of the easy position Revelle had left him.

"But I tell you what, Benny, though you won't stand in with me, you might be a good chap and lend me your tools!"

"With the greatest of pleasure possible, Marquis. I—I brought them along with me. I thought you might like them. You do understand me, don't you? This is absolutely a friendly dissolution of partnership!"

"Of course, dear old chap! I'm afraid that you're suffering from Railton's trouble—loss of nerve. Say no more about it!"

* * * * *

"Railton, let me have a look at those plans."

"Yes, sir."

Mr. Faversham had taken his departure. Revelle was alone in the smoking-room. The silent valet drew some papers from his pocket—very carefully drawn up plans of The Towers, Lord Normanhurst's residence.

"I believe them, sir, to be quite accurate!"

He drew out another paper.

"This, sir, contains a time-table—if I may use the expression—of the policemen on night duty in this neighbourhood. I have to thank my two young constable friends for the facts scheduled there."

Revelle took it.

"This, Railton," he said after a comprehensive glance, "is simply admirable!"

Railton flushed a little, and bowed.

"And when, sir, if it is not an impertinent question, is it your intention to carry through this enterprise?"

"To-morrow night, single-handed. Mr. Faversham has resigned!"

"So I gathered, sir, from his rather sudden departure. I trust not in consequence of any friction?"

"Oh, no, we parted the best of friends!"

"Then to-morrow night, sir?"

"Yes, to-morrow night, Railton. Have you any suggestion?"

"Only this, sir, if you will pardon the liberty; would it not be as well—or perhaps you may deem it an excessive precaution—to be seriously indisposed to-morrow, confined to your bed, and let the fact be made known?"

Revelle nodded his head.

"You see, sir, in case of any unpleasantness arising, I should be able to testify to having attended you in the course of the night, the other servants being able to vouch for the same!"

"Yes, that sounds all right, Railton! Influenza to-morrow, then, let it be!"

(To be continued.)

First Woman: "I got a letter from you yesterday; but do you know it is dated next Wednesday week?" Second woman: "Good gracious! John must have posted it the very day I gave it to him."

Mrs. Strongmind: "Why don't you go to work?" Tramp: "Please, mum, I made a solemn vow twenty years ago that I'd never do another stroke of work till women was paid the same wages as men."

Mrs. Hansom: "I understand, sir, that you have secretly been making love to my daughter, and I must forbid an acquaintance begun in that way. You should have seen me first." Shrewd Suitor: "Madame, had I seen you first I should have forgotten your daughter and fallen in love with you." Mrs. Hansom: "Um—the informality of the proceeding was all I objected to. Come with me and I will introduce you to my husband."

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

The Cut Discourteous.

"F. K. B." made the acquaintance of a gentleman three years ago, and he used to pay her great attention. One day she thought he seemed rather cool, so the next time she met him she did not care to recognise him. She heard that he afterwards wondered why. She since thinks she has made a mistake. She likes him very much and would wish to be friends. Whose place is it to speak first?

* * * *

Evidently "F. K. B." has been in the wrong. However cool he may have been on the occasion in question, as she knew him socially, by cutting him she commits an offence, the penalty of which is the cessation of an acquaintance. His coolness may, for all she knows, have been caused by private worry or indisposition, and have had nothing to do with his feelings towards her. Why not take the opportunity next time she meets him of giving him a very nice bow, and if she gets a chance of speaking, tell him that she was afraid she had omitted to notice him the other day, "thinking at the time he was someone else," or some excuse of the kind. The man could scarcely be expected to take the initiative after her treatment of him.

The Cure for Ugliness.

"CAN one make oneself less ugly?" asks "STELLA," who confesses to being one of the plainest girls imaginable. "If you can recommend me any way by which I can improve my looks I shall be very much gratified."

* * * *

The surest way "STELLA" can improve her looks is to look after her personal character. Whoever knew people uncharitable enough to ridicule anyone's ugliness if they saw in it signs of a kind nature and generally attractive disposition? On the contrary, people altogether forget one's looks in one's character. Does not beauty grow hateful to those who contemplate it if it does not cover a nice character? Let "STELLA" altogether forget her looks and cultivate accomplishments, say singing, playing the piano, painting, fancy work, or a knowledge of useful books; let her do good actions whenever she can, and before many years her ugliness will have worn off entirely, as surely as the beauty of her friends does, and give place instead to the good looks of a good heart.

Should Girls go to Cafés?

"ADA" went with some girl friends the other night rather late to a West-end café, and while there was seen by a gentleman friend, who expressed his great surprise at seeing her at such a place. "ADA" maintained that there was nothing wrong in her conduct, and had rather a tiff with the man. However, she is prepared to abide by my judgment in the matter. Ought she to have gone there?

* * * *

There is nothing particularly wrong about it. On the Continent women of all classes go to cafés. But it is not so in England, where they are often not desirable places for girls of respectable parents. I should not like to see a girl friend of mine at such a place. There is, I repeat, nothing wrong, but a girl by going to places of this kind associates herself with an undesirable class and really derives no good from such visits. Of course a girl, escorted by her fiancé, or say her brother might go to such places, but certainly not with other gir friends.

The Shady Suitor.

MANY years ago Peter was a suitor for the hand of "ANNA H.," but just as things seemed to have been brought to a happy climax, something went wrong with him in business, and discreditable stories got about in connection with him. Of course "ANNA H." was compelled for the time being to break off the engagement, partly because Peter had not a penny to bless himself with. What was the truth of the stories against Peter, "ANNA H." never knew, but since this he has succeeded in placing himself in a splendid position, and has again applied for her hand. Do I think she should accept him, and if so, would her parents be likely to consent?

* * * *

What sort of a position has Peter now got into? Is it a responsible post in a really good undertaking? If so, I think "ANNA H." might safely reinstate him into her affections, and I cannot see that her parents need object to again receiving him as their prospective son-in-law. But "ANNA H." should be sure as to Peter's position. I have known young men of doubtful reputation who have announced that they were receiving munificent salaries as secretaries of companies, and at the end of three months have found themselves within an ace of the police-court as conspirators for fraud—the willing tools of bogus company promoters. Get a friend, "ANNA H.," to make a few inquiries as to Peter's position before you again take him in hand as a suitor.

The Happy Heiress Hunter.

"SHOULD a man look for a wife with money?" "JONAH" is a young man in a modest position, but believes that if he met a girl with money he could place himself independently in highly affluent circumstances. Having to work for the necessaries of life prevents his carrying out certain schemes he has in mind, and he thinks that if his household were secure he could really do great things in the world. Do I, therefore, think he would be justified in seeking a girl for her wealth alone?

* * * *

If "JONAH" thinks he can find a girl with wealth who is disposed to give herself and her fortune into his tender keeping I should certainly advise him to seek for her. Columbus sought for America, and many men are at present seeking for the North and South Poles. I do not discourage marriages for wealth, if they come off, provided always that the man is man enough not to expect to live on his wife's means, but is prepared to work at a profession. Such marriages have, in many cases, paved the way for men with brains but no money, and provided there is a certain amount of proper marital affection between the parties, these matches often result quite happily. So, "JONAH," don't bother about the ethics of the matter if you really think you can find that girl.

Etiquette for Mistresses.

"HETTIE" is a servant girl, and the other day her sister called. While she was there, her mistress entered the kitchen and appeared to be in a very amiable mood. "HETTIE" introduced her sister, who did not know how to act in the presence of the mistress. Can I tell her what would be the proper etiquette under the circumstances?

* * * *

The etiquette should be decided by the mistress. Of course it would not be usual for her to shake hands with a social inferior, so she would probably have bowed a "how d'you do," and entered into a general conversation. "HETTIE'S" sister would reply "Quite well, thank you," or something of the kind. In introducing anyone to a lady in such a position, the lady herself is expected to make the first acknowledgment, and all tactful people of good breeding would know how to save embarrassment to those introduced to them in a way which would at once facilitate conversation.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON, LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

"Strongest and Best."—Health.

Not a stimulant merely for the moment; but a Permanent and Agreeable Form of Nourishment

"TATCHO"

Gets the Hair Back.
Puts the Hair Right.
Keeps the Hair Right.

WHO SAY SO.

COMMANDER T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.
"Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902.
"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair."

MAJOR-GENERAL KEATE.
"High Croft, Winchester.
"I find the Renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time."

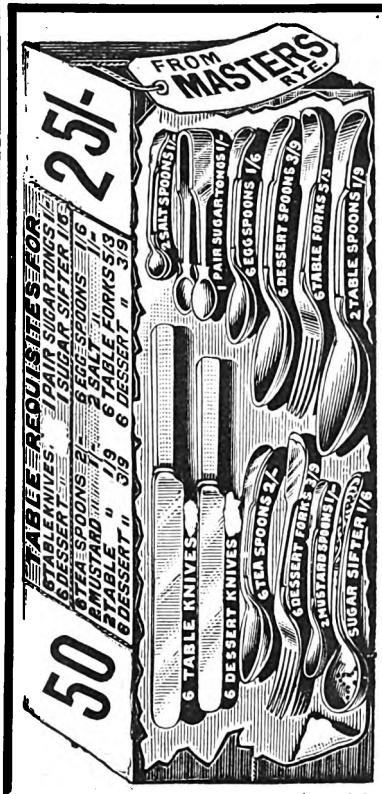
LADY SYKES writes:
"Mayfair, W.
"I can honestly recommend 'Tatcho.' It has really entirely renovated my hair."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFORUS PALŒLOGUE writes:
"Belvedere Hotel, Kensington, W.
"I would not be without it on any account."

MRS. BROWN POTTER.
"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

A 4/6 FULL SIZE BOTTLE of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' "Tatcho" is supplied to enable you to test its value at the NOMINAL PRICE of 1/10 at all Chemists', Stores, and Hairdressers', or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, 81 Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn, London.

Sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.



CUTLERY.

MASTERS' "MONSTRE" PARCEL

50 High-Class Articles For 25/-

EACH PARCEL Prices separate.

CONTAINS:	s. d.
6 Good Quality Table Knives	3 6
6 " " Dessert Knives	3 0
6 "Warewhite" Table Forks	5 3
6 " Dessert Forks	3 9
2 " Table Spoons	1 9
6 " Dessert Spoons	3 9
6 " Tea Spoons ...	2 0
1 Pair " Sugar Tongs	1 0
1 only " Sugar Sifter	1 6
6 " Egg Spoons	1 6
2 " Salt Spoons	1 0
2 " Mustard Spoons	1 0

Sent to any address on approval on receipt of 2/6

IF satisfactory, you send a further 2/6 on receipt, and complete purchase in monthly payments of 5/- each.

OR if you send the full balance WITHIN SEVEN DAYS, we will give you a handsome BREADKNIFE as Cash Discount.

MONEY REFUNDED IN FULL if Parcel is not approved of, and is returned to us AT ONCE.

CATALOGUE containing thousands of designs of WATCHES, CLOCKS, CUTLERY, PLATE, &c., Post Free to any address.

AGENTS. — SPARE TIME AGENTS wanted to introduce our Goods. Particulars, &c., POST FREE.

J. N. MASTERS LTD.,
157 HIGH ST., RYE, SUSSEX

The PRINCE OF WALES says:

"WAKE UP, ENGLAND."

DON'T PURCHASE FOREIGN POLISHES.

"MATCHLESS"

METAL POLISH.

POLISH, TINS & BOXES ARE ALL MADE AT OUR OWN WORKS IN LIVERPOOL.

By PURCHASING this POLISH you are Supporting BRITISH TRADE.

Should you have any difficulty in obtaining supplies, two 6½d. Tins will be sent Post Free (with address of nearest Dealer) on receipt of 1/-

MANUFACTURERS:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH Co. LTD., LIVERPOOL

EVERY WISE WOMAN
Will Insist on Having

CROSFIELD'S PURE CANE SUGAR

Sweeter and More Economical than Comm n Beet Sugars. It Produces NO Fermentat on.
The Best Sugar for Household Purpose. Write for Name of Nearest Agent to CROSFIELD'S LTD., Sugar Refiners, LIVERPOOL.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!
PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.
A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

"KKOVAH"

FLAVORED ONLY WITH RIPE FRUIT JUICES.

SUTCLIFFE & BINGHAM Ltd No 7, KKOVAH WORKS MANCHESTER

JELLIES

Chapman's ENTIRE-WHEAT Food

IS NOTHING NEW, BUT HAS Without Advertisement Stood the test of 30 years.

Every Physician knows that it contains the Greatest Nutriment in Smallest Compass.

BUILDS & SUSTAINS THE BODY.

Stocked by all Chemists,

CHAPMAN'S FOOD COMPANY, BATTERSEA.

SHORT STORIES

THE GREAT HOME STORY PAPER.

TARTAN COVER
No. 3.—MACLEOD.

No. 715.] Week ending September 13, 1902. [One Penny.

Digitized by Google

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2½ inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Eversot time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES'

Shakespeare

SPECIAL OFFER.

Lady's Silver Watch and Albert for 30/-

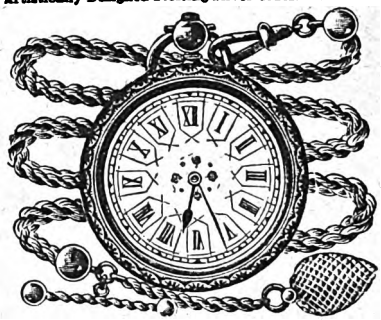
TERMS. 3/- with order, and balance by monthly payments of 3s.

DESCRIPTION. Sterling Silver Watch with horizontal movement fitted with all modern improvements and Fully Jewelled; Handsomely Finished Opal Dial Decorated and Embellished in High-class Style; Artistically Designed Sterling Silver Cases. Warranted Five Years.



Very Neat Two-row Sterling Silver Albert, with Bar and Drop Piece.

Watch and . . Albert complete in Elegant Case. 30/-

Send for our No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., Post Free.

Good Agents Wanted in spare time. Persons in regular employment should apply for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 18s 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted.—DEREHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

NOSE

RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (B'T), Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

SYMONDS' RELIABLE CYCLES.

STRONG CYCLES.

Symonds' Cycles are sound, will carry persons of any weight, Firm Frames combine rigidity with tensility. Prices £4 to £8. Cash or easy payments. James Robey, the Irish Giant Cyclist, rides a Symonds' Standard. Thousands of testimonials from satisfied patrons. Reduce your weight by cycling! Catalogues free on application. Mention name of this paper. Symonds' London Stores, 124-128 CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 3), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc. from 10/- MONTHLY

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money, and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment.

EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

GIVEN AWAY

With this Week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 452)

Paper Pattern OF THIS

GIRL'S COAT

For Autumn Wear.

(4 to 6).

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Price ONE PENNY.

DON'T MISS THIS.

OUR newest plan enables you to make a Regular Income as one of our agents, and get splendid presents earlier and quicker than by the old methods. To advertise our Bargain Catalogue, we intend giving away £5,000 worth of Presents:—Guaranteed Timekeepers, life-size Dolls, Dress Rings, and Jewellery of all kinds to every agent. Send your address to us at once (a post-card will do) and we will post you 12 articles of "Up-to-date" Jewellery to sell to your friends at 6d. each. Sold by other firms at 1s. 6d. When sold, remit the money to us, and we will send you the presents selected, together with agency terms. You take no risk whatever, as we take back unsold goods, and give you a present for your trouble in any case.

(Dept. 59) THE HYDE PARK WATCH Co., 14 Ranelagh Road, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MACKINTOSH'S

1s DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Short Stories

No. 715. One Penny.

For the Week Ending September 13th, 1902.

Princess Poppinjay.

The Tragic Little Story of a Village Wooing.

"Joshua! Whatever be the matter wi' ye?"

"Hannah!" he answered her, as he staggered, white-faced and trembling in every limb to his own arm chair in the chimney-corner. "I 'a sin a dead man—i' the watter younder!"

The old host of the "Black Jack" pointed, with shaky forefinger, out through the open doorway in the direction of the weed-covered, sluggish, ebbed stream of the disused canal.

"A dead man, Joshua! What be a dead man doin' here?"

"Thee's fulish, wife! How be I to know!"

"An' where were 'e, an' what wer' 'e like?"

Joshua Fibley continued to gaze vacantly in front of him, big beads of sweat standing thick upon his forehead, his hands the while twitching convulsively.

"'E wer' down in that flag bed, by the owd bridge—'is clothes were good, an' 'e looked as 'e wer' a gentry, but 'is face I coonna see, for 'e wer lyin' on it, an' it wer' unna the watter."

"What be ye a goin' to do about it, Joshua?"

"I dunno yet—a thing like that 'ull ruin the "Black Jack"—whatever I do——"

"Well, Hester will put it all right for us, but about this awesome thing, my man! Ye must do somethin' soon, afore folks get a hold on it."

"I must that! I'll just go down again an'—an' turn it over, an' see if I knows 'un."

"Don't go, Joshua! Don't go by theeself—wait for the sergeant as 'll be by on 'is rounds in half an hour for 'is early pint!"

"No, I tell 'ee! I'll go by myself first—now!"

He got up as he spoke, and shivering in spite of the July heat, went out into the sunshine and down the little sloping brick path towards the canal at the bottom of the garden.

There was not another house of any description for at least a mile round in any direction, the small lonely place, half farm, half public-house, seeming almost impossible of existence.

Farm labourers from the villages round, and occasional excursionists of the tripper sort (the spot being only thirty miles or so from the Metropolis) were the customers the "Black Jack" in the main depended upon, but it was a poor place, whose accommodation for both man and beast was of a kind at once the most primitive and scanty.

At the foot of the garden flowed, or rather crept, the canal the deserted, neglected aspect of which but added to its picturesqueness and charm.

With halting feet and beating heart the old man approached the spot where, but a short while before, he had seen the gruesome thing which had fastened itself upon his mind, to the exclusion of every other thought.

"Yes, there it was, just as he had first seen it. Why he should so desire to know more of this dead man, he could not satisfy himself, but there was the craving, and he could not shake himself free of it.

Not a human soul was in sight, not even a customer up at the house.

It was as much as he could do to bring himself to touch the inanimate piece of clay.

He was on the point of turning the body upon its back when he heard a shout from above.

"Joshua! Joshua!"

It was the voice of Hannah, his wife. He listened but did not answer.

"Joshua! Hester wants ye!"

Slowly again his old arms went down to turn the dead man so that he could see his face.

Down the brick path he could now hear the footsteps of some one running swiftly.

He made as though to sign back whoever it might be, though his lips, try as he would, could not frame a word, or even a whisper.

A supreme effort, and the suicide, or murdered man, lay before him, his face upturned to the sky.

A foreign and a handsome face, it was strange to him, and unfamiliar.

Nearer and nearer came the footsteps.

"Father!—where are you?" rang out a young, rich, contralto voice.

Then, before he could prevent her, she was by his side, and had seen the face of the dead.

Tall, stately, dark-eyed, and of a type absolutely un-English, she seemed on the instant to turn to stone.

She did not weep or wail, but with hands clenched in front of her, moaned out—"Istria—my Istria!"

"You know him?" asked the old man, in childish wonderment.

"Know him!" she answered wildly. "It is Istria Danielli—the father of my little Giacomo—my husband!"

Six years before, Hester Fibley, then about nineteen, and a remarkably handsome girl, had left her home at Trenunder to enter the service of the Countess of Rochdale as confidential maid.

Digitized by Google

So clever was she and tactful, that she speedily made herself invaluable to her mistress.

There was only one thing about her which troubled the Countess — viz., Hester's undoubted air of distinction, and her refined superiority to the ordinary members of her class and station.

As a matter of fact, Hester had better taste in dress than had Lady Rochdale herself, wore her clothes more effectively and becomingly than did the modern representative of ancient Norman blue blood, and was therefore largely in the nature of a thorn in the aristocratic side of the old dowager.

Lady Rochdale was, in her way, curiously unconventional, almost eccentric; one of the most noticeable of her peculiarities being a mania for the entertaining of foreign notabilities, or, at any rate, those who passed for such. At her country place near Trenunder, and also in Grosvenor Square, she was for ever surrounding herself with the good, bad, and indifferent of Europe, from Paris to Petersburg.

It was this habit and custom of hers which ultimately led not only to Hester's domestic secession, but also to the creation of a social wonder, lasting more than the proverbial nine days.

One particular season, the special shining light of the usual somewhat motley Rochdale gathering in London was a certain Prince Istria Danielli, a connection by marriage of the great Italian house of the Borghese.

This gentleman was, for one of his nationality, more than ordinarily wealthy, the great majority of the modern Italian nobility being notoriously poorer even than the very poorest of church mice.

But it was his attractive personality quite as much as his money, which called forth the by no means shy glances of society's daughters, both fair and otherwise, though without doubt it was the Danielli ducats which operated largely in making the handsome prince the object of every manœuvring mamma's super-polite attention.

It will readily be imagined, therefore, that when, on the eve of Lady Rochdale's biggest and last function of the season, Prince Danielli suddenly and mysteriously disappeared, and when also her ladyship's confidential maid vanished in like manner, leaving behind her for her mistress' edification and enlightenment a note signed "Hester, Princess Danielli," society was shaken from its foundation to its centre.

Of course the general opinion on the defection of "His Excellency," and on the "shame-faced treachery" of Hester Fibley, was wholly condemnatory—with one exception.

That exception was Kenneth Ogilvie, Lady Rochdale's secretary and man of affairs.

A young man of poor Scottish family and descent, Kenneth Ogilvie, while being beyond question the true, refined gentleman, was liberal-minded and practical, in straightforward, healthy, commonsense fashion.

Appearances counted for little or nothing with him, and when handsome Hester came upon the scene and into his life, he thought not of her birth or parentage, but let her see unmistakably that did she please she had it in her power to make him the happiest of men.

Then entered the "fairy prince," and though other people were blind to the Italian's secret wooing of Hester, Kenneth Ogilvie, with the insight of true love, divined it—and realised his helplessness.

There was no mutual promise between him and Hester, therefore he could but be silent and watch events in her interests.

Still, when the catastrophe did come, when this "girl of the people" removed herself without a word from his reach, he felt hurt and sore, for though the love-lamp of his life would yet remain with him, the light had gone out.

To make matters worse he had to listen to all sorts of comments upon Hester and her works, his own mouth being of necessity sealed.

Thus he was left with an image impressed upon his heart and memory, that would remain with him until his dying day.

* * * *

Five years after Kenneth Ogilvie's last sight of Hester, he happened to be staying with a bachelor acquaintance in the neighbourhood of Trenunder for the week-end.

His friend, a hard-worked journalist, and literary man generally, was enthusiastic upon this especial corner of the kingdom.

"My boy!" he said after dinner, on the Saturday evening, "for lovely country, lovely air, and lovely women, there isn't another place in Great Britain that can beat hereabouts!"

"No?" said Kenneth, who, in their latter days found it difficult to get up enthusiasm upon anything; even the most remarkable. "You seem, Davidson, to know all about it."

"Know all about it! Why, of course I do, man! And, talking of lovely women, I saw one fair specimen when I was down here a fortnight ago, who, I think, would bring you out of your cave, my knight of the dismal countenance."

Even this did not rouse the other to respond in kind.

"I'll tell you what little I know of the story connected with this lady fair—it is a veritable romance."

"Romance in these days!" said Kenneth Ogilvie, with just the ghost of a smile. "Go on; but you mustn't expect me to believe it, all the same."

"Miserable sceptic! But listen! Once upon a time in this very village, or town rather of Trenunder, a certain poor couple lived with one child, a daughter. As the girl grew up, she developed personal gifts that might have been envied by ladies of the highest of high degrees, thereby incurring the jealous dislike of every other member of her sex, throughout the whole countryside.

"Nothing very romantic or unusual in that!" remarked Kenneth.

"By-and-by," the other proceeded, "the damsel took service with some big family, and, for all practical purposes, was seen no more by the folks of these parts. A year ago, however, a lady, with a boy infant, a nurse, and two other servants, put up for a few days at this very hotel. I won't excite your derisive faculty by mentioning the name she gave, merely saying that it was a peculiarly high-sounding foreign one."

"Foreign?" queried Kenneth, displaying slightly more interest in the narrative.

"Yes, sir! but 'foreign' of the very best hall-mark, the name, that is. Well, now comes the astonishing part of the whole tale—the romantic part of it. This lady (who, by-the-way, spoke English perfectly) one day ordered a carriage, and drove, alone, to the cottage inhabited by the old parents of the beautiful maiden I told you of. There she remained awhile, returning in the evening to her hotel."

"And the next day departed, bag and baggage, for parts unknown, I suppose?" queried Kenneth.

"Nothing of the kind, my too previous friend!—nothing of the kind! Within a week of the arrival of the fair visitor, whom many had recognised as the some time absent daughter of the aforesaid old couple, the latter removed out of Trenunder, and, though hitherto absolutely unpossessed of means, entered into the occupancy of a small, lone public-house and farm in the valley, and about five miles on the Porterbury road. When fairly settled at the "Black Jack," the lady and her baby-boy (the servants returning to London) joined the new host and hostess of the solitary little place, staying for a week or ten days. She repeats this short visit every three or four months, and is known among folks for miles round as 'Princess Poppinjay.'"

Digitized by Google

"Has she paid this periodical visit of late?" asked Kenneth, with curious quickness.

"My boy! she's here, or rather there, now! Her being so it was that reminded me of this very pretty little drama of real life. By-the-way, I forgot to say that, according to rumour, she met, during her period of service, with some foreigner of distinction, who, falling in love with her, married her, and carried her off to his native heather. Her sudden return, alone, is certainly strange and unaccountable, while no one seems to know whether her husband is dead or alive. Of course, as she appears to have plenty of money, she it is who has put old Tibley and his wife into this little business, though it is a bit inexplicable her choosing so primitive and poor a place, seeing that she herself uses it every now and then as a sort of secret rest and refuge."

"And she is there now, you say?"

"Yes."

"Can you direct me to this "Black Jack" inn?"

"Oh—oh! Why, I'll show you the way to it myself to-morrow."

"Thanks! But, if you don't mind, Davidson, I'd sooner go alone."

"Oh, very well! Only, mind, I shall expect a full, true, and particular account of everything!"

"That depends. I make no promise."

* * * * *

Except to travellers, the "Black Jack" was shut for business purposes until midday, not a single sign of life being visible about it, as Kenneth Ogilvie strolled up to the open gate of the neglected-looking little farm-yard.

He began to think that his errand would be in vain; that a hope, new-born during the past twelve hours, was to fade and fail, as every other hope had faded and failed.

It was while he was thus balancing probabilities in his mind, that he saw, through the green tracery of the hollyocks and the dahlias, in the garden at the side of the house, the gleaming in the sun of a white dress.

Not stopping to think, he moved across the yard, mounted the few rickety brick steps which led up to the garden level, and in a moment was face to face with the one woman in all the world for him.

"Mr. Ogilvie!"

"Yes, Hester! I, indeed!"

"But—but how did you find me? What do you require of me?"

"As to how I found you, chance did much, and opportunity the rest. All that I require of you is to know if you are well and happy."

"It is kind of you! You were always kind."

"Was I? I don't remember! But, tell me—can I be of any service to you? I feel, somehow, that something is troubling you!"

"Mr. Ogilvie—but come along this path towards the canal; I would rather that my father or mother did not see or hear me talking to you."

"Surely not as an old friend!"

"They know nothing of old friends! They only know that I married a rich and titled man, and that less than twelve months after my wedding day, my husband, in some mysterious way, was spirited away from me, his brother, who always hated him, assuming the title and property, with the exception of that portion of the latter settled upon me by my husband, Prince Istria Danielli."

She spoke the name with a proud insistence which well became her, and Kenneth thought he had never seen her look so beautiful as she did at that moment.

"Yes," she went on, looking away from him, "there is something! I have a trouble! and, perhaps—who knows?—you may be come to help me."

"Believe that, Hester! I cannot call you else. Yes, believe that! Now, tell me, and what man may do to help you, that will I, for—for the old-time memories' sake!"

She could not but rightly interpret his meaning, the ring of his voice betraying him in spite of himself.

Then she told him,

Married to the Prince at a registry-office on the very morning of Lady Rochdale's reception, she left with him for Paris on the following evening. Staying in the French capital only long enough to have the religious ceremony performed at the Italian Embassy, she and her husband (whom she described as an honourable, true, and good man) travelled on without delay to the latter's estate on the Venetian frontier. Here, in the Palazzo Danielli, they lived happily for a little more than ten months; until, indeed, just after the birth of her boy.

Then, one day, Istria, her husband, started for Florence to meet his brother, and never returned. In a week Marco Danielli turned up, accompanied by a notary and the local syndic, and said that his brother Istria must have perished in some manner by the way. No one remembered to have seen him at the Venice railway station so that he must have disappeared with his horse before arriving at the City of Waters.

Given to understand that she must give immediate possession to the claimant brother, Hester, through another and friendly notary, secured her own interests, which, owing to her husband's generosity, were on a most liberal basis.

Although her husband fully had her affection, she would have been content at this point to leave with her child for England, but for one thing. Marco Danielli had possessed himself of certain papers which would be necessary in the future to establish her son's rights to the Danielli title and estates. These Marco refused to surrender, or rather denied all knowledge of their existence.

Wearied at last with her futile quest, she decided to go to England, and to wait events.

Now, through the friendly notary, with whom she was in constant communication, she had word that Marco Danielli was endeavouring to dispose of certain priceless jewels, pictures, and other property, and that unless action of some sort were taken to prevent him, the most valuable part of the family belongings would assuredly be lost for ever.

In the end, it was hastily arranged that Kenneth Ogilvie, as Princess Istria Danielli's representative, should proceed to Italy, and do his best with Notary Maffei's help, to circumvent Marco's fraudulent intentions.

It was also agreed that Kenneth and Hester should meet in the morning by the old bridge on the canal to discuss final matters.

"Good-bye!" she said, "don't go back through the house yard; keep straight along the canal side, and it will bring you out close by the "George."

"Good-bye, Hester!" he answered, waving his hand to her as he passed under the bridge, and so out of sight.

* * * * *

The next morning, before Kenneth had even thought about starting for his rendezvous with Hester, he was told that the local sergeant of police wanted to see him.

Digitized by Google

"Beg pardin, sir, for disturbin' you, but Mrs. Filbey's daughter, up at the "Black Jack," her as is known hereabouts as 'Princess Poppinjay,' wants to see you particular."

"Why, of course, what is it?"

Kenneth marvelled much at receiving a reminder of his appointment by such a messenger.

"Well, sir!—there's murder or something very much like it."

"Murder—what do you mean?"

"Well, it may be suicide, but I has my doubts."

"Murder!—suicide! What is it, man?"

"There's a body bin found in the canal, by the old bridge, sir, an' it turns out to be the Princess' husband, sir!"

"Prince Istria Danielli? Why, she thought him dead years ago!"

"Perhaps, sir, you'd best go down an' see her, she's mighty upset! I've got to go into Porterbury for the county superintendent."

In less than half-an-hour Kenneth was in one of the rooms of the "Black Jack."

Hester's one cry to him was "He came to find me! He came to find me!"

To soothe her he promised to proceed on his journey at once, in order that he might try and get at the bottom of the mystery.

Before doing this, however, he insisted that she should leave the place, return to London with her boy, and await there the result of his efforts and inquiries.

He did not attempt to conventionally comfort her, feeling that, whatever the virtues of the dead man, he himself would act the hypocrite in being otherwise than relieved at her being once more a free woman.

Her last words to him were "I cannot understand it—make it clear for me, and I will be grateful—very grateful!"

By daybreak next morning he was at Calais on the road to Trieste and the Palazzo Danielli.

* * * * *

The evening shadows were gathering fast as Kenneth Ogilvie sat, taking a hasty meal, in Florian's, on the Piazza of St. Mark's, Venice.

He had arrived at the Palazzo Danielli the afternoon of the day previous, to be informed by Notary Maffei that Marco Danielli was at that moment in Venice, and, having effected his object, was preparing to leave in forty-eight hours for Trieste, en route, it was believed, for South America.

Kenneth went back again, therefore, to the queen city of the Adriatic, the honest little notary engaging to follow on in the course of a few hours.

Little imagined Kenneth that that night would connect him, and one very dear to him, with one of the greatest calamities the artistic world has ever sustained.

Then, Giovanni Maffei bustled into Florian's, joined Kenneth at his table, and poured out a budget of red hot news.

"No wonder the poor fellow disappeared for all these years! The villain Marco had him seized, the day of his visit to Florence, just outside his own grounds and conveyed to a private asylum for the insane.

"It was not until one of the asylum attendants was persuaded by Prince Istria to believe in his sanity and to help him to escape—an event which took place only a fortnight ago—that it was possible for him to attempt to right the wrong.

"Unfortunately, however, he did not come to me first, but procuring funds from an old friend whom he swore to secrecy, made at once for England in search of his wife.

"As you have told me, and as there can be no doubt, he missed his way in the dark, and was drowned without chance of help. How he found out his wife's whereabouts we shall never know, beyond the fact that he knew she originally came from Trenunder."

"Now, Signor Maffei," said Kenneth, "we have only to deal with this Marco—if we can. He has these papers, there is no doubt, and I fancy that if you call upon Italian law to check him, we shall yet be able to bring him to book."

"Si, signor, si! But look, there he is—there, quick, our hats. You pay the bill! I will after him—and you follow—to the left by the Campanile!"

Kenneth caught the little notary up before he had gone half the side of the piazza.

"There he is—see! Ah, he disappears!"

What followed is matter now of history.

There was a mighty rending sound, a roar like that of an explosion, and the great Campanile, the glory of Venice, four hundred and more feet high, suddenly fell upon its own base, almost like a pack of cards.

People shrieked, great clouds of dust rose up to obscure St. Mark's and the Doge's Palace.

It was hopeless in the face of this national calamity to expect success in their quest; the notary and Kenneth, therefore, after hearing that no one presumably was killed, went back to Florian's.

A couple of hours later, however, it was rumoured that a man's body had been found under a portion of the ruined tower. Out of curiosity Kenneth and his companion went to see, and the lawyer's first glance was enough.

"It is Marco Danielli!" said he, and (to the officials present) "I, as the legal representative of the Princess Istria Danielli, claim that everything found on the person of this man may be impounded by the State until I have proved my case on my client's behalf."

A month or so afterwards Kenneth Ogilvie, personally handed to Hester, in London, the packet of papers attesting her son's heirship and titular rights.

With regard to Hester's gratitude and the nature of it, one thing only can be said—she has promised to talk it over with him twelve months hence, and he is perfectly satisfied, for he feels that she will keep her word.

Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google

A Horrid Little Flirt.

A DAINTY TALE OF A LOVE DUEL.

"Yes, it's quite true, Jack—she's a lovely girl—and as charming in manner as in feature. I can't describe her to you—she's beyond description! But she's a horrid little flirt! If I were you I wouldn't go near the place! You take my tip, old man."

Jack looked at his companion, a tall, slim, young man, with jet black hair, and a handsome moustache of the same colour, then he cast a glance in the mirror opposite, and beheld himself; his companion was much the handsomer man of the two, for Jack barely reached the middle height, he had light hair and a very poor apology for a moustache, and, worst of all, it was straw-coloured! Then his eyes were bluey-grey, and looked quite ordinary compared with his friend's fine dark orbs.

"Miss Harley surely couldn't have resisted your charms?" he said, smiling.

"I tell you she has broken the hearts of a dozen fellows already—and mine among them," said the other, trying to look melancholy.

"Well, I shall go and still hope to return heart-free in spite of this syren's charms," laughed Jack.

But his companion shook his head at him sadly as he left the room.

Mabel Harley was indeed all that Jack's friend had said of her; her beautifully-moulded figure, her trustful brown eyes, and her wavy golden hair, all combined to give her that peculiarly attractive appearance that had led to the fascination and subsequent downfall of so many would-be lovers. But if we were to endeavour to adequately describe the charms and graces of this naughty little flirt—we should require a volume setting aside for the purpose, so following the example of Jack's friend, we wisely forbear with the remark that "she was beyond description!"

"Who is that blonde young man opposite, who keeps looking this way?" Mabel asked of the lady who sat next her, feeling in her wicked little heart that she had already made another conquest.

"Oh, that's Jack Ordry, studying, I believe, for the Bar. He is over for a visit at his uncle's," replied the lady addressed.

"By Jove!" muttered Jack under his breath. "The fellow didn't exaggerate in the least—she's simply charming! Jack Ordry, take care!"

After dinner Jack received a formal introduction to Miss Harley. He invited her to dance, and Mabel complied with a smile which was the more dangerous on account of its seeming innocence. Ah! that smile had done more damage to the hearts of her victims than the blackest frown in existence!

After the dance the two strolled away together, and took a seat almost hidden from view by the spreading leaves of a palm.

"It's all up with him!" whispered one of the guests significantly. "It's a pity, too, he's such a nice young man, and so straightforward himself. He'll believe every word she says."

"Are you fond of society, Mr. ——?" Mabel queried, fixing her lovely eyes on him.

"Call me Jack, if you please, it is easier to remember, and sounds so much nicer from your lips," Jack responded with one of his most slavish looks.

Mabel smiled winningly; so she had made another conquest already. She wished that fellows wouldn't lose their hearts quite so readily—it spoilt the fun.

"With regard to society, I think it depends to a great extent upon the people one meets there. Sometimes I feel awfully bored, but I am enjoying myself to-night immensely."

He cast at her another loving glance as he spoke.

"Oh, for shame, Jack!" she cried, slapping him playfully on the back. "And now"—she continued with pretended gravity—"I am going to concede a point and allow you to call me Mabel."

His answer was a surprise to her. "How delightful! Especially as there will be no danger!"

"Danger of what?" she responded quickly.

"Of us falling in love—or any of that sort of nonsense. We shall be just like brother and sister together."

Then her conquest was not so complete after all, and Mabel answered in momentarily pique—"There certainly will be no danger as far as I am concerned!"

Jack answered with wonderful frankness: "Nor as far as I am concerned either. I think thirty is quite young enough for that sort of thing, and how pleasant it will be to be able to talk naturally to each other without the constant fear of being misunderstood."

"What a horrid fellow!" Mabel cried, stamping her foot passionately on the carpeted floor of her own room. "The very idea of talking to me like that! But I'll punish him—I'll make him fall head over ears in love with me, and then just tell him what I think of him!"

"So the duel has begun," Jack soliloquised. "Lucky I was forewarned! I wonder who has had the best of it. I've got it bad myself anyway. I must wait a day or two to recover before I make a fresh attack!"

So Jack waited two days before he paid the Harleys a visit. Mrs. Harley compelled him to take afternoon tea with them, and Jack confined his attention almost entirely to the old couple; they were simply delighted with him, while Mabel thought his inattention to herself was positively rude.

However, Mabel schemed to get a few moments alone with Jack in the garden after tea, and then she commenced her pre-formed plan of revenge with her utmost ability. She talked glibly on various subjects, and again and again her eyes shot coy glances, and her lips formed into the most bewitching little smiles and pouts at his answers; now she would stoop suddenly but with matchless grace to cull a flower, then she would stand erect in front of him playfully barring the way; finally she insisted upon fixing a flower in his button-hole, allowing her hands to linger for a moment near his neck, which has a very tragic effect upon a young man if he is at all susceptible. For a time she thought she was succeeding pretty well in her wicked plot, and at last felt emboldened to put the question :

Digitized by Google

"What sort of girls do you admire most, Jack ?"

Oh, how he longed to throw his arms round her waist and cry passionately : "You—you are the sort of girl I most admire and love !" But he managed to control himself, and answered quite calmly : "I am afraid that I am no connoisseur on the subject. As a rule, girls all look very much the same to me."

"But have you never been in love, Jack ?" she asked.

Jack treated this as some huge joke. "Good gracious, no !" he laughed. "As I said before, I think it is plenty of time to be in love when one gets to be thirty."

If Mabel felt mortified at his answers she covered her confusion ably enough, and her laughter never sounded merrier nor more unaffected, than as she led the way back to her parents.

"A very successful evening," Jack commented, as he threw himself down on the bed.

"Positively detestable !" cried Mabel, "I hate him !—and I know he does care for me—he couldn't help it !"

Jack's visits were frequent after this, he said there was nothing he liked better than a conversation with Mr. Harley, and one of Mrs. Harley's cups of tea—Mrs. Harley could make tea ! This he intimated to one who always repeated everything—a very useful vehicle if one knows how to manage it.

Mabel's conduct towards Jack changed and she became more "stand offish." Under these new tactics she felt sure she should draw him on. Jack, however, was not to be drawn on, he was always very polite, and beyond that seemed to take no further interest in her whatever.

"I have it !" she cried, after having lain awake for two whole hours plotting, "I'll make him jealous !" Then she rolled over and went to sleep in less than five minutes.

Now there was in the neighbourhood a certain Colonel who showed undisguised admiration for Mabel ; a few weeks ago Mabel would have liked nothing better than a little flirtation with the Colonel, but now her whole desire was to make Jack fall in love, and she realised little gratification from this new escapade.

However, she went walks with the Colonel and generally contrived to drop across Jack ; that young gentleman, however, contrary to expectations, showed the utmost unconcern, he raised his hat and positively smiled when he first met them —to Mabel's great disgust.

But having considered it out in her wise little head, Mabel concluded that Jack knew her reputation for flirting so well that he considered this as nothing more than one of the others —she was positively certain this must be the case—"Or else," she asked herself, "how could he help being jealous ?"

A week later the neighbourhood were surprised by the announcement that Miss Harley and the Colonel were engaged to be married. "Now we shall see !" Mabel said to herself triumphantly.

The next day Jack dropped in for tea, Mabel met him with a smiling countenance.

"I suppose you have heard the news ?"

"Yes," he replied cheerfully, "and have taken this early opportunity of calling to congratulate you." He spoke so calmly, could it be possible that he didn't care, after all ?

"The Colonel is a splendid fellow ! So handsome ! Everybody is fond of him !—and though you perhaps could have done better—well, it's best to choose the one that we really love."

Then Jack took his seat at the table, and talked away to the older couple, but the worst of it was he seemed unable to speak to Mabel without bringing the Colonel's name in every time ; he seemed a good deal more pleased about the arrangement than Mabel herself. Why couldn't he let the subject drop !

"And when is the marriage to take place, Mabel ?"

"I don't know !" She answered so shortly that both Mr. and Mrs. Harley turned to look at her.

Only Jack didn't notice, and went on innocently :

"Anyway, you'll invite me to the wedding—I shall be back in town by then, I expect, but you must write and let me know."

Jack seemed to think it must be a pleasure to Mabel to keep on harping upon this one subject. At last she could bear it no longer, but rose abruptly and left the room.

Jack returned home moody and dissatisfied, he was not at all sure of his ground, but he consoled himself by the thought that if he had betrayed his love, she would have only treated him the same as the rest of them—better that she should never know.

The engagement with the Colonel only lasted a fortnight, then the report was circulated over the town that the match was broken off. That afternoon Jack made another call.

"And how's the Colonel ?" he queried.

They were standing alone in the garden together.

"I don't know," she replied sullenly. "Haven't you heard that the engagement has been broken off ?"

"I am extremely sorry," cried Jack. "Could I do anything to explain this misunderstanding—for I am sure it is only a misunderstanding ?"

"No ; it is quite irrevocable—I find that I do not care for him—I love another."

There was a look in her eyes that conquered Jack all in a moment. He knew that he was a fool. He had been forewarned what would happen—he went into the snare with his eyes open—simply because he couldn't help it.

"Mabel," he gasped, "dare I hope that I am the one ?"

She looked at him unmoved, that fickle smile still upon her lips. "But you know you do not intend to be married until you are at least thirty ?" she said wickedly.

"Mabel," he cried passionately, "I have loved you all along !" And he was pouring into her ear the tale of burning love.

So she had conquered, at last her revenge was consummated !

Perhaps Jack saw something of triumph in her eyes, for he broke off in the midst of his appeal and cried fiercely :

"I know that I am a fool to let you know !—I was told that you had no heart—you cannot love nor know what love is ! Well, you have heard my tale and added another conquest to your list ! And now farewell for ever !" He turned abruptly and left her standing there.

"Jack ! Jack ! Come back to me—I do love you !"

And Jack turned to see her little hands stretched out towards him, while her wonderful beauty was enhanced ten-fold by the soft light of love that shone from her eyes.

"Ah !" she sighed, her lovely head resting on his shoulder, and her arms incircling his neck, "I did not know what it was to be in love then—had I known I would never have led others on !"

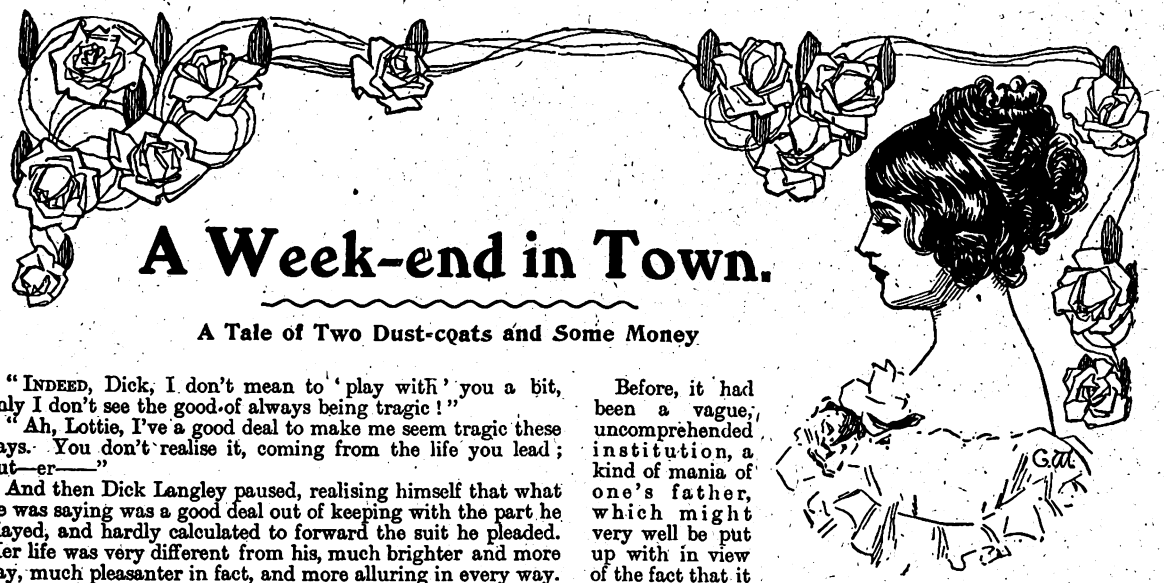
Then she put her arm through his and they walked back very slowly towards the house.

W. H. Martin.

"A FOE IN THE FAMILY"

is the title of the splendid new serial story which is to commence in "SHORT STORIES" in a few weeks' time.

Digitized by Google



A Week-end in Town.

A Tale of Two Dust-coats and Some Money

"Indeed, Dick, I don't mean to 'play with' you a bit, only I don't see the good of always being tragic!"

"Ah, Lottie, I've a good deal to make me seem tragic these days. You don't realise it, coming from the life you lead; but—er——"

And then Dick Langley paused, realising himself that what he was saying was a good deal out of keeping with the part he played, and hardly calculated to forward the suit he pleaded. Her life was very different from his, much brighter and more gay, much pleasanter in fact, and more alluring in every way. But was this the time to point out the differences? Was it wise for him, who sought to induce her to link herself to him and his life for ever, to insist now upon these sufficiently obvious differences, the change for her that marriage with him would involve?

He sighed, and his eyes straying down from the dainty chiffon about her neck, along the exquisite material of her summer gown, to where two glistening points of grass-green leather, soft as satin, showed where her little feet nestled half under the seat—his eyes taking in these things told him that her costume of to-day represented at least a month of his poor salary.

The unshadowed gaiety of her bright face might have been smiled upon as pure beauty by most men. To poor Dick, in his present mood, it meant several thousands of sovereigns per annum in maintenance. Poverty would bring shadows there, he thought; the absence of the thousand and one luxuries which each day brought her would soon overcloud that face and overcome the sunshine of it.

"You are right, dearest," said he, with another half-suppressed sigh. "And I am all wrong. I won't be 'tragic' any more. It was sweet of you to come this afternoon, and throw over that garden-party; and I'm an ungrateful wretch to repay you with boredom."

Lottie Crane beamed upon her rather melancholy lover. He was really a "dear" she told herself, for the thousandth time at least; and it was a horrid shame that his father should have been ruined, and died, and left his wife and son and daughter so poor, and—and the rest of the unhappy story. It would have been so much nicer if things could have gone on in the old happy, careless fashion, as they went when she had first met Dick, two years ago, at the Langley's luxurious place near Maidenhead. What lovely summer days on the river those had been! And how jolly Dick had been, choosing her from among the other nice girls in all their excursions and amusements! Business was a horrible thing, thought Lottie. Even her wealthy old uncle and guardian, the great diamond merchant, was sometimes upset, and made grumpy, by this same business.

"I wish people could get on without business and money, and those things," said she, prettily, to Dick. "It would be so much jollier if the government, or—somebody, could supply all the really nice people with everything they wanted, and let the horrid people do all the business!"

"Ye-es," Dick was understood to agree with dainty Lottie in this revolutionary sentiment. Business meant distasteful routine and a hundred and twenty pounds a year to Dick—now.

Before, it had been a vague, uncomprehended institution, a kind of mania of one's father, which might very well be put up with in view of the fact that it provided the means of settling one's bills, buying new boats, horses and what not, and, in short, of keeping one well ahead of one's fellows in the jolly, flirtatious sport called life. But now—well, everything was different now.

Dick's father, one of the most daring speculators of his day, had died, an almost penniless bankrupt, two years before this summer afternoon. The world in which Dick had industriously played up till the age of twenty-five knew him no more; Maidenhead was a distant Paradise, remote indeed from the terraced street in Brixton, to which Dick wended his weary way from Cannon Street each evening. His poor mother had grown undeniably fractious of late, in the dusty, fusty little Brixton "front parlour," and Madge, his pretty sister, the best sculler and punter of her sex at Maidenhead, was drooping, these June afternoons, like a flower whose roots lacked nourishment. Poor Madge held that morning and afternoon "governessing" was worse than "anything in the City."

But it was not quite true that the world of his youth knew him no more. Two links between it and Dick remained yet unsevered. One of them, in the charming person of Lottie Crane, sat beside him at this moment, upon a green-painted seat in the Park, close to which she had been in the habit of meeting Dick on Saturday afternoons for quite a long while. The other was an old college chum, Henry Marley, who dined with Dick every Saturday evening in a famous restaurant near Piccadilly, and played billiards with him afterwards in a hall below the dining-room. This link had come very near to snapping, apparently, by reason of Dick's insisting upon taking his share in the small expense involved in these weekly evenings out. But Marley's good-nature had triumphed at last, and Dick's pride was smoothed by his being allowed to pay for the billiards, whilst his friend's play was rather spoilt by the necessity of allowing Dick to win in the last game, and so lose nothing by the evening's amusement.

The first link, personified in pretty Lottie Crane, was of gossamer; the other, of the steel by which friends are bound one to another. Yet there was no sort of doubt but that the first tie, fragile though it might be, was yet by far the more precious to Dick Langley.

Fascination is still stronger than affection, and the love of a man for a maid, a passion that still will thrill him more deeply than can any relation with those of his own sex. But it is surprising upon what slight and fragile foundations the blind god will erect his fairy palaces—and, alas! how apt the structures are to topple over at first breath of an unkind wind, or even to disappear in a single night, as the result of, let us say magic, or the work of evil sprites.

Digitized by Google

In the case of Dick Langley and Lottie Crane the foundations were singularly slight. Just two months prior to the disastrous collapse in the midst of which Dick's father had died by his own hand, in his Moorgate Street office, Lottie had arrived at the Langley's beautiful river-side home with a school-friend of Dick's sister. That had been her introduction to the Langley household. It was known that she was an orphan, and that her uncle and guardian, with whom she lived, was a wealthy man and an eccentric, with a fine house and estate in Surrey, which he seldom saw, and a large flat in London. His charming ward had every possible liberty, and was encouraged to visit and amuse herself with girl friends, and particularly, under the wing of the mother of one of these friends, Mrs. Lane Thompson. The Langleys had never met Lottie's uncle; indeed it was understood that the old gentleman did not meet people at all in the pleasure-loving world in which the Langleys lived and had all their interests.

"I had no end of trouble with dear old uncle before he would let me come up to the flat for this week-end, Dick," Lottie had explained on the present sunny afternoon of her meeting with Dick. "And, you know, it really was difficult getting up from Deepdene by myself on Saturdays; such a long way, and—people wondered, and——"

"Yes, yes; I can guess; and it was sweet of you to have come so regularly, darling," said Dick. "And now, don't you think you will let me come and see your uncle, and ask him—and tell him——"

"Dear Dick, it would be simply ruinous," exclaimed Lottie, with a pretty grimace of horror. "If you had heard him at Christmas—you remember, when I said I wanted you to come to Deepdene, and I wouldn't—when he was so horrid about Mr. Spargrave!" (Spargrave was the son of a wealthy stockbroker, whose country house stood within a mile of Deepdene. Lottie's guardian had informed her that here was the husband intended by Providence for her) "If you had heard him then, Dick, you would realise how impossible it is, as—as things are, you know. He said the most outragous things; and when I ventured to say something about—well, about people marrying for love, you know, he quite flew into a passion, and growled out that in my case it would be marrying for the work-house, and—horrid things like that. And—Dick, dear, I'm sorry, but that's five striking. Do you know, I must go back now. Uncle always comes home about five on Saturdays, he says, and he expects me to have a cup of tea with him."

They rose, and walked slowly toward Princes Gate, Dick's eyes upon the gravel at their feet, his soul in the depths. Lottie insisted upon their parting at the gate of the Park, and would not hear his protests.

"Well, say you will come next Saturday, darling—somehow," said Dick, who was feeling particularly wretched, and, as he would have said "out of the running," this beautiful June week-end. "I must think about things. I won't let you go, my sweet—not for all the uncles in the world. Something must be done. I'll find a way, somehow. But mean time, say you will come next Saturday."

"Yes, I will come, Dick. Good-bye—Dicky!"

"Good-bye—my heart. Oh, darling, think of Dick sometimes in—in the middle of things!"

And with this somewhat incoherent appeal on his lips, and a great deal of very loving sadness in his heart, the junior clerk, who but two years before had been the open-handed, free-living young man of fashion, turned, and walked slowly back through the Park towards Piccadilly. There were still two hours to be lived through before he would meet Marley at the Regency Restaurant. Lottie would spend a portion of those two hours in the hands of her maid, thought Dick; for the girl had told him that she was going to a smart dinner-party and a dance that evening with Mrs. Lane Thompson.

"H'm! I'll go down Regent Street," thought Dick; "and see if I can't pick up some pretty little thing for Madge to wear to-morrow. Poor child, she doesn't get many fal-lals, these days. Alas!"

So the two hours were spent not altogether unpleasantly in the kindly laying out of a very few shillings on behalf of Madge and Mrs. Langley in Brixton; and Dick was feeling upon rather better terms with himself and the world when he passed the resplendent porter at the great swing doors of the Regency, to meet his friend. But, whatever his state of mind, it was a fact that Fate appeared to cherish no very amiable intentions in the matter of Dick's affairs at this particular week's end. From seven o'clock, their customary hour for meeting, until ten minutes to eight, Dick sat at the little table which Marley and himself invariably used on these occasions, and still no Marley came.

"Hang it!" reflected Dick, moodily. "He might have sent a wire or something. But, to be sure, there was no place for him to send it to. Ah, well, I suppose the only thing will be to have a chop, or something—the cheapest thing on the menu, begad!—and go home."

Already an attentive waiter had turned away two applicants for the seat opposite Dick, saying, with a look of understanding in Dick's direction, that the place was engaged. Now, as an elderly, shrivelled-looking gentleman approached the table, Dick whispered to the waiter:

"Let him have it. I'm afraid my friend cannot be coming this evening. And you might bring me a chop, will you? I—I've no appetite to-night."

And that was odd, if true, for it was Dick's custom nowadays to go without even his usual eightpenny lunch on Saturdays, in anticipation of the very pleasant and satisfying meal which Marley made a point of ordering in the evening.

So the parchment-faced old gentleman, with the broad, black ribbon hanging from his pince-nez, was politely ushered to the seat opposite Dick, and there settled himself, after a funny little ceremonious bow to his vis-à-vis.

It may have been this little old-fashioned courtesy, or it may have been interest in the elderly gentleman's rather singular order, given in a business-like manner directly he sat down:

"A small sole, a cutlet, not too well done, spinach, green peas; half of '43, at once, please, and a half of—er—of '97, in a basket, with the Stilton—bring the whole cheese, please!"

But whatever the cause, Dick found himself responding readily to some polite but common-place observation from the old gentleman, and (what was a good deal more remarkable) when he had ceased to pretend that the remains of his chop held any interest for him, Dick positively accepted the elderly stranger's invitation to join him in a glass of port.—"A really very creditable vintage I consider, for a public place; unpretentious, no doubt, but sound, and not unpleasing, I think."

The wine was certainly pleasing enough to Dick's palate, after his ungarnished chop, washed down only by that unremarkable vintage which the water companies are good enough to supply to most of the residents of London—when convenient to themselves.

Dick explained (even one glass of good old port exerts a distinctly lubricatory effect upon a young man's tongue) his disappointment of that evening, in the matter of his weekly billiards in the hall below.

"Well, now," said the old gentleman; "I am fond of a game of billiards after dinner myself, when—er—particularly after having carried any affair to a satisfactory conclusion, as I may say that I have this afternoon. With your permission, my dear sir, I shall be delighted to try and take the place, for an hour, of the gentleman who has disappointed you this evening; or, since it is perhaps presumptuous of me to expect to take a young man's place, let me say that I will endeavour to mitigate in some part the loss caused you by his absence."

Digitized by Google

"A really delightful old chap!" thought Dick, as he smilingly assented. "He talks like an old play." The stranger ordered a bottle of '97, the old port, to be sent downstairs to the billiard-room, and together the oddly-matched couple chose a table. Dick removed his coat and hung it up, with the light dust-coat which he was carrying, upon the hook which he always used for the purpose. His elderly companion made no change, however, in his dress, and the fact rather caught Dick's attention, by reason that the old gentleman was wearing a light top-coat, on this warm evening.

The port was opened while they chalked their cues, and, at the end of an evenly contested game of "a hundred up," the old gentleman called for another bottle.

"I don't think I'll take any more, thank you," interposed Dick, a little awkwardly, and speaking also, it must be admitted, a trifle thickly. The fact was he was thinking that he ought to order something for his hospitable companion, and the thought of the probable cost of that "very creditable vintage" frightened him. But the old gentleman poohpoohed the notion of not having any more port.

"Why, my dear young friend," said he, to his acquaintance of two hours' standing; "life after dinner would be intolerable but for port. You have my word for it, my dear sir, there is not half a headache in a hogshead of this particular wine. I know it well."

The young man was persuaded, and played two further games with his host, both of which he won. The fact that Dick took but one glass of wine during the progress of these two games may conceivably have had something to do with his winning.

Seeing the hour was close upon eleven, Dick said he must leave at the end of this third game. The old gentleman protested that the evening was young. He drew off his coat, hung it up, and pressed his dear young friend to give him his revenge in "fifty up" at all events. In courtesy Dick felt obliged to yield to this, and the heat of the room made an iced whisky and soda grateful to him, after the port. This short game ended, Dick asked the marker for his coat, and firmly declined his elderly friend's invitation to further play.

"Well, then, if you really must go, my dear young friend," said the stranger, "I shall play just one more game with this good man here"—indicating the smiling marker—"and then go off to bed myself. I have to thank you for a most agreeable evening spent in the society of the most congenial—a most pleasing close to a satisfactory day for me. I trust I may again have the pleasure—er—Good-night, my dear young friend; good-night!"

And so, with rather brighter eyes than usual, and carrying his head very erectly, Dick walked off, carrying his dust-coat and an evening paper upon one arm, his gloves in the other hand, and in his mind a conviction that life was not really so drab a business as one might fancy, even for a junior clerk with a hundred and twenty pounds a year.

On his way to Brixton, Dick dozed for a few minutes, and finding on his arrival at "Carrington Villa" that his mother and sister had already retired for the night, he decided to make directly for bed himself. In hanging his coat in the hall, Dick's hand rested for a moment upon the upper inside pocket of the garment, and:

"Now what have I put there I wonder!" he muttered, sleepily.

A moment later, and he was standing under the hall gas lamp, a bulky Morocco pocket-book in one hand, the light top coat in the other.

"Why, good gad!" he exclaimed aloud. "It's not my coat at all!"

Then he walked into the stuffy little "front parlour," and, having turned up the gas, sat down at the centre table to examine this pocket-book. Dick was not at all sleepy now.

The first thing he drew from the case was a flat wad of bank notes held together by a rubber band. There were five for one hundred pounds each, four for fifty, ten for ten pounds, and three for five.

Eight hundred and fifteen pounds. The junior clerk almost gasped. Then there were various memoranda, including a note of the numbers of all these, and some other, bank notes. There were several cards bearing the name of "Mr. Rupert Ball, 122, Portgavon Road, S.W." Then—and poor Dick's eyes glittered at the discovery—rolled in silk, and encased in a little leather pouch, he found eighteen uncut diamonds of a sort which the veriest ignoramus in such matters could not but regard with admiration. Dick felt that these jewels must represent a far larger sum than the value of the bank notes, and had he guessed six times that sum, he would as a fact still have been well within the mark.

"Good heavens!" muttered Dick at length, leaning back in his chair. "I suppose it belongs to the little old man at the Regency. Thousands of pounds—Great Scott! and all in the pocket of a common or garden top coat, the very image of mine! Thousands of pounds—and I suppose he has thousands more; and I—Pooh! That's nothing whatever to do with it. But still—H'm! And only this morning Madge was saying how she wished to goodness we even had enough capital to allow of our going out to California, or to South Africa, or anywhere out of this stuffy—Oh, dear! What's the good of thinking of all that? The thing's of no more value to us than a piece of string. Of course I shall have to take it back. Portgavon Road—H'm! But, Great Scott, what a find!"

And then, slowly, Dick replaced its contents in the Morocco pocket-book, and slowly, sadly, betook himself to bed, the book in his hand, the mellowing influence of that evening's wine, and his inclination for rest alike departed from him utterly.

* * * * * *

It was a restless, miserable night that Dick passed. The mere thought that the value of several thousands of pounds lay under his pillow, seemed to fence off sleep from the head above the pillow. It was singular that the temporary possession of riches which did not belong to him should increase the distance between himself and the dainty Lottie Crane. But it did. Never had Dick felt so hopeless regarding the girl he had learnt to love beside old Thames at Maidenhead, as he did when he met his mother and sister at breakfast on that Sunday morning.

"Good heavens!" he thought, as he looked round the dingy little apartment. "How could I ever have thought of asking her to share this sort of thing? It's absolutely beyond the bounds of things possible."

And his hopelessness robbed him of what might have been a pleasure, when he came to make his little presents to Madge and her mother; the trifles he had purchased on the previous evening in Regent Street.

After breakfast, he retired to his room, and again examined the contents of the pocket-book.

"With this," he muttered; "I could start a new life out there—somewhere—out in the open, away from all this sordidness. And Madge would bloom like—Oh, look here;! This won't do. By gad, I'm losing my head. It isn't safe. I'll go and tell them about it."

Digitized by Google

And he walked down the skimpy little staircase, warned by a wholesome instinct that in this case safety lay in taking counsel.

You may be sure the women-kind were finely flustered. Dick's mother had never been a strong-minded woman. Her misfortunes of the past two years had shaken her life to its very foundations. She never had practised economy; the necessity for it irked her almost beyond endurance. Her health had been very indifferent since her husband's tragic end.

"Dick," she said, after a long pause. "I don't see why you shouldn't—I—It seems providential. Oh, my dear Dick, you know how sorely we need help!"

"Goodness; this is cheerful!" muttered Dick. "But, I say, you know, mother!" he said aloud.

"Why, mother, dearest, what can you be thinking of," cried Madge, flushing to the roots of her fair hair. "Of course Dick will take the thing at once to this Mr.—what-ever-his-name-is, in Portgavon Road—Of course!"

"H'm! Yes; of course, I shall," agreed Dick; and felt some relief.

"Well, well, my dear; I don't know. You know best. But, oh, this dreadful, scraping, cheese-paring life—I——"

And poor Mrs. Langley dissolved into tears, her worried mind occupied by hazy pictures of her old, luxurious life at Maidenhead. The world is full of such people, in these days of rapid fortune-making, and losing; and their cases are very hard, and sad.

At three o'clock that afternoon Dick Langley turned out of Porchester Street into Portgavon Road; and in his breast-pocket was the famous case, with its wealth of bank notes and diamonds. Number 122 proved to be a huge, sombre-looking house, divided into three flats. A footman in plain black clothes answered Dick's knock, and informed him that Mr. Ball was at home. Dick was shown into a dining room which had every appearance of being very seldom used; and in a few moments there entered to him there his elderly acquaintance of the Regency Restaurant, looking, Dick thought, a good deal worried.

"Ah!" began the old gentleman. "My excellent young friend of last evening. I thought I did not know the name James gave me—er—Mr. Langley, I think. H'm! Ah; yes; the name is not altogether unfamiliar, I think; all the same. Ah—er——"

"I suspect you are thinking of my father, who died two years ago," said Dick. And the old gentleman hastened to tide over what seemed an awkward moment.

"Ah! And how did you find me out, now? I am very pleased to see you I'm sure—er—very pleased. I must tell you that our pleasant evening had a most unfortunate, a most disastrous ending for me. Yes, really disastrous. I went upstairs to have a devilled biscuit, after my last game, you know, and hung my coat on a rack at the door of the supper room. And, if you'll believe me, sir, some rascal took it from there while I was at my biscuits, and left in place of it, one rather like mine, I must admit, but—er—quite unlike mine in the pocket, I do assure you; for there was a matter of close upon ten thousand pounds in diamonds and notes, in my pocket-book; the result of negotiations of that very evening—very successful negotiations, too."

"Well, well," thought Dick; "he hasn't an idea of the true state of the case. He will smile when he sees the coat I am sitting on." Dick had thrown the old gentleman's light coat, which he himself had carried from Brixton this afternoon, on the back of the chair in which he sat. He now rose to reach it more conveniently. As he did so, the door of the room opened, and a young girl entered, dressed for walking, and saying:

"Oh, uncle; there's someone come to see you. Please don't let them keep you too—Oh, Dick! However could you!"

It was Lottie Crane, quite unaware till the moment that her uncle had found his visitor, and never dreaming who that visitor might be.

"Why, what the dickens does the girl mean? Eh? What! Dick? What d'ye mean, child?"

"My name is Dick, sir," explained that young man, with a smile.

"Well; but what the—tut——"

"And I've come to bring you your coat, and pocket-book, sir, which the billiard-marker gave me last night in place of my own. The diamonds and the notes are quite safe."

"Eh? What? You've got the coat, and the book? Well, bless my soul! But how the——"

"Darling uncle, this is Dick, you know. I told you about Dick last Christmas. And Dick is—Dick, you know, is——"

"Oh, tut, tut! God bless my soul and body!"

"Well, darling uncle, you know you said yourself this morning that you played billiards last night with the most agreeable young man in London. Well, uncle, dear, that—that's Dick, you know!"

And Dick is quite learned about diamonds now, though at the diamond-merchant's office they say he will never make the expert man of business that his uncle-in-law still is. And that is quite possible; but they are a very happy pair, Dick and Lottie; and they say that Madge, who lives with her mother at Deepdene, will marry Spargrave.

And so you see, life, like the curate's egg in the story, is "very good in parts, my lord!"

A. J. Dawson.

Digitized by Google

Troubled Matchmaking.

The Story of a Desirable Engagement.

On the death of her father Elsie Roscoe went to live with her aunt, and in due course Mrs. Bailey proceeded to gratify her desire to exercise her powers as a match-maker.

Mrs. Bailey had longed for such an opportunity; she had no children of her own, and her brother had been a man who did not brook interference with his domestic arrangements. Mrs. Bailey had endeavoured to persuade him that he really ought to permit her to see about a husband for Elsie, but he had always cut her short with the remark that Elsie would attend to that matter on her own account when she wished to. Elsie appeared to be quite indifferent on the subject, helping her father with his scientific researches, and taking a more sober view of life than is common with young women of her age.

Mrs. Bailey's opportunity came with the change in the condition of things, and she decided in favour of a gentleman named Monckton.

Mr. John Monckton was about ten years older than Elsie, and reputed to be in very comfortable circumstances. He lived in Wilsford, but he was connected with a large business in the town, and went backwards and forwards every day to the office. He was very quiet and reserved, and all that was really known about his business was that he had an office with a clerk or two, but did a large commission business in British and foreign goods.

"Just the man for Elsie!" declared Mrs. Bailey. "She has been brought up very staidly, and she wants a man of the same temperament and mode of life. And she will make him a good wife, too. A splendid match!"

The disparity of age was not serious; possibly, he was not ten years older. His appearance was not stylish; it would not have attracted a town-bred young woman, probably, but Elsie was different. She made a few discreet inquiries concerning Monckton, and these inquiries were made outside Wilsford so that there should be no false notions concerning the man. The result was satisfactory.

Mrs. Bailey soon contrived that Mr. John Monckton and Elsie should meet frequently. He was invited to the villa after three or four meetings, and finally she succeeded in bringing the match to pass. John Monckton proposed and was accepted. Not exactly a love match on Elsie's part, but love would come after marriage. She respected him, and thought a great deal of him, so what more was to be desired?

Mrs. Bailey kept the engagement secret for the greater part of a week, and then handed a notice to the editor of the local weekly just in time to secure its admission in the issue published on Saturday. She strictly enjoined him to secrecy. Thus it came about that the announcement of the engagement was made to friends in Wilsford through the medium of the local journal.

Elsie had gone to the house of a friend some miles away and intended to return that evening. Mrs. Bailey read the notice with much gratification, and waited with conscious pride for the numerous congratulations that were certain to pour in.

It was about eleven o'clock when the first visitor was announced; this was the vicar of the parish, the Rev. Algernon Sanders. He looked grave, as if he had come to offer condolence instead of congratulations.

"I saw a notice in the Wilsford Express this morning, Mrs. Bailey"—he began, as though delivering a text—"and I—or—that is, I suppose it is correct?"

"Certainly!" replied Mrs. Bailey stiffly.

She had never got on very well with the vicar; he would do things in a way that she considered to be quite wrong, and he was not so amenable to reasoning—Mrs. Bailey's reasoning, that is—as he ought to have been! Still, they were quite friendly, although she had once threatened to cease attendance at his church and betake herself to the sacred edifice in the next village. His manner on this present occasion jarred on her nerves, and she was ready to assert herself if necessary.

"Then I am sorry to hear it!" said the vicar with such bluntness that he left her speechless for the space of fully sixty seconds.

"Yes, I am sorry to hear it!" repeated the vicar with emphasis. "Miss Roscoe is an excellent young woman, and she ought not to throw herself away on that good-for-nothing Monckton!"

"Mr. Monckton is an honourable gentleman!" she burst forth. "He is held in high esteem by every person in this place, and his reputation in the town where he conducts his business is all that could be desired. I think you owe me an explanation, sir!"

The vicar looked uncomfortable.

"I have reason to know, Mrs. Bailey, that the reputation of Mr. Monckton is not so good!" he said mildly. "I admit that he is generally esteemed, but that is because certain facts, known to a few, have been kept confidential by those few. His financial position is a very bad one, I should say, but I feel that it is not my place to say more, as I am not one of the vic—sufferers. I came to give you a hint, and I will leave you to regard it or not as you please. I fear that my presence is not welcome, so I will withdraw!"

He did so, and Mrs. Bailey sat still and pondered. What on earth did the man mean? Her feelings were like those of a man who has undertaken a task different from any in which he has had previous experience, and who finds that he has been over-confident of success. Had she made a blunder as a match-maker? She tried to assure herself that she had not, but the vicar was not a man to say such a thing without foundation, even if he were an unreasonable individual.

"Here's a note, ma'am," said the maid, entering at this moment. "I don't know when it came. It was dropped in through the letter-box."

Mrs. Bailey took the note with a certain sentiment of relief. This was a congratulation from someone who knew Mr. Monckton in the town, or it would not have been dropped through the letter-box anonymously. Good paper! The writer must be comfortably off!

Mrs. Bailey opened the envelope and looked for the address at the head of the letter, but it was quite plain; she looked for the signature, but that also was missing. Then she read the communication and a troubled expression overspread her countenance.

Digitized by Google

It was brief, and contained a warning. John Monckton was not what he seemed; he was reputed to be well-to-do, but this was incorrect. He was hard-up. What did he do with his money? The inference was that he did not pass the entire day in his office, but had some more agreeable occupation! Was he really travelling when he was away?

"I don't like anonymous communications!" said Mrs. Bailey aloud. "Still, there is truth in them at times!" she admitted in the next breath. "I must get to the bottom of this! Dear me, match-making is not so pleasant as I thought it was! I have been priding myself on having made a better selection for Elsie than she would have made for herself, but I really wonder if it is quite wise to take the matter entirely out of the hands of the party most interested!"

Mrs. Bailey had little time left for reflection. Another visitor was announced in the person of Mrs. Dr. Gillett—that was how she was popularly named in Wilsford—who came in hurriedly.

"I saw the notice," said the bustling wife of the village medico, after the usual greetings had been exchanged. "But you surely do not mean to say that dear Elsie has actually become engaged to that man?"

"Why not?" asked Mrs. Bailey, flaring up. She was getting tired of the disparagement of the husband selected for Elsie; she could not understand that everyone else knew that he was a bad subject and that she alone had been gulled. "Why not?" she repeated with emphasis.

"Because he is insolvent! Because he is worse than that, he borrows money off his friends and doesn't pay!" said Mrs. Gillett just as defiantly. "There!"

Mrs. Bailey rather admired the Doctor's wife, and she was impressed with the frank declaration. Yet she felt that she must defend her choice.

"There is some mistake!" she declared. "He is perfectly honourable, and he satisfied me as to his financial position. I went thoroughly into that, you may be quite sure!"

"I'll prove it to you!" cried Mrs. Gillett. "I'll fetch his I.O.U. for the twenty-five pounds my husband lent him!"

She went off in a hurry, but she was back almost before Mrs. Bailey had time to realise that she had had time to perform the journey. She pushed a paper into Mrs. Bailey's unwilling hands. There was no mistake about it; an I.O.U. for twenty-five pounds, signed by John Monckton, stared at her.

"He has borrowed quite five hundred pounds from people about here," said Mrs. Gillett. "He pretends that he wants the money to complete a purchase; he only wants it for a fortnight or three weeks, till he receives payment of various large accounts. My husband lent it; he wondered why Mr. Monckton didn't keep his word, but thought that he would remember it and pay. The Doctor felt reluctant to remind him, as he was so honourable a man. They do not meet often, or the subject might have come up in conversation. In fact, Mr. Monckton is so reserved and so seldom meets anyone to have a chat, that it is a wonder he ventured to ask for the loan, that was what we thought. But it is all coming out now, and the Doctor and others had decided to wait on him this afternoon and claim payment when we saw the notice of his engagement to Elsie."

Poor Mrs. Bailey was in despair; she stated her intention of calling on Mr. Monckton during the afternoon, and asked that the proposed visit of creditors should be postponed till the evening.

Mrs. Bailey tried to eat a little lunch, but the attempt was a failure. She was getting ready to go to Monckton's villa at the other end of the long, straggling village when Elsie Roscoe returned.

"My dear Elsie, I am glad to see you back!" cried her aunt fervently. "I have been much upset this morning, and—and—but it isn't so bad as it might be, seeing that you might have been married before it was found out, and you don't really love him!"

Elsie stared at her aunt, and turned pale.

"I don't understand, aunt!" she faltered. "Is there anything wrong? Has any accident happened to Jack? O don't keep me in suspense! Let me know the worst at once. Oh, my dear Jack!"

"She really loves him!" groaned Mrs. Bailey in despair. There was no mistaking the fact; it was patent in the girl's manner and expression. "People are saying discreditable things about him, Elsie, dear, and——"

"Well?" asked Elsie, her manner changing.

"I can't say, of course, my dear!" protested Mrs. Bailey, noticing the change from anxiety to indignation, "but there seems to be some foundation for them!"

"Tell me what they say!" commanded Elsie with decision. "My Jack is above anything discreditable, and I insist on knowing what calumnies have been uttered against him, so that I may defend him!"

Her aunt had never seen Elsie look so proud and defiant. She related what had passed and showed the anonymous letter. Elsie put it into her pocket.

"I am going to see John," she said briefly. "I will tell him all, and it will be bad for those who have tried to slander him!"

"I am afraid he will feel insulted," moaned Mrs. Bailey, "yet—I saw the I.O.U.!"

Elsie went through the village with a defiant expression on her usually placid face, her head poised proudly, and every movement indicative of a determination to defend her lover against all comers. People wondered to see her walk through the village so haughtily, and began to say to one another that she need not be so proud at having become engaged to Mr. Monckton.

Elsie had not been gone long before Mrs. Bailey's maid brought in a card inscribed with the name of John Monckton.

"Ask him in!" said the widow, when she had recovered from her surprise. "I can have it out quietly with him," she added under her breath. "Perhaps it is well that Elsie is out, although he will be disappointed!"

Mr. John Monckton entered. He was a man of medium height, rather too stout for his number of inches, but upright and more quick of movement than one would have anticipated. His face was half concealed by a wealth of moustache and beard, and a pair of spectacles with large, round glasses. The kind of man who does not attract at first sight, but who improves very much on acquaintance.

He said "Good afternoon, Mrs. Bailey!" in a brisk manner, but he appeared to be suffering slightly from hoarseness, and he seated himself modestly in a corner where he was out of the draughts and also in obscurity.

"It is rather a pity that Elsie has just gone out, Mr. Monckton. She must have missed you, for she went to see if you were at home. However, I am not sorry, as——"

"Oh, it doesn't matter at all!" was the rather startling reply. "I prefer to see you alone just now. Never mind Elsie. You will excuse me, but I am somewhat hoarse. I have a request to make, just a small favour to ask. I am in great need of a little loan for a few days till I get some accounts paid, a mere matter of twenty-five pounds! It is like that in business sometimes; one has to sink so much capital in the stock and so on. Do you think that you could oblige me?"

Mrs. Bailey sat speechless with amazement and anger. At length she burst forth vehemently:—

"You are a rogue, a swindler, and I have a good mind to hand you over to justice! To think that——"

But Mr. John Monckton did not wait to hear the finish; he had appeared uneasy from the first moment, but the outburst threw him off his balance entirely. He sprang up and made a dash through the door into the hall, where he literally ran into the arms of his exact counterpart, behind whom stood Elsie

Digitized by Google

"Ha!" cried the new-comer, gripping the man who had rushed into his arms. "So I have caught you! I did not expect to have such luck. You wretched scoundrel! You have turned up again to impersonate me and rob my friends of their money and me of my good name! Stand aside, Elsie, and I'll thrash him through the village!"

The inhabitants of Wilsford were treated to the uncommon spectacle of seeing Mr. John Monckton belabouring Mr. John Monckton with a stout walking stick half way through the village street. By the time the victim of this vigorous treatment had got away from the stick, he had lost his glasses and his beard was awry, and he looked less like Mr. John Monckton than he had originally done.

"That's a cousin of mine," explained Elsie's lover to Mrs. Bailey, a little later. "He resembles me very much in build and features, and it is not difficult for him to make up a bit. He impersonated me some time ago, and narrowly escaped imprisonment. I thought he had left the country, and I have grown a beard since then. Unfortunately this addition to my person has made it more easy for him to impersonate me, and I shall have to discard it! Such effrontry to come here, to this house! I suppose you detected the difference in the voice and certain differences in appearance and manner, which intimate friends and relations perceive quickly, and so he was exposed?"

"I am afraid I did not," admitted Mrs. Bailey shamefacedly. "He pretended to be hoarse, he sat in a dark corner, and I was so agitated! I called him a rogue and a swindler because what he said was so different from what you had said and I thought I was addressing you!"

Mr. Monckton laughed good-naturedly.

"It was a case of a guilty conscience! He thought you had found him out, so he bolted. Now I must find out how much money he has had in my name and repay it. It is a pity they did not call upon me to redeem the I.O.U.'s, for I should have been spared a good deal of money! I have wondered why some people have seemed so distant lately!"

Inquiry showed that the pseudo John Monckton had practised the same trick to aid the deception as he had tried on Mrs. Bailey; he always had a cold, and paid his visit either in the twilight or sat in a dark corner.

Congratulations poured in as soon as the mystery was cleared up, and the ceremony at the village church was something to be remembered. The vicar performed the marriage ceremony so well that Mrs. Bailey has been on better terms with him ever since.

George Day.

ELDERLY LODGER: "How did you sleep last night, Professor?" Professor Larkins (testily): "Lying down, madam."

THE BASHFUL LOVER: "Miss Agnes, I—er—hem!" She (sweetly): "Do you, Mr. Mammasdear? Now wouldn't you like to join our sewing class?"

FATHER: "I am inexpressibly shocked. Your mother tells me that you are engaged to three young men." Daughter: "It's all right, papa. They are all football players, and when the season closes I can marry the survivor."

NICE OLD LADY: "Will you kindly tell me if the lady who writes 'The Mother's Page' every week in your paper is in? I want to tell her how much I have enjoyed reading her articles on 'The Evening Hour in the Nursery.'" Office Boy: "That's him over there with the pink shirt, smokin' a pipe."

"MISS TWILLING," said Mr. Calloway, glancing down at his shining boots with a complacent air, "don't you like to see a man looking as if he had stepped out of a band-box, his clothes nicely brushed, and everything about him indicating refinement?" "Yes, Mr. Calloway, I do," answered Miss Twilling, with a significant look. "I like to see such a man as you have described about once a year."

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

September 9. — Rather a favourable year for business for those whose birthdays fall to-day. Good for health and general affairs. Those in employ need to exercise care or they will lose it.

Girls born in the early morning will become engaged.

The day is good to do business, speculate, sign papers, and travel.

A child born to-day will be fortunate in business, will be clever, and rise in life.

September 10.—Those who celebrate birthdays to-day may expect a changeable year. Should avoid changing residence. Guard against loss.

Girls will find love affairs very interesting, but if born early they will need care against deceit.

The day is good to deal with elderly people, but beware of promising speculations. Have a care with horses.

A child born to-day will never be settled, and if a girl the prospects of marriage are not good.

September 11.—Little progress; much anxiety and worry are indicated here. Strong opposition if in business; trouble with writings and landlords.

Young girls will have obstacles and disappointment in love affairs; those born near six p.m. will meet with strange experiences.

The day is one to keep quiet on, and let others make the first move in matters of business. Don't change residence here.

A child born this day will be subject to many vicissitudes, and should keep in employ of others.

September 12.—A dull year; disappointment in business and sickness in domestic circle. Beware of law and monetary losses. Bad for farmers.

Girls born near six a.m. must beware of broken promises, and should place but little confidence in opposite sex.

The day is bad to speculate, deal with elderly people, or sign agreements.

A child born to-day will be wise to keep in the employ of others.

September 13.—A quiet year; business much as usual.

Girls must beware of attentions from married men.

The day is not good for changes, or asking favours; go steady.

A child born here will be fond of change and will go abroad if born from noon to three p.m.

September 14.—The year will be good for business, and bring many useful friends. Guard against quarrels, or you go to law.

Girls will find much discord in love affairs, chiefly through third parties.

A child born here will be subject to many mishaps, but fortunate in business. Will be clever, though stubborn and rash.

September 15.—A mixed year; beware of accident and of fire. Farmers, builders, and elderly people are favoured.

Young girls will have a quiet time in love matters.

The day is good to buy property, land, or deal with landlords. Beware of mishaps between nine and ten p.m.

A child born to-day will be fortunate and rise in life. The mind will be steady and painstaking; the wit keen.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

The Stranger from London.

A Romance of a Country Village.

It had fairly poured for two days, and I had waded through all the newspapers and other reading matter to be had at the little hotel at which I was staying.

The landlord, Mr. Carpenter, was a jolly old fellow who was noted for his lively stories, and he did his best to entertain his guests and keep up their spirits as they sat in the porch of the Wayside house and watched the steady downpour.

I did not join the group in the porch. If there is anything I particularly dislike it is to listen to the chatter of a lot of people who are trying to delude themselves into the belief that they are enjoying life when the face of Nature is ankle deep with mud and water, and it is still raining as if it never intended to stop. So I kept to my room and read books, week-old newspapers, patent medicine almanacs—anything that would help me in a measure to forget the abominable weather.

But on the evening of the second day, when it grew suddenly colder and a roaring wood fire had been kindled in the open fireplace in the big sitting-room, I was one of the first to gather round its cheerful blaze.

Now, if ever, was the time for story-telling, but the landlord's repertoire seemed to be about exhausted.

"No use asking for any more funny stories," he drawled out with a deprecatory shake of the head. "These two wet days have pumped me dry, so to speak. I can only think of one more story, but as there isn't anything comical about that one, I don't suppose you'll care to hear it."

"Give us a story, by all means," urged one of the ladies. "I can always sleep better if I have a ghost story or some exciting adventures to go to bed on."

"Well," began the landlord, reflectively, "I don't think this comes under the head of a ghost story nor even a story of adventure. I'll have to tell it, and let you classify it for yourselves.

"The climax of my story came ten years ago when I was keeping a hotel in my native village, but the beginning dated back many years before that, to the time when the Peeks were the nabobs of the place.

"Squire Peek, with his wife and only daughter, lived in a big white house on a hill on the outskirts of the village, and a haughty, high-stepping old chap he was when I first knew him.

"He always seemed to consider himself and his family a little above the rest of the folks in the village and when Lucinda Peek grew up, although she was by a long way the best looking young lady in the place, and while the young fellows were all half daft over her, none of them really had the courage to make love to her for fear of arousing the wrath of the stiff-necked old squire.

"The first one who tried it was an outsider, and the ruthless way in which his aspirations were nipped in the bud by Lucinda's father held forth very little encouragement to the others.

"He was a young college student, named Harry Randell, who had come into the country to spend his summer holidays in earning some needed money. Though dependent wholly on his own earnings, he was bravely working his way through college, it seems, and he got a job keeping the books and making up accounts at the village shop in the daytime, and at night he gave lessons on the violin and other musical instruments. He was a first-class singer, too, and soon after coming to the place he started a singing school, hiring the schoolhouse and charging a good fee for lessons, which he gave every Thursday evening.

"It was at the singing school that he made the acquaintance of Lucinda Peek, and it was a clear case of love at first sight. He was a manly young fellow, and when people saw how matters were shaping, everyone wished him well.

"But the course of true love runs uncommonly rough sometimes as the poet tells about, and when young Randell walked boldly up to the big house on the hill with Lucinda one evening, and asked her father for her hand in marriage, it was said that the haughty old squire drove him from the house with the direst threats and curses that one man ever poured upon the head of another. It was then near the close of his vacation, and Randell was compelled to return to his college without again seeing Lucinda.

"It was said that letters addressed to Lucinda in young Randell's handwriting came after he went away, but the postmaster, who was a friend and sort of dependent of the squire, saw to it that none of them ever reached her. Finally one of the letters received after Randell had left the place, was returned to him so I've heard, with the notification across the face of it that the person to whom it was addressed, was dead.

"It was a cruel and wicked thing to do, but such things will happen when a penniless student falls in love with a nabob's daughter.

"Years passed. Squire Peek finally died, and then it was discovered that most of his fortune had been wasted in unwise speculations. The big house on the hill was sold, and mother and daughter moved into a small cottage at the other end of the village. A year later Mrs. Peek died (of a broken heart, it was said), and Lucinda was left alone in the world.

"She was now thirty years of age, and though there was a look of settled sadness on her countenance, she was still the handsomest woman in the place, and it was rumoured that she had refused many flattering offers of marriage.

"Well, ten years went by, and those of us who had been young once were growing old, Lucinda among the rest. One of the banks had failed that spring, business was almost at a standstill, and the country round was in a bad way generally. Right in the midst of the stagnation a stranger suddenly appeared in the village. He was a middle-aged gentleman, with iron-grey hair and beard, and had the air of a prosperous business man.

"He took rooms at the hotel, saying he was from London, and was looking round for some quiet village in which to spend the summer. I told him I thought he would find things quiet enough, just then, and he said, in a sort of absent-minded way:

"'Yes, it does seem quieter than it used to.'

"'Why, when were you here before?' I asked, giving him a quick look, and vainly trying to place him.

"He coloured up and said he had been thinking of something else when he spoke, and the matter was dropped.

"Well, the first night he was there he sat about, listening to every word that was said by the villagers who dropped in, but taking no part in the conversation. After awhile the crowd began to discuss the bank trouble, and one of the party said:

"'Too bad about Lucinda Peek, isn't it? They say she lost every penny she had by the bank failure, and it is only a question of time when she will have to give up her cottage and go out to work for a living.'

"Before the sentence was fairly ended, the stranger jumped up, with a face white as a sheet.

"'For God's sake, tell me quick!' he gasped—'is Lucinda Peek alive?'

"'Why, of course she's alive,' said I.

"'And her father and mother?' he asked next.

"'They're both dead,' I replied.

"'And she no longer lives on the big house in the hill—in her old home?' he questioned eagerly.

"'No,' said I; 'she is now living in a small cottage near the——'

"'Excuse me for interrupting,' he broke in, impatiently. 'My name is Randell. I used to know Miss Peek. I must see her at once. Have you someone you can send with me to show me the way to her house?'

"I called in Joe, my man of all work; and, by the way, Joe is still in my employ, and I think I'd better let him tell the rest of the story."

Stepping to the door opening into the hotel kitchen, the landlord called out:

"Here, Joe; come in and tell the ladies and gentlemen what happened the night you showed the stranger from London the way to Miss Peek's cottage."

"Well," began Joe, apologetically, as he stepped into the room, "I think ye'll all be disapp'inted, because there didn't anything happen wuth mentionin' scarcely. In the first place, the gentleman didn't say a word all the way to the cottage—jest walked; that's all; an' I had to run purty nigh all the way to keep up with him.

"An' when we got to the gate, an' I told him that was the place, he went flyin' up the path an' began knockin' at the door as if he was there on very urgent business. In a minute or so, Miss Peek opened the door, an' I heard him say: 'Lucinda, don't you know me?' and she held out both hands an' said: 'Why, it's Henry!' an' the next minute they were hangin' on to each other, laughin' an' cryin' both at once, like a pair of softies, an' I seen I had no further bizness there, so I come away an' left 'em; an' that's all that happened."

"You have forgotten one important item in your story, Joe, and that is the present that Mr. Randell gave you for showing him the way to the cottage," suggested the landlord, smilingly.

"Oh, yes," said Joe, "the gentleman handed me a five pound note the next day, an' when I told him it was too much, he said:

"'No, my man, you earned every penny of it, and more besides.'

"My conscience troubled me considerably for taking it, though, for a day or so, but when I heard that he gave the village clergyman £25 for marryin' him an' Lucinda, —an' only a five-minutes' job at that—I made up my mind that Mr. Randell must be a millionaire an' left off worrying about it."

W. S. Gidley.

Your Editor Chats.

THE NEW SERIAL.

At last I am able to announce to you the title of the new serial story which I hope to commence in the course of a few weeks time. It is to be called "A Foe in the Family," and though somewhat different in style from our present serial, will, nevertheless, I feel sure, hold your attention and interest quite as well as, and even more—if that were possible—than that story has done. I will be able to give you the exact date of its commencement shortly. It will, however, follow immediately upon the conclusion of our present serial, and as, at last, the dark clouds which have up to now blackened poor Alec Scarsdale's life are just beginning to show their silver lining, the grand climax, in which our hero emerges triumphantly from out of great tribulations, cannot be far off.

FREE GRAMOPHONES.

Regarding our scheme for supplying certain lucky readers of Short Stories with gramophones gratis, of which I made a preliminary announcement last week, I may fairly say that the scheme is now complete, and next week I hope to give you full details of the competition.

"THROUGH THE PERIL OF THE NIGHT."

Next week's coloured cover you will find represented in miniature on page 344. The picture depicts a most thrilling incident in a powerful story entitled "Through the Peril of the Night," which we have been at no little pains to procure. The girl is a somnambulist, and in her sleep is walking along the telegraph wires because she feels sure that her lover is begging her to come to him in order to escape some danger. What the danger is, of course, the story tells, as also the dramatic sequel to her terrible journey. Undoubtedly it will be the tale of the week.

C. Y. N. T. H. I. A.

By the way, I received some excellent results from our "Cynthia" competition. Seldom indeed has a competition been more popular, and many and curious were the sentences sent in. All sorts of subjects were dealt with—humorous, pathetic, serious, and extraordinary, while the best one dealt with the subject of the innocent and lovable Cynthia herself. The winning sentence constructed of words the initial letters of which formed the name Cynthia was:

"Change Your Name To Hope I Advise."

This excellent result was sent in by Mrs. E. Ryan, of 21 Abbott's Road, East Ham, E., and consequently the first prize goes to her. Many other good sentences were sent, and consolation gifts go to the following:

S. White, 162 Camberwell New Road, S.E.; H. Martin, Superintendent Peabody Buildings, Herne Hill; W. Tombs, 13 St. Olaves House, Walnut Tree Walk, Kennington; J. S. Ryan, 21 Abbott's Road, East Ham, E.; E. Tudor Marsh, Villa Chrysanthème, Ellison Road, Streatham Common; H. Barnes, 2 Vauxhall Walk, S.E.; H. C. Pickard, 46 St. Giles' Street, Northampton; C. Windsor, 11 Ramsden Terrace, North Street, Leeds; T. Allison, 18 Fleet Street, Gorton, Manchester; S. L. Baines, 6 Ingatestone Road, Woodford Green.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.
CASELLIS	A man from Jamaica who knows Mrs. Norton's past history.

Mrs. Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia: Her companion.

THE STORY STARTS HERE.

HAVING arrived in England from a Bruges convent to be companion to my cousin, Frances Norton, I soon discovered that my cousin was taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money were lost and won. The climax came one night when Mary Vernon staked her diamond earrings (a gift from Lord Kinross), and one of the onlookers found them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton.

A few weeks later, my cousin, with Fluffy's help, stole a pocket-book, containing abouteight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew, an American millionaire, at the Café Regal.

We next moved into a house in Pont Street, and it is while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposed to Frankie, and was refused.

Later on Lord Kinross called at Pont Street for a private interview, and during this interview Percival Hope entered the room unannounced, and made the startling statement that Mary Vernon had discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Frankie left the room; but I stayed, and, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope, overheard Hope (who turns out to be Kinross' cousin) tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he would prove that Frankie is an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends. I told Frankie what I had overheard.

The next evening Lady Gaveston, Frankie's chaperone, informed her that she didn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decided at once either to marry or refuse him, she would return to Scotland. My cousin was given a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind.

We went to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis Blount, instigated by jealousy, enticed me to bet heavily, by which I lost £800. Frankie also lost heavily, and to pay our debts, she prevailed upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000.

That same night, at the Duchess of Warminster's ball, my cousin came face to face with a man from Jamaica who knew all about her past life. Percival Hope brought him in. It was a critical moment, but once again Frankie scored, for she managed to buy his silence.

The next day marked the end of the fortnight, during which Hope was to obtain proofs of Frankie's guilt. He and Kinross arrived with Casellis at Pont Street, and Casellis was asked to say what he knew of Frankie's dark past, but, instead of disclosing any unpleasant facts, he swore that she was a perfectly innocent woman.

Several other witnesses were called, but Frankie scored over each one in turn. Thus baffled, Hope left, and Kinross formally asked Frankie to be his wife. They were still in conversation when Sir John Strickland arrived. He had not heard of Frankie's engagement.

Before I could stop him he had gone into the room where my cousin and Kinross were talking. At sight of them he staggered and fell in a dead faint. Doctors were called, and pronounced it a paralytic seizure. Toby next called. In three days his uncle's bill must be redeemed. If this was not done he vowed that he would shoot himself.

Digitized by Google

FRANKIE MAKES A WIFE BREAK FAITH.

Among Frankie's acquaintances at this time was the wife of Horace Grendale, a young M.P. of great ability. He was generally considered to have a big political future before him—whatever that may mean—and was at present private secretary to a member of the Cabinet—the Minister for Foreign Affairs, I think it was.

Toby had introduced my cousin to Mrs. Grendale, who had straightway fallen in love with her. Frankie tolerated her affection, and she became a constant visitor at Pont Street.

She was a pretty woman, one of those sweet, appealing creatures, with melting eyes, a pathetic mouth, and an ingenuousness all infantile. She was the daughter of a country squire, and had seen but little of Society before her marriage. She now burnt with the desire to become a leader thereof.

She modelled herself upon my cousin. What Frankie did Dorothea Grendale—"Dollie" her intimates called her—strove to do likewise.

Her husband was charming but not rich. He, a very ambitious man, worshipped dear Dollie, and regarded her as a miracle, not only of beauty, but of intellect. She could be an admirable listener on occasions, and always turned up at the Commons when he made a speech.

In spite of his affection for her, Dollie's extravagances hit him rather hard. He swallowed milliners' and other bills, but drew the line at gambling debts. "All the smart set gamble," Dollie wailed, but her husband would not listen. She must play no more.

This being so, Mrs. Grendale gambled when she could, upon the nod, and in this way had got into Frankie's debt to the extent of about two thousand pounds. Remembering this, it occurred to me that Frankie might ask her for the money. It would help towards the £5,000 required for Nathan's bill.

I suggested this to Frankie the morning after Toby's call.

"The money must be raised, Frankie, or I'm sure Toby will do something rash. Why shouldn't Dollie pay what she owes you?"

My cousin nodded.

"I'll see what I can do," she said. "I'll go and see her this afternoon. By-the-by, Cynthia, run down and fetch this morning's paper, will you? I want to look at the stocks and shares."

Frankie studied the columns of the Times intently. She seemed to derive great satisfaction from the share market, and looked quite bright when she laid the paper down.

"I think we shall meet the bill all right," Cynthia, she said, "if Toby will be sensible. You might take a hansom to Downing Street"—Toby was a clerk in the Home Office—"and tell him, whatever he does, he's not to ask anyone I know to lend him the money. It's too risky."

I did as I was told, had a nice drive, saw Toby, and picked up Lord Chesterton on my way back. I asked him in to lunch. We found Pettigrew installed in the drawing-room, looking pleased with both himself and Frankie.

The millionaire had fought shy of Pont Street for a while, but had gradually drifted into the old state of things. He was as much infatuated with Frankie as ever, but was far more reticent both as to his affairs—and his pocket-books.

He seemed in an expansive humour that day, however; either Frankie or the lunch had loosed his tongue.

"How are things going in the City?" said my cousin. "I look upon you as a Stock Exchange magnate, Mr. Pettigrew. I believe you make millions every day!"

"Not a bit of it, my dear lady," said Pettigrew—pleased none the less.

"I love to hear about the City," said Frankie enthusiastically. "Companies are always exciting, and sometimes romantic."

"Not much romance about Wall Street, anyway," he said grimly. "By the way," he turned to Chesterton, "you don't know anything of politics, I take it? I don't suppose, for instance, you could give me any information as to the state of the game between your country and mine, in reference to this arbitration matter? It's about a strip of territory in South America, Mrs. Norton," he explained, "to which Britain and the United States both lay claim. The negotiations have been pending for years and years, but at last things have come to a head. The decision will shortly be made public; meantime I'm in a fix. I've put a lot of money into a scheme for building railways in that particular quarter of the globe. We're only waiting for certain concessions to be signed to start right away. But the bother of it is that we don't know which government will take the territory over. If the 'States' come out on top I'm all right; my company will get the concession. If Britain wins the deal"—he grimaced—"there's a rival company who'll put us clean out of the running. If I could get to know which way the cat is going to jump I could act accordingly. Either buy more shares or sell out those I have. It's an awkward position anyway."

"I'm afraid I can't help you, Mr. Pettigrew," said Chesterton. "I've steered clear of politics so far. I only vote for two bills—the deceased wife's sister, and for the better preservation of pheasants!"

It seemed rather a strange combination, but I didn't like to make any remark. Frankie said men hated women to criticise them, and I didn't want Lord Chesterton to feel that way to me.

"It's an intensely exciting situation, Mr. Pettigrew," said Frankie. "I suppose you could clear a really big sum if you only knew what was going to happen?"

"I should that, Mrs. Norton. I'd pay handsomely for the information."

Frankie flushed and her eyes grew very bright.

"There's likely to be an exciting debate in the Commons this afternoon on this very matter," said Chesterton. "Suppose you all come down to the House and have tea on the terrace?"

Pettigrew was otherwise engaged, but Frankie at once accepted. She seemed in great spirits at the notion, just as if she had an invitation to a specially smart affair.

She put on one of her prettiest gowns, a pale green voile embroidered in silver, and a toque of cerise roses. I wore a sweet mauve muslin over a silk slip, with a ruffle of white chiffon, and a soft, crinkly straw hat trimmed with a mass of chiffon and hydrangea.

Chesterton conducted us to the Ladies' Gallery. It reminded me of a sheep pen, only we poor sheep couldn't get our heads through the grille. Frankie and I had good seats in the front row. I felt as if I were at the theatre and wished the orchestra would commence.

A very stout and very prosy person was speaking with much deliberation and a large number of "ahems." He was followed by an impassioned youth, with a tiresome collar that seemed to get in his way perpetually.

After he sat down everyone said "Hear, hear!" It was just like the theatre only the performers didn't take their call.

Presently Mr. Grendale got on his feet. Frankie listened to him attentively. At the close of his oration, short, sharp, and brilliant, Dollie, who had been seated further back, leant forward and welcomed Frankie with delight.

"So sweet of you, darling, to come and hear poor Horace"—Dollie always spoke of her husband as poor Horace—"didn't you think him splendid? Of course you did. Going to have tea on the terrace! How delightful! so am I."

It was a gay scene on the terrace. Society women in smart frocks, literary women

Digitized by Google

—not all smart—political women and a good sprinkling of actresses. Everyone ate strawberries and cream, including the legislators. Frankie was soon the centre of a group of Irish members; she and Dollie seemed to be the features of the afternoon.

It was a beautiful day, and the river looked bright and sparkling in the sunshine. I should have enjoyed myself thoroughly if it had not been for the thought of Toby and that terrible bill.

Dollie drove back with us to Pont Street. She was most affectionate to Frankie, and more than ever impressed with her friend's social importance.

"You must stay to dinner, dear," insisted my cousin. "Lady Gaveston is out—engaged in good works, so we can have a cosy time together."

We had a very nice meal, and then adjourned to Frankie's den. Dollie smoked cigarettes and drank champagne with a delightful sense of being wicked! "Poor Horace" had such quaint ideas about women. He couldn't bear them to smoke, she explained.

From cigarettes Frankie discussed chiffons, gliding in the most natural manner possible into Clairvette's infamous prices and her determination to be paid.

"By the bye, Dollie, if it's quite convenient, you might let me have a cheque. I'm awfully pressed, old girl, or I wouldn't bother you. I suppose you can let me have a thou. on account?"

Dollie crimsoned to the tips of her ears.

"I have spent every fraction of this quarter's allowance, dear," she said. "I shan't have another penny till next month."

"That's easily got over. Horace never refuses you anything. He'll give you a cheque for the asking."

"He can't, Frankie. He——" Dollie paused. She always tried to impress one with the idea that Horace was possessed of millions. It would, she thought, discredit her position in the smart set if she acknowledged the true state of the case.

"You don't mean to say that Mr. Grendale can't afford to pay his wife's gambling debts?" sneered Frankie. "You've no business to have played at all, if that is so."

"Horace made me promise not to gamble any more."

Frankie shrugged her shoulders.

"Well, tell him you owe the money to your dressmaker, or your tailor; I'm not particular what you say so long as I get the money. Look here, Dollie, you can't say I've been hard on you. You've owed me close on two thou. for the last month or six weeks. I've not asked you before, shouldn't now unless I was terribly pushed. You're bound to get it, old girl, and that's the fact. Would you like me to ask Mr. Grendale for you?"

"For Heaven's sake, Frankie, don't do that."

Frankie frowned, glancing at the little woman contemptuously.

"You're not behaving well, Dollie. You play with me for high stakes, then you ask me to wait for the money, although you know debts of honour should never stand over. Now when I can wait no longer you try and put me off indefinitely. It's dishonest and mean. I relied on the money to meet certain obligations. My creditors won't show me any mercy, I can tell you."

Dollie wrung her hands.

"I don't know what I shall do," she sobbed. "I daren't ask Horace for anything just now. He's so worried and harassed about affairs in Parliament. The negotiations between Britain and America have kept him awake night after night. It's very silly of him for he's not responsible, but there it is. I can't speak to him now."

Frankie gazed at her friend through a haze of smoke.

"I must say that's rather rough on you, Dollie. A woman like you oughtn't to be neglected, even for politics. The sacrifice shouldn't be all on your side."

Dollie immediately assumed an air of injury and sighed.

"I expect you could do with a little money yourself, dearie," continued Frankie. "It's a long time till next month."

"I'd give anything for some cash. I owe such a lot it makes me positively wretched."

"A clever woman like you ought to be able to make all she wants. Everyone speculates nowadays. With your sources of information you should do very well on the Stock Exchange. Why, a man I know was telling me only this morning that he could clear hundreds of thousands in the next few days if he only knew how this arbitration matter would be settled." Frankie looked swiftly at the other. "Political secrets always leak out, you know, somehow or other," she continued, "nobody knows how, but somebody makes a fortune. Why shouldn't you?"

"I—oh, Frankie, it would mean breaking faith with Horace! I couldn't do that. Besides"—suddenly getting frightened—"I don't know anything about the arbitration."

Frankie smiled cynically.

"Look here, Doll," she said slowly, "you'd better understand me; I mean business. You've got to pay the money you owe me. If you don't get it yourself I shall be compelled to go to your husband. By to-night—within an hour—he will know how his wife has deceived him. He will know that his wife is a gambler, and"—she lowered her voice—"a cheat."

"Not that, for God's sake, not that! It was only once, and I didn't mean to—indeed, indeed I didn't. He loves me so dearly. Trusts me so completely. I should die if he were to change towards me. I thought you were my friend, Frankie."

The unhappy little creature clutched at my cousin's hand and strove to soften her.

"It will be your own fault," said Frankie coldly, "if your husband knows. Here I point out a way by which you can clear off your debts and start afresh, and you talk sentimental rubbish about betraying your husband's trust. Don't be a fool, Dollie! How could it harm your husband? Am I likely, for my own sake, to persuade you against your interest? No one will ever find out. Come"—she bent towards her coaxingly—"I'm sure you know; tell me, which is it, Britain or America?"

"No, no," Dollie buried her head among the sofa cushions. "Don't ask me. I daren't—I won't tell you."

"You know the alternative. I go to Mr. Grendale."

"You can't mean it, you don't mean it!" Dollie rocked to and fro. "If I did," she glanced up tearfully. "Are you sure it wouldn't hurt Horace?"

"Positive."

"And I should get enough money to pay you and everybody else?"

"Enough to pay me certainly," said Frankie, "and some besides."

"But I don't know anyone on the Stock Exchange."

"I'll settle that part of the business. Come now. Speak."

But at that Dollie fell to whimpering.

Frankie lost patience.

"Be quiet," she said, "you little fool. Listen to me," seizing her by the wrist. "I'll waste no more words on you. Tell me at once, this minute, or I go to Horace. Poor Horace!" and she sneered.

Dorothea Grendale raised her head, a strange look in the big blue eyes. Weak she was, foolish and vain, but yet she loved her husband. The very thought that she might lose that husband's love and trust was terrible. If she did not do what Frankie wanted he would learn what she had done. He would turn utterly from the wife he had held so dear.

Digitized by Google

And yet it was an awful thing to break his confidence. How could she, how could she do it?

I read the struggle on her face and impulsively sprang forward.

"Don't tell," I cried, "you'll never forgive yourself if you do. Confess everything to your husband; I know that he'll forgive you, but don't reveal what he said to you in confidence. For your own sake, I beg you, I pray you—don't."

Frankie showed no anger at my interference; she smiled and shrugged her shoulders.

"It's true—quite true," sobbed Dollie, "I'd better tell Horace all."

"Certainly," said my cousin. "I quite agree with you. We'll go together—Cynthia, ring for the carriage."

"I—I—Oh, it's no use," cried Dollie. "I can fight no longer. My husband told me last night about the arbitration—he was so full of it he had to speak to someone. Britain gives up her claims in favour of America. There—there—I've told you. I've betrayed Horace—betrayed my husband—what shall I do, what shall I do?" Hysterical sobs choked her, she was agitated beyond control.

Frankie promptly dashed water in her face and poured brandy down her throat. Then, tucking her up on the couch, charged me on no account to leave her for a moment.

"I am going to see Hiram," she whispered. "He'll give pretty well all I like to ask for what I've got to tell him. Keep Dollie here till I come back. At any rate, Cynthia, you might be glad of one thing. Pettigrew's money will settle Nathan's bill and save Toby from disgrace. Remember, there was only to-day to get the money. Yesterday was the first and to-morrow will be the last day of grace."

Somehow it seemed too heavy a price even for Toby's safety, as I glanced at the figure on the couch. Dollie was quieter now, but an occasional sob still shook her slight frame. She was very young, quite a girl, I thought, as I watched the pretty, fair head, drooping with shame.

Presently she sat up and commenced to talk.

"You can't think how good Horace has been to me," she said. "I've tried his patience often, I've been foolish and silly, and thought more of what other people have said than my own husband. I wish I'd never tried to be smart. If I'd been content to go out less, and stop at home more, I should be happy now, instead——" She commenced to cry again, plucking restlessly at her gown.

"Don't you make the mistake I've made, Cynthia. If you get married be content with your husband's love. Don't worry and fret about Society. It won't help you; when you're in trouble it will stamp on you, laugh at you. I wish I had done as he asked me," she wailed. "He begged me to go into the country this season. He said London would rub the bloom off my cheeks, he might have said off my heart, too. He would have run down from town very often, I should have seen just as much of him. Why did I refuse—why did I refuse?"

I sat and listened with a heavy heart. My mind went back to those first days when I had come to live with Frankie. Only the matter of six months or so, but what a lot had happened in those six months. How many things I had learnt that then were strange to me.

I knew nothing of Society then. Now—I know really too much!

The hours passed very slowly, ten, eleven, twelve had struck and Frankie had not yet returned. Dollie had made one or two efforts to go home, but I had easily dissuaded her. At last she fell into a broken sleep, murmuring every now and then her husband's name.

Just after midnight Frankie returned, looking splendid in a long sacque coat of black satin and a picture hat with heavy plumes.

She called me from the room.

"I've seen Pettigrew," she said, "and arranged everything satisfactorily. But as ill-luck would have it, coming out of his hotel—the Cecil, you know—I caught sight of Kinross. He was with two other men, and looked black as thunder when he saw me by myself. He'll make an awful fuss about it, Cynthia, and goodness knows what excuse I am to make for being out alone at such an hour. He's sure to ask for an explanation. Good Heavens!" as a thundering knock at the front door interrupted her. "I do believe that is my lord himself. What am I to do? He mustn't know that Dollie's here. You'll have to see him, Cynthia, while I get rid of her. No, that won't do. You must be present when I speak to Dollie. Quick, we must get it over soon," and she pulled me into the morning room.

"Well, Dollie," she said, smiling in her usual manner. "Are you better? That's right. I've good news for you, my dear." She leisurely unfastened her coat, studying the other intently.

"Here's my receipt for what you owe me, Doll, and a thousand pounds besides. Count the notes and see that they are all right, dear."

My cousin laid the paper and the notes on the table.

Mrs. Grendale did not speak. She rose from the couch, walked to the table, deliberately took up the notes and threw them on the floor.

"Why, Dollie——"

"I don't want your money," Dollie interrupted swiftly, "and I won't take it. As for this," she lifted the receipt, "it is of no value to me now, and she tore the paper into shreds.

Frankie breathed quickly, the situation was becoming strained. Outside in the hall, Kinross, his voice louder than usual, was imperatively demanding to see Mrs. Norton. At any moment he might stride into the room to look for her, and then——

"Don't be foolish, Dollie," said Frankie, biting her lips. "If you don't take the notes, what are you going to do?"

"This—I'm going straight to my husband to tell him everything." She glanced defiantly at Frankie, and moved towards the door.

In a second my cousin intercepted her, and stood triumphant, towering over her.

"You little fool," she said, "to think you can get the better of me. You will tell your husband everything, will you?" she mocked. "Idiot! He knows already, I've told him myself, everything—not half an hour ago."

And with that Frankie threw up her head and sailed out of the room.

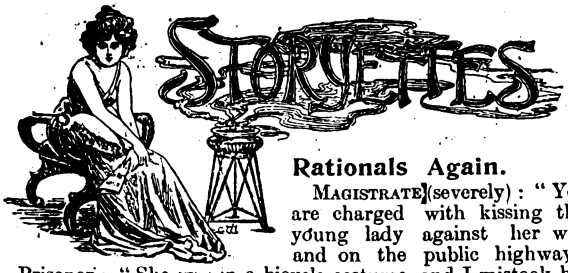
Kinross was waiting for her, angry and impatient, in the hall. I heard his voice raised to question her. She took him in the dining-room and closed the door.

He had come to ask her for an explanation of her midnight call on Pettigrew.

What explanation could she give?

(Frankie's explanation to Lord Kinross is recorded next week.)

Digitized by Google



Rationals Again.

MAGISTRATE (severely): "You are charged with kissing this young lady against her will, and on the public highway." Prisoner: "She was in a bicycle costume, and I mistook her for my long-lost brother." Magistrate (briskly): "Discharged! Call the next case."

Why it came Last.

MR. HOJACK (at dinner): "My dear, isn't it very queer for you to serve soup after the beef?" Mrs. Hojack: "Not at all, love. This is oxtail soup. It comes last."

Saved the Situation.

POLLY (to her fiancé): "Tom, you danced four times with that girl Jenkins, and only twice with me." Tom (slyly); "Well, it takes quantity, you know, to make up for quality."

Why it Failed.

PASSENGER in railway carriage to his neighbour: "Is marriage a failure where you live?" Colonist (returned home for a few months): "I'm sorry to say it is." "Why?" "Lack of women."

The Height of Consideration.

HE: "I think it is an outrage that the ladies should wear high hats in the theatre." She: "Yes. I must admit you men are much more considerate." "Of course we are." "Some of you who get in the front row are even so considerate as to leave your hair at home. You are too good for this world."

The Way Out.

SWEET SEVENTEEN: "Oh, papa! I have found a way for you to escape the death duties." Father: "I fancy not." Sweet Girl: "Yes, I have. You give half your stocks to Mr. Slimpurse, and then I'll marry Mr. Slimpurse, and so all the money will be kept in the family, and the Government won't get a penny."

Reassured.

TIMID LADY (about to buy a ticket for New York): "And is the boat that sails on Thursday perfectly safe?" Agent for the Ocean Greyhound Co. (gravely): "Madam, I can assure you that in all the time this ship has been in service, and that time covers a number of years, madam, not once has she gone to the bottom." Timid lady (reassured): "Oh, then, it must be all right. Let me have a cabin, please."

A Chance for Somebody.

MR. DECKER had been entertaining a party of his friends in the parlour, and the aroma of their cigars still lingered in the curtains. Mrs. Decker was naturally disgusted when she came into the room. She threw the windows wide open, and remarked: "Well, it is all very well to talk about inventing smokeless powder, but I don't see why somebody hasn't the gumption enough to invent a smokeless tobacco."

Love's Young Dream.

FATHER. "Now, see here! If you marry that young pauper, how on earth are you going to live?" Sweet Girl: I have been reading a poultry circular, and I find that a good hen will raise twenty chickens in a season. Well, the next season that will be twenty-one hens; and as each will raise twenty more chicks, that will be 420. The next year the number will be 8,400, the following year 168,000, and the next 3,360,000! Just think! At only one shilling a-piece we should have £168,000. Then, you dear old papa, we'll lend you some money so that you will be able to pay off the mortgage on this house."

Love in the Grocer's Shop.

"Do you love me?" said the paper bag to the sugar. "I'm just wrapped up in you," replied the sugar. "You sweet thing!" murmured the paper bag.

Another Philanthropist Hardened.

PHILANTHROPIC OLD GENT: "Here, my little man, here's a penny for you." His Little Man: "Toss yer double or quits—whether yer makes it tuppence or keeps it."

Her Reasons.

MR. FLATHOUSE: "Why did you kick me under the table when I asked Gorgeleigh to have some more wild duck?" Mrs. Flathouse (severely): "For two reasons. There was no more wild duck, and not being a professional dancer I could not kick over the table."

Why He Refrained.

"MR. BLUFFLY," she said, graciously, "you are one of the most original men I have met for ever so long. You haven't said a single word about the weather." "No," he replied, with a tinge of regret in his voice, "I couldn't give my opinion of the weather in the presence of ladies."

He Wore Size 9.

MRS. DE BRIDE was entertaining callers. After they left she remarked to her husband: "I hope they didn't see my walking shoes lying there; they wouldn't think me very tidy if they did." "Oh, if they saw them, they probably thought they were mine," answered her husband, in a consoling tone. And she hasn't spoken to him since.

A Gentle Hint.

MRS. BRIGHT: "My daughter tells me that you have become quite an adept in palmistry." Young Squeezem: "Yes, I have studied it for some time. Mrs. Bright: "Well, I have had a plaster impression taken of Madeline's hand, and if you wish to study it you can do so at your leisure. It will save you the trouble of a personal examination, you know."

An Ominous Symptom.

"A GOOD wife is Heaven's greatest gift to man, and the rarest gem the earth holds," remarked Mr. Jarphly, the other morning. "She is his joy, his inspiration, and his very soul. Through her he learns to reach the pure and true, and her loving hands lead him softly over the rough places. She is——" "Jeremiah," said Mrs. Jarphly, solemnly, "Jeremiah, what wickedness have you been up to now?"

Not Quite what he Meant.

MISS CLARA WINTERBLOOM: "Mamma, this is Mr. Tutter. I want to introduce him to you. Do you know that he was under the impression that I was the only daughter, and I have just been telling him that I have two sisters." Mrs. Winterbloom: "Oh, yes. You must meet Maud and Estelle. Mr. Tutter. They are both of them older than Clara there.' Young Tutter (wishing to say the right thing): "I didn't suppose it possible, Mrs. Winterbloom, that you could have any daughters older than Miss Clara."

What is Love?

LOVE: A nervous disorder affecting the entire system, and sometimes even the clothes and food of the victim. Peculiar to both sexes of all ages, from childhood to second childhood. Always fatal in age, seldom in youth. Symptoms: Loss of appetite and interest in mundane affairs. Anxiety as to personal appearance. Longing for flowers and poetry. Sudden affection for children, especially babies that the victim has formerly despised. Demented belief in the absolute perfection of some being of the opposite sex. Vacant expression of the eyes and cerebral cavity. Patient speaks in monosyllables, and takes an especial interest in the monosyllable "Yes." Treatment: One dose of the monosyllable "No" and nursing, for males. For females, a new seal-skin jacket, diamonds, and a trip to the Riviera, are sometimes efficacious. An application of "stern parents" may be of use, but more often merely excites the malady. Marriage is an absolute specific. But it is so dangerous that it is never used except in extreme cases.

Digitized by Google

A Mission Which Failed.

And the Ambassador who Succeeded.

MRS. LYNN felt her responsibility more than usual that morning. For four years she had been piloting her nephew, a young minister, past all kinds of matrimonial snares, only to find that when the right girl came along he was as blind and as unresponsive as though he had been made of wood.

True, he had never been even slightly conscious of the aforesaid matrimonial snares, and had not known that she was piloting him past anything. How should he—for nature, while giving him six feet of height, and power and logic and eloquence in the pulpit, had ordained that he should be as clay in the hands of the potter when it came to worldly affairs.

As for Mrs. Lynn, while he was in his study busy with next Sunday's sermon, she was expressing herself unsparingly to old Jane.

"It's really rather too bad of Dick—it's not at all what I expected of him!" she declared. "Here is Grace Noble, pretty and sensible, and with so much taste—and a sweet voice—I can't endure a screeching woman—and no relatives to speak of—I never could dream of having Dick marry a woman with an odious mother to come here and dictate to me—and she has a little money, though I'm not particular about that—I have enough for Dick——"

She paused to take a breath and to sigh a little, which gave Jane an opportunity to remark fatuously:

"Perhaps he hasn't noticed her. He's not worryin' about no woman."

"No, he hasn't noticed her," replied Mrs. Lynn with spirit. "I have her here to dinner, and go off and lie down afterwards on purpose, and he sits up there and talks books the whole time. Books! And once he came in and met her in the garden in the moonlight, and he stood there and talked flowers. No wonder she doesn't like to come over here. When he was gone that last time I pretended that he was to be away all night, and begged her to stay with me—almost lying for his sake, Jane—another little bit and it would have been a falsehood!—and he came back and wasn't in the house five minutes before he was off to see old Pennybaker, because he was ill! What is anyone to do with a man like that?"

"I wouldn't worry myself with no man," said Jane sententiously, thus virtually admitting that the problem was too much for her.

"Yes, but I can't leave him alone," said Mrs. Lynn, with a tragic emphasis. "If I do he is likely to marry just anybody—perhaps that sandy-haired Gaines girl—and think of her mother! Someone's at the door, Jane."

Mrs. Lynn was still reviewing the situation and grieving over it desperately when Jane returned.

"That young Harrison to see you, ma'am," she said with the privilege of age, and Mrs. Lynn went to meet the young Tom Harrison.

When she emerged from her conference with the much-embarrassed young man, a contemplative look was upon her face and a new look in her eyes.

"I'll see what can be done, Tom," she said cordially, and a sense of justice to Tom forced her to add, "but I don't think you need expect anything."

"I'm not hoping much," he confessed gloomily. "But I knew you were so intimate—and perhaps if she knew you thought well of me——"

"Of course," said Mrs. Lynn, busily plotting treason against Tom. "Good-bye. Tell your mother I'll send her that pickle recipe next week."

With an innocent countenance and a guileful heart Mrs. Lynn made her way into the study.

"You know how you like Tom Harrison, Dick," she said with warm and graceful interest. "Well, he's just been here—and he wants you to undertake a very delicate mission for him."

"What is it? I should be glad to help Tom," said the Rev. Richard Moore, pushing his books away.

"I knew you would," Mrs. Lynn hastened to assure him. "I told Tom you would. He's in love with a girl, you know, and he's so timid, and feels so unworthy, and so afraid of a refusal—and he thinks if you would go first and talk to the girl about it, and tell her how much everyone thinks of Tom—how much you think, especially——"

He towered before her, aghast.

"Well, I should certainly call that too delicate a mission," he cried. "Let him go himself."

"I told him you would go," said Mrs. Lynn unmoved. "He'd never go—and there'll be his happiness spoilt for his whole life. Grace thinks so much of you—it's Grace, you know—she'll listen to what you say. She went by with her sketch book a little while ago. You'll find her out in the park, I think."

He did not move.

"You mean Miss Noble?" he asked. "Don't you think she is rather superior to——"

"To Tom?" she said, with great cheerfulness. "Of course she is—but so is every woman to any man she is likely to marry. If they waited for their equals they'd all die old maids. Go along with you, Dick, and do the best you can for Tom."

When the young man found Miss Noble she had carefully established herself in a remote corner of the park, and the sketch she was painting, he saw, as he came up, should have included a bending tree with a glimpse of water under it. What was there about such a picture to make one turn it upside down with frantic haste and shut the book over it? She stood up, the colour rushing to her face, and the minister stood and looked down at her. He was all at once conscious that it would seem incongruous to speak to this girl about marrying Tom Harrison. But he had promised, and what he had promised was to be done.

"I hardly know how to go about it," was the undiplomatic way in which he opened the subject. "I shall do it very awkwardly, I know."

She did not help him out. He was embarrassed, but he went heroically on. There was but one way known to the young minister whereby things might be done, and that was the briefest and simplest and most direct way.

"I hope you won't think me officious," he said; "but I come on behalf of young Mr. Harrison. He loves you very deeply, and is so little conscious of his own merit"—he felt himself warming up—"that he hesitates to tell you of his love. I am only anxious for you to do him justice. I know him, I suppose, better than anyone else knows him. He is a thoroughly good fellow, who has built himself up through many adverse circumstances."

Miss Noble was looking at him haughtily, and her face was very white.

"Mr. Harrison is fortunate in his advocate," she said in chilling tones. "Will you tell him that I asked you not to speak further of this matter, because it would be useless—now and for ever?"

He floundered helplessly, and for one swift moment resolved never to be a friend to anybody again

Digitized by Google

"I am sorry," he said—for speech was given him that day for his own undoing. "No man's love is to be lightly thrown away—least of all the love of a man like Tom."

He waited a moment. She had turned away and was drawing on her gloves, her sketch book under her arm. Having nothing else to do, he watched the trembling gold that the sun threaded into her hair. Manifestly the proper thing to do was to go, but he could not go without looking into her face again.

"I hope you won't be angry with me," he murmured contritely. "I knew I should do it badly—I don't suppose there is any man living who could be as awkward about it as I naturally would—but you shouldn't make me feel quite so wretched as this." He walked round until he was facing her. "You surely are not going to be so unforgiving—Grace!"

She had raised her eyes, and he saw the tears in them. In an instant he was holding both her hands, and the sketch book was on the ground.

For a long moment he stood there, holding her hands and looking into her face, while his own face grew white. Then he let the hands fall.

"Good-bye," he said. "I must go and tell Tom that I can't plead his cause—for I love you myself. And then I suppose I shall make a failure of my own hopes."

He had not surprised her secret—he had only discovered his own. The young artist made a sudden grasp after her scattered pictures, the colour beginning to flame back into her face again; but he was before her; and there the topmost one had nothing to do with a bending tree and a glimpse of water under. It was a very good likeness of the Rev. Richard Moore, though even he could see that it flattered him.

"I was painting that for your aunt," said the young lady, blushing furiously. "No, I will not—at least—Richard!"

Mrs. Lynn was sitting in the half dusk of the vine-clad porch that evening when he came in and went up to her falteringly.

"I am afraid you will never forgive me, Aunt Helen," he said. "I know you were not thinking of my marrying for years yet—perhaps never—but Grace and I love one another—and I have told Tom—and I hope you won't be unwilling, auntie."

Mrs. Lynn was obliged to press both hands to her heart.

"Why, Dick Moore!" she cried, much scandalised. "I thought you went to win a wife for Tom! Well, I suppose I never shall understand any man alive! But no doubt it is all for the best. Go and bring Grace—and I'll have to forgive you, I suppose." And she stood on tiptoe to kiss the boy she had brought up.

J. T. Bishop.

The Missing Bank Note.

A Pretty Little Tale of a False Accusation.

THE respectable home of Miss Jessie Howard was in a state of turmoil. One hundred pounds had been paid to Miss Jessie that morning, and within little more than an hour the money had vanished as if by witchcraft.

Just now Miss Howard was tearfully going over all the circumstances with her niece, who stood before her with indignant eyes and protesting voice.

"Of course, Amy," sobbed Miss Jessie, "it is only natural that you should feel as you do just now, still I do wish that you would be a little more reasonable."

"Reasonable!" ejaculated the younger Miss Howard, with infinite scorn in her voice; "it is not I who am unreasonable! It is you, Aunt Jessie, when you insinuate for a single moment that Robert Armstrong had anything to do with your wretched old money."

"But just listen, Amy. I tell you I had it in my hand when he entered the room. Mr. Tenney had just been in and paid it to me. It was just as he left that Mr. Armstrong came in. I know that I held it in my right hand when he came, for, you see, I distinctly remember that I had had to put it down before I could shake hands with him. Then he told me his errand, and, of course, that put all thought of the money out of my head. I never dreamt, Amy, that you cared for him."

"Well, I do, auntie," her niece affirmed, with a sort of wrathful positivity, "and I hope you were nice to him. You haven't told me yet what you both said."

"Oh," with a deep sigh, "I suppose I was nice enough to him. You see, I didn't miss the money until after he had gone. He told me that he liked you and wanted to marry you; that he believed you cared for him. Of course I said I was astonished, and I expect he could see easily enough that that was the truth. But I had always liked his mother, and of course we know all about his family, and that's something, although it doesn't seem to matter about his family at all," she ended rather incoherently.

"Go on, auntie," commanded her niece imperiously, "what else was said?"

"Oh, well, I told him that it was not a matter in which I felt that I should interfere; that you had your own life to live, but that I was glad you had chosen a man whom I could trust and like; for I have liked him, Amy. Then, of course, he thanked me and talked about you and his plans for the future. He said that he was in rather a tight place financially just now, but that he hoped to have matters straightened out soon, and he hadn't meant to speak to you, he said, until everything was all right; but somehow he had forgotten himself."

"Yes," Amy acquiesced, with a little smile, "he certainly did forget himself if he hadn't meant to say anything to me yet, but it doesn't really make any difference, you know. What next, auntie?"

"Oh, that was all. He sat and talked about you, of course, and he thanked me, and then he left. I just went to the door here with him. He wouldn't let me go to the porch. He said that he should be here so much now that we mustn't stand on ceremony with him."

"Well!" impatiently.

"Well, then I came back and sat down to think it all over. All of a sudden I remembered that money and it wasn't on the table. I couldn't believe it at first. I just remembered what Robert Armstrong said about being in financial trouble, and——"

Digitized by Google

In spite of her extreme vexation Amy Howard laughed outright. "My dearest aunt, Rob is worth nearly a million pounds, and your little hundred pound note wouldn't help him much."

But Miss Jessie shook her head wisely. "You can't tell me that, Amy; perhaps he needed that amount to-day."

"If he did there are a thousand places where he could get it honourably. But if there were not, and if he needed it—which he didn't in the least, I can assure you—he would lose every farthing he had rather than get it dishonourably. Now, Aunt Jessie, I am not going to get angry with you if I can help it, because you have been too good to me all my life for me to do any such thing. But you mustn't make any insinuations, auntie. Now tell me exactly what you did when you found that the money wasn't where you thought it was."

"I looked round for it at first, but you can easily see that it isn't in the room. Then I stepped to the door, and told James to call you. You see, Amy," poor Miss Jessie concluded tearfully, "I haven't been an inch outside this room since Mr. Tenney gave me that wretched money, and not a soul besides was in here until you came in just now—except Robert Armstrong."

"Then it is in this room now," said her niece, emphatically.

"Where?"

Amy looked round the small, square room that was commonly known as Miss Howard's "den," and mentally acknowledged that there were few hiding places in it. In fact, it was little used. In one corner stood a huge desk with a rolling cover, and this might have afforded a thousand possible hiding places, but Miss Jessie asserted that the desk was locked and the key in her box upstairs; that she had not been to the desk for two days. Amy tried the top and the drawers of the desk only to find that everything was locked as securely as Miss Jessie had stated. She looked beneath it and over every inch of the carpet. She shook out the folds of her aunt's dress and hunted in every corner, but all to no purpose. Aside from the desk just mentioned, the only furniture in the room consisted of a few chairs and a table on which were a couple of newspapers. Amy unfolded the papers over and over, but no money was hidden in them. At last she stopped in sheer disgust and perplexity. Her aunt had been watching her anxiously. "It isn't here, is it, Amy?"

"I certainly can't find it, Aunt Jessie," the girl acknowledged frankly, "and I have been over every bit of this room at least a dozen times. It must have blown up the chimney or out of the window."

"The chimney has been closed for weeks," her aunt said drily, "and while the window is certainly raised, there is a screen in it. The note couldn't have blown through that even if there were a bit of air stirring to-day, which there isn't."

"You are sure Mr. Tenney paid you, Aunt Jessie?" her niece asked hesitatingly.

Miss Jessie's eyes flashed ominously. "Am I a fool, Amy Howard? I have been called a good business woman for more than twenty years now, do you suppose I don't know what money is given me? Mr. Tenney had the receipt all made out, and I signed it with his fountain pen. There is the ink it left on my fingers now. I hate fountain pens! But you needn't insinuate that I am an idiot, Amy, I don't deserve it from you."

Amy took the reproof meekly, for she felt that it was not undeserved. Miss Jessie, as she herself had remarked, had now the thoroughly merited reputation of being a good business woman. If she declared that money had been paid her, then it had, and there was no more to be said on that phase of the subject. Still, Miss Jessie had undoubtedly been completely upset by Robert Armstrong's avowal, and possibly her practical wits were not so alert as usual. Yet, with this admitted, even by Miss Jessie herself, Amy was no nearer the solution of the problem than before, for Miss Howard could swear to the payment of the money, to placing it on the table after Robert Armstrong had entered, and to the fact that no one except himself had entered the room, while she had not left it.

"It is certainly worse than a Chinese puzzle," Amy declared indignantly. "Rob is coming this afternoon to take me driving, and I shall just tell him the whole story, and perhaps he can throw some light on it."

Miss Jessie fairly gasped with surprise. "What! shall you tell him that you think he must have taken the money."

"Of course not," Amy rejoined, indignantly. "That would not be the truth, so why should I say it? But I would like to know if Rob saw the money, and if he noticed anything about it. And I shall ask him."

* * * * * * *

And ask him she did that very day. It was an annoying little episode, and if possible she did not want the early days of her engagement to be troubled any more by it. She told her lover all about the mysterious disappearance of the money, and begged him to search his memory and see if he could recall anything at all about it. Of course Amy said not a word about her aunt's suspicions.

"Why, yes, dear," Armstrong said promptly. "I do remember all about it. Miss Howard laid the note on the table just as she told you she had done. After I had told her my little story, she took it up in her hand, and, after twisting it round in her fingers a few moments, she put it into her pocket. I thought that she was not half conscious of what she was doing at the time. Naturally I had upset her considerably."

Amy laughed in sheer relief. "Poor Aunt Jessie, she must have been disturbed indeed to forget what she was doing in that fashion. I presume she even forgot that she had a pocket. In fact, that is the only pocket she possesses, and she had a great fight to get that. You must know, my dear, that fashion nowadays does not allow us poor women to have pockets, and auntie's dressmaker was indignant when she insisted on having one."

Poor Miss Jessie was overwhelmed with mortification when Amy told her tale, and the missing bank note was found safely, even as Armstrong had said, in the one solitary pocket that she possessed.

"Will he ever forgive me, Amy?" she cried, plaintively.

"He doesn't know that he has anything to forgive, and we will not enlighten him, auntie," Amy said, adding maliciously: "His financial troubles have all vanished now, Aunt Jessie. He found a letter after he left you this morning, telling him that those people who have been trying to steal his South African mines have given up the fight. So, you see, Rob doesn't need your hundred pound note."

M. J.

The Modern Novel.

"Tell me honestly," said the novel reader to the novel writer, "did you ever see a woman who stood and tapped the floor impatiently with her toe for several moments, as you describe?" "Yes," was the thoughtful reply; "I did once." "Who was she?" "She was a clog dancer."

Nice for the Shopman.

Mrs. Upton: "I don't know what to do with myself this afternoon. Give me ten shillings for a ticket to the concert, and I'll go there." Hardy Upton: "Really, Clara, I have but fivepence-halfpenny in my pocket, and——" Mrs. Upton: "Oh, well, give me that, and I'll spend the afternoon shopping."

A Wonderful Gift.

Fortune-Teller: "You may in time make a good income, but you will never be rich." Young man: "Eh? Why not?" "You are wasteful. You are wasteful." "My! my! I'm afraid that is true. You have a wonderful gift. How did you know I was wasteful?" "You have just wasted a shilling getting your fortune told."

Digitized by Google

A DAMAGED PICTURE.

Telling of a Girl's Devotion.

MARGARET CLAYTON put down her palette and surveyed her handiwork with satisfaction.

"That's splendid," she murmured, "the Beggar Maid's expression is perfect, I know. Dear me, what weeks of genuine hard labour that face alone represents—over and over again I've painted it. Harold will be so proud too. He knows just enough about art to appreciate my best work. I will go and bring him to see it."

Glancing round her studio she decided to move the easel to another position.

"He will see it directly the door is opened," she reflected, "and I can move it round for him to see the details."

With a happy smile upon her face she left the room and put on her hat to tell her success to the man who loved her work only less than he loved herself.

Passing a closed door on her way to the hall she hesitated. If she told her blind mother that the great work was finished, would her pleasure for her daughter's success counterbalance her grief at not being able to see the picture? After a moment's consideration she opened the drawing-room door.

"Mother, dear," she said gently, "I am going to ask Harold to come while the light is good to see the picture. It is finished."

"I am so glad, dear child. I know by your voice it is good. You are pleased. I wish I could see it, Margaret, but you must tell me exactly what it is like when you come back."

The old lady's excitement and pleasure were as manifest as her daughter's.

Margaret ran to her and putting her arms round her, kissed her.

"We will go to see it at the Academy, mother, and listen to the remarks of the crowd. It is my best work by far. I can promise you the treat safely. Two months from now. Am I conceited mother, mine?" she added laughing.

"I will look forward to it every day." Mrs. Clayton's fingers busied themselves with the knitting which was their invariable occupation, and with a delightful nod she told her daughter to hurry for Harold who must leave his books for that afternoon.

But the mother's interest was too great for her to be content to sit still when left alone.

"I will be there to hear his praises," she thought, "I know where the easel stands facing the window. Yes, I will go up and be there when they come in."

Carefully she felt for her stick and moved towards the door. She groped her way safely upstairs but it was the work of some minutes. She entered the studio and waited just inside.

Presently hearing the front door open and shut she advanced into the room.

"I must not be in the light," she reflected, "I will go to the other end. Now, he can see it quite well. Here they come."

As they opened the door there was a resounding bang, for Mrs. Clayton accidentally struck her foot against the easel, and upset the picture. Unfortunately it fell face downwards on the carpet.

"What is that?" asked the blind woman quickly, "not anything valuable I do trust? I was trying not to be in Harold's light." Then as they did not answer she became alarmed.

"Oh, Margaret, dear child, surely it is not your picture? Say I have not spoiled your work?"

Margaret glanced from the smudged canvas which she had picked up to her mother's supplicating, grief-stricken face. Stifling her cry of disappointment she said in a cheerful voice:

"All right, mother, this is not the Academy picture." Alas, it looked as if that were true.

The old lady's face radiated with joy.

"I am relieved. What a shock I had," she exclaimed. "And what do you think of Margaret's work, Harold? Is it not good and worthy of her? I came up to hear your praises."

"It is very, very good, Mrs. Clayton," was the emphatic reply, as he looked his admiration into the eyes of the woman he loved.

"And I am going to the Academy to see it," continued the blind woman fondly. "I have only two months to wait. Now I will go down and leave you. I am sure you have a lot to tell her, Harold, to say how pleased you are with her."

"The face is all smudged," cried Margaret when the door had closed behind her mother, "it is quite spoilt and the wet paint has gone over her dress and all. What shall I do? And you didn't even see it."

"You have done more than I could have done, little girl already. A V.C. isn't good enough for you, and I know you can do more. Paint the face in again and take her to the Academy to 'see' it."

"Oh, Harold, I can't. I can never touch it again."

"There, let us begin at once," and kissing her tears away he handed her the palette and brushes.

The little gods who reward the brave did not fail to do their duty in this instance. To Margaret's delight her second finished face was equally as good as the first and the smudges on the dress were soon painted over.

She was happy when she felt her mother's arm tremble with joy when she overheard the appreciative remarks of the crowd gathered round "King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid," the picture of the year. But she was happier still when she read Harold's love and pride in his face.

Rita Cay.

OUR THRILLING COLOURED COVER FOR NEXT WEEK.

In her sleep she silently glided over the housetops.

An incident from the powerful story, "Through the Peril of the Night," in next Tuesday's issue.

Digitized by Google

OUR . . THRILLING SERIAL.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By Henry Farmer.

Crump Makes a Discovery and Visits Scotland Yard.

Crump had been busy, very busy indeed, since his return from Gurlston Bay; yet not so busy but that he had been able to find time to write daily to Esther. She was rapidly improving now; though some time must elapse before it would be possible to remove her to Warham. And it was as well—so Crump told himself. John Mansfield was a changed man since the interview in which Crump, without setting before him actual proof positive of Scarsdale's innocence, had thrown light on the character of the man on whose testimony he had been convicted. He had kept nothing back, not even the deductions that he had drawn concerning the manner in which Alice Vance had met her death. The banker had been astounded, horrified beyond words. Believing the right moment to have come, Crump had not hesitated to take him into his confidence. When it came to a question of whom to trust and whom to distrust, the little man never made a mistake. He knew that the banker's secrecy could be relied upon.

Certain communications had reached the little man from abroad of a very satisfactory nature about Signor Balderini. He had also succeeded in obtaining a copy of a certificate of marriage between one James Balder and Alice Vince. He had further, after much trouble, succeeded in unearthing one of the witnesses of the marriage. Crump was capable of doing a tremendous amount of work, and doing it without flurry, and could always find the time to be amiable and courteous.

The little man was taking an early breakfast in his room at Woodbine Cottage. The day before had been spent in a remote country village, the birthplace of Alice Vince. From Railton, through Fred Wilton, he knew that Revelle and Faversham were expected at The Firs that afternoon. On the table, beside him, was laid his map of Avesham Common with its crosses and pencilled notes.

He pursed up his lips. To himself it was perfectly convincing. He was in a position now, when called upon, to produce witnesses who would be able to identify Seaton Revelle, Esq., of The Firs, as a man who, some eleven years back, had been known both as James Balder and Signor Balderini; he had proof to hand that James Balder had married Alice Vince, and that Alice Vince and Alice Vance, late parlour-maid in John Mansfield's service, had been one and the same woman. Then there was the evidence of the torn fragment of dress, fitting a tear in the dead woman's dress, and of the material of which the asylum uniform was made, discovered clinging to the gorse near to where the first bag of ballast had been found, where, also, a tuft of gorse had been uprooted; and there was the extraordinary position of the dead woman's body in the reservoir and her broken limb. Yet the little man told himself that all these points were not sufficient to secure a verdict of "Guilty!"

"Scarsdale's innocence," he muttered, "and absolute proof of it, so that the most sceptical shall not be able to entertain a tittle of doubt on the subject, is the most important, because the happiness of the living depends upon it; but it will be most grievous if this vile scoundrel should escape the penalty of this greater crime."

Then, suddenly, the little man struck his forehead sharply and gave vent to an ejaculation of annoyance.

"A most criminal piece of negligence on my part!" He shook his head more in sorrow than in anger. "I am past this kind of work, that is what is the matter with me. Now, if I had read in the papers of such a piece of neglect on somebody else's part, I should have been merciless in my condemnation. Yes, sir, I am guilty. I shall not attempt to plead extenuating circumstances!"

Then he pulled out his watch.

"But I shall endeavour to atone."

He tapped his forehead with a finger as if trying to recall something.

"Ah, yes! Spender—Messrs. Spender and Sons supplied the balloon and all the accompanying tackle. Oh, but indeed, I have been guilty of a most criminal piece of negligence, and had it been anyone else I should have been so merciless."

And had anybody heard Crump mutter the words, not knowing him, he would have imagined him to be one of the most merciless of men.

"Come in!" he cried, in answer to a knock on the door.

Pollie entered, carrying the toy tea-service that Crump had given her.

"Oh, Mr. Penworthy, you haven't quite finished your breakfast, have you?"

The little man glanced surreptitiously at his watch. He had a train to catch; but there would be just time to play the game that instinct told him Pollie desired.

"Well, Pollie dear, I have to go to London this morning, on business; but there will be just time for you to make me a cup of tea!"

Then Crump, chuckling to himself, poured some real tea into the miniature tea-pot, and some real milk into the jug, and was presently gravely drinking from a cup but little larger than a thimble.

"Might I trouble you," he said, "for another cup of your most delicious tea, Lady Mary? It is a beverage for which I have a great weakness."

All of which was very delightful to Pollie.

"And now, Lady Mary, a thousand pardons; but will you excuse me? Business is unfortunately business!"

Crump caught his train; but it was by the "skin of his teeth!"

He was fortunate enough to obtain an interview with Mr. Spender himself, head of the firm, to whom he revealed himself in his true character.

"The balloon and apparatus used recently at the fête at Warham were supplied by you, I believe, Mr. Spender?"

"Yes."

"Has," continued Crump, "has the balloon been used since?"

"Not to my knowledge; but I'll find out for certain."

Inquiry confirmed the statement. The balloon in question was stored on the premises.

"I should like," said Crump, "to examine it, and I should be very grateful if you would consent to be present, Mr. Spender."

The wicker car had been detached from the silk envelope. Crump entered it, and proceeded to make a very careful examination. It was in much the same state as when Revelle had left it at Ocklington. The two anchors had been placed inside. They were three-pronged, and looked like grappling irons.

Digitized by Google

Crump turned his attention to them, last of all. He had obtained from Mr. Spender a pledge of secrecy.

The ends of the prongs were shaped like fish-hooks.

"Ah!" exclaimed Crump; then, addressing Mr. Spender, "I wish to call your attention to this fragment of dark material—serge, I think—that is fixed on this hook, before I remove it. I have frequently known counsel for the defence to insinuate that the police are capable of manufacturing evidence."

Mr. Spender looked at the strip of cloth; then Crump removed it, and, having taken out his pocket case, drew therefrom another strip of cloth, that found on Avesham Common. The two strips were of the same material.

Crump had given no reasons for his examination.

"You said, 'counsel for the defence,'" said Mr. Spender, "is a law case likely to arise out of this?"

"I think so, Mr. Spender, I very much think so, a most staggering case; but until you hear from me, I can rely upon your silence!"

Some ten minutes later Crump was on his way to Scotland Yard.

"Dear me!" he sighed, as he alighted from his cab. "How time flies. It only seems yesterday——"

"Now then," said a young constable, on duty in the entrance, "what's your business?"

The little man smiled faintly. A few years ago, he would have been spoken to very differently, and to the accompaniment of a salute.

"I wish to see," answered the little man quietly, "Sir William Saunderson."

"Perhaps," said the constable sarcastically, "you'd like me to send round a message to the Home Secretary, telling him that you're here, and want to see him at once."

Sir William Saunderson was the head of the Criminal Investigation Department.

"Young man," said Crump, taking a card from his pocket, "avoid flippancy when on duty. Though the most troublesome old lady, or old man, in the world should come along and overwhelm you with trying questions, be polite, avoid sarcasm. When you feel tempted to exercise your undoubtedly brilliant wit, check yourself with the thought that, when on duty, you are the servant of the public. I won't trouble you to send for the Home Secretary at present, though very probably I shall be in communication with him before long." He paused to scribble something on his card. "Now will you kindly see that this card is delivered to Sir William?"

At that moment a gentleman, who had driven up in a closed carriage, passed into the entrance hall.

The constable went stiff and saluted. Then, the next moment, to his intense surprise, Sir William Saunderson was heartily shaking the insignificant, homely little man by the hand.

"Why, Crump, this is a most delightful surprise."

"Crump—the Crump!" thought the constable. "Oh, my Lord! But I've put my foot in it nicely, this time."

But when Crump, Sir William's arm linked in his, passed the constable, he nodded to him in a friendly way and with a quizzing glance in his small eyes that seemed to say: "Don't be downcast, young man, we all of us make mistakes sometimes."

For over an hour Crump was closeted with the great man.

"And that," said Crump, at the conclusion of his narrative, "is how matters stand at the present moment, Sir William, I have behaved, I know, in an unorthodox fashion. I ought, perhaps, to have communicated with you long before this; but, rightly or wrongly, my object has been, and is, not so much the unmasking of the scoundrel who is now posing as a gentleman at Warham, as the righting of an innocent man, though, at the same time, before I have done with him, I hope to have the supreme satisfaction of seeing that infamous blackguard adequately punished."

"Crump," said Sir William, "there is no need for you to make excuses. You will continue to conduct this case in your own way, and the services of Scotland Yard are at your disposal."

"Thank you very much indeed, Sir William," said the little man gratefully. "I shall not hesitate to take advantage of your kind offer!"

"I shall give instructions that all orders received here from you, Crump, are to be obeyed as implicitly as though you were still chief inspector, and, I assure you, I have often regretted your retirement."

"It is most kind of you to say that," answered Crump, with considerable embarrassment.

"Mind you, Crump, with regard to the murder—and I am as much convinced as yourself that it was murder—I don't think that even now there's enough evidence to insure conviction."

"Quite so. I have the same doubts—at present; but I do not despair of ultimate success. And I certainly feel that to-day a step forward has been taken. And now, Sir William, I must take my leave. Mr. Revelle and Mr. Favorsham are expected back at Warham this afternoon."

"Well, good-bye, Crump. I wish you every success!"

There was a little twinkle in Crump's eyes as he passed the constable in the entrance hall. The man hung his head rather sheepishly.

"I'm very sorry for my mistake, Mr. Crump, I'm sure!"

Crump patted him on the shoulder.

"I quite enjoyed it," he said, with a little chuckle, "don't distress yourself any more about it. Good morning!"

But, once outside, the amused smile died away, and the little man's face assumed a grave look.

"If," he muttered, "my conclusions should turn out to be wrong! I—I am feeling as nervous as a kitten! Yet they are pressing Revelle horribly for money. Unless he settles with his creditors soon, his position will be untenable. From the trouble that Tomlinson has been to in order to pump Fred and Tom on the movements of the police in the Warham neighbourhood, from his frequent visits to the Towers, I can't help thinking that his master means the Normanhurst jewels to supply him with the capital so desperately needed. Or if I am wrong in that respect, at all events he is meditating a coup somewhere in the immediate neighbourhood, and if he means to keep his head above water he must bring it off soon. I feel that the crisis on which everything turns may be now daily—or rather nightly—expected. I have practically promised that dear young lady that all will be well ultimately, and it's this that is making me feel so unpleasantly nervous. I am glad that Sir William approved of my policy of allowing the scoundrel sufficient rope in the belief that he will hang himself. It is good of him to allow me a free hand."

On his arrival at Warham, he returned to Woodbine Cottage, where he locked away the shred of cloth taken from the prong of the anchor. Not long after he received a telegram. It was from Grogan, his one-time colleague at Scotland Yard, who was keeping Benny Beard under surveillance.

"That's all right!" muttered the little man.

The telegram had been dispatched from a London terminus, and stated that B. had booked for Warham.

"And now," said the little man, as he leant back in the arm-chair, and covered his face with his handkerchief, "I may as well snatch a little sleep, seeing that I shall have no opportunity during the greater portion of the night."

A few moments later he was sleeping peacefully. When he awakened, Tom Jackson was entering the room. He was in mufti.

"Well, Tom, my lad?"

Digitized by Google

"I've just seen Railton. Faversham's come, and gone!"

"Gone?"

"Yes"

"Dear me!"—Crump cogitated for a moment—"I wonder if there has been a split, or a change of plans? Tom, you will be doing me a great favour by taking a telegram for me?"

"Certainly."

"Did—Railton," said Crump, pencilling a message at the same time, "give you no particulars?"

"No. Only that Mr. Faversham had returned again to London."

"It isn't laziness, Tom, on my part, asking you to dispatch this message, but the fact the address is that of a private detective agency. You will be delighted to hear that the latest news from Gurlston Bay is that Miss Mansfield continues to progress most favourably."

The telegram was to Grogan, informing him of Benny's return to London, and asking him to get in touch with him again at once.

That evening Crump went out, taking his latch-key with him, after telling Mrs. Cobb not to sit up for him. He only returned to the cottage shortly before dawn. The night had been spent in watching The Firs; but without result.

A telegram reached him as he was sitting at breakfast.

"F. returned to his old quarters."

Had there been a quarrel? Or did it imply a change of plans?

"At all events," reflected Crump, "I can rely absolutely on Grogan. And that reminds me. I must send him a cheque on account of expenses. He's a good fellow, and wouldn't think of asking for such a thing; but business is business, and his time is money!"

And in the letter that accompanied the cheque, Crump conveyed the idea that he was acting on behalf of a third person. It was characteristic of him. Then he yawned; but he mastered his sleepiness, and proceeded to pen a long letter to Esther.

"I am so pleased to think," he said to himself, "that the misunderstanding between father and daughter no longer exists. She will not be nearly so lonely now!"

His letter to Esther finished, he penned another to her father. His correspondence posted, he paid a visit to The Woodlands, where he spent some time with Banks, the gardener, and expressed his satisfaction at the way in which the alterations were progressing.

"Another week, Mr. Penworthy, will see the job done, I'm thinking. I'm sure it's been a pleasure to work with you."

"It's very kind of you to say that, Banks."

"But since we started on it, Mr. Penworthy, a lot o' sad things have happened, haven't they? Poor Vance gone, and now all these terrible things have been taking place at Gurlston Bay. Heart-breaking for Miss Esther! I'm sure it cast a regular sadness over everybody round about here. You know, we all worship her. And it's curious, too, how opinions change. At the time of the robbery, there was scarcely a soul that had a good word for Alec Scarsdale, now there's a change in his favour. You see, he's showed himself such a plucky one."

The two men were standing with their backs to the gate.

"Good morning to you, Mr. Banks," said a voice from behind them, "busy as usual!"

And Railton, otherwise Tomlinson, Revelle's silent valet, leant over the gate.

Banks had turned round sharply. Crump—his acute faculties had served him well—had recognised the voice, though, with the exception of that one occasion outside The Firs when Tomlinson had all but collided with him in the dark, he had not heard it for years. It was a crucial moment. He had altered his appearance; but Tomlinson was remarkably cunning, and not likely to forget the man who had been the means of sending him to seven years' penal servitude. And Crump realised that recognition would spell disaster to his hopes. But the little man showed no outward symptoms of flurry. His back still turned, he scratched his head thought-

A Wise Schoolboy.

Ten-year-old George Chambers, the son of a well-known Dublin veterinary surgeon, asked at school to construct a sentence in which the word "cure" appeared, promptly wrote "Bile Beans cure Biliousness." As proof of the wide recognition of this important fact, it may be stated that the master accepted the sentence as a perfectly matter-of-fact one, just as if the boy had written, "Nature's remedies are the safest cure for Nature's ills." Bile Beans are purely vegetable, and in all cases of biliousness and liver disorder are unequalled. All chemists stock them at one and three-halfpence or two and nine per box. Mrs. E. Simmonds, of Parfett Street, Commercial Road, London, E., says: "After the birth of my first child I frequently suffered from bilious attacks, together with constipation and piles.

"Sometimes my food, however carefully selected, would return, and for days at a stretch I was so bilious as to be practically useless in the house. Until I tried Bile Beans nothing seemed to touch my complaint. In Bile Beans, however, I found a remedy; and after fourteen long years of ill-health they have quite restored me. As a mark of gratitude I shall always recommend them." Here is powerful corroboration of the truth contained in the school-sentence. If you suffer note it well.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the Skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

YOUR SAVINGS

MORE THAN DOUBLED.
YOUR SATISFACTION COMPLETE.

Write at once for

H. SAMUEL'S
GREAT FREE
BARGAIN GUIDE

FREE FOR A POST-CARD.

260 Pages, 3,000 Engravings of Diamonds, Watches, Clocks, Chains, Cutlery, Plate, &c.

THE "ACME."

Solid Silver Case, fine ¾-plate movement, jewelled, dust and damp proof cap, and the latest patented improvements.

H. SAMUEL'S PRICE 25/-.

Warranted for Seven Years.

SENT YOU FOR 5/-.

Test it for a week. If satisfied, remit balance, 20/-. Those sending full amount with order receive a

FREE SILVER ALBERT

SEND YOUR POST-CARD NOW.

H. SAMUEL (Dept. 29) Market Street, MANCHESTER.

Digitized by Google

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

Our Powerful Serial.

fully; then walked up to the labourer who was digging some little distance away, and entered into conversation with him.

"Who's that?" questioned Railton.

"Why, Mr. Penworthy. Haven't you seen him before?"

"No."

"A rare nice sort. And how are things going at The Firs?"

Railton was staring rather fixedly at the little man's back view.

"I am sorry to say," he answered, his eyes still riveted on Crump, "I am sorry to say that Mr. Revelle is far from well this morning. He has not felt up to leaving his bed. The doctor has been in to see him, and seems to fear that he is suffering from influenza."

Crump, having finished his conversation with the labourer, tilted his soft felt hat to the back of his head and clasped his hands behind his back, then strolled away thoughtfully and disappeared into a shrubbery. Railton followed him with his eyes. His usually expressionless features wore a puzzled, rather uneasy look. Somehow the figure seemed familiar to him.

"Mr. Penworthy," he muttered half to himself, "he's the horticultural specialist that I've heard my master mention. Of course, he's lodging at Woodbine Cottage. Of course. Well, I must be getting along. I don't suppose my master will be leaving his bed for the next day or two. Good morning, Mr. Banks."

Some few moments after Railton's departure, Crump, seemingly wrapped in thought, emerged from the shrubbery.

"So you don't know Railton?" said Banks.

"Oh," said Crump, "was that Railton, Mr. Revelle's valet? And how are matters at The Firs. I had hoped that Mr. Revelle was going to intrust me with the laying out of the grounds there; but it doesn't look like it now."

"Railton tells me that Mr. Revelle's laid up in bed, supposed to be the influenza. He's not expected to be out for a day or two. Queer thing, that influenza—you never know how it's going to take a man!"

Crump's eyes were twinkling brightly.

"You are quite right, Banks. It is a curious complaint!"

Was it influenza, the little man was wondering, or a false report that Revelle, for purposes of his own, wished to be disseminated?

"My habit," he said to himself, when later he was returning to Woodbine Cottage, "of jumping at conclusions is past cure. I can't help myself. Is this report being put about, with the view of being able to establish an alibi, should such a thing be required?"

He gave a little laugh.

"Dear me! What a terribly suspicious person I am! At the same time, I think I shall take advantage of Sir William's kind offer. Tom and Fred would have answered admirably; but they are hampered by their duties."

Once within the cottage, he referred to a very worn pocket-book that he carried, and presently worked out a cypher message on a sheet of paper. When, later, Fred looked in, the little man requested him to dispatch a telegram for him.

Shortly after dusk, two ordinarily dressed, quiet-looking men called at Woodbine Cottage and asked for Mr. Penworthy.

"Two old friends of mine," Crump explained presently to Mrs. Cobb, whom he found alone in the kitchen, "they are homely fellows, and wouldn't mind sharing the same bed. Do you think you could put them up for to-night, Mrs. Cobb, without unduly inconveniencing yourself? I am quite sure they would be very happy and comfortable in that little room upstairs. Could you manage it? I should be exceedingly obliged to you!"

Had it been anyone else, Mrs. Cobb would have probably refused there and then; but, seeing that it was Mr. Penworthy, it was altogether another matter. Crump, like Father O'Flynn, had such a wonderful way with him.

"Seeing that it's to oblige you, Mr. Penworthy, and if you think that they'll be comfortable, why certainly!"

"That is very nice and kind of you, Mrs. Cobb!"

"It's a pleasure to do things for him," reflected the old lady, after Crump had joined his friends.

"That is settled," exclaimed Crump, as he closed the door of his room behind him, "and now, gentlemen, I will explain more fully the plan of campaign."

BENNY WRITES A NUMBER OF LETTERS AND DESTROYS THEM.

HAUNTED by his conscience, as well as feeling that, for all his seeming friendliness and unconcern, the Marquis had "got his knife into him," Benny Beard had returned to London in a restless, unenviable frame of mind.

"He'll be trying to get even with me, sooner or later," he told himself, "for having given him the chuck. I know the Marquis. I wish to Heaven now that he'd never crossed my path. I've been a weak fool. And there's that poor wretch gone back to prison, and they'll make it doubly hot for him, after this escape of his and his other goings-on. It'll break him, body and soul. Five years nearly did for me. And there's that poor girl, eating out her heart, and ill. Her face, those dark eyes of hers, are everlastingly haunting me! And when I came that cropper, she behaved to me like an angel, and yet I'm positive that she suspected me; I'm positive that she's seen through the Marquis from the first. It was always there in her eyes, that mute look of reproach. And for all his devil-may-care manner, I believe the Marquis realises now that, as far as she is concerned, the game's up. He won't give in; but he's desperate. They're howling for money. If he could have given proof that he was really engaged to her, Masters would have advanced him the money right enough. But now he refuses to let him have a penny. It is a case of the Normanhurst jewels, or smashing up. He'll pull it off right enough. He's a genius at that sort of game; and that poor wretch will continue to stick in prison, and that poor girl will go on eating out her heart, unless——"

Benny was making his way on foot to his rooms—he had recently changed his quarters. He glanced nervously at the passers-by, as though afraid that they might have read his thoughts.

"And I can't help thinking that, sooner or later, he'll be trying to get even with me, unless I—I get one in first!"

He paused to buy an evening paper. A man sauntering along, some little distance behind him, paused also, to light a cigarette. Benny shivered as he went on his way again.

"He's as much in my power as I am in his. There'd be only one way of shutting my mouth. 'The man who sells me, will be signing his death-warrant at the same time!' that's what he said."

It was only when he had reached his rooms, situated in a quiet street in the north of London, that he glanced at his paper.

He winced as if he had been suddenly pricked with a knife. A short paragraph, tucked away in a corner, told him that convict 35 had been sentenced to a long spell of solitary confinement and punishment diet, and that the remainder of his sentence would have to be served in full!

"God help him!" he whispered hoarsely.

A moment later, he was pacing the room feverishly, remorse gnawing at his heart strings. Suddenly he sharply covered his eyes with his hands.

"I can see the look that will come into her eyes when she reads this! Why, in Heaven's name, am I cursed with a conscience?"

The room that he was in was on the ground floor. The house stood a little way back from the pavement, a dingy little patch of garden in front. As he sprang to the window, and pulled down the blinds, a man sauntered past; but Benny

Digitized by Google

Call or Write.

Alfosco Regd

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write.

Alfosco Regd

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 1262. 10/6

☞ Design No. 1262. 10/6. The fashionable three-quarter Sacque Jacket for Autumn and Winter wear, direct at first cost from the "Alfosco Factories." This marvellous jacket is produced in several excellent cloths—Black or Grey Vicuna and Frieze, also in pretty Grey Tweeds, and in Black, Fawn, and Brown Beaver—write at once for patterns. The jacket is cut with the full sacque back and trimmed with tailor-stitching, and pearl buttons, smart cuffs and lappels. Price, 30ins. long, 10/6; 33ins., 11/6; 36ins., 12/6; 39ins., 13/6; or 42ins., 14/6; carriage 6d. extra. This jacket can be ordered single breasted if preferred. Send bust measurement, under arms, and length required. Money returned if not approved.

Design No. 1425. 10/6. ☞

The latest in Costume Skirts. Made in a good black Vicuna Cloth with bright finish. This lady-like skirt is lined throughout and trimmed with tailor-stitched strappings of same material and small black silk buttons. All sizes in stock. Direct at first cost from the 'Alfosco Factories.' Price only 10/6, carriage 5d. extra. In ordering send waist measurement and length of skirt in front.

Write for our WINTER SKETCH BOOK. Sent post free. Hundreds of illustrations of the LATEST NOVELTIES of COSTUMES & JACKETS sent post free.

Design No. 1261. 10/6 Carriage 6d. extra.

Design No. 1261. 10/6.

Chesterfield Three-quarter Sacque Jacket for Autumn and Winter. This Jacket is produced in Black, Fawn, and Brown Beaver Cloth, also in pretty Grey Tweeds. Price only 10/6, carriage 6d. extra. This jacket can also be ordered 33ins. long, 11/6; 36ins., 12/6; 39ins., 13/6; and 40ins., 14/6; carriage 6d extra.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

Cures in Ten Minutes

Never Fails!

Nothing "Like It" or "As Good"

KAPUTINE

The Safe Remedy for

HEADACHE & NEURALGIA

Supplied for use in the Field Hospitals of H.I.M. The King of Greece, the Red Cross Society in the South African War, the Anglo-Chinese Hospitals, &c., &c.

Recommended by many medical men, including Dr. Alexander, M.D., Dr. Thompson, M.D., Dr. Boyd Williams, M.D., &c., &c.

There is no similar preparation, nor anything as good.

All leading Chemists sell it at 1/-, packet of 18 doses, or for 12 stamps, from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back, Puts the hair right, Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALŒLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account.—Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.—

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trowbridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find the renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

Colonel PERRY—

"My Dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER.

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER—

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

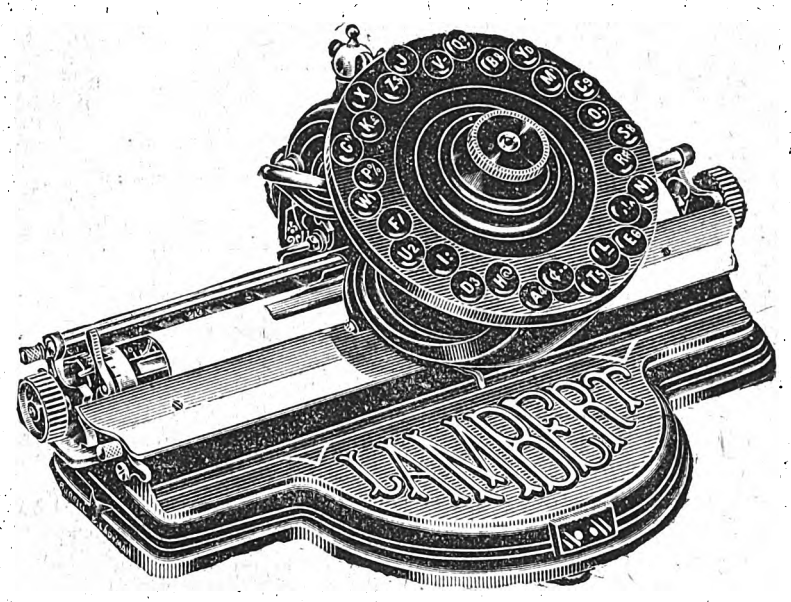
A 4/6 full size bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemist and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9 and 5/-

Digitized by Google

HOW GIRLS CAN MAKE MONEY!



On this page we give an illustration of the latest invention in typewriters. It is called the LAMBERT. It is a dainty little machine, but built for practical use in the office and the home. The Lambert does the work of any standard typewriter and does it equally well. The Lambert costs only £7 10s. and weighs only 5lb., so by saving up or getting your friends to advance this amount (which, if you are enterprising, you will be able to pay back in a month or so) you can possess a typewriter. The LAMBERT fits in a pretty little case and can be carried about comfortably. Remember, once you possess a typewriter you can earn money. A girl who can earn money always commands admiration and respect.

Write to us for our Illustrated Book about the Lambert Typewriter. It is essentially the machine for Ladies.

We will also tell you where you can see a machine.

WE HAVE AGENTS EVERYWHERE.

The LAMBERT typewriter is made by

THE GRAMOPHONE & TYPEWRITER LTD.,

21 CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

scarcely noticed him. He lighted the lamp; then, after more feverish pacings, fetched writing materials.

For a long time he sat, biting his penholder; then he wrote a few sentences, immediately afterwards tearing the paper up into tiny fragments. Then he drew out a bank-book, and studied the state of his account.

"I should be well across the water before the letter was delivered. There's still a tidy sum to my credit at the bank, and——"

He pulled out his watch. It was not going. A glance at the blinded window, then he opened the back of the watch. The works had been removed. In the cavity, in cotton-wool, lay three stones—unset diamonds!

Had Crump but suspected the existence of these, Mr. Faversham's pocket—for all the stout strap that was attached to the watch—would have been picked, months previously! Of the loot taken from John Mansfield's safe all had been disposed of but these three stones. They represented a portion of Benny's share of the plunder, and constituted a reserve fund upon which to fall back in case of accidents. In the event of an embargo being placed upon his banking account, and himself perhaps compelled to fly the country, Benny would have still had the equivalent of three or four hundred pounds about him.

"With what's in the bank, and what these would fetch," muttered the dapper little cracksman, "I could keep things going abroad for some time comfortably. And once across the water—no, I don't think they'd be likely to find Benny, I don't really!"

He snapped to the coverings of the watch case.

"Masters would let me have three-fifty down on the nail for these!"

He was pacing the room again restlessly; then he commenced another letter, only to tear it up into tiny fragments.

"Too late to catch Masters at his office to-night; but I'll get round there some time to-morrow, and I'll also have what's left out of the bank, then——"

A third attempt to write a letter ended as the others had done—in tiny fragments.

"I'm not pleasant company for myself, somehow. I'll try a music-hall!" he whispered desperately.

The following morning, shortly after ten o'clock, saw him in a cab, bound for Chancery Lane. Some distance behind, another cab followed.

Alighting outside a big block of buildings let out in chambers, Benny passed up on to the third floor, and rang the bell outside a door on which was painted "Lewis Masters, Turf Accountant & Commission Agent."

He was still awaiting the opening of the door, when a man reached the landing, and continued on his way up the next flight of stairs. A pale-faced office-boy opened the door.

"Mr. Masters?"

"Not in, sir. Out of town, and won't be back till to-morrow."

"What time?"

"Couldn't exactly say, sir; but I don't think it will be before the afternoon or early evening."

After a visit to his bankers, Benny returned to his rooms, and spent the rest of the morning writing letters—and tearing them up.

The man's whole bearing told of mental restlessness and indecision.

"The Marquis is going to pull that job off to-night!" he muttered to himself, more than once, "I wish to Heaven he'd never crossed my path, or that poor girl's! And if I don't get the best of him, he'll be getting the best of me!"

He wrote another letter only to tear it up.

"The man who sells me will be signing his own death-warrant at the same time!"

These words, continually ringing in Benny's ears, were perhaps responsible for such waste of ink and paper.

(Next week more links are added to the chain of evidence which is to convict Revelle.)

New Methods in the Treatment of Deafness.

In a recent medical publication we find a description of a new way of treating deafness which is rapidly taking the place of the old methods. In fact, the records of the Institute where this new treatment is used, show many remarkable instances in which the hearing has been restored after the patient has been pronounced incurably deaf. Those who are interested in this subject are referred to "The Journal for the Deaf" for July, in which there is a full description of the new treatment. A free copy of the Journal, containing a description of this method, can be obtained by addressing the Editor, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W. With the "Journal" is enclosed a "Supplement," containing details of upwards of forty cases cured during the past month, and also a Patient's Report Form, which enables anyone to receive free advice as to the application of the treatment at home.

LADY'S MAGAZINE

For SEPTEMBER

JUST OUT.

SOME OF THE CONTENTS:

Conjuring for Ladies.	Pearls of the Marquise.
Society Tittle Tattle.	Servants.
Editha.	Law for the Lady.
Mothers and Children.	Girls' Interests and Hobbies.
Cookery.	Etiquette.
Three Loves.	Serial.
Home and Table Decorations.	Woman on a Journey.
Health and Beauty.	The Man at Home.
Dress and Fashion.	House Beautiful.
Behind the Scenes.	Toilet.

Notes on Novelties.

AND

A PAPER PATTERN OF A FLANNEL BLOUSE.

A COMPLETE MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN.

A SET OF REAL PAINTS.

Forty Prizes, including 10 Gramophones, worth about £3 each, are offered as Prizes in a Competition.

ALL THIS FOR SIXPENCE.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

An Out-of-Date Fad.

"ELSIE H." hates smoking, and before her marriage her husband made a point of not indulging himself in a weed while with her. Now they have been married some time, he invariably lights his pipe in the evening, much to his wife's annoyance. She thinks the way men smoke in the house is very ill-mannered, and adds: "How would they like it if women were to spend their whole evenings eating chocolate, which is supposed to fill the same function as does smoking to men."

* * * * *

I think "ELSIE" is a little hard on her husband. Very few women nowadays have this objection to tobacco, under proper circumstances. So far from its being selfish on their parts, men usually get far more amiable and talkative when smoking than when not doing so. "ELSIE" should be rather glad to think that her husband is content to sit at home and smoke than to wish to go out to a club or elsewhere and indulge his fancy. Rest assured that if tobacco were prohibited at home, her husband would before long develop a distinct desire to go out, which would be far less pleasant for "ELSIE" than those few fumes at home. She should learn to get accustomed to smoke, which has become more and more a necessity of man's strange organisation than it used to be.

❦❦❦

Looking After the Pence.

"S. D." has my deep sympathy. He is a sensible young man who does not let the imaginary duties of love blind him to the need for increasing his income. The circumstances are these: He has the opportunity of taking up evening employment which will considerably add to his income. But this means that he will only be able to see his sweetheart on Sundays. This causes her no little regret, but "S. D." by taking on this employment will be able to make enough money to start a home, which will make the future look brighter for both of them.

* * * *

Yes, "S. D.," you should talk very seriously to her about the matter. The secret of your happiness in married life must so greatly depend on your position that she should certainly see that it is her duty to sacrifice those week-day evening meetings, however sweet they may be.

❦❦❦

Friendship or Worse?

"PERPLEXED" is engaged to a girl, but is only able to see her once a fortnight. The engagement is as yet a secret. During the intervals between their meetings, the girl has been seeing a good deal of a man very much her senior. She asked "PERPLEXED'S" permission to see this man, which the latter generously gave. Since this, however, they have begun to see each other every day and go for walks together. Should "PERPLEXED" ask her to discontinue this, or do I think he might allow it to go on, trusting in his sweetheart's fidelity? The man is forty-one, the girl twenty-one, and the feeling between them may be merely friendship.

* * * * * *

I am a great believer in friendship, but quite realise that in some cases it is a dangerous toy. Whether "PERPLEXED" allows this intimacy to proceed between his sweetheart and this man must depend on, firstly, her own character, and secondly on his. If the girl is, let us say, thoughtful and cultivated, and enjoys friendship for its own sake, and the man is a gentleman, and not likely to act dishonourably, I think "PERPLEXED" need have no fears. But he should most certainly make his engagement known as soon as possible, as unless he does so, complications may arise which will be very difficult to get out of.

❦❦❦

Unacquainted and in Love.

"A. W." goes by the same road to business as a young lady. When they pass they have been in the habit of exchanging familiar, and even wistful glances. Would it be conformable with propriety for him to openly acknowledge her? "A. W." is attracted towards her.

* * * *

Those "wistful" (expressive word) glances suggest that she would not dislike to know "A. W." I should not advise him to be too sudden in making her acquaintance. Supposing his glances grow less wistful as time goes on, and that something like a smile begins to discreetly dawn on his countenance? The smile might be gracefully modulated into an acknowledgment, and when that stage is reached, "A. W." should simply talk to the girl without further ado. But it is always well to know definitely that one is not looked upon unfavourably before acting in this forward manner.

❦❦❦

A Very Silly Quarrel.

"FRED" was rather late in meeting his sweetheart "GERTRUDE" the other day. She appeared to be annoyed at his delay, and "FRED" resented this, saying that it was time to "look out for a fresh girl." "GERTRUDE" at once gave up going with him, and started acquaintance with a friend of his. Now "FRED" wants to get back into her good graces without upsetting his friend. How should he proceed?

* * * *

"FRED" showed that he looked upon the girl as a mere convenience when he said he would have to look out for someone else. It was a clear suggestion that he had no real affection for her. It is not surprising that she sought the friendship of another. I do not know how "FRED" can win her away from his friend without a quarrel. He was foolish to be so careless of retaining her affection in the first instance. All he can do is to see how the affair with the friend progresses, and await his chance to reinstate himself in her good books.

❦❦❦

An Engagement to be Broken.

"CHARLOTTE" has been meeting "WALTER" for six months. At first she thought she was fond of him, but now she sees that there are points in his character which would mean an unhappy marriage. At the same time he is very fond indeed of her, and she fears it would break his heart to tell him that she no longer thinks of him as a future husband. Is a girl justified in giving so much pain to a man?

* * * *

Certainly, "CHARLOTTE," if you really feel that a life with him would be an unhappy one. You are compelled by duty to break off the engagement if you no longer love him. Your duty, however, is to lighten the load of parting so far as you possibly can. It would be better if you were to take a holiday for a time, and, if possible, spend a month away from home. Your letters should be less frequent than is usual, and perhaps couched in a cooler strain. Then you might break the news to him of the cessation of the engagement. In this way the shock would not be so sudden, and, having anticipated its approach, the man would be more likely to take it coolly than if it were broken to him without notice.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

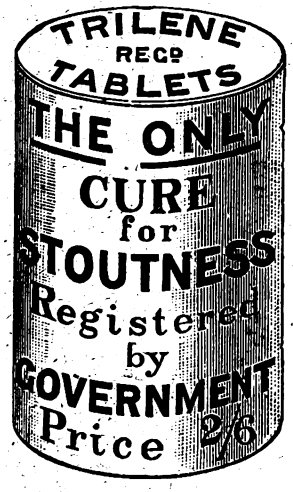
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.

"Yours faithfully, J. E. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

MRS. D. BURTON, of Silvercleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 6lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

MRS. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

MRS. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes, Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

MRS. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

MRS. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

MRS. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

MRS. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

MRS. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

MRS. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Miss JANE CARTER, of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

MR. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

A SINGLE BOX OF BEECHAM'S PILLS

CAN cure and chase away more ills than you're aware of.

To remember to keep a box by you, and
To remember to take a dose of the pills at the proper time, is the

ABC OF HEALTH.

They ensure

A CLEAR HEAD, A HEALTHY LIVER, PURE BLOOD, A SOUND STOMACH.

and, therefore, as a natural consequence

THEY PREVENT AND CURE

NERVOUSNESS	SICK HEADACHE	BACKACHE
INDIGESTION	ANÆMIA	GRAVEL
BILIOUSNESS	FLATULENCY	SKIN ERUPTIONS
CONSTIPATION	DEPRESSION	INSOMNIA

The GREATEST TREASURE in the BEDROOM is a Box of

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Digitized by Google

ONE PENNY

SHORT STORIES

IN HER SLEEP SHE SILENTLY GLIDED OVER THE HOUSE-TOPS.
(SEE POWERFUL STORY ON FIRST PAGE.)

Do your Dyeing at home.

It costs little, and you get quicker and better results than by sending to dyers, if you use

New Style Old Style

MAYPOLE SOAP

which is simple to handle and Dyes BLACK or ANY COLOUR, Fast, Permanent, and Beautiful.

ANY COLOUR, 4d. A CAKE. BLACK, 6d.

Send for Free Booklet, "THE PERFECTION OF HOME DYEING," to the Maypole Co., Ltd., 17, Cumming Street, London, N.

FREE TO ALL

MR. H. STANSFIELD (from a photo).

A trial of an entirely new method of curing

RUPTURE,

the same method that cured Mr. H. Stansfield. No cumbersome steel truss, and no loss of time from work. Write to-day for free trial and for interesting literature, including a book containing many testimonials.

DR. W. S. RICE,
57 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES'

Shakespeare.

The "Elegant" Parcel 36/=

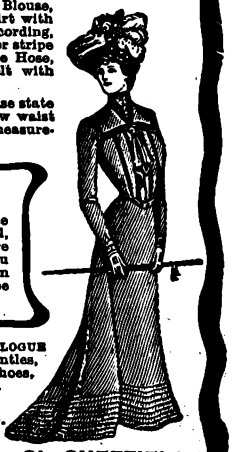
LADY'S COMPLETE OUTFIT.

Contains: Pretty Black Sateen Cloth Sailor Blouse, with detachable front, Black Costume Skirt with deep fashionable flounce and 9 rows of cording, Pair Model Corsets, Underskirt with check or stripe in different colours, Pair Black Cashmere Hose, Cream Lace Scarf, and Black Velvet Belt with Fancy Clasp.

IMPORTANT. When ordering please state Length of Dress Skirt in front from below waist band, also size of corsets worn, or waist measurement over Dress.



.. TERMS ..

Send only 6s. with order, and if the parcel meets with entire approval, complete the purchase in five more monthly payments of 6s. each. If you are not PERFECTLY SATISFIED, return the goods, and your deposit will be promptly refunded in full.

Please send a Post Card for our No. 5 CATALOGUE of Drapery, Costumes, Capes, Jackets, Mantles, Men's and Youths' Clothing, Boots and Shoes, etc., etc. Sent to your address Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

You must try

E. & T.

PINK'S JAMS

they are

Absolutely Pure

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably." Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

£5

Symonds' Cycles, cheapest and best. Warranted 2 years. For young and old, cash or easy payments, prices £4 to £8. Thousands of testimonials. Machines sent on approval. Clincher, Dunlop tire, Rimlock, and other noted tyres, Brampton chains, Shelby tubing, and other superior features. Special prices if you buy now. Catalogue of 1902 models free. Mention this paper when writing.

Symond's London Stores, 124-128 City Rd., London, E.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

From 1s. weekly. Special Offer. £12 15s 0d. Sample for £6 6s. Carriage paid. PLATED RIMS, FREE WHEELS, RIM BRAKE FITTED FREE. Agents wanted. —DEREHAM ROAD CYCLE CO., NORWICH.

NOSE

RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked or Prominent Noses. By H. W. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (B T), Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

GIVEN AWAY

With next week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 454)

PAPER PATTERN

of this

GIRL'S NIGHTDRESS

(12-14).

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Short Stories

No. 716.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending September 20th, 1902.

Through the Peril of the Night.

A Thrilling Story of a Somnambulist and a Fortune of £20,000.

I.—The Temptation of Stephen Crawford.

Sir James Crawford was dead—people whispered that it was almost by his own hand, for if he had not driven so madly, the accident would not have occurred which killed him on the spot, and which so severely injured his wife that if she did not die, she would be a cripple for life.

Still the verdict had been accidental death, even though there were a lot of strange rumours about, and now Lady Crawford lay looking up wearily at her stepson who stood at her bedside. He was not a pleasant-looking man. His skin was thickened and roughened, and his eyes, which shifted restlessly whenever one looked straight into them, were blood-shot with dissipation.

"I know what it means, Stephen," she said slowly. "But I do not fear death. It is not that that worries me, it is something else, Stephen."

Stephen stirred impatiently and swore under his breath. He had a hatred of worry of any kind, and he had surely had enough lately to send him into his grave.

He looked round the great, luxurious room at the thick carpets and heavy hangings and signs of wealth that were everywhere about, and remembered what they were already saying of his father, that his death had been well-timed, that another week or two would have seen him in the dock, a branded criminal and a bankrupt.

Stephen shivered a little and looked round desperately. He was in no mood to be lectured, and he supposed it was a lecture he was going to have—something about his drinking and card-playing of course.

Lady Crawford was looking at him with wide, pathetic eyes.

"You'll listen to me, Stephen? It is hard for me to have to tell it—oh, have a little pity on me, Stephen, and help me now that I am dying."

Help her? Stephen looked down with sudden interest. Then it was not a lecture after all.

"Well?" he said.

Lady Crawford sighed. Stephen was his father's son—hard, cold, and cruel, and she set her teeth as if the courage which she had tried to summon before when Sir James was alive might fail her even now. She looked up uneasily.

"Stephen, I must tell you," she cried, "I've tried often and often to tell your father, but I could not. He frightened me. But he is dead now and I am dying. I must unbosom myself to someone. I must speak before I die."

She tried to draw herself closer to the edge of the bed—closer to Stephen, and failed, and lay back helplessly. Stephen looked at her without any pity or tenderness in his face. He was hard, as his father had been before him, and it was only desperation, now that she was so close to death, that made her go on.

"I've tried to love you as though you were my own son," she gasped breathlessly, "and because of that I ask you to help me now. You promise, Stephen?"

He bit his lips impatiently.

"Well?" he said. "Go on."

It was hard to go on. Lady Crawford's lips quivered and set, and she made another effort.

"I could only come to you," she said. "You are almost my son. I married Sir James when you were six years old, and you scarcely knew another mother, and I—I was going to say I have known no other child, but it is that that I have to tell you, Stephen."

Her voice sank and Stephen looked up with almost a start.

"Go on," he cried roughly.

"It is a confession," she gasped, "that I could never make to your father. Stephen, I've got a child—a little girl—at Worlden Hill."

Stephen started in earnest.

"A child," he cried, "at Worlden? What on earth do you mean?"

Lady Crawford's fingers clutched desperately at the counterpane.

"My little child," she whispered. "I was married before I met Sir James. He was a good man—a good man, Stephen, but poor, and when he died—we had so little to eat—Lucy and I—that we nearly died too."

She closed her eyes to shut out Stephen's hard face. Her face seemed white as the sheet itself, and it required all her courage to speak even now.

"It was terrible," she went on, breathing heavily. "I

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

tried to get a living by singing, and that is how I met your father—at an 'At Home' we met often—he didn't know that I had a child—I never told him—he would not have married me if he had known, and Lucy was a delicate girl and almost starving, and I married Sir James for her sake.

"I found a nurse and put her in her hands—I always paid her well. Her name is Martha Steadwell, and she lives at Worlden."

Stephen looked aghast. Worlden was the place where his father's ironworks were.

"How on earth did you prevent anyone knowing it?" he asked.

"It was not difficult," Lady Crawford answered. "When I handed over the child it was dark and I wore a veil and Martha did not know me. I have seen her many times since, and she has not recognised me. I have seen Lucy too—my poor little Lucy! Stephen, what I want you to do is this—to go to Worlden and fetch her to me before I die? You'll do it, Stephen? Oh, you will, you will; you need not be ashamed of her. She has been well educated, and she is a good, dear little soul, and she will be rich. She will not be dependent on you, I have seen to that. When we married, your father settled twenty thousand pounds on me. I have never touched it, and the interest has been accumulating all these years—twenty years—Stephen, and I have left it all to Lucy. You will not want it. The solicitor who pays Martha has my will, and he will see to everything—you will have no trouble only—I want you to fetch her to me before I die."

A change had come over Stephen's face. There was a sullen light in his eyes and his lips looked thin and cruel.

Twenty thousand pounds! And in a week or two when his father's affairs were wound up he would be almost penniless! He ground his teeth. The money that Lady Crawford was leaving to this girl ought to belong to him—it would belong to him if she died—it should belong to him. Twenty thousand pounds all going to a chit of a black-country girl—an ignorant girl, of course—a little fool who had never dreamt of such a sum in her life, perhaps, and if she were dead the money would be his! Bah! It was maddening.

He bent over Lady Crawford, and, with a strange glimmer in his eyes, promised he would go to Worlden and bring back her daughter.

Lady Crawford put her hand under her pillow and drew out a letter.

"I have written to her," she said faintly. "This will tell her everything. And oh, thank you, Stephen—thank you, and bless you."

Stephen turned away with his face set and his eyes dark. He was wondering how he could get hold of Lucy's money.

II.—A Miracle in the Darkness.

"Lucy, Lucy, don't tell me that—don't say no again. Darling, you can't mean it?"

Lucy lifted her face—such a girlish, pretty face, to the man who stood holding her hands in his. He was young, with a fresh, open face, and the handsomest pair of eyes in the county.

"Oh, don't, Harry," she cried. "Don't tempt me. I couldn't. I'd rather be dead."

His face whitened.

"Rather be dead than marry me?" he cried.

"Oh, you know what I mean," Lucy said hastily. "You know I couldn't marry you. You're the son of a gentleman—you live in a Hall that has been owned by your family for hundreds of years, and I'm only a poor girl—a—a—shameful girl perhaps," her voice broke, "for I don't know, and Martha doesn't know, who my mother and father were."

Harry Linton went very close to her.

"My darling, I don't care for that," he cried. "I've not got much to boast of. We're as poor as rooks, and I don't care what you are, and if you'll only marry me——"

She stepped back from him.

"Don't—don't say it again," she cried. "I can't. No no, Harry, I never could."

He caught her hand in his, and drew her to him again.

"But if I were nobody you would?" he asked. "If I were not Harry Linton of the Hall, but a clerk or a nail-maker in the Crawford Iron Works you would, eh?"

A sob choked in her throat.

"Oh, if you were!" she cried.

He looked at her long and steadily.

"Lucy, I can't give you up," he cried. "I won't!"

She wrenched her hand free.

"Don't speak of it again!" she said; "and now I must go. Martha's got a new lodger—a man from London—and I must go and help her."

"A man? What's he like? Not young, or nice looking?"

"I—I don't know. I think he's young. But he's not nice-looking. Oh, no, he's horrid looking, and he drinks!"

She shivered a little; she did not know why, except that the stranger had had a strange effect upon her. His eyes had frightened her. She looked down the miserable black-country street, with its dirty little houses huddled close together, and then back at Harry.

"Somehow, I'm frightened of him!" she cried suddenly. "I don't know why—it's stupid, of course, but I—I don't like him."

She drew a deep breath.

"Oh, it seems almost as if he hated me and wished me ill!" she cried.

Harry looked at her thoughtfully. An idea had occurred to him, and he was wondering how it would work.

"He shan't hurt you, Lou," he said. "I—I'll take care of you, and, darling, you'll trust me always, won't you, whatever happens?"

She looked at him wonderingly.

"Of course," she said. "You know I will."

Harry said nothing more, but his handsome face had a smile upon it as they walked up the narrow entry to the back of the house in which Lucy and Martha lived.

It was only a small house like the others in the straggling, dirty street, but it did not look like the others. It looked cleaner, sprucer, and the coal dust which seemed to linger on the steps and sills of the rest seemed to have escaped this.

It was getting dusk, and heavy shadows hung about the narrow yard as they passed into it. Harry caught Lucy's arm, and then started, for as he did so, something shot from the roof and clattered at their feet.

Lucy gave a little cry, and Harry looked down with his face grown white. A slate from the roof! An inch nearer and it would have killed her.

She shuddered and stood quite still, looking into Harry's face. A sudden cold terror crept into her heart, and a vision of the lodger's face flashed for a moment between her and Harry.

Harry caught her to him.

"Lou! Lou!" he cried.

She looked up.

"It—it wasn't an accident!" she breathed. "It was done on purpose. Oh, Harry, I'm afraid—I'm afraid!"

Harry bent his head in reply, but before he could speak the door behind them had opened and a face peered out.

It was an ugly, menacing face that fell back startled at the sight of Harry. The next instant, however, he had recovered himself and come forward.

Digitized by Google

"The new lodger," Lucy whispered nervously, and as he passed out she saw his eyes on Harry's face, and she saw something ugly and desperate and savage flash into them, and her heart stood still.

She held her breath for a moment, until the sound of his footsteps had died away, and then turned to Harry.

"Oh, he means ill to us," she cried. "He looked at you as if—as if he would have liked to murder you!"

Harry laughed.

"You foolish baby!" he cried. "Why on earth should he mean ill to me? I never saw him before in my life."

Lucy shook her head.

"I don't know—I don't know!" she cried, "but he means ill to me—to you and me! He means ill to us both!"

Harry laughed again, and tried to drive the foolish idea from her head, but it was no use—it stuck there, and during the next two days it seemed almost as if she were right, that the man did mean some evil after all, for she began to meet with curious accidents, and always the new lodger was somewhere in the neighbourhood. Twice she fell downstairs, twice she met with an accident in the street, and at last Harry began to be thoroughly alarmed. He determined to watch this stranger and find out something about him, and the thought that had been vaguely in his mind a day or two before took shape.

"I'm going away, Lou," he said abruptly. "I don't know how long for, but it may be some time. So it will be good-bye to-night."

She looked up at him with her heart sinking, but with a sudden sense of relief too.

"I—I'm almost glad," she said, "for that man would murder you if he could. I'm sure of it. I saw him look at you again just now, and he means ill—I know he means ill—and—and perhaps it will be good for you to go away for a bit."

Harry laughed, as he had laughed before, and bid her good-bye. He said nothing more about coming back, he said nothing more about making her his wife, and though she felt that she could never be that, yet her heart was heavy as she turned back into the house. If only she could have told him how she loved him! If only there had not been that uncertainty about her birth! If only she had been his equal how different things might have been!

How different! She never dreamt what a difference his going away would make to her! She never dreamt that she would miss him so!

She missed him every hour of the day, and when the post brought her no news of him her heart grew sick with disappointment. Yet, after all, what had she expected? She had refused him. She knew she could never be his wife, and surely it was better that she should not see him again?

All the same her face grew very white, and Martha looked at her in alarm.

"It's that man upstairs as has brought us bad luck!" she said; "and his drinking and mad ways is frightening you, I can see. I wish I'd let the rooms to that nice young man as called two days ago. He'd got a wig on, I'm certain, but he was respectable, and it was a great pity I had to send him to Mrs. Neal opposite. I shall turn this drunken wretch out. He gets worse. That's my firm belief."

He did; and the ugly fear settled at Lucy's heart, and no news, no message came from Harry. He had gone, and though she did not know why, she felt, that somehow, she was at the mercy of the man upstairs.

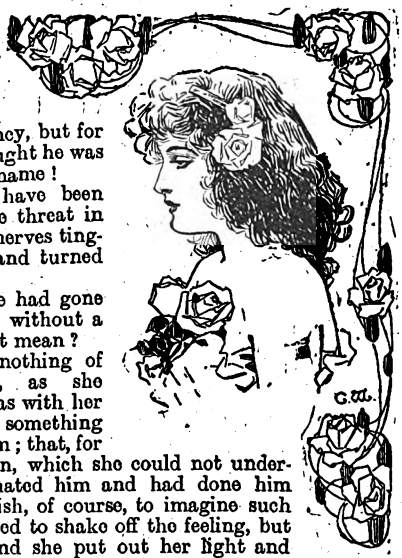
"I'd give my 'ead if we could change him for a lodger like Mrs. Neal's!" Martha cried. "He just sits quiet all day—writing or summat, and isn't a bit o' trouble."

"He's only been there two days," said Lucy, "and he may—Oh, hark, Martha! he frightens me!"

The man upstairs were tramping up and down muttering to himself. His heavy feet treading the floor sounded terrible in the little sitting-room. Lucy got up with a shiver.

"Oh, Martha, he frightens me!" she said. "Let's go to bed."

Martha dragged herself up from her chair, and Lucy crept upstairs silently on tip-toe, and ran quickly past the lodger's room.



As she went, his voice, hoarse and unsteady, came out to her, and for a moment she stood still. It could have been only fancy, but for a moment she thought he was repeating Harry's name!

It surely could have been only fancy, but the threat in his voice sent her nerves tingling with horror and turned her blood cold.

Harry! And he had gone away abruptly and without a word! What did it mean?

It could mean nothing of course, and yet, as she undressed, there was with her the ugly fear that something would happen to him; that, for some strange reason, which she could not understand, the lodger hated him and had done him harm. It was foolish, of course, to imagine such things, and she tried to shake off the feeling, but it would not go, and she put out her light and drew up the blind with it still upon her.

She looked across the street, at the silent houses, at the blank, dark windows, and as she looked she gave a start, for she almost fancied for a moment that she saw Harry's face looking back at her from Mrs. Neal's house!

It was only a trick of the nerves, of course, and she drew back shivering and crept into bed. She lay trembling under the clothes, her heart beating heavily, the terror strong upon her.

When she fell asleep at last it was to dream wildly and horribly, and always of some danger that threatened Harry.

She sat up hurriedly at last. Surely she had heard him call her? Surely she had heard his voice? She could not be mistaken!

She slipped out of bed—still asleep—and stood for a moment in the centre of the room. She stretched out her hands and turned slowly towards the door. Her eyes, wide open, saw nothing, but she went steadily across and turned the handle.

Outside the landing lay in pitch darkness, but she did not hesitate. She was fast asleep; but in her sleep she could hear Harry calling her, and she went steadily towards him.

But she went a strange way. The voice she heard in her sleep seemed to lead her to a perilous path, for she turned away from the stairs, the head of which lay close to the lodger's door, towards a ladder that led to the roof.

She mounted it steadily—her bare feet did not falter—and pushed open the trap door.

The cold night air blew through on to her face and drifted through her long, dark hair that curled about her shoulders, but it did not wake her, and she went on.

It was a strange path to choose, but perhaps her brain acted unconsciously, for she disappeared through the trap door. A door below opened, and the lodger crept out.

He stole on tip-toe towards her room. He swayed drunkenly as he went, and his eyes, glazed and bright, saw nothing, although he was wide awake.

He drew a sharp breath as he pushed open the door, and brought the knife he carried a little closer to his side.

A moment later he came out again, leaving the knife stuck fiercely through the bedclothes on the spot where Lucy had been lying a short time before.

* * * * *

Meanwhile Mrs. Neal's lodger sat at the window opposite as he had sat for the past hour.

He was staring across the street at Lucy's room—staring as though the white figure he had seen draw up the blind an hour ago might reappear.

Digitized by Google

He was getting stiff when something—a sudden flutter of white on the flat roof startled him. He peered forward sharply. Something was moving along the leads—he could not see clearly what it was, and he rose to his feet and pushed open the window.

It was something white. That much he could see, And then suddenly he gave a startled exclamation. It was a woman!

He leant forward breathlessly. She was standing upright now—a slight figure in a soft, white gown, standing upright and still on the treacherous tiles—standing as unconsciously as if she had been on the flat pavement.

His heart stood still and stopped beating for a moment, and he leant on the window sill, motionless with horror, waiting for what would happen.

That she would fall headlong in a moment seemed a certainty, and a strange sickness overcame him. A girl—a young girl, too, she looked, but he could not see clearly for a moment. Then slowly she turned until she stood with her face towards him, and then suddenly the red flare of one of the black-country furnaces flashed up and threw the light on her face, and he gave a hoarse cry.

Lucy!

For a moment everything went black before him. For a moment the dark sky studded with stars, the thick smoke and the red fires that leapt day and night from the furnace chimneys swam hideous and confused before him. Then he realised that she was walking in her sleep, and he gripped the window sill with both his hands and set his teeth with all his will bent to hers—to send her to safety by the force of it if such a thing were possible.

It was the only thing to do—to stand there and watch and wait. He dared not lose sight of her. He dared not move. And yet—to see her there, in peril of her life, seemed to send him near to madness.

He ground his teeth and held his breath when she moved at last, and his heart leapt into his mouth when he saw her move slowly towards the edge of the roof and balance herself upon the narrow coping.

Was his will no good? Could he not drive her below?

He waited, and then a hoarse sob broke from his throat; for instead of going below she was making her way back along the roof towards a telegraph post which stood upright against it. In another moment she would be out of his sight—in another moment she would be where his eyes could not follow her, and the sickness and giddiness swept over him again.

Then suddenly he started. Did he see aright? She was mounting the pole—creeping up to the wires that stretched away from it across the dark roofs. God help them both, what did she mean to do?

He watched her breathlessly. She had reached the top, her small fingers had gripped the outstretching bars, and Good Heavens! she had mounted the wires—had balanced herself, and was swinging to and fro upon them—was starting to walk across them.

God help her! His lips moved, but no sound came from them.

For a moment it seemed to him that it was a horrible, hideous nightmare, and he stared up with his face growing white and strained as she came steadily on.

She did not falter. It was wonderful how calmly she came. In her sleep she glided silently over the housetops—over the smutty roofs, over the street towards the next post that stood at the corner of Mrs. Neal's house. The wires swayed wildly backwards and forwards, in and out, but a strange power guided her that night, for she did not slip and the wires held her safely.

As she came nearer the man watching her drew a heavy, hoarse breath, and rousing himself sharply, turned and ran from the room, making for the trap-door in the roof, intent only on one thing—on reaching her when she got to the post on Mrs. Neal's roof.

He rushed out and leapt up the ladder. His breath seemed to fail him, and an odd feeling of faintness came over him as he reached the leads and crept along them, and then once more the sob broke from his throat.

He was just in time! She came on, swaying and swinging on the wires, her face white, her eyes now half closed, and her thick, dark hair curling gloriously about her shoulders.

She came on by a miracle, and the man leant forward.

His shaking fingers touched the hem of her nightdress.

He looked up breathlessly, and then—he was just in time. She swayed suddenly—a word fell from her lips, and the next instant she was in his arms, and he was sobbing over her and dragging her slowly down the ladder to the landing below.

She opened her eyes with a start and a cry of dismay, and for a moment the old fear seized her. Then she saw that the man was a stranger, and she looked round, bewildered, at the unfamiliar room.

"I—I—oh, where am I?" she began, and then she started again, for the stranger had wrapped something round her, was holding her in his arms with his face close to hers, was pulling off his wig and his beard.

She started up, and her heart gave a leap.

"Harry!" she cried.

* * * * * * *

A little later they found the man they had known as Martha's lodger huddled in his room, staring wildly at something unseen that threatened him, and when Lucy confronted him he fell back from her, shouting that he had killed her! He was removed to an asylum, declaring that the dead had come to life, and a few weeks later he died, a raving lunatic.

But before that they had found in his pocket a letter addressed to Lucy, and when she read it her last scruple about marrying Harry vanished. She had found her mother!

It was Harry who took her to London, and put her in the dying woman's arms, and it was Harry who, later on, promised solemnly to love, cherish, and honour her, and who has since faithfully done so.

As for Lucy, she has amongst her treasures a wig and a beard. They remind her of a time when her husband was "Mrs. Neal's lodger," and when he saw her pass through a strange and terrible peril of the night. That he saved her from death twice that night she always declares, for she had heard him calling her in her sleep, and if it had not been for that she would never have got up as she did, and Stephen would have killed her as he had intended to as she lay in bed.

That was so; and Harry has never ceased to be thankful that he disguised himself in order to watch over the girl he loved.

But that night left a grey hair or two amongst his black ones.

Annie O. Tibbits

Digitized by Google

A Frustrated Plot.

A Pretty Little Narrative of a Girl's Love.

A SUNBEAM that had lost its way in the golden tangle of the laburnum suddenly shone upon a girl's fair head. There was a smell of fresh-turned earth, mingled with the delicate scent of Spring; and the swaying figure in the blue print gown, tip-toeing for a branch of pale pink apple-blossom, made one think of wild hyacinth under a rose-flushed sky.

The gate clicked and the colour deepened in her cheeks. The apple blossom seemed more difficult than ever to obtain. Perhaps she knew that the sunshine was turning her hair to gold and that the breeze, scattering the petals upon her upturned face, was playing such lover-like tricks as would drive a man wild with envy. But she was innocence itself with her little start of surprise when Ted Gardiner spoke.

"It was," he suggested, "an evening made for a ramble in the fields."

"Well, if Ted would wait until she changed her gown?" with a glance at her skirts and another at his admiring eyes.

But he shook his head. "It's the one I like to see you wear better than any," he told her.

"Bad taste," she answered, wrinkling her forehead.

"Maybe, but it's the gown you wore the day——"

"The day you met me at the picnic and behaved so badly," she returned. "Never took notice of the vicar, his wife, or anyone else for that matter."

"Well, you were there—that was enough for me."

Elsie Dent lowered her eyes reprovingly.

"You know you promised not to talk in that way, Ted; at any rate, until father is willing."

"Leave your father out of the question for to-night, Elsie. I have much to say."

By this time they had left the garden, and, skirting the meadow where the farmer and his men were still at work, walked towards Norton Woods, a mile or so from the old homestead, where for generations past a Dent had lived.

"Your father won't have anything to say to me, Elsie, until I can show him a nest-egg, a hundred or two in the bank or some adequate provision for the future. I don't say but what he's right; a man should not marry until he can keep his wife in comfort. But he won't even hear of our being engaged."

"I told you so, Ted. I warned you that it was no good to speak."

"All the same, Elsie, I mean to make him take me for a son-in-law. But to do that I must have money, and to get that I must go to London. To tell the truth, Miles Foster offered to get me a berth at Sheldon's, the big horse dealers, the last time he was down here. I should have to 'try' the nags, show 'em off, you know, and put 'em through their paces. It would suit me down to the ground, and Miles says I should get well paid."

London might have been as far away as Texas by the distress displayed by Elsie at the notion of Ted's going there. It would be impossible for her to endure life with any degree of comfort, let alone happiness, with Ted in London. Besides, people said queer things about Miles Foster, no good would come of anything he recommended, she was sure.

The young fellow listened to all her objections, and soothed, or tried to soothe, her grief. But his determination remained unshaken. He wanted Elsie, but without money he could not have her. Therefore it was only common sense to seize the opportunity Foster had put in his way. He would go to London and take Sheldon's berth, and come back prosperous and triumphant like the good youth in the fairy tales.

"Cheer up, Elsie. I'll soon be back. Come, dry your eyes and let me see the bright face that I love so well."

"You'll often write, Ted?"

"Of course I shall. Give me a kiss and say 'Good-bye.' You'll be faithful to me, Elsie?"

"You know that, Ted."

He nodded, and caught her in his arms.

The next minute he strode off quickly—almost cheerfully, the girl thought. Well, perhaps she could understand it. The village was small, the interests petty, the life dull. In London there would be things to see; fresh people to talk to. She sighed regretfully at the fate that sends men out into the world to work, and keeps women in the home to make beds, darn socks, and weep when there's a spare five minutes.

It was quite as well for Elsie that those five minutes were few and far between. At Dent Farm there was much to do, both in the house and diary, and few hands to do it. Farmer Dent was a warm man, so far as money went, but an uncommon close one. To save a penny he would expend a vast amount of energy, and he expected others to do likewise. Elsie was hard at it all day long. An hour or two in the evening was all the time she had to herself.

Some month or two after Ted's departure she found even this little leisure threatened. Of all things in the world, her father announced his intention of taking a farm pupil!

He advertised to that effect in the local paper, and had received a favourable reply. In less than a week the thing was settled, and the beginning of October Ralph Houghton was an inmate of Dent Farm.

All the day he studied agriculture, gazing at crops with great determination if little energy. And in the evening he expected Elsie to amuse him.

At first she resented his intrusion, but after a time she grew to like the quiet, self-contained young fellow. He lent her books, taught her games, and was so unfailingly cheerful and attentive that Elsie had but little time in which to grieve for Ted.

That young man was doing very well. He had proved invaluable to Sheldon's, and had had more than one offer from a rival firm. He hoped to run down and see Elsie at Christmas. Ralph Houghton had heard of Ted through village gossip, and professed great interest in his prospects. Elsie was drawn to make a confidant of him, and discussed her plans and hopes for the future very fully.

Digitized by Google

Just about this time Miles Foster reappeared in the village. The redoubtable Miles was a sharp, wizened little man, with a tongue like vinegar and a temper hot as pepper. He had been a jockey in the days of his youth, but various malpractices had resulted in his being warned off the turf. Since then his mode of life had been a mystery. He came back to the village occasionally, and put up at the Crown Inn, where he was both liked and feared.

The more respectable part of the community fought shy of the ex-jockey, and it was a vexation to Elsie that Ted should have obtained his situation through such a channel.

Ralph Houghton, however, professed himself much amused at Miles; the man was an oddity, he declared, and worth studying. Elsie marvelled at his taste, but discreetly held her tongue.

One evening she came across the two, Houghton and Miles, in close conversation. She passed them in the woods, bare and leafless now, and giving little cover. The strangely-assorted pair to all appearances were not on the best of terms.

Houghton, his face set in an ugly and determined fashion, leant against a tree. Foster, giving full play to his peppery temper, was snarling out sharp sayings at a little distance.

"A hundred pounds I'll pay you if the job comes off, and not a penny more," said Houghton.

"What, me take a sum like that?" replied the other. "You're too big for your boots, mister, and that's a fact. I won't lend a finger under two hundred and fifty pounds, and you can't play the game without me. At a word from me the young man would take fright and warn the boss."

Houghton tightened his lips.

"A hundred is my price; take it or leave it."

"Think what it will mean to you if the job comes off. You'll be a millionaire. I tell you the nag is the fastest thing I've ever seen. He's bound to win, unless——"

He stopped and grinned significantly. "If the horse doesn't start you'll rake in thousands. If we nobble the man and doctor the nag you'll be on velvet."

"And if it doesn't I shall be—somewhere else," said Houghton grimly.

The ex-jockey laughed. "Stone Jug's not a nice place, I grant you, mister, but there's no fear of your being put away if you'll act straight with your pals. Come, I'll meet you half way. Give me fifty quid on the nail and the other fifty shall stand over."

"Very well, you shall have the money to-night. When do you say the young man goes to the stables?"

"Next week."

"And the nag?"

"Arrives soon after him. We've six months to work the job in, mister, and I bet my life we shall succeed. A man'll do a lot for money when he has a pretty sweetheart whom he wants to make his wife."

Houghton nodded.

"I'll see you this evening at the Crown, Foster," he said, and the two men separated.

Elsie felt considerably puzzled at this conversation. That some evil was afoot she felt sure, though it was difficult to suspect Houghton of underhand dealings.

On arriving home a more pleasurable matter took her attention. She found a letter from Ted, announcing his return to the neighbourhood. A gentleman had engaged him to act as trainer at some small stables close to Norton. The salary was fair, the work congenial, above all he would be near his darling Elsie.

The girl was too delighted with the news to immediately connect it with the conversation she had overheard. Later, however, she wondered if Ted would by any chance be the young man referred to.

When she learnt that her lover had been specially engaged to look after a two-year-old, of whom great things were expected, and who was entered for the next year's Derby, she felt persuaded that that was the case.

There was, she feared, a plot on foot to injure both Ted and his charge. But of the nature of the plot she could not form a notion.

* * * * *

For the next three months things went smoothly both with Ted and Elsie. Since the former had been engaged by Sir Charles Denvers, Farmer Dent had modified his views concerning him, and the young people met with his consent.

Elsie had not told her lover of the conversation she had overheard between Miles and Houghton. The former had disappeared from the neighbourhood, and Houghton was apparently engrossed in agriculture. It seemed best to let things be; Ted had a fiery temper, the chances were that if she told him her suspicions he would have taxed Houghton then and there. This would have brought about a scene and made everyone uncomfortable. She wanted nothing to disturb her father's friendly attitude to Ted.

Christmas came and went, bringing good cheer to Norton generally, and an extra share of happiness to Elsie. Sir Charles had expressed his satisfaction with Ted and raised his salary. The young man was saving and steady. It seemed as if his marriage with Elsie was not so far off after all.

And then in the midst of their planning fell a bolt from the blue; Ralph Houghton asked Farmer Dent for his daughter Elsie! The farmer, as might have been expected, listened to his suit. Houghton, to all appearance, was a wealthy man, and Dent loved and reverenced wealth.

To make a long story short, Ted was told to go, and forbidden to show his face again as Elsie's suitor unless he brought two hundred pounds—that being the sum Houghton had promised to give the astute Dent should he win Elsie for his wife.

It was just about this time that Miles Foster reappeared, and that Sir Charles charged Ted to look after Gladiator, the two-year-old referred to, even more carefully than before.

"It's a great responsibility," the young trainer confided to his sweetheart at one of their stolen interviews. "I don't mean the care of the horse exactly, but the fear that some harm may come to him while under my charge. You see Gladiator is entered for the Derby. He's a flyer and will carry all before him. Sir Charles stands to make a pot of money over him. If he wins, the bookies will be hard hit indeed!

"Now, there's a combine against Gladiator," he went on; "that is to say, a lot of money's being laid against him. What I fear is that somehow or other the horse will be got at—doctored, you know, and injured so that he can't start for the race. It will be ruin for me if anything happens to Gladiator. Sir Charles would never forgive me."

"Keep watch and ward over him, Ted," said Elsie excitedly, her mind recalling Houghton's conversation. "We've got enemies, you and I. There are those who would like to harm us. For Heaven's sake, don't lose sight of Gladiator for a moment!"

So impressed was Elsie with the sense of threatened danger that she begged her lover not to leave the stables unless actually compelled. She would contrive to slip over to see him there, he must not risk anything by meeting her elsewhere.

Still, however, she did not tell him of her suspicions in regard to Houghton. The time for that, she thought, had passed. There was enough ill-feeling as it was between the two young men.

Houghton was an attentive but by no means an annoying suitor. He had taken Elsie's somewhat furious rejection of his proposal in good part, merely observing that she might possibly alter her determination.

Digitized by Google

"Never!" she said defiantly, "so far as he was concerned."

The weeks slipped quickly by, Elsie still worried and anxious about Gladiator; Ted tired by his constant watching and somewhat gloomy in consequence.

One Thursday afternoon Elsie received a pencilled scrawl urging her to come at once to the stables. Full of foreboding she obeyed the summons.

She found Ted in a terrible condition of excitement. He spoke thickly, and was not at all like himself—almost as if he had been drinking. He poured out an incoherent statement as to Sir Charles' ingratitude, and the world's injustice.

"I took no more than a glass of ale, Elsie, at the Crown—uncommon bitter it was too. It made me feel a bit queer, somehow, and I got back here as soon as possible. The master had just arrived, and he stormed at me like a pickpocket; vowed I was a drunken vagabond, and that he'd a good mind to dismiss me then and there. You know whether or not I've done my duty to Sir Charles and the horse? Hardly a wink of sleep I've had this month past for anxiety and worry. I've not trusted one of the stable boys to so much as feed Gladiator without I stood by, and now I'm abused for my pains because I took a glass of ale."

"Sure it was only one, Ted?"

"I swear it. You can ask Foster, he was with me at the Crown."

"Ted, don't think me foolish, but—but——" she paused. "Do you think Foster drugged the beer?"

"Now what on earth should he do that for? Poor old Miles has been a good friend to me. A better friend than Sir Charles, anyway. Look here, Elsie, you and I have waited long enough. We must get married. Your father wants £200, and I've a mind to get it. Why am I to wear myself to death looking after Gladiator? I won't do it any more. I'll go to sleep to-night and"—he looked mysterious—"if anything should happen to him before the morning I shan't be any the wiser, and"—he nodded—"I shall have——"

"No, no, Ted, you mustn't say it!" screamed the girl, putting her hand over his mouth. "You can't know what you're doing. You must be mad. Go and lie down and get some sleep, and I'll watch here for the next hour or two. Don't argue"—with a stamp of her foot—"do as I tell you, or goodness knows what may be the consequences!"

Ted finally allowed himself to be persuaded, and retired to rest. Elsie took up her position in the stables, perched on a box in Gladiator's comfortable stall. The Danvers' establishment was but a small one. Ted, a young groom, and two boys comprised the staff. There were two other nags besides Gladiator, neither of much account, but very useful for trial purposes. Sir Charles was not a rich man, unlucky speculations on the turf had indeed made him comparatively a poor one. He looked to Gladiator to redeem his fortunes.

Ted reappeared after some hours' repose, much refreshed, and considerably quieter. He had lost the strange excited look which had so alarmed Elsie, and seemed much ashamed of the wild things he had said.

One evening she came across the two, Houghton and Miles, in close conversation. The strangely-assorted pair, to all appearances, were not on the best of terms.

Elsie made no reference to what had passed until just before she left. Then resting her hand on her sweetheart's shoulder, she said softly: "You'll look after Gladiator, Ted?"

"On my word!" he answered slowly, "and—I'll not be seeing Foster till after Monday, Elsie."

The assurance gave her comfort. Monday was the day on which Gladiator would leave the stables for Epsom.

Friday and Saturday were anxious days for Elsie. She sent a cheering note to Ted each morning, but he replied in a despondent vein. He had reason to suspect the groom of designs upon Gladiator, and had incontinently dismissed him. The man was insolent, and had hung about the yard all day in conversation with the boys. The news came from London that the odds against Gladiator were increasing daily. Sir Charles had wired Ted that he was arriving at The Firs, a country house near Norton, on the Sunday; until then the young fellow had the responsiblity alone.

Sunday morning Houghton announced that he was going away for a day or two and did not expect to return till Tuesday. After he had gone Farmer Dent decided to go over to his sister's, some few miles away. Elsie was left alone.

She rushed through her household duties and arrived in the stables early in the afternoon. Ted was looking ill and fagged, and feeling very miserable.

"I can't keep it up much longer," he said. "I'm about done up. I wrote to Sir Charles and told him I was worried about Gladiator, and he wired back saying I was a fool! No one could harm the horse if I took proper precautions. On top of that I get a note from him to-day sent from The Firs, where he arrived last night. Read it, Elsie, and say what you think."

Digitized by Google

"Bring Gladiator over here this evening about ten. Am anxious," said the note.

"It will knock the horse up a bit, won't it, Ted? It's a matter of five miles to The Firs."

"Won't do him any good. Still the master knows what he's about. It will give me a night's sleep, anyway. I tell you what, Elsie, this place has got on my nerves. I suggest that I walk home with you, put Gladiator in the farm stables for an hour, and go on later to Sir Charles."

Elsie thought it a very good suggestion, and presently the two set out, Ted leading Gladiator with all the care he would have given to a child. They went by slow degrees, the horse must not get tired, so it wanted a quarter to nine when Dent Farm was reached.

The horse was put up in the old stables, Houghton's chestnut being turned into the field to give the favourite more room. With a sigh of relief, Ted followed his sweetheart into the comfortable kitchen.

"When do you expect your father, Elsie?"

"Not till the morning, Ted, and Houghton has gone to London for a couple of days. It's quite like old times, you and I sitting here together."

Ted responded in a suitable and lover-like manner. Presently Elsie went upstairs to put on, with girlish vanity, a more becoming blouse. As she stood before the glass admiring her pretty face and dainty figure she fancied she heard footsteps, stealthy, muffled, creeping down the passage leading to her room. She felt frightened, and moved towards the door. Just as she clenched the handle, the key was turned upon the other side!

In another minute Houghton's chestnut had taken Gladiator's place in the empty stable.

Someone had locked her in the room!

Her first impulse was to scream, then she remembered that Hannah, the domestic help, was not in the house, nor any of the farm hands. Ted could not hear her from the kitchen. It was more than probable that the thief—for surely a thief it must be—would come in contact with her sweetheart soon enough without her intervention.

The thought brought with it a vivid sense of apprehension for her lover. Somehow she must get to him, it was maddening to stay there locked up while he was in danger. She threw open her window, the branches of an apple tree growing close to the house swayed towards her.

As a young girl she had often clambered to the ground down that very tree. Why not now?

A minute later, breathless and excited, she had put her project into execution, and stood in safety on the ground.

The kitchen window was closed, the curtains tightly drawn; not a sound to be heard, not so much as a ray of light to be seen. The front door was bolted. Creeping to the back of the house she found the door of the dairy left ajar.

On tiptoe she entered, passing softly down the passage till she reached the store room, which led into the kitchen. The door between the two rooms was ajar—she could see and hear all that passed.

Ted was standing on one side of the table. Facing him, an ugly look in his eyes, and a look of determination in his square, strong figure, was Ralph Houghton. Miles Foster watched them both from a seat by the window.

"You may just as well listen to reason, Gardiner," said the "farm pupil." "You are absolutely cornered. I've got you tight. Shout if you like but it won't do you any good. There's no one to hear but Elsie, and she's locked up in her bedroom. If any of the neighbours should look in my tale's ready. I found you here in the farmer's absence, against his express commands. As for fighting your way out—we are two to one"—he glanced at the ex-jockey, "and—well——" he paused, and lifted a revolver significantly. "I'm in dead earnest, Gardiner, and at the worst I wouldn't hesitate to put a bullet through you."

"What do you want with me?" said Ted sullenly.

Houghton paused.

"I want you to give Gladiator a bran mash," he said; "specially flavoured."

"You blackguard," was the answer; "I'll see you hanged first."

Houghton smiled.

"You'd much better listen to reason," he said once more. "In any case you've cooked your goose with Sir Charles. He isn't likely to keep a man in his employ who'd walk a Derby favourite five or six miles across country. He sent for Gladiator himself, did he? Nothing of the kind, my friend. I sent for the horse. Yes, I wrote that note. I forged the signature, But Sir Charles won't believe that. I'm much too respectable a person. Besides, the note is in your pocket, and before I've done with you it will be burnt. You'll have the credit of having doctored Gladiator anyway. If you're sensible you'll have something else besides. Here's two hundred pounds," he threw a bag of gold upon the table. "The price of your sweetheart, isn't it? I don't want the girl, believe me. It was only a ruse, the better to bait the trap for you. If you'd been wise you'd have accepted Foster's offer a week back. You can, however, still accept it. Give the horse a dose and I'll hand over the money. You can take him back to the stables and then get clear away. Elsie can join you. If you refuse Gladiator will be doctored just the same, and you will have to face the music. No one will credit your story—Foster and I can both prove an alibi. Now then, choose."

For answer Ted flung himself on to Houghton. He was tall and well built, and for a moment Houghton staggered under the shock, the next he had tripped his opponent quickly and neatly. Gardiner fell like a log, striking his head against the fender.

Digitized by Google

Instinctively Elsie rushed towards him. But as she reached the door she paused. For the moment she was powerless to help her lover, but she could at least defend his honour. She must wait and hear their plans, then strive to outwit their designs on Gladiator.

"He's got a nasty blow," said Houghton. "He'll lie senseless for a bit. Stay you here, Foster, and watch him. I'll go to Gladiator."

"No you don't, mister," said Foster angrily. "I'm not going to be left here to take the blame. You knocked him down, and here you've got to stay. I'll dose the nag, and then I'm off."

"Have your way," said Houghton, "but for Heaven's sake look sharp. You've got the stuff?"

Miles nodded, taking a bottle from his pocket.

"Be very quiet, and don't take a light into the stables. Somebody might spot it, the farmer may be home at any minute. Gladiator's by himself, they turned out my nag, so there's no chance of a mistake. Look slippy, Foster."

The ex-jockey nodded, and commenced his preparations, emptying the contents of the bottle into a basin.

Quick as thought Elsie flew down the passage leading from the store room into the garden. Hardly daring to breathe, she made her way round to the stables and softly opened the door. Miles would be about five minutes preparing poor Gladiator's supper, she decided. Five minutes in which to save her sweetheart's honour, and stave off ruin to Sir Charles. No wonder her heart beat quickly and her cheeks grew pale.

The horse whinnied as she entered, the beautiful creature seemed to love her and would follow her like a dog. She led him from the stable into the meadow opening from the yard. Tethering him to a tree, she called and quickly caught Houghton's chestnut. In another minute he had taken Gladiator's place in the empty stable. It was a dark night, and crouching beside the favourite in the paddock, she strained her eyes until she saw Miles Foster leave the house, enter the stable, and close the door.

Then, her pulses beating madly, her heart throbbing, and her brain on fire, she jumped on Gladiator's back. Thank Heaven she had learnt to ride without a saddle, thank Heaven the horse knew and responded to her touch. At any moment Foster might discover the trick she'd played, and, giving chase, capture the horse she'd done so much to save.

"Faster, my beauty, faster," she murmured, and the horse heard and understood, and putting out his matchless speed, swept like the wind across the country.

It was a mad gallop, and when at last they reached "The Firs," and Sir Charles was fetched by the astonished servants, Elsie had only strength to cry:

"I've saved him, I've brought him safe and sound. But they've killed Ted, they——"

She staggered, and the Baronet caught her gently in his arms.

* * * * *

A few days later Elsie found herself a heroine! The story of that dark night's work was spread abroad the countryside. Ted, little the worse for his rough treatment, came in for a share of the applause. Altogether it was a most satisfactory ending to what might have been a black chapter in both their lives.

Gladiator won the Derby, and made Sir Charles' fortune. He proved himself not ungrateful to his trainer, and at the present time Ted is on the road to prosperity.

Foster and Houghton were not again heard of. Houghton, it was alleged, was a member of a gang of sharpers, and had been sent down for the express purpose of corrupting Gladiator's trainer.

In that, however, despite bribes and other mean devices, he had not succeeded, therefore he had determined to deal with Gladiator himself.

Houghton's poor chestnut was found dead in the stables. Gladiator's dose had been too much for him. He, and he alone, had proved the victim of that dark night's work!

John K. Prothero.

THE TOWERS OF NOTRE DAME.

"No, never, never; I shall never marry you now! I hate you!" And pretty Yolande de Mirbelle stamped her tiny foot. Anger shone in her eyes, as blue as the azure sky, and generally so full of laughter and mischief; her rosy lips wont to open in rippling smiles on pearly teeth are to-day hard and set; her brow, wreathed with a crown of golden hair, is puckered with a wrathful frown. She stands before the low couch from which she has risen under the heat of passion, and she hurls words of bitter scorn and hatred at her cousin and fiancé, the young Marquis of Kéranville.

Bewildered, the young man stands utterly at a loss to account for this unexpected storm.

Hubert de Kéranville and Yolande de Mirbelle had played together as children; he being several years her senior allowed his wee girl tyrant to order him about, and was ever her ready, willing slave.

One sunny Spring afternoon Hubert and his little fluffy, golden-haired cousin were playing in the apple orchard of the Château de Mirbelle in Normany; Hubert was perched up among the branches of a gnarled old apple tree, showering down the rosy petals on the head of little Yolande underneath. Suddenly she called out to him:

"Hubert, I'm tired of this game; let us play at something else."

"All right!" Hubert rejoined; "but what shall we play at?"

"Well, come down; how can I shout out to you when I want to talk seriously to you? This is to be a very serious game!"

The boy tumbled down on to the grass close beside her.

"Well, now, little one, what is the game?"

"Make love to me!" was the startling rejoinder. Hubert, as a well brought up aristocratic little boy, was rather shocked at this.

"Yolande, you know little girls in France should never think of such things."

"But I am not a little girl; we are playing just now at being grown up. I am a young lady."

"But, Yolande," laughingly protested Hubert,

Digitized by Google

"young ladies do not ask young men to make love to them."

"Oh, nonsense, but they do! The other day, just before we came down to Normandy, I was walking with my bonne Annette in the Luxembourg gardens, and we met a soldier—oh, such a fine cuirassier—and Annette ran up to him, and she must have asked him to kiss her, because he put his arm round her and did so."

"Yolande, little girls should not notice such things."

"Why?"

The boy moralist did not exactly know how to answer the child's puzzling query, so he ignored the question and went on very gravely.

"Annette is a bad, naughty woman. I shall tell mother to advise auntie's having another maid for you."

"No, no! I like Annette, she tells me such funny stories. But now, Hubert, I wanted to tell you, when I am really grown up I am going to be married to you."

Hubert laughed. "All right, but tell me, dearie, why?"

"Oh, well, because I should like to be called Madame la Marquise!"

"Is that all?" And the boy looked rather wistfully at his little cousin.

"Well, no, I like you, Hubert; in fact, I think I like you and Stella about equal."

Stella was Yolande's little white Pomeranian. Somehow, her childish instinct warned her that Hubert felt pained and hurt, so she raised herself on tiptoe, and holding up her little rosebud of a mouth, she said quite earnestly:

"Hubert, dear, you may kiss me! Annette says people who are going to be married always kiss!"

* * * * *

Through an unforeseen chain of circumstances Hubert and Yolande were parted soon after this episode, and did not meet again for ten years. Hubert accompanied his father, the Marquis de Kéranville, to Constantinople, where the latter had been sent as ambassador to represent France at the Ottoman Court. A few years later the Marquis died, and his son entered the military school of St. Cyr, where, after a brilliant career at his different studies, he passed into the army and was ordered to Madagascar. Meanwhile, Yolande had been found too impetuous and self-willed to be brought up at home under the too easy rule of an indulgent mother and yielding governess, and it had been found necessary to put the young lady into the Convent of the Sacred Heart at Versailles, where she duly finished her studies. The kind-hearted sisters knew exactly how to deal with this high-spirited girl, and when she left the convent at eighteen to return to her home she was a highly accomplished, gifted person, thoroughly fitted to take her place in society. As the only daughter of the Countess de Mirbelle, every one knew Yolande would have a pretty large fortune as her dowry, and this, added to the fact of her being very beautiful, made suitors innumerable plead for her hand. Her mother was ever receiving overtures of marriage from dukes, marquises, and counts, but Yolande's invariable answer was: "Mother, darling, I have only just come back to you, and do you want already to turn me out? I do not wish to marry yet awhile." But suddenly Yolande changed her mind on this momentous question, and it came about in this way:

One afternoon Madame de Mirbelle was confined to her room with that favourite French ailment, a headache, and Yolande was alone in the drawing-room bending over her tapestry frame, when the footman threw open the door, and announced:

"Monsieur le Marquis de Kéranville!"

A burning flush suffused the young girl's cheek, and she rose from her seat and advanced with extended hand to meet the bronze-hued Captain of Chasseurs in his becoming pale blue and silver uniform.

"Hubert this is an unexpected pleasure and surprise."

"Can this be my little playmate, my little Yolande?"

"Am I so changed?" she coquettishly answered.

"The chrysalis has become a butterfly with gold and azure wings, the seed has born a flower of regal beauty, the shell has developed a pearl of surpassing value!"

"Fie, fie, for shame, you naughty flatterer!" but Yolande's eyes brightened with delight under her cousin's undisgusied gaze of rapt admiration. "Come," she resumed, "let us talk seriously; when did you return from Madagascar?"

"I arrived this morning in Paris, and you see I have lost no time in coming to pay my respects to my aunt, and pretty cousin."

Yolande pretended not to hear this latter part of the speech.

"My mother is suffering from a bad headache, but later on we shall go to her boudoir; she gave orders not to be disturbed, but a hero back from the wars like you, surely there is no law for such a one!" And half-mockingly the girl signed to him to be seated. "Now tell me all about your campaigns?"

"Tush; nonsense! I am sick of warfare—it is a game I am tired of; let us play at something else. Do you remember that last time we played together in the orchard at Mirbelle how you suggested we should play at something else?"

Yolande blushed and showed evidently she had not forgotten that far-away Spring morning amid the falling apple blossoms.

"Yolande," he continued very softly, "do you recollect the game you suggested then? You asked me to make love to you; I want to play that game now!"

The girl toyed nervously with a bunch of violets at her waist, but did not answer.

"And you said you were going to marry me when you were grown up. You are grown up, and, darling, I want to marry you!"

Still she did not raise her eyes, and he continued pleading passionately:

"Yolande dearest, I have never forgotten our boy and girl courtship; by the bivouac fire, through the roar of the battle-field, I kept engraven on my heart the image of my golden-haired little fairy cousin plighting her troth to me amongst the flowering apple blossoms. To-day I come to claim your promise. Dearie, what is your answer?"

The Marquis boldly possessed himself of one of Yolande's hands and, incircling her waist, drew her towards him. "That day you said, 'Hubert, you may kiss me,' will you not say so to me to-day?"

So low that he could barely catch the words she murmured: "Hubert, you may kiss me!"

Fondly he pressed her to his heart while he playfully plied her with questions.

"And is it only because you would like to be called Madame la Marquise that you are going to marry me? And must I share your affection with your pet dog?"

In the midst of these happy remembrances of their childhood, the heavy velvet hangings were drawn aside and Madame de Mirbelle stood on the threshold. She paused aghast, horrified when she beheld her daughter's waist incircled by the arm of an officer of Chasseurs.

"Monsieur! Yolande!" gasped in agonised tones the bewildered Countess. The guilty couple started aside, but they looked not one whit ashamed of themselves as they advanced to meet the irate mother. Yolande's eyes shone with a happy look of intense joy.

"Mother, mother, Hubert has returned——"

"To claim his fiancée," broke in the young officer eagerly; "aunt, allow me," and he gallantly saluted his aunt's cheek.

The Countess, on recognising her nephew, was somewhat mollified, but still she remonstrated:

"My dear boy, you are so impulsive, so 'impossible'; surely you know you ought to have come to me to demand your cousin's hand, and not to have presumed to speak to her yourself. It is most improper, most injudicious, quite an unprecedented event in our society."

Digitized by Google

The young people pleaded their intimacy in childhood, the unexpected return of the young officer, and the impetuousness of youth.

A French mother never loses sight of the practical side of things, and Mme. de Mirbelle knew that an alliance with the wealthy Marquis de Kéranville was for her daughter a splendid match; she was, therefore, easily brought to overlook and forgive the unconventional wooing of her future son-in-law.

From that day Hubert and Yolande lived in a sort of ethereal paradise of their own. They were officially engaged, and together day after day they went to balls, dinners, theatres, and picnics. Of course, according to the French strict rules in such cases, Mme. de Mirbelle accompanied them everywhere, but she was a good-natured, kindly soul, and often left the young folks to themselves.

Then there came the fatal day when all the sunshine went out of Yolande's happy daydream. Every morning since she had been engaged the Marquis sent her a dainty basket bedecked with bows of pink and blue ribbon, filled with the sweetest and choicest of white flowers, azaleas and lilies of the valley, white lilac and pale tinted roses.

One morning she wanted to send off some flowers to a sick friend in the country, and she went into one of the big flower shops on the Boulevard. She happened to notice two exquisite baskets of flowers exactly similar as to blossoms and ribbons; her eye caught the two cards attached to the handle of each basket. On one she read "Mdlle. de Mirbelle," on the other, to her amazement, she saw written "Mdlle. de Verny."

"Ah!" said the officious shop girl, "Mademoiselle is looking at those beautiful flowers that M. le Marquis de Kéranville has just ordered. Every day he bids us prepare two of these floral presents exactly similar in every way."

Yolande felt faint and sick, her heart pulsed high in an agonising passion of jealousy. What, those flowers she prized so were but the duplicates of ones sent to another woman! Oh, how false, how treacherous men could be! She hurried home, and rushing to her room bolted herself in, and flung herself on to the couch to give way to passionate weeping.

Hubert was false to her. Oh, she would die of a broken heart! But first she would show him how utterly she despised and loathed him!

Some few hours afterwards, when the young Marquis sauntered into his aunt's drawing-room, he found Yolande white and resolute, with set lips and strained eyes, and he was greeted with the passionate sentence with which this story opens. Again and again she vowed that she would never marry him. The enraged, excited girl flew to his basket of flowers lying on a marble table close at hand, with an eager, passionate gesture she wrenched the flowers out of the stand, threw them on the ground, and stamped on them.

"As I trample on your flowers, Monsieur le Marquis, so do I trample on the love you professed to feel for me."

"Yolande, tell me at least what have I done? Everyone who is accused of a heinous crime is at least told what his offence is, so that he may justify himself."

"Justify yourself, you. No, Monsieur, it is impossible. Go. I forbid you ever to enter my presence again." And like a tragedy queen she swept out of the room, leaving him standing speechless in the midst of the room.

Yolande's brain was on fire with the tumult of angry passions that raged unchecked within her bosom. Hastily putting on a hat, veil, and gloves, she peremptorily ordered her old nurse Marion to follow her, as she wanted to go for a walk. Marion adored her young mistress, and never ventured to oppose any of her wildest whims. They left the Hôtel de Mirbelle by the side door, giving into a back street. Scarcely knowing or caring whither she bent her steps, Yolande walked on and on, and poor old Marion could hardly keep up with her quick strides. Suddenly they found themselves on the "Parvis Notre Dame." Yolande glanced up at the grim and stately building; then, like a flash of lightning, the thought coursed through her brain, she wanted air. Well, she would climb to the top of the towers of Notre Dame, and there sit down to collect her thoughts.

"Marion, I am going up there."

"No, surely not; Mademoiselle is joking?"

Marion knew of old no remonstrances ever availed when her young lady's mind was made up.

"And does Mademoiselle want me to drag my weary old limbs up there too?"

"No, no, my good Marion; come, I am not quite so cruel as that. You sit and wait for me in the porter's lodge."

Yolande paid her admittance fee to the towers, and began her ascent up, through the tortuous, winding stairs. She gained the first platform, rather out of breath, gazed awhile on the hideous grinning gargoyles and demons, elfs and spirits carved in stone.

The bell-ringer came forth from his shed, insinuatingly offering his services to show her over the huge brazen bell, which only tolls for births, marriages, or burials of great people. But Yolande turned away; this was not high enough, she was not far enough removed from all humanity, which she just now hated with a deadly hatred, because one mortal had proved false. The stairs leading to the top platform were not lit up, and the night was very black.

Yolande groped her way up; the walls were damp and clammy with moisture, and altogether it was a weird, uncanny feeling. She sat down on one of the recesses just by the edge of the tower, and gazed in awe at the panorama stretched out before her.

Suddenly she started; a black cat with glaring fiery eyeballs and tail erect stood at her elbow, mewing in a most unearthly way. Yolande screamed; to her affrighted, overstrained mind this black cat seemed to be an impersonification of the devil sent there to tempt her to her doom.

The colour left her cheeks, she tried to jump to her feet, but a deadly feeling of sickness pervaded her whole being, her eyes closed, she swayed, and for one awful instant the most appalling of deaths threatened the wretched girl. But in her great extremity, while a hideous end confronted her, two protecting arms were stretched out to support her, and she was saved. Saved and clasped in a loving embrace. Half fainting, paralysed by terror, she lay in Hubert de Kéranville's grasp.

"Yolande, my darling!"

She opened her eyes, then shuddering, turned them away from those of him whom she so lately scorned, and her gaze once more reverted to the black cat, calmly licking his paws.

"Why it is only 'Quasimodo,' the black cat belonging to the bell-ringer. How could you be so childish as to let a pussy cat terrify you so?" the Marquis queried.

"Oh, I was so unhappy, beside myself with grief; but," and she trie to freed herself from his incircling arms, "how is it you are here? Let me go," she whispered fiercely.

"I followed you step by step, Yolande; tell me what have I done that in one twenty-four hours you could so change?"

"Go, leave me Monsieur; go to Mademoiselle de Verny!"

"Mademoiselle de Verny! Yolande, can you be jealous of my friend the Baron de Saint-Pierre's fiancée? Why, they are to be married to-day week!"

"Then she is as false to him as you are to me. How dare you send her daily the same flowers that you send to me?"

"Is that the key to the mystery which has made us both so unhappy? Oh, Yolande, little one, could you not trust me? Saint-Pierre knew I was engaged, he knows nothing about flowers, or what ladies like, so he had begged of me, when ordering flowers for my fiancée, to order some exactly similar ones for him."

"Oh, Hubert, can you ever forgive me?" And Yolande, humble and penitent, sued for forgiveness, which her generous lover was only too ready to grant.

Lily Butler.

Digitized by Google

The Patron of an Artist.

A Dainty Little Tale of a Parting and a Reunion.

THEY had met—loved—and parted, promising to write. There was nothing absolutely original in the occurrence; thousands had done identically the same thing before in their time, and, in all probability, thousands will emulate their example years hence. But the promise made on a liner's deck, though sacred at the time, was soon forgotten; and five years elapsed without a line being exchanged between them. And this was the man's fault.

Charlie Montrose had bade Zara Hoste adieu at Vera Cruz, when she was but a girl of sixteen, or rather woman, as girls of that age are ranked out in Mexico; one matures early in Central America.

A year passed, then Art had gradually blotted out the remembrance of her Madonna-like face. True, he had kept five of her letters, unanswered, by the way, which detailed to him her trusting love and her progress in sculpture; but they had lain on the mantelpiece of his study till dust had begrimed them and nearly obliterated the faintly-written words. Then four years lapsed, and Zara was almost forgotten by the man on whom fortune had smiled. Therefore it was somewhat strange that Charlie Montrose dreamt sadly of the past during an interval at a ball given by Lady Belmont at her house in Park Lane.

"Why so glum, Mr. Montrose?" she queried gaily, tapping him playfully on the shoulder with her fan. "You have not done your duty by standing out three dances! I must find you a partner."

"May I have the pleasure, Lady Belmont?"

"With me? Oh, I should be delighted, only, alas! my programme is filled," she replied vivaciously. "But I will introduce you to Miss Vivian. You know the great sculptor?"

"Surely not the Miss Vivian of 'Sleep' renown?"

"The same."

"Pleasure?" She smiled quizzically. "I heard once that you were jealous of her!" He bowed acquiescingly.

"You heard correctly, Lady Belmont; for once report was truthful."

"Impossible!" She gazed wonderingly at the rising artist. "Why, Mr. Montrose, are you jealous of an artist of a rival art?"

He smiled enigmatically. "My dear Lady Belmont, I am jealous because she endows cold marble with life; my figures are coloured by paint, but not by life. My paintings are but the outcome of—shall we say, talent?—while her conceptions are born of genius." He paused, then added brightly: "However, I am wildly anxious to know her, or even to see her, both of which pleasures have hitherto been denied me. Is she old? Learned? Or does she wear glasses?"

Lady Belmont laughed merrily. "Oh, dear, no! She is extremely youthful, being only twenty-two, in fact. Adorably pretty! Witty, and does not wear glasses!"

"Then the pleasure is doubled, Lady Belmont," he replied smilingly, as his hostess tripped away to speak to another of her guests. The band struck up the opening bars of a dreamy waltz, and Montrose, noticing that the promised introduction did not come off, retreated into an ante-room, and seating himself on a lounge, gave himself up to the "blues." Through the half-closed portière, he saw the giddy whirl of dancers circling round the room, noticing their smiling faces with a smile that was born of cynicism. He shrugged his shoulders impatiently.

"How true it is," he murmured reflectively, "that one-half of the world is happy, caring nothing for the miserable other half!"

A light step behind him caused Montrose to turn round. A brunette was coming towards him—a brunette whose beauty, surpassing even his ideals of feminine beauty so often depicted on his canvasses, caused the master-artist to almost wonder as he gazed at the marvellous regularity of her finely-chiselled features. He rose, stretched out his hand mechanically to pull back the heavy portière for her to pass into the ball-room, when she stopped suddenly, and glancing swiftly up at the handsome face of the limner, said impulsively:

"Mr. Montrose, the great artist, I believe?" He glanced straight into the eyes raised shyly to his, then replied:

"That is my name. As a great artist, I believe I am a fraud!" Then added modestly: "I have been lucky, that is all!"

"You are modest," she said gently. "I hope you will excuse my presumption in speaking to you without a formal introduction, but I was very anxious to speak to you. I only saw you once before to-night—at the Academy; you were pointed out to me."

"I am indeed honoured by your remembering my features," he said politely. Then glancing steadily at her face, said thoughtfully, "But surely your face is familiar? It is—ah, yes!" he cried bitterly, "I know whom you resemble. You are much prettier, yet so strangely—strangely like a girl I once knew!" He sighed, as he let the portière fall from grasp.

"Indeed?" The brown eyes opened widely. "I am pleased I resemble that lady—you—you were interested in. It is quite romantic, to be included, if even in so slight a degree, in a great man's life!" Montrose flushed dully.

"I am afraid I was speaking my thoughts," he said awkwardly. "I apologise. I must have bored you!"

"On the contrary," she replied brightly, "I am interested. As I resemble this lady, will you not tell me more about her? Or would it be indiscreet on my part to proffer such a request?"

"I am sorry to refuse!" he replied, glancing at her. "It is very difficult to do so, but no man cares to record a shabby action of his own."

"But, Mr. Montrose," she murmured, "you have always been spoken of in the papers as the soul of honour!"

"So much for the truth of journalism!" he said bitterly.

"But, surely, Mr. Montrose"—her voice trembled a little—"you have never broken your word or——?" He laughed harshly.

"That is identically what I have done!" he said. "I broke a pledge made six years ago, and now dare not redeem it."

"Indeed!" said the brunette, smiling archly. "And why not?"

"Because she would despise me now!" He stopped short, blushing hotly as he realised that he had committed himself. "May I escort you to the ball-room?"

She blissfully ignored his question.

Digitized by Google

"So you had asked her to marry you," she said thoughtfully, "and then grew tired of her."

"You appear to be a thought-reader!" exclaimed Montrose almost savagely. "You are, however, correct. I did ask her to marry me, then we drifted apart; four years passed and I did not write, and when I did my letters came back marked 'unknown.' You, however, are wrong when you say I got tired of her. I have loved her all these years, and now, when she has passed beyond my reach—— Bah! why do I speak to you, an utter stranger, in these terms?" he asked, with sudden coldness. "Allow me to conduct you to the ball-room, and pray Heaven I may never see you again; you remind me too vividly of what I have lost!"

He raised the portière.

"No," she replied impressively, seating herself on the lounge. "I will not go in. Sit down here beside me, I want to speak to you!" He turned to face her, cold lines hardening his face.

"Pardon me," he said haughtily, "I am unaccustomed to be ordered—even by a beautiful woman!" She blushed crimson, and he, seeing her embarrassment, hastened to apologise.

"I'm sorry for the way I spoke to you just now," he said awkwardly. "My pride is my fail——"

"Charlie!" There was a pathetic yearning in the way her lips lingered over the name. He started violently, stared hard at his companion, then approaching the lounge, said hoarsely:

"Is it possible? No, you jest! Yet—Zara, can—can it be you? For God's sake tell me if this is truth or am I dreaming?"

"It is true!" she said softly, rising.

"No, you are joking, or I must be dreaming!" He seized her hand and gripped it, then said feverishly: "No, this is real—I am awake!" Then, dropping her hand, said, almost wistfully: "You have come to reproach me; is it not so, Zara? Be merciful!"

"I came over to England to see you, not to reproach you!" she replied gently. "Oh, Charlie, you cannot imagine what agony I underwent during those four years of silence! A year ago I left Vera Cruz in the hope of finding you, and have only just succeeded in seeing you. I suppose you despise me now I have committed that heinous crime of running after a man!"

She asked the question defiantly, a crimson blush suffusing her cheeks.

"Despise you?" he echoed wonderingly, drawing her trembling form to him. "Zara! Zara! it is I who pose you that question!"

"Should I have crossed the Atlantic if I had?" she queried softly. "I thought you had forgotten me, and had I not been assured of your love to-night, I should never have revealed my personality."

"And you?" he asked anxiously. "Do you still care for that artist who asked you to be his six years ago?"

"As fondly as I did then," she replied simply.

"And if he wanted to keep you to that promise?" he asked gently, tilting her face up to his. "Would you repeat the answer of six years ago?"

"How do I know he would not ignore me again?" she asked archly. He sighed, then muttered bitterly:

"True! true! It is only natural you should doubt the sincerity of my love." She melted at the sight of his dejection, then, nestling her cheek against his, replied:

"Can you forgive me for being so horrid, dear? I never meant it, for I still adhere to my promise of six years ago."

She glanced archly up at him as she uttered the words, blushing so prettily the while that Montrose flung discretion to the winds and kissed her passionately, Zara wriggled herself clear of his retentive clasp, exclaiming merrily:

"There, that will do! Enough is as good as a feast; remember this is at a ball, please, and see, you have taken my fringe out of curl! When we are married I shall only allow you to kiss me once a day, but never at a ball!"

"I shall disobey that mandate if you persist in looking so pretty," he said laughingly. "We must go into the ball-room, or our hostess will be wondering what we are doing. Lady Belmont has promised to introduce me to a Miss Vivian, the great sculptor. I feel certain she will be horribly vain and conceited. By the way, talking of sculpture, you used to turn out things in quite a masterly manner once upon a time. Do you still, and have you improved?"

"I think I have, Charlie," she replied demurely. "Why?"

"I must have taught you thoroughly," he said; then added seriously: "My name will help you along tremendously. In fact, I will become your patron!" A faint smile crossed her lips, and her eyes danced with latent merriment.

"Yes," she said softly. "It would."

"Yes, I must have taught you thoroughly," he continued reflectively, raising the portière for her to pass. "And you must stick to figures; you used to chisel them out marvellously."

"Yes, I think I shall keep to figures," she replied, passing him.

"Ah! here you are," cried Lady Belmont, sweeping down on Zara. "I must introduce you to Charlie Montrose, R.A., my dear. He's wildly jealous of you, isn't it lov—— Oh, here you are!" she exclaimed, as Montrose entered the room. "Here is the Miss Vivian of 'Sleep' renown—Mr. Montrose—Miss——"

"I knew her years ago," interrupted Montrose starting, and colouring awkwardly. "But I was not, however, aware that she was the great sculptor. Miss—Miss Vivian has done me the honour of consenting to be my wife this evening. I tell you, Lady Belmont, because you have always followed my career with such kindly interest."

"I object to the word 'years,'" Zara said merrily. "It makes me feel an old crony."

"Then your fresh beauty gives the lie to the sensation," Montrose replied gallantly.

"How annoying it is!" exclaimed Lady Belmont smiling.

"Annoying?" echoed Montrose surprised.

"I suppose I must congratulate you both," she said gaily. "And I do, most heartily, but all the same, it is annoying—excessively so."

"But why?" insisted Zara.

"Well, you see," said Lady Belmont merrily, "I was hoping to pit the two wits of my party against one another on the subject of the rival arts, and now I am to be denied the pleasure of hearing the discussion."

"You have been the innocent means of uniting two hearts which had strayed apart, dear Lady Belmont," replied Montrose gaily. "Is not that a sufficient compensation for the loss of the argument?"

Tristan K. Monck.

Mrs. Scribbler (impressively): "Whatever you do, never, never, marry a newspaper man." School chum: "Why?" "I married one, and I know. Every night my husband brings home a big bundle of newspapers from all over the country, and they drive me crazy." "The newspapers?" "Indeed they do. They are just crammed with the most astonishing bargains in shops a hundred miles away."

Digitized by Google

A QUESTION OF PROPOSALS.

Telling of a Dilemma and its Solution.

"I HAVE something on my mind which is perplexing, rather than unpleasant, but which preoccupies me a good deal."

"If you were a woman," remarked Mrs. Eden, the charming little widow, "I should say you had just received a proposal, and didn't know how to answer it."

"But being a mere man, I'm in the far more difficult position of having a proposal to make——"

Mrs. Eden looked at him with her small and lustrous head on one side.

"Yet of not being able to make up your mind to whom."

His hostess rose.

"The sun is in your eyes, isn't it? No, don't stir; I never allow anyone to arrange my blinds but myself; other people only disarrange them."

She stood with her back to Holt while she lowered an inch or two the silken and lace flounced blind.

She returned to the sofa.

"Do you mean to tell me that you have a vague desire to propose to woman in general, or to some indefinite yet-to-be-met-with she?"

"I ought to have said, 'to which.' For there are two girls——"

"Ah, two girls," repeated Mrs. Eden.

"Who are both so charming that I can't decide between them, and so I come to you, as usual, to help me out of my difficulty."

"Then I know these highly-fortunate young women, one of whom you intend thus to distinguish?"

"Oh, it's easy to laugh! But you've so often advised me to get married that it's only kind to help me to put your advice into practice. I think you know Margaret Whelan?"

"Intimately. Did I not see her for a whole day in the country last summer? And I approve your taste. She is good to look at."

Holt appeared pleased.

"Yes, is she not handsome? Such a fine figure, and so tall."

"That's her one fault. She's almost too tall. She's taller than you."

"Dear lady. You're quite mistaken. She is three inches at least shorter than I am. She is certainly not more than five feet eight."

"What are inches?" cried his hostess. "A woman is as tall as she looks, and Miss Whelan looks taller than you."

There was silence.

"Then I suppose it's her long frocks," observed Mrs. Eden in a conciliatory voice, but Holt had abandoned the argument.

"Do you like her as well as you admire her?" he wanted to know.

"I adore her. Women never do less than adore each other on so short an acquaintanceship. But I should have got on with her better had I not been so dreadfully afraid of her."

"Why on earth should you be afraid of her?"

"O, she's so clever, so well informed——"

"She is well informed."

"While I, you know, am such a perfect little ignoramus."

"I know nothing of the sort. In your own way you are immensely clever, too."

"But in what a commonplace way! I can keep house, certainly, and out of debt, and I could make my own clothes, and cook my own dinner, if it were necessary; but, then, any woman can sew and cook."

"I wish to heaven any woman could! I wish my landlady could!"

"But I can't read Greek, as Miss Whelan does. She carries a pocket 'Aristophanes' with her up the river, and we could see her now and again enjoying silent laughter as she read. It's uncommonly clever to enjoy Greek jokes, isn't it? But then, of course, you and she could enjoy them together."

"Oh, as to my Greek," said Holt, and with a shake of his head he flung his last memories of it afar. "Margaret, you see, studied at Girton."

"Could I fail to see it? Girton is written all over her in indelible ink. It exudes from her manner, which is an impressive manner, an overwhelming one. A manner which puts me altogether into the shade in spite of the fact that I'm a widow with grey hairs."

"Have you grey hairs?" asked Holt, much interested. "I don't see any."

"There was certainly one there yesterday. Well, at least Miss Whelan need never fear grey hairs; her hair is too pale coloured to show any."

"She has curiously colourless hair, I admit," said Holt. "It would almost justify the use of hair dye. Kitty Redfern's hair is much prettier."

"So the other one is Kitty? Dear little Kitty! I like Kitty. Everyone likes her. It would be impossible not to do so, for she agrees with everyone and is of your own opinion even before you've expressed it. She's so beautifully feminine."

Holt assented. "She's like the finest, the most plastic clay, the whitest unwritten page——"

"On which you write all you wish, but the writing dries off immediately, leaving the surface white as before; while her plasticity is of the kind which takes, but cannot retain an impression. The moment the pressure is removed her mind springs back to its original formlessness."

"It is true that her innocence of any opinions is sometimes perturbing——"

"For while Echo is charming in the fable you hardly want her seated by your fireside."

"And I shouldn't wish my wife to be a mere mass of concessions."

"You are too intelligent. There are many men for whom Kitty Redfern would be ideal; for the man who merely requires a presentable mistress of his house, a healthy mother for his children. But you need something more than this; you need a companion——"

"With whom I can enjoy Greek jokes. Which seems to bring me back to Margaret Whelan, does it not?"

"Oh, but a companion who is also a good comrade. Some one who can appreciate your own little things as well as those of Aristophanes. Now, I should scarcely venture to try any joke on Miss Whelan which was less than a thousand years old. On the whole, I don't consider her any more suitable than Kitty. Less so, in fact. For if one doesn't want too much concession in a woman, neither does one want too forcible opposition. And Miss Whelan can be forcible. I've heard her."

"So have I," murmured Holt, reminiscent.

Mrs. Eden laughed.

"You're exhilarating!" she told him.

"I'm glad I exhilarate you, for I'm much depressed myself," said he. "I seem unable to pull this affair off. You tell me to get married and I try to obey you, yet my suggestions don't find any favour in your eyes. Perhaps you will make a suggestion yourself?"

Digitized by Google

"My suggestion would be such an exceedingly obvious one——"

"Which is actually the reason I can't see it for myself."

"It is merely that you should make an effort to obtain the woman you're in love with."

"But surely I'm more or less in love with Margaret and Kitty, too!"

"Believe me, very much less rather than more."

"Dear lady! By what signs do you judge me?"

"By these signs," Mrs. Eden told him. "When you are really in love with a woman you don't weigh her in the balance with anyone else. She stands above everyone, unique and alone. You don't ask other women their opinion of her; you force your opinion on them. You are in her society as often as you can manage it, and you are filled with solicitude for her welfare when ever she is out of your sight. You joke with her, laugh with her, discuss with her, and disagree with her. You quarrel with her and make it up again. You lay open to her the subject you have nearest your heart, and in any difficulty your first thought is to take her advice."

"But there's no woman in the world towards whom I feel like that but you," said Holt with sincerity. "And—and—but why——! What a fool you must think me!"

He moved close beside Mrs. Eden on the sofa and took her hand between his own!"

"Dear—my dear Mrs. Eden"—he asked her persuasively, "do you think you could ever get to love me the least bit?"

Mrs. Eden turned away to hide her smiles, and having subdued them turned back with a histrionic word of surprise upon her tongue tip, but, looking straight into his eyes, she suddenly threw away play acting and gave him the warm and happy truth.

"You dear and foolish person!" she murmured, "could you not see I have loved you for ever so long?"

But Holt, who hid some wisdom beneath much apparent folly, was wise enough to let this query fall.

G. H. Page.

ACCIDENT TO MISS MADGE MORRIS.

I AM sure all my readers will be sorry to hear that Miss Madge Morris, who has, for so long, been your willing counsellor in any heart-troubles of which you may have confided to her, has met with a nasty accident. Owing to the horse stumbling and falling, she was thrown out of a hansom, and though, by marvellous good fortune, no bones were broken, it will be several days before she is about again. Under the circumstances, therefore, I have thought it best to omit the "In Confidence" page altogether for this week, rather than give it to anyone else. You will be glad to hear that, just as I am going to press, I have received a message from Miss Morris to the effect that she hopes to be sufficiently recovered to continue her services in your little paper next week.

"TOPIC" COMPETITION RESULT.

IN the "Topic" competition, the first prize of a solid silver pencil case goes to Miss M. Hogg, of 15, Mid Street, Fraserbury, Scotland. Her sentence, which has reference to the King's tour, is—"'Tis to this shore the hero hies—this is his rest resort." Consolation prizes go to the following: D. Pope 5, Vernon Place, Birkenhead; L. White, 162, Camberwell New Road, S. E.; P. J. G. Lewis, Jersey Snuff Box, Dover; Mrs. E. Ryan, 21, Abbott's Road, East Ham; H. Barnes, 2, Vauxhall Walk, S. E.; J. G. Bennett, 8, Sydney Street, Grantham; W. Pearman, 115, Brewery Road, Plumstead; D. G. Jelley, 85, Ermine Road, Ladywell; J. A. Downie, 231, Great Junction Street, Leith; and J. G. Inch, 23, Southwold Road, Upper Clapton, N. E.

Your Editor Chats.

A MOST remarkable thing has happened in connection with Cynthia's "Confessions." Two days ago I received the following letter from Miss Cynthia Hamilton:

Empress Club,
Dover Street,
London, W.
Monday, September 1, 1902.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—I have had quite an adventure, and am naturally rather excited about it. This afternoon, about four o'clock, I was having tea alone in Bond Street, when, on glancing up, I saw Arthur St. J. H—— (whose name you remember I put as Percival Hope in my "Confessions"). He was with two ladies, most elegantly dressed. He seemed much graver and older than when he used to call at poor J.'s house in Pont Street. (J. is the initial of the real Christian name of the adventuress called Frances Norton in Cynthia's articles.—ED.)

After a while he looked my way, and caught my eye. He did not seem to remember me for a second, but when I smiled he nodded gravely, and a few minutes later excused himself from his companions and came over to me.

Of course I was awfully perturbed for a moment. I thought at first that he was going to row me about the "Confessions," but then I thought and hoped that probably he never read your paper. But I went furiously red all the same.

He said in his quiet, even voice: "You are looking very well, but a little sadder than in the old days." He paused, then continued in the same even way: "I see you've taken to writing."

I dropped my eyes and blushed scarlet. He had not only read the "Confessions," but knew who had written them! When I looked up again he was smiling.

"They are clever—very clever, Miss Hamilton! I congratulate you. But you're hard on that chap, Percival Hope!" He smiled. "You make out he didn't care for Cynthia very much. In writing this you are misleading the public, Miss Hamilton. He did." Another pause, during which I felt (although my eyes were on my teacup) that he was looking at me. Then he took a deep breath. "You heard, of course, about Toby?" I said that I had not. "Poor youngster, he's gone to the—the dogs."

Then he roused himself. "Well, good-bye, Miss Hamilton; so glad to have met you again. Mr. Pettigrew and I are over for the Coronation. We leave on Wednesday for Paris for a week. I hope to meet you again when we return. We shall be staying at the Cecil. Good-bye!" and, shaking hands with me, he returned to his friends. Two minutes later he had gone!

I wonder if he will ever come into my life again?

Yours gratefully,

CYNTHIA HAMILTON.

This incident is very gratifying, and shows that the facts stated by Cynthia in her confessions are practically correct. Of all the characters in this life drama, I consider the most interesting (after Mrs. Norton and Cynthia) to be Percival Hope. I feel that this young man, with his serious views of life, has had more experiences than the average young man of his age, and the renewed interest he has aroused by reason of his reappearance has set me thinking. If I can get hold of Hope and induce him to write up some of his experiences in high society—not only in connection with the Frances Norton business, but in other directions, both here and in America—would these experiences be appreciated by the readers? I wonder! Perhaps you will drop me a postcard and say what you think. I shall be guided by the opinions of the majority.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

☞ On Monday, Sept. 1st last, Cynthia Hamilton met Percival Hope at a tea shop in London. Read Cynthia's letter to your Editor on page 367.

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. FRANCES NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA HAMILTON .	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.
CASELLIS	A man from Jamaica who knows Mrs. Norton's past history.

Frances Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia Hamilton: Her companion.

THE STORY STARTS HERE.

HAVING arrived in England from a Bruges convent to be companion to my cousin, Frances Norton, I soon discovered that my cousin was taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money were lost and won. The climax came one night when Mary Vernon staked her diamond earrings (a gift from Lord Kinross), and one of the onlookers found them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton.

A few weeks later, my cousin, with Fluffy's help, stole a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew, an American millionaire, at the Café Regal.

We next moved into a house in Pont Street, and it was while here that Sir John Strickland, a poor baronet, proposed to Frankie, and was refused.

Later on Lord Kinross called at Pont Street for a private interview, and during that interview Percival Hope entered the room unannounced, and made the startling statement that Mary Vernon had discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Frankie left the room; but I stayed, and, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope, overheard Hope (who turned out to be Kinross' cousin) tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he would prove that Frankie was an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends. I told Frankie what I had overheard.

The next evening Lady Gaveston, Frankie's chaperon, informed her that she didn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decided at once either to marry or refuse him, she would return to Scotland. My cousin was given a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind.

We went to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis Blount, instigated by jealousy, enticed me to bet heavily, by which I lost £800. Frankie also lost heavily, and to pay our debts, she prevailed upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000.

That same night, at the Duchess of Warminster's ball, my cousin came face to face with a man from Jamaica who knew all about her past life. Percival Hope brought him in. It was a critical moment, but once again Frankie scored, for she managed to buy his silence.

The next day marked the end of the fortnight, during which Hope was to obtain proofs of Frankie's guilt. Owing, however, to Frankie's ingenuity, the indictment failed miserably.

Kinross then formally asked Frankie to be his wife. They were still in conversation when Sir John Strickland arrived, He had not heard of Frankie's engagement.

Before I could stop him he had gone into the room where my cousin and Kinross were talking. At sight of them he staggered and fell in a dead faint. Doctors were called, and pronounced it a paralytic seizure. Toby next called. In three days his uncle's bill must be redeemed. If this was not done he vowed that he would shoot himself.

Frankie being in a desperate strait, then got a large sum of money by worming a state secret out of Dollie Grendale, the wife of an M.P., and selling it to Pettigrew. While returning from Pettigrew's hotel late at night she met Kinross, who demanded an explanation.

Digitized by Google

FRANKIE MAKES AN AMERICAN COCKTAIL.

My thoughts were quickly turned from Frankie and Lord Kinross. Dollie Grendale clutched me tightly by the arms.

"What am I to do?" she cried, her breath coming and going in short, hard gasps. "I daren't go home. I'm—I'm afraid. I can't face Horace. I daren't!"

"You'll have to," I answered firmly. "Come, Dollie, pull yourself together. I don't suppose Frankie said anything to Mr. Grendale about your gambling. She only told you that to frighten you. You'll find she mentioned you'd let slip something about the arbitration, but assured your husband no one should be any the wiser. Cheer up, Dollie, Frankie isn't the sort of woman to make mischief."

I said this more in the hope of restoring Mrs. Grendale's peace of mind than from any great belief in the veracity of the statement.

As it happened, however, I had made a fairly shrewd guess as to the true state of the case. Frankie had driven to the "House," seen Mr. Grendale, and warned him in a friendly and entirely charming manner of the folly of making his wife a political confidante.

My words calmed the poor little woman. She wept copiously, but consented to be helped on with her cloak, and allowed me to send Skinner for a hansom.

"Take my advice, Dollie," I said earnestly, "don't attempt any explanations with your husband. Just kiss him and say you're sorry."

She promised to follow my advice, and, much relieved, I saw her depart.

Frankie was standing at the dining-room door as I passed down the hall. She was flushed, and there was a look of anxiety on her face that startled me. It was very rarely Frankie showed anxiety.

"Come in," she said, "Hartland wants to talk to you." She took my hand and squeezed it. "Don't give me away, Cynthia," she whispered, "for the love of Heaven."

Lord Kinross was standing by the window. Frankie settled herself in a lounge chair and motioned to him to speak.

"If Cynthia is to be scolded," she said, "you must do it—I shan't."

"I think Cynthia deserves to be scolded," said his lordship. He smiled as he spoke, but I didn't like his manner all the same.

"I understand you've found my cousin Percival a little trying lately, Cynthia. I've found him so myself at times." Kinross paused. "He has some letters of yours, I understand, letters which you wish to get back from him? Ask Hope himself to return them."

Kinross looked keenly at me. I felt myself turn crimson. I had written two or three times to Percival thanking him for flowers, etc., short, almost curt notes; nothing in any one of them that the whole world might not see. Why should I desire their return?

"Your cousin tells me you asked her to induce Pettigrew to use his influence with Hope to get these letters. Surely it would have been better to have asked Percival himself—why didn't you? Come, Cynthia, don't be childish, you must have some answer to give me. I owe it to my cousin to ask you for an explanation. Perhaps"—he paused—"have you already asked Percival to send back your letters?"

"No," I gasped. "No."

"Do you think he would refuse?"

I shook my head.

"Why, then, did you beg Frankie to go to-night and urge Pettigrew to get the letters at any cost?"

With a shock I realised what my cousin had done. To save herself from Hartland's anger she had pretended that she went to Pettigrew on my behalf. Mine! I flashed a look of indignation and reproach at her.

"Don't tell," she motioned, with her eyes, her hands, "don't tell!"

Unable to show anger to her I turned upon his lordship.

"You have no right to question me," I said. "You have no control over me nor my affairs."

"Pardon me, I have this right. I am your cousin's future husband; as such I will not permit her to commit indiscretions even for your sake. It was a glaring indiscretion to call on Pettigrew. I will not have it repeated. You understand?"

My cheeks burnt and my heart grew hot at the contempt in his voice. I threw up my head, and returned his look.

Proudly, defiantly, silently I would screen my cousin; for her sake I would consent to be misjudged, but not even for her could I acknowledge that Lord Kinross had a right to question me.

"As for the letters," he continued, "I will speak myself to Percival upon the matter."

But that I could not endure.

"You will do so in your own name, not in mine," I cried. "I send no message to Percival Hope through you. If you speak to him it will be not at my request, but from your love of interference. I dare you to tell Percival I want my letters."

Kinross shrugged his shoulders.

"As you like," he said coldly, "but in no case will I have your cousin dragged into the affair. Frankie"—he turned to her—"I have your word that you will not interfere again in the matter?"

My cousin nodded.

"That's right. We'll say no more about it. And now, my dear," he went to her side and laid his hand upon her shoulder. "There is one thing I want to speak to you about. I must prohibit you betting, Frankie, either on horses or at cards."

"I'm not so terrible a gambler as all that, Hartland."

"In future you are not to gamble at all," he said firmly. "Have you any bills still unpaid?"

"A few."

"Let me have a list in the morning. I will settle them. Also"—he paused—"are you in debt, Frankie? I mean do you owe much money to tradesmen and people like that?"

"Of course I do, till quarter day. I settle my accounts every three months. A tradesman in this locality would take it as an insult if you offered to pay him cash."

"How many unpaid bills are there left from last quarter, Frankie?"

My cousin laughed.

"You're terrible, Hartland. I confess I'm extravagant and get into debt, but who doesn't?"

"What do you owe, Frankie?" He took out his cheque-book and looked at her expectantly.

Frankie flushed.

"I think that's hardly your affair at present," she said slowly.

"Anything that effects you must of necessity be my affair," he answered gravely. "You've confessed you're extravagant, and I know you're short of money. I'm going to pay some into your bank, and I want to know how much will put you straight. Don't oppose me, Frankie. I'm not going to scold you, but I won't have it said that the lady I'm engaged to marry can't pay her butcher or the baker."

Digitized by Google

CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

"Somebody's been talking against me. Who is it, Hartland?"

"Nobody. I shouldn't allow such a thing. Let us return to the bills. How much, Frankie?"

He spoke with more determination than I had ever seen him show. It was evident that if Frankie did not give way to him upon the point, it would make a serious breach between them.

That was the last thing my cousin wished to bring about. With a shrug and a smile she yielded.

"Two thousand will put me straight, Hartland," she said.

He wrote out a cheque for the amount.

"That will pay all your bills?"

"All," she answered with an emphatic nod.

I happened to know such a sum would but settle half my cousin's liabilities, and I wondered that she should have neglected the opportunity of clearing herself of debt. But I never could understand Frankie. I could only wonder at her.

"I shall pay another thousand into your account," Lord Kinross continued, "so that you will have some cash to go on with till next quarter day. You receive your dividends from Jamaica then?" He glanced at her keenly.

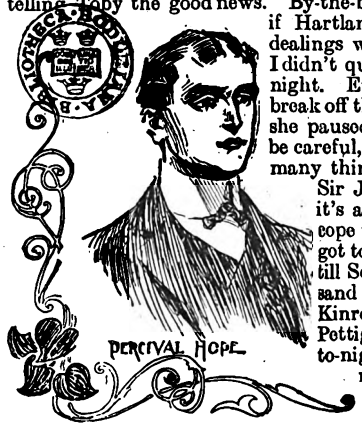
"Yes, dear, every quarter punctually," said Frankie. "And now I think you've lectured me enough. Don't look cross, Hartland, it doesn't suit you. I'll pay my debts and I'll forego gambling, and I'll lead a steady, sober, and righteous life. Will that please you?"

"Entirely. Don't forget. Frankie, you've got to turn over a new leaf." He parted from her affectionately, but bestowed only a cool good-night on me.

"Don't look so tragic, Cynthia," said my cousin, as the door closed behind him. "It isn't as if you really cared for Percival. Even if you do, what I said won't harm you. Kinross isn't likely to mention the letters after the way you snapped him up. It was a terrible predicament for me, dearie. I think I got out of it very cleverly."

I made no answer. Remonstrance as to her conduct was useless, but I could not bring myself to offer her congratulations.

"I'm glad you got that Grendale woman off so quietly," Frankie went on. "I managed that affair beautifully! Don't worry, Cynthia; 'poor Horace' will forgive dear Dollie this time. I've seen to that. I must go down to Nathan's in the morning. You shall have the pleasure of telling Toby the good news. By-the-bye, Cynthia, I wonder if Hartland has heard I've had dealings with the money-lenders? I didn't quite like his manner to-night. Even now I believe he'd break off the engagement if——" she paused. "I shall have to be careful," she said, "there are many things he mustn't know. Sir John, Toby, Grendale—it's almost more than I can cope with. Worst of all, I've got to get through from now till September on four thousand pounds — three from Kinross and a thousand from Pettigrew—he paid me six to-night. If I try to raise money Kinross will hear of it. I know what that would mean," she added, catching her breath. She rose from her chair, and paced the room in silence.



"Suppose we shut the house up and go into the country for a bit?" I suggested.

"Impossible. I can't leave town till the end of July, and we're only at the beginning. I've a difficult game to play, Cynthia, and for once the luck's against me."

Frankie's difficulties seemed to increase instead of lessening. Toby, relieved from the nightmare of Nathan's bill, recovered his spirits, and took to haunting the house and my cousin more persistently than ever. At last Kinross remonstrated.

"Ffolliott's here a great deal too much, Frankie," he said. "I don't like it. It's very well to say he's only a boy; other people don't think so. You must give him his marching orders, Frankie, or I shall interfere."

Frankie listened, angry and impatient. Kinross was displaying an unlooked-for strength of character. Of old, he had been easy-going, tolerant, amiable. Now he was as exacting and imperious as Percival himself. I wondered at the time if Mr. Hope had a hand in his lordship's new development. Frankie must, I thought, have felt the contrast between the faith, the utter and complete faith Sir John had always shown her, and the constant, and, at times, ill-concealed suspicions of Lord Kinross. Not that Hartland was wanting in affection; at times he was passionate in his love and admiration. But the old doubt was ever there, clouding his brightest moments. The doubt that cloyed the sweetness of her kisses darkened the radiance of her smile, making her very beauty seem less fair.

For more reasons than one, however, Frankie realised that she must give Toby his congé.

She came to the conclusion that Toby would be the better for a sojourn on the Continent, so she determined to get him a post at one of our foreign embassies. To that end she cultivated Horace Grendale with much tact and considerable assiduity.

That astute politician was charmed to accept her friendship. He had reason, so he thought, to feel very kindly towards Mrs. Norton. Owing to her intervention, his wife's volubility had been checked in time. Otherwise the consequences might have been serious. Pettigrew, I may mention, had conducted his Stock Exchange negotiations with skill and secrecy. No one ever discovered from whom he gained his information.

"If you could use your influence for young Ffolliott, Mr. Grendale, I should be awfully grateful." My cousin looked into Horace's eyes with a beautifully pathetic expression. "He's a nice boy, you know, and ought to do well. But," she paused, "he's foolish, and fancies himself in love, and—" she hesitated, "I've felt quite motherly towards him, Mr. Grendale. I assure you it was a terrible upset to me when I found out he'd mistaken my feeling for something different. I'm sure you understand, you're so sympathetic. Thank you," as Horace took her hand, doubtless to show his sympathy. "I knew you'd help me. And you think St. Petersburg? It's the only vacancy? Well, it's a long way, but perhaps that's all the better. When he's there he'll learn wisdom and forget me."

"The first he may do in time. The second"—Horace bowed over her hand—"is impossible."

Toby took his dismissal quietly.

"I fully understand," he said bitterly, "you've no further use for me, and so I have to go. You've heaps of admirers, Frankie, and your lovers are plentiful as blackberries. But there's this difference between me and the rest—they love and they admire you—why? Because they don't know you. But I," he paused, and drawing her to him clasped her in his arms. "I know you through and through. You're bad, bad as can be, and yet I love you, love you with every fibre of my body, and shall do so to my death. You'll send for me yet, Frankie, and when you do you'll find me ready. Kiss me a last kiss, a kiss from the woman who has ruined me." He drew her closer, and, with a cry of pity, she raised her face and clasped him round the neck.

And then he left her.

Digitized by Google

Toby Ffolliott had passed out of her life and mine.

Kinross increased his vigilance as time went on. Frankie was held accountable for every hour of the day. If she ventured to go out unchaperoned there were black looks. She must neither drive, nor walk, nor call unattended. Lady Gaveston cordially approved of his lordship's stringency, and I am bound to say aided him to the best of her unamiable ability.

Frankie commenced to show signs of this severe treatment. She looked harassed, little lines crept into view about her mouth, and there were dark rings under her eyes.

"I can't bear it much longer, Cynthia," she said to me one night. "The suspense is killing. At any moment Kinross may hear how terribly I am involved in debt. Every post brings me letters demanding payment, some of the tradespeople have threatened to summon me. If only Kinross would go away for a bit I would raise some money and satisfy the most pressing claims. But he won't stir from me, and while he is in town I can do nothing. If he finds out that I deceived him about my debts he'll throw me over, and yet I can't move hand or foot to get the money to pay them. I sometimes think he has me watched; I can go nowhere without his discovering it."

"When do we leave town, Frankie?"

"We're due at Cowes in three weeks," she answered, "but unless I can manage to stave off my creditors we can't go at all."

The day after this conversation Frankie developed a headache. It came about three in the afternoon, just as we were about to start for Hurlingham, to see a polo match in which Chesterton was to take part. Kinross was much upset by my cousin's sudden indisposition, and talked about giving up the expedition. Frankie would not hear of such a thing, and finally, yielding to persuasions, he consented to go with me and Lady Gaveston, leaving Frankie to lie down in a darkened room.

When I returned that evening I found Frankie much improved in health and spirits.

"I've raised some cash, my dear," she said. "I gave my maid a holiday, and while the household thought me peacefully sleeping I slipped out, the key of my door in my pocket. How did I get the cash? Borrowed it on my jewels. I simply haven't got a trinket left! Hartland's diamonds and Fluffy's pins all had to go. I've not sold them, silly," as I gazed at her, in horrified amazement. "I can get them again when I pay the money. How much? Three thousand; enough to give me breathing time, at any rate."

Frankie's appearance at dinner next evening devoid of any jewellery created something of a sensation. Rich ornaments became her infinitely; hers was a beauty that could stand a costly setting. But she had never looked more lovely than that night, gowned in white and silver, lilies in her hair and at her breast.

Kinross approved her new-found simplicity. He grew quite enthusiastic about "beauty unadorned." But after a time he tired, or grew suspicious of the change.

"Why don't you wear the diamonds I gave you, Frankie?" he questioned; "what has become of that turquoise bracelet I sent you?"

My cousin parried the inquiries with naive quickness, but at last he would no longer be put off. He expressed a hope that she would on no account appear at Lady Daventry's party without the diamonds. It was to be an immensely swagger function, the last event of the season.

My cousin could not get the diamonds under two thousand pounds, the party was in ten days' time, and Kinross was more devoted in his attendance than ever.

Providence, in the person of one of Hartland's aunts, interposed on my cousin's behalf. The aunt in question was taken ill and wired to Kinross to come to her at Como. His lordship reluctantly obeyed.

Frankie, in the height of good spirits at her freedom, wired to Pettigrew to come and take her out to dinner. He turned up about half-past seven, with him a young American named Vernon P. Slade, a professional billiard player.

"It's sweet of you to come," said Frankie. "I propose we go to the Carlton, I want a real good time."

We had an awfully jolly evening. Vernon P. Slade was quite a charming person, and Pettigrew waxed enthusiastic over his marvellous skill with the cue.

"There isn't a player to touch him in England, Mrs. Norton, amateur or professional. There is only one man who can come within a mile of him, and that's your friend Chesterton. I watched him play the other evening at the club."

"Why not get up a match between him and your friend?" she said, laughing. "I won't own England can be beaten, even at billiards, without a trial. I'll back Chesterton to any extent."

"That's real sportsmanlike of you, Mrs. Norton," said Pettigrew approvingly. "If the match comes off I'll lay £3,000 upon Slade."

"I'll put a simliar amount on Chesterton. I don't bet as a rule, you know, Mr. Pettigrew, but in a case like this where one's patriotism is involved, I can't refuse."

"I'll see Chesterton to-morrow to fix it up," said Pettigrew.

Frankie smiled assent, and leaving Pettigrew for me to entertain, turned her fascinations upon Slade.

He was a good-looking fellow, there was character in his square jaw and steady eye. With all the quickness and avidity of the Yankee, his manner was quiet, his expression imperturbable. He did not fall a very easy victim to my cousin, but parried her soft speeches with wonderful self-possession. But I was not surprised—it was no more than I had expected, when in the course of a week he surrendered at discretion, and became a constant visitor to Pont Street.

The match between Slade and Chesterton was arranged to take place the evening before Lady Daventry's party. Frankie had written and told Kinross that for this once she felt compelled to disobey him, and had backed his friend for all she was worth. Hartland condoned the offence, and hoped to be back in time to see Chesterton carry all before him. In any case, he would return for Lady Daventry's affair.

The day before the match I discovered Slade and my cousin in a close and confidential attitude—she had clasped her hands round his arm and was gazing at him intently.

"It isn't much for you to do," she said; "one defeat won't spoil your reputation. Consider the match is purely a friendly affair."

"I've played a straight game all my life, Mrs. Norton," he said quietly, "and I always shall. If, as you say, you have backed Chesterton so heavily, that you will be unable to meet your losses, why don't you hedge? You can put an equal amount on me, you know, and that will make you safe either way."

"I can't—Lord Kinross would never forgive me. Besides, there's no one to take the offer. It's a purely friendly match, as I told you before."

Slade paused. "I'm terribly sorry for you," he said at last. "I'm not a rich man, Mrs. Norton, but if a few hundreds would help you?"

"Not a bit of use," she interrupted hastily.

"Well, then, I can do nothing. It's quite possible," and he smiled, "that I may be in bad form, or Chesterton may put up a better game than I anticipate. For your sake, I will hope for the worst."

Digitized by Google

He smiled again and pressed her hand. But for all his soft words he was adamant. Frankie could not move him.

At length the evening of the match arrived. It was to be held at Chesterton's house in Manchester Square, where there was a splendid billiard room. Frankie was resplendent in a wonderful gown of wine-coloured silk, veiled with rich lace, and held her head high despite her fears.

"I shan't be able to get my diamonds back in time to wear at Lady Daventry's if Slade wins," she remarked. "Kinross will surely discover what I have done with them. And then"—she shrugged her shoulders. "At all events," she added, "I mean to have a merry night even if it's my last."

The billiard room was very large and lofty and flooded with electric light. The green tables, the polished ivory balls, exercised a fascination over me, and when the game commenced I was fully as excited as the rest.

Three games under American rules were to be played of 200 up. Chesterton scored first with a break of 20. Slade followed with a break of 36. The Englishman, who was in fine form, rapidly ran up to 150. Slade failed to catch him up, and Chesterton, as Pettigrew said, romped in an easy winner of the first round.

The second game Slade made a brilliant start; he took and kept the lead, beating Chesterton by 50.

The third game was the most exciting. Each had scored a victory. This was a final test.

Chesterton played cautiously, his score crept slowly but surely to 80, 90, 100. The balls rolled monotonously, again and yet again, till his score nearly touched 150. It would take some skill on Slade's part to beat his record.

The American, with a tense look on his face, made a succession of brilliant strokes. He soon passed the first hundred and reached the second. He had eighty-five to make to win.

"He moistened his lips with his tongue and glanced towards the side-board where there was an array of decanters.

"Let me mix you something, Mr. Slade," said Frankie. "I'm a very good hand at American drinks. What do you say to a cocktail?"

"Thanks, very much, I should like it immensely!" he replied.

Frankie set about compounding the mixture. She took rather a long time over the business. The flavouring wouldn't come right, she said.

"It tastes first-class," said Slade. He drank it, and returned to the table.

For a while his play was brilliant as before, gradually, however, his wrist seemed to lose its power, he all but missed a stroke, and looked very white and fagged.

"You might open the window, the room is awfully hot!"

He looked so bad that Chesterton suggested he might like a rest, but he would not hear of it.

"I'm all right," he said irritably; "there's nothing the matter with me."

He took up the cue and struck wildly, sending the balls in all directions but the right. The game was over, Chesterton had won.

"Never saw such a smash-up in my life!" said Pettigrew. "What's come to you, Slade?"

"I'm beaten, that's all," said the American, too much of a sportsman to acknowledge that he was feeling awfully bad.

"You're ill, old chap!" Chesterton took his arm and led him from the room. Frankie and I were left with Pettigrew.

"Can't understand it a bit," said Hiram. "Never witnessed such a collapse in my life. It's just as if he was dying or faint or something!

"I shouldn't wonder if your cocktail made him queer, Mrs. Norton," he said joking. "English women don't know how to mix a drink."

Laughing, he took up Slade's glass—there was still a little of the mixture left—and examined the contents.

He tasted, and seemed to like the taste but little. His face grew very grave.

"It's very queer," he said, shaking his head, "very queer. Why," he dropped the glass and faced round quickly, "I believe it's drugged, and you"—he walked to Frankie and seized her wrist—"yes, you have drugged it!"

(What happens to Frankie will be told next Tuesday. This series began in No. 702 of Short Stories. Back numbers may be ordered through any newsagent.)

IN THE MIDST OF LIFE.

Beginning with a Tragedy and Ending with a Honeymoon.

"By just half a minute, sir," said the porter.

For the moment the man did not answer.

It was evident that he was more than vexed, that he was irritated and angry at his failure to catch the train.

He was a fairly well set-up man, of an age that it was hard to determine. Wrapped in a long, roomy, travelling cloak, the collar turned up above his ears, and wearing a big, black, soft felt hat, his face was all but indistinguishable.

He was too upright, too alert for an old man, but the deep, firm tones of his voice, as he at length addressed the sympathetic official, indicated someone with more than the usual share of decision of character, good or bad.

"The train just gone," he said, "is the very last which could possibly put me on board the Campania for New York, isn't it?"

"Yes, sir! The next will be just too late, by three hours."

"Um! Well, it can't be helped; get me a cab!"

His bidding was done, the two great cabin trunks being re-hoisted on to the roof of the "growler."

"Where to, sir?" asked the porter, tip-expectant.

"Ah! That's just it!" re-echoed the man.

"Beg pardon, sir! Where you came from, perhaps, sir!"

The man's face became absolutely livid; while he himself seemed suddenly to be transformed into hard, dumb stone.

Then the fit changed, and his face became scarlet with passion, his eyes almost bolting out of his head; he clenched and unclenched his hands as he flung words at the unfortunate porter, like as they had been deadly missiles.

"There! Tell me, you rascal! Why I should go there!"

"I can't tell you!" returned the nettled railway official; "and as to being a rascal, keep your bad language for somebody else as like's it better nor I do."

"Why, you impudent, loafing scoundrel! I'll complain to your masters and have your coat from off your back!"

The porter, as if determined to keep his temper, and so be on the prudently right side, made no reply, but having done his duty with regard to the luggage, walked away to another and newly-arrived cab. The man was about to enter his own vehicle when his Jehu roughly asked for directions.

The fare looked at the driver, who repeated his inquiry with an impatient insistence, which served, however, to irritate the other still more.

"Where to?" he snarled viciously. "Drive towards

Digitized by Google

Paddington. Go along the New Road and—and Talbot Street, and I'll tell you when to stop."

"Talbot Street!" exclaimed cabby, half turning round. "Why that's where——"

"Never mind!" sharply interrupted the man, "do as you're told, and keep your remarks to yourself!"

Outside the station boys were shouting out the contents of the noon editions of the halfpenny evening papers.

"Terrible murder! Man stabbed to death in an hotel in the West End! Murder!"

The man in the four-wheeler leant out of the cab window and beckoned to a boy.

"Evening Express there!"

"Here y'are, sir! Terrible murder, sir!"

"Give me the paper, you noisy young blackguard! There's the money!" throwing a penny into the road.

"Who're you callin' a blaggard? You're a nice old cup o' tea, you are!"

The boy's abuse followed the cab, but the man, though he must have heard it till it died away in the distance, took no notice, but sat well back in the shadow, his eyes fixed on the paragraph which described the tragedy at Blacklock's Private Hotel, Talbot Street, Edgware Road.

* * * * * * *

Two women, by their striking likeness to one another, obviously sisters, sat at the open window of a second floor front room of number twenty-three, Talbot Street, Edgware Road.

But in spite of the likeness between the two there was as noticeable a dissimilarity.

One, evidently the elder, expressed in the lines of her face, in the sad look in her eyes, and in her careworn appearance generally, the strain of responsibility and thought for others.

The younger girl was, or seemed to be, altogether different.

A complete contrast in appearance to her sister, she was tall and fair beyond the ordinary, and in every way of a more intellectual, if restless, type of character.

"Gracie," the latter was saying, "I cannot rest. I think I shall go out."

"Go out, Rita! You know this is your rest day! Don't, please don't!"

"Nonsense, dear. I will just stroll and meet Leo; he always walks home on Saturday afternoons, and I shall be sure to catch him the left side of Oxford Street near the Circus."

"Well, I think Leo Bryant ought not to encourage you, Rita, in playing these mad pranks," said Grace Ellington. "You never seem to be for five minutes together in your home. He imagines that just because he, as a man and a journalist, is under the necessity of being abroad at all hours, and can do it with impunity, you, a mere girl, can do the same, and with like results."

"And Leo is right, you dear old fidget! Any way, I'm going, and we shall be back in a couple of hours, in time for an early cup of tea."

As Rita Ellington quietly closed the street door behind her, and halted a moment on the bottom step to button her glove, a four-wheel cab, with two heavy trunks on the top, passed slowly up the street.

As it passed where she stood, the white, black-bearded face of a man appeared at the window nearest her.

It was only for an instant that she saw it, but long enough to be able to recognise it.

For she remembered that only the night before, while as on this afternoon sitting at the open window of their front room, she had seen about half-past twelve, at the centre, second-floor window of the hotel opposite, the same white, black-bearded face pressed for a second against the window pane.

At the time it had startled her by reason of its expression of weird terror and horror-stricken apprehension.

Mixed, too, with this coward look was a cruel, vindictive glint in the eyes, which she could plainly see in the light of the moon that beamed down from overhead, sheer between the two sides of the street upon the centre of the roadway.

Now up the street came the raucous voices of the newsboys, crying out—"Terrible murder in the West-end! Murder of a gentleman in a Private Hotel in Talbot Street, Edgware Road! Paper!"

They had kept the affair very quiet over the way; for although a certain amount of unusual bustle and running to and fro had been noticeable, not a whisper of the fact had leaked out, until it was made public through the evening early editions.

Rita Ellington had that rare gift among women of being able to come to logical conclusions on most matters, and this gift it was that caused her to take these two separate views of a man's face, and to make of them two well-forged, unbreakable links which should connect themselves with the murdered man still lying in the centre, second-floor room of Blackstock's Private Hotel.

And the man in the cab went on his way, little heeding that a woman's wit was awake to follow in his footsteps; that a woman's hand was set to the task, from which she would not, because she could not shrink.

* * * * * * *

Rita Ellington never did anything like the majority of other girls, and when, therefore, walking on and on, she failed to meet her lover, she did not hesitate to make the whole journey to Fleet Street right to the door of the office of the Daily Phonograph, the journal upon the staff of which Leo Bryant was a special news reporter.

"No, Miss!" said the commissionaire, in reply to her inquiry. "Mr. Bryant isn't here; he went away in a cab more than two hours ago."

"You don't know if he is likely to be back here, do you?"

"Can't say Miss! But as he's gone on that West End murder case, near Edgware Road, it's sure to be very late when he does come."

"I might have guessed that he would have been detailed," said Grace, half to herself and half to the doorkeeper. "Well, please tell Mr. Bryant, if he should come, that I called—Miss Ellington—and—and that's all. Good afternoon!"

She stood a moment in the doorway, undecided as to whether she should walk home or take a cab. The latter was somewhat in the nature of an unwonted luxury, and she was on the point of bracing herself to face the inevitable, when a hansom dashed up, a young fellow, tall, stiffly-built, and breathless almost with energy, descending quickly from it, and well-nigh knocking Rita down in the semi-darkness of his impetuosity.

"Rita! What's brought you right up here?"

"Nothing of any importance, Leo, except that—that something I cannot quite explain, is worrying me a bit."

"Well. I shall not be ten minutes, go into the room there on the right of the passage and I will come to you, and we'll go home together."

Leo Bryant was a first-floor lodger in twenty-three Talbot Street, the house where the Ellington girls lived.

In less than ten minutes he came and bore her off into the crowded street, and, as they decided to walk, they soon found themselves in Holborn, with their faces set westward.

"Do you know the job I'm on, dear?" he asked her abruptly.

"That alleged murder case at Blackstock's in our street, isn't it?"

"Yes, but how did you find out?"

"The old doorkeeper at your office told me."

"Ah, of course. Well, Rita, it is one of the most extraordinary cases I have ever had to tackle, and my experience, for a youngster, hasn't been so limited. It completely fogs me."

"Do they suspect anybody?"

"Well, there's the rub! There is absolutely no one upon whom they can lay a finger as having been likely, from motive or interest, to kill this man. Except, perhaps, a man who left the hotel this morning, and there is really nothing definite to connect him with the crime."

Digitized by Google

"Leo, you love me very much? At least you say you do, so I suppose I must believe it."

"My darling, you know that I love you better even than life itself."

"Then, if love be life, we—you and I, Leo—shall live for ever, because my faith is that love can never die."

"Dear heart!" said Leo tenderly, and inclining his head towards her, so that her hair touched his cheek. (They were passing through quiet Staple Inn, so the caress was possible). "What ails you to-day? And what earthly connection can there be between this wretched murder case and you and me?"

"More, perhaps, than we should care to acknowledge, dear," she answered him.

That her strange manner should startle him was not wonderful, seeing that Grace had told him more than once of her sister's almost unnatural proneness of late to do and say things peculiar and out of the common.

"What makes you think so, dearie?" he asked, without putting too much earnestness into the query. He knew that if he was to be successful in guiding her mind back into a calmer and quieter channel, it must be by refusing to take her too seriously.

"Only something I saw last night, and something else that I saw a couple of hours ago. But, Leo, if I told you what I think these two things really mean, you would simply laugh at me, and so—well, I won't tell you."

"That is unkind, dear!"

"No, Leo, there may be nothing in it after all, and should that be so, I should regret having said anything to you about it."

"You will at least tell me why you put that question to me just now as to my love for you?"

"Oh, I don't know, dear; I fancy it was because in case anything should happen to me—to us—it is pleasant to know that love, at least, is deathless."

"Happen to you! What can happen?"

"Who knows? But there, dear, we won't discuss the subject further. I am not quite myself to-day, and maybe it is all fancy on my part and foolish moonshine."

"Very well, my darling, if it pleases you to say nothing—say nothing. We will hail the first hansom, and get home in double-quick time."

At the corner of Tottenham Court Road they found a hansom, and in a quarter of an hour were landed at Talbot Street.

"Remember!" said Leo to her as they parted in the hall, "you are not to worry your poor little head with any theories, good, bad, or indifferent on the subject of this hotel affair!"

Before having his tea Bryant crossed the street, and exchanged a few words with the policeman on special duty outside the hotel opposite.

He knew that the body of the murdered man, upon whom nothing had been found by which he could be identified, had been within the past two hours removed by the police to the nearest mortuary, yet on the chance that anything fresh in the shape of explanatory evidence might have transpired and which he could add as late "copy" to his already delivered-in account, he thought it advisable to "tap" the constable ahead of the other newspaper scribes.

The officer knew the Daily Phonograph's special reporter and responded readily to his inquiries.

"No, sir, there's nothing new, and I don't fancy as there will be."

"Well, if anything turns up, you know where I live; just run across and knock me up, wil you?"

"Right you are, sir! Thank you, sir!"

This was for the customary tip, which in these cases is always a source of strength to the pressman angling for news.

Seeing that there was nothing more to be gleaned, Leo Bryant went in, had his tea, and a pipe, and sat by the open window in company with his thoughts.

* * * * *

It was just after filling his second pipe that young Bryant imagined he heard the street door shut to, but, quick as he was, he failed to see more than the back of a woman walking rapidly up the street towards the main road.

For an instant he thought it looked like Rita. To make sure, he ran upstairs and knocked at the Ellington's sitting-room door.

Grace opened it.

"Has Rita gone out?" Leo asked.

"Gone out! No! She went to bed directly after her tea."

"Then it couldn't have been her," he said, half-musingly. "Would you mind, Grace, making sure that she is in? I'm a bit anxious about her. That's all!"

Grace Ellington came quickly back again, her face white with apprehension.

"You are right, Leo. She is out. Oh, where can she be? What can she be doing?"

"Stay you there, Grace! I'll go and look for her."

The words were scarcely out of his mouth before, seizing a cap, he was down the stairs and out into the street.

"Did you see which way that lady turned who left twenty-three just now?" he asked his friend the policeman.

"The young lady as you came in with awhile ago, sir? Oh, yes, when she got to the top of the street she turned to the right, Kilburn way!"

"Thanks! Good night!" and Leo Bryant sprinted for all he was worth in the same direction.

To keep his eyes on both sides of the road, in his search for Rita, was no easy matter, the thoroughfare being even more than usually crowded.

As he neared Maida Vale, however, it got quieter, but not a trace of Rita could he see.

Kilburn reached and without any result, he felt both alarmed and at a total loss what to do.

Then it suddenly occurred to him to hark back, as it was improbable that Rita should have made so long, and apparently so purposeless a journey.

On his return to Talbot Street he was met with the news of the arrest of the alleged murderer of the man at Blackstock's.

"It's only a case of suspicion," said the policeman to Leo, "but pretty thick suspicion at that. If it don't hang him, may I never get my stripes!"

It appeared that the police, who naturally suspected the prisoner, but lost track of him after his missing of the boat train, came up with their quarry just as he was boarding the Havre steamer. He made no resistance, and at the moment no statement.

Leo Bryant's first duty being to his paper, he collected all the information relative to the case, posted off with it to Fleet Street, and did not inquire about Rita till his return.

The story he had to hear was most extraordinary.

In the first place he learnt that Rita had returned within an hour after his departure in quest of her, refusing to go to bed until she had seen him and spoken with him.

Late though it now was, he found both sisters up, and evidently waiting for him. In his position as Rita's promised husband, no one of the three saw anything out of the way in his sitting and talking with the girls at this hour.

Digitized by Google

"Leo, I have seen my father to-night!" were Rita's first words.

He thought almost that she was ill, for he knew, as a matter of fact, that Mr. Ellington had not been heard of for ten years or more, he having some time before his wife's death sailed for parts unknown.

"Your father, dear! Why——!"

"Yes, I know, but I have not seen him alive, Leo—but dead,—in the mortuary at Church Street."

"Good Heavens—have you been there to-night? And your father?"

"He is the man murdered at Blackstock's last night. I cannot exactly say what it was that impelled me to go and see—see—him, except, perhaps, that I have lately been thinking much of poor old thoughtless dad."

"Do you know that they have caught the man who is said to have killed him?"

"The man I saw at the window—the man I saw in the cab! There is nothing extraordinary in it. A child could have pieced so easy a criminal puzzle together."

* * * * *

In his subsequent confession the prisoner, Sylvanus Hemp, told a remarkable tale.

He and the dead man had, it seemed, been partners on a "claim" in the Nevada silver fields.

The other, Robert Ellington, but known as Robert Pateman, discovered a rich "pocket," for a time keeping the discovery to himself.

Accidentally finding this out, Hemp planned to murder and rob Pateman, but the latter, secretly concealing his property, managed to elude his scheming partner and to make off coastwards.

Reaching New York—Hemp well on his track—he sailed for London, putting up on his arrival at Blackstock's.

There the two accidentally met and patched up a sort of peace. Hemp waited a favourable opportunity to effect his purpose, namely, the getting at the proceeds of his partner's "find" at any risk.

It came, he surprising Pateman when half asleep, and demanding a share of the money. On the other's refusal to disgorge a single coin, Hemp stabbed him with his own knife, which lay at hand upon a small table by the bed.

Hemp then left the house after paying his bill, deposited his luggage at a railway cloakroom, and kept quiet till it was time to catch the night mail for Liverpool.

He also in the interim bought a passage to New York at a London agency of the Cunard company.

That was all there was to be said about it, and he was now prepared to pay the penalty of unsuccessful crime.

This he did in due course.

* * * * *

A month or two after the events above related, a couple, evidently newly-married, took their seats in a second-class compartment of the limited mail at Euston.

The girl was tall and fair, and her companion had the look of one who might be relied upon in the tightest of emergencies.

"You're sure you are comfortable, dear?" said Leo Bryant.

"Comfortable, Leo! I'm simply happy, and that's better, for it includes the other."

"So it does, Rita, and all you have to do now is to forget everything that is connected with the old days, and let Gracie see that we are the happiest couple in the world."

"Dear old Gracie! She will be thinking of us all the time we are honeymooning in the Isle of Man."

"Well, I'll tell you what I did, dear. I told her on the quiet that we should expect her down in a week from to-day. Does that please you?"

"Leo!—it is just what I could have planned, but as your dea it is better than best."

As the train steamed out of the station he asked her:

"And you feel safe, darling?"

"Perfectly safe," she answered him, "now and for always."

Ralph Enderby.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

September 16. — The year promises much annoyance and anxiety to those whose birthdays fall to-day. Losses in business and through false friends. Sickness in home circle.

Girls will need great care in their love affairs, and should act with extra caution and prudence.

The day is evil for marriage and pleasure parties; not good to engage maid servants.

A child born to-day will be careless, fond of pleasure, but of good understanding, and will get on in life by its wit.

September 17.—Those celebrating birthdays to-day will have a changeable and uncertain year. Unfavourable for those in employ; better for aged people, landlords, farmers, and builders.

Girls born in the early morning must beware of deceit from opposite sex.

The day is not good to ask favours, to speculate, or travel. Beware of accident near nine a.m. and five p.m.

A child born here will be fond of change, extravagant, and should keep in the employ of others.

September 18.—The year will be rather favourable for health, business, and finances. Some trouble in domestic circle.

Girls will meet with disappointment in love affairs and have some strange adventures if born near six p.m.

The day is good for commencing new undertakings, buying and selling, consulting lawyers, doctors, and military men.

A child born here will be fortunate with business; have an active mind and keen wit.

September 19.—An unfortunate birthday; the year will be full of change. Health will need care, and the temper should be kept well in hand.

Love affairs will bring worry and anxiety; not a good time to marry.

The day is evil for social affairs, letter writing, and dealing with aged people. Guard against chill and cold.

A child born to-day will be cunning and crafty, lack self-confidence, and will not make much headway in life.

September 20.—The influences for the year are not good; losses and worry in business. Do not lend to friends; avoid speculation.

Girls will find love affairs of a quiet order.

The day is not good to buy or speculate; good to study metaphysical subjects, visit palmists, and spiritualists.

A child born to-day will be improvident; the mind will be original and fond of mysticism.

September 21.—Rather favourable for business; beware of accident and law. The year will be fair for health and domestic affairs.

Girls will find love affairs very interesting, and, if engaged, may marry this year.

A child born here will be cheerful, quick, and rather fortunate in life. Should insure against accident.

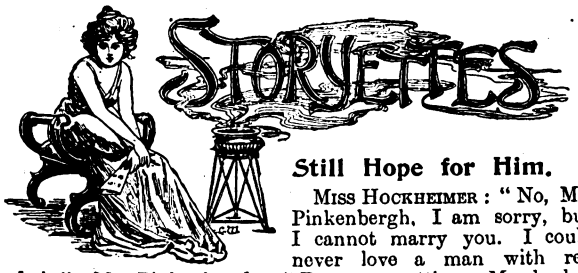
September 22.—A favourable year for those in business; if in employ promotion is promised. The health will need some care.

Love affairs are rather promising to girls; those born near one p.m. will become engaged, or marry.

The day is good for asking favours, seeking employment, dealing with bankers and shipping agents.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google



Still Hope for Him.

MISS HOCKHEIMER: "No, Mr. Pinkenbergh, I am sorry, but I cannot marry you. I could never love a man with red hair." Mr. Pinkenbergh: "Dot vas notting. My barber tells me dot at the rate my hair is falling oudt I vill be completely bald in one year."

More Bacteria.

MOTHER: "What's that smacking noise in the parlour?" Studious boy (who goes to school): "It's Ada and her young man exchanging microbes."

Very Probably.

MRS. SMITH: "I declare this leg of mutton has shrunk away almost to nothing." Willie Smith: "Perhaps, mamma, it came off the same sheep as my flannel did."

Nature Sure to Compensate.

ETHEL (looking at the statue of the Venus of Milo): "It seems to me, Maud, that the women in ancient times had larger waists than they have now!" Maud: "Well, perhaps the men had longer arms."

The Youthful Cynic.

LITTLE DICK: "You can say what you please about boys, but men is polite, anyhow. Men always gives up their seats to ladies." Little Dot: "That's cause sittin' down makes their trousers bag at the knees."

He Remained.

SHE (sadly): "Well, if we must part, let us part friends. Good-bye, and may all that's good go with you." He (decidedly): "If all that's good went with me you would not remain here." Then she smiled and laid her head on his shoulder, and he remained.

Not a Laughing Matter.

LITTLE JOHNNY: "That young man who comes to see you must be pretty poor company. He hasn't any sense of humour." Sister: "Why do you think so?" Little Johnny: "I told him all about the funny way you rush about and bang doors when you get in a temper, and he didn't laugh a bit."

Looking for Trouble.

LADY (to husband): "My dear, did you remember to order a ton of coal to-day?" Husband: "Yes." Lady: "And my shoes?" Husband: "Yes, and" (peering out of the window) "there is a truck backing up to the door now, but its too dark to see whether it has the coal or the shoes."

Not Very Substantial.

MR. NEWEDD: "How is that, my love? Nothing in the house to eat? I gave you money this morning." Mrs. Newedd: "Yes, I know; but I ran against the most exquisitely charming dinner gong—awfully fashionable, you know—and I couldn't resist the temptation to buy it." "But what shall we do for dinner?" "We can listen to the gong."

Just the Difference.

DAUGHTER (delightedly): "And did you really consent?" Father: "Consent? My stars! I had to. The man demanded your hand like a highwayman holding up a coach. Consent? My good gracious! I believe, from the way he looked and acted, he would have knocked me down if I hadn't." Daughter: "Oh, it can't be. You must have been dreaming. Why, when he proposed to me he trembled so that he could hardly speak, and he looked so weak and nervous I had to hurry up and say 'Yes' to keep him from fainting."

Saved and Lost.

"I HEAR Smith has got married to a Naples lady." "Yes; he went south to save his lungs and lost his heart."

The Cook's Question.

"I WONDER if his heart is fired—he calls here every night. I wonder—are his calls inspired by love or appetite?"

A Tedious Business.

JUDGE (to prisoner): "We are now going to read to you a list of your former convictions." Prisoner: "In that case perhaps your lordship will allow me to sit down."

The Initial Proceeding.

MR. BASHFUL: "If you were going to invite a young lady to go to the theatre, how would you begin?" Mr. Swiftly "By pawning my watch to pay for the tickets."

An Urgent Call.

SHE: "One of the legs of our sofa is broken. Will you come at once and mend it?" Carpenter: "I am very busy just now, miss. Won't to-morrow do?" "Oh, dear no. It must be ready by 7.30 this evening."

The Meanest Man.

PENDENNIS: "Who is the meanest man you know?" Warrington: "Old Closefist. Whenever there is a crowd at the railway booking-office he always gets on the outside, so as to be the last to part with his money."

Mr. Softly Left Hurriedly.

BOBBY: "My sister will be down in a few minutes, Mr. Softly; she's upstairs rehearsing." Mr. Softly: "W—what is s—she rehearsing, Bobby?" Bobby: "I don't know exactly; but she's standing in front of the mirror and blushing and saying, 'Oh, Mr. Softly—er—this is so sudden!'"

Agricultural.

THE meek young agriculturist had been talking with great frankness to the handsome young woman, but she didn't quite believe him. "Oh," she exclaimed, "you are chaffing me!" "My dear young lady," he responded, "you were never more mistaken. With wheat at its present price, it would be an insult to offer you chaff."

Amateur Golf.

FIRST YOUNG LADY (learning golf): "Dear me! What shall I do now? This ball is in a hole." Second Young Lady (looking over a book of instructions): "Let—me—see. I presume you will have to take a stick of the right shape to get it out." First Young Lady: "Oh, yes, of course, see if you can find one shaped like a dust-pan and brush."

His Mother Could.

A CONJURER was recently performing the old trick of producing eggs from a pocket-handkerchief, when he remarked to a little boy in fun: "I say, my boy, your mother can't get eggs without hens, can she?" "Of course she can," replied the boy. "Why, how is that?" asked the conjurer. "She keeps ducks!" replied the boy, amid roars of laughter.

Breaking it Gently.

"REALLY, Mr. Stalate," she protested, "you have given me four hours of your time this evening." "Why—er—upon my word! So I have. The hours pass like minutes when I am with you." "You were telling me that since your promotion your time is valuable." "Yes." "Well, papa doesn't allow me to accept expensive presents from young men."

Unpremeditated.

MAIDEN AUNT: "I hope you did not make any chance acquaintances in the train, Maud?" Miss Maud Brisk: "I am sorry to say, auntie, that I sat for a little time in the lap of an Episcopal bishop, and watched a stockbroker stand on his head in the lunch basket of a total stranger." Aunt: "Horrors, child, what can you mean?" Maud: "It was not premeditated, I assure you, Auntie; but when our train collided with another, we were so upset by the shock that we were hardly responsible for what we did."

Digitized by Google

In Search of an Heiress.

A Charming Little Story of a British Consul's Luck.

THE Hon. Philip Howard, bachelor, British Consul at Gon, never knew exactly how he succeeded in securing his appointment, but he did know that in applying for it, he had vaguely imagined that he was to have nothing to do except to draw his meagre salary and amuse himself. But, after six months at his post, he had made three important discoveries. Firstly, that there was a great deal of serious work to do; secondly, that he, being ignorant of the language, was absolutely incompetent to do it; and thirdly, that he was hopelessly in love with Mlle. Marcelle du Pont, the young lady whom he had engaged to teach him French. Marcelle du Pont was a sweet, gentle girl of twenty, with a fair face and a voice that breathed music. After the third lesson she saw the love-light in Philip's eyes.

"Mademoiselle," Philip said abruptly, "what is French for heart?"

"Cœur, monsieur," she replied.

"Bien," rejoined Philip; and how would you say 'with my whole heart?'"

"De tout mon cœur, monsieur," Marcelle answered demurely.

"And how would you say 'I love you?'"

"Je vous aime, monsieur."

"Good," cried Philip; then looking her squarely in the face, he said, "Mademoiselle, je vous aime de tout mon cœur."

"Monsieur's accent is very bad," observed Marcelle naively.

But that was five months ago. Last night under the silent stars she had said to him, "Oui, Philip, je t'adore," as only a French woman honestly in love could say it. Thus it was that Hon. Philip Howard, British Consul at Gon, on a salary of £300 a year, found himself engaged to be married to the prettiest and one of the poorest girls in French Switzerland, for Marcelle du Pont, although she gave music lessons, did not even own a piano. And, what was worse, Government changes were likely to take place in a few months, and Philip's tenure of office was already a dissolving view.

"It would be just like them to kick me out on my wedding-day," he groaned; "why haven't we got some money?" And Philip, with a heavy heart, turned to his London mail which had just arrived. Among other letters he found the following:

"London, Oct. 3, 189—. To the British Consul, Gon.

"DEAR SIR,—The late William Markham, a merchant of this city, received some fifteen years ago from one of your predecessors a communication in regard to the case of a child, Eva Cottram, whom it appears was deserted by her mother at Nice in 1878, and who was subsequently taken to Gon by the nurse to whom her mother had intrusted her. The grandfather of this girl has just died and left her the bulk of his estate amounting to about £50,000. If you can find any trace of her at Gon, or elsewhere, we would be greatly obliged if you would communicate at once with the undersigned.

"Yours very truly, BLAND AND JONES, Solicitors."

"Why didn't I find Eva Cottram, the heiress, and fall in love with her instead of Marcelle du Pont, French teacher of music and languages?" grumbled Philip. Then he went to his bookcase and took down the great record-book bearing on the outside page this descriptive title:

"Record of Births—Deaths—Marriages and Other Happenings of Personal Interest in the Consular District of Gon. From 1876 to 189—."

As he was looking through the index, the door of the consulate opened and Mlle. du Pont entered.

"It is time for your lesson, Monsieur," she said, with a certain gentle reserve which she always maintained with Philip when acting in her capacity as his French teacher, even in spite of their engagement.

"You must let the lesson go to-day and help me with something else," said Philip. "Read this," and he handed her the letter he had just received, which Marcelle read with undisguised interest.

"It is an opportunity to make some money if you find her, is it not, Philip?" she cried enthusiastically. "Certainly she would be generous if you should put such a great fortune into her hands."

"I hope so," said Philip. "I think I might legally ask at least three per cent.; that would be £1,500."

"We need fear nothing with £1,500 in the bank."

"No," said Philip, "but we haven't discovered the girl's whereabouts yet, and I doubt if we ever shall."

Meanwhile he had turned to page 106 of the big record book. Here he found the following entry:

"COTTRAM—June 13, 1878: Eva Cottram, two years of age, born at Lucerne of English parents as attested by her birth certificate, was this day brought to this Consulate by one Marie Barbier, of No. 3 Rue des Grottes, Gon, who states that she was formerly employed as 'gouvernante' at the Hotel des Anges, Nice; that on the 2nd day of March, 1878, there came to the hotel, Robert Cottram and Emily Cottram, his wife, and that they had with them their infant child, Eva; that they engaged her, the said Marie Barbier, as governess, and that she immediately entered into their service; that on the 6th day of April, Mr. and Mrs. Cottram left the hotel, saying they were going to Monte Carlo, that instead, they went to Paris; and from there wrote to her sending five hundred francs and begging her to keep their child until they came for it. They gave no explanation of their strange conduct, and in May, 1878, Marie Barbier saw an account of a railway wreck at Dijon, in France, and learnt that among the killed were Mr. and Mrs. Cottram. It is presumed that they were on their way back to Nice to get their child.

"(Signed) "BENJAMIN HEMMICK, Consul."

A second entry was as follows:

"August 3, 1878.—Since making the above entry, I have communicated with William Markham, in London, father of Mrs. Robert Cottram, telling him of the presence of his grandchild here and asking him what disposition he desired should be made of the little one. He answered me curtly, stating that his daughter had eloped with a blackguard, and that he would assume no responsibility for the fruit of such a marriage. Mademoiselle Marie Barbier agrees to keep the child upon condition that she may adopt it as her own, to which I have consented, and she now has it in her possession. She is an honourable and industrious woman with some savings of her own and a respectable home at No. 3 Rue des Grottes.

"(Signed) BENJAMIN HEMMICK. Consul."

"It is a very sad story," said Philip softly, as he finished reading the record aloud to Marcelle. "I hope I shall be able to find the poor girl; you must help me, Marcelle; we must look at once for Marie Barbier, the governess."

"I happen to know Mlle. Marie Barbier very well," said Marcelle quietly.

"What!" cried Philip. "Do you mean it?"

"Undoubtedly, monsieur," said Marcelle, "but she is no longer Marie Barbier; her name now is Marie Barbier du Pont. I have just left her, and she, too, had received a letter from London. She asked me to bring a paper and show you. Have the kindness to examine it, if you please."

"What is this?" cried Philip excitedly, as he hastily scanned the document which Marcelle had handed him.

"It is a birth certificate, Monsieur le Consul," answered Marcelle, "my own birth certificate. I am the adopted daughter of Marie Barbier du Pont," and as Philip read from the paper the name "Eva Cottram," she buried her head upon his shoulder and burst into tears. B. A. Ridgley.

Digitized by Google

NEW SERIAL STARTS IN THREE WEEKS' TIME.

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

By Henry Farmer.

Tom Jackson Supplies a Link to the Chain.

"AND that, gentlemen," said Crump, knocking the ashes out of his pipe, "represents my plan of campaign. I should be very grateful to either of you for any suggestions or improvements."

His two visitors shook their heads.

"Let it stand at that, Mr. Crump," said one of them, in a low voice.

After knocking, Mrs. Cobb entered with letters.

"The last post's just come in, Mr. Penworthy!"

"Thank you, Mrs. Cobb. We shall be going out after our suppers; but I have my key."

He sorted through his correspondence and selected a letter, addressed in pencil, and bearing the London post-mark. Its appearance suggested that it had been written under difficulties.

"From Grogan," said the little man, after Mrs. Cobb's departure. "Just listen to this, gentlemen: 'F. left his rooms this morning for Chancery Lane, and called in at Holbeck Chambers. Mr. Lewis Masters, Turf Accountant and Commission Agent not at home, but expected back to-morrow afternoon or evening. F. then proceeded to the Central Bank, and drew out about a hundred and fifty pounds in notes and gold. He is back at his rooms now. Am pencilling this not a stone's throw away.—G.'"

"It looks to me," commented Crump, as he tore up the letter, "very much as if there had been a split, and that Mr. Faversham meditates a trip abroad. This Mr. Lewis Masters, can either of you tell me anything about him?"

"H'm," said one of his visitors, "he does a big betting business. He calls himself Masters; but that's not his real name, and he's not an Englishman. He's a Dutchman, and his real name's Meister. He's got a partner who has offices at Flushing. A lot of English money goes over there."

"Exactly," said Crump thoughtfully. "Has Mr. Masters a clean sheet, do you know?"

"Yes, and no! He's never been convicted; but some little time ago he was brought up for paying a betting debt with bank-notes that had been stolen. However, he swore black and blue that they had come to him in the ordinary way of business, and there was no proof against him."

Crump's eyes seemed to light up suddenly. He opened his lips; then closed them with a snap. He had all but given utterance to a conclusion.

"Could you tell me," he said, after a pause, "what kind of a man this Masters is? I mean his character?"

"Well, I saw something of him when I was doing racecourse work. He's one of your blustering, bullying sort; but an arrant cur at heart."

"Thank you. That is a piece of information that may come in useful, if at some future time I should have dealings with him!"

"Mr. Crump," said the other detective eagerly, "might I ask what's passing through your mind?"

The little man hesitated.

"Wilcox," he said eventually, "if it should ultimately turn out that Mr. Lewis Masters was the medium through whom the diamonds and bank-notes, stolen from Mr. Mansfield's safe, were disposed, I should not be overwhelmed with surprise. But I will not commit myself further than this!"

There was a knock on the door, and Tom Jackson entered.

"Come in, Tom. Shut the door behind you. Let me introduce you. These two gentlemen, Inspectors Winton and Wilcox, have heard all about you and Fred."

Tom Jackson went stiff and saluted. They were great names, these! The inspectors nodded.

"Mr. Crump," said Winton, "has spoken very highly of you, Jackson."

The young constable flushed a little.

"Only carried out his orders, sir!"

"Anything to report, Tom?"

"I've just seen Railton. He's been questioning me about you, Mr. Crump!"

"Oh, indeed!" said the little man, a shadowy look of annoyance flitting across his face.

"Said he'd heard that Fred and I were chummy with you, and wanted to know what sort you were?"

"And you said?"

Tom flushed again.

"Well, you see, having an idea that he was a bit suspicious, I—I said, well, I said——"

Crump was chuckling now.

"Out with it, Tom!"

"Well, I said that you were a good-hearted, but rather a stupid old buffer!"

Crump threw himself back in his chair, and laughed himself red in the face.

"Good, Tom," he chuckled, "good! Stupid old buffer—good, very good indeed!"

Poor Tom looked very uncomfortable indeed.

"Then," he went on, "he wanted to know if you have ever been connected with the police force in any way!"

"And you said, Tom?"

"Nothing for a bit. I just laughed. That seemed to reassure him. Then I said that you'd no more been a policeman, than he, Railton, had been a cracksman. Then he laughed. And then, well, I spun a bit of a yarn about you having spent most of your life in the country, flower and fruit growing. And somehow, when I parted with him, he seemed happier in his mind."

Crump and the inspectors sighed in unison, sighs of relief.

"Anything else, Tom?"

"Nothing to do with The Firs; but you've heard me talk of old Rumbey that sometimes goes on the drink for a fortnight at a time, and prefers sleeping in ditches and hedges and the hollows of trees to a decent bed? He was so bad this evening that I had to take him to the station. It was a bit difficult to catch what he was saying, but it seems that he was sleeping in the wood that night poor Vance was drowned, and he kept on mumbling——"

Crump's eyes were glowing like stars.

"What?" he said sharply.

"Mind you, he's very much the worse for liquor; but he kept on mumbling something to the effect that he was in the wood on the night that Vance was drowned, and that if he had cared to come forward at the inquest, he could have told coroner and jury something that would have opened their eyes for them, and given them something to think about; but when I asked what it might be, he turned nasty and showed fight. He's a queer sort, old Rumbey: He's thought by many not to be right in his head, and when he's in liquor, he carries on like a madman. They say that, many years ago, he was crossed in love, and that was what made him take to drink, and living like some wild man of the woods. They call him 'Old Hedgehog' in the village."

Digitized by Google

"And," questioned Crump, "he made no more definite statement than what you have just told us?"

"No."

"He will be brought up before the magistrates to-morrow?"

"Yes. It will be a matter of fourteen days."

Crump glanced at the inspectors.

"We shall know where to look for him then, and, perhaps, when he is sober, we shall be able to extract something more definite from him. I am much obliged to you, Tom, for this piece of information. It may prove that you have supplied me with a very much wanted missing link; though I mustn't allow myself to be too sanguine. Drunken men are prone to make irresponsible statements; yet it is remarkable how Rumbey's statement, vague as it is, corroborates certain discoveries and suspicions of mine."

He glanced again at the inspectors, who nodded significantly.

"But I think the time has come to enlighten you, Tom."

As yet Jackson knew nothing of Crump's suspicions on the subject of how Vance had met her death, nor of his investigations and discoveries; but before he left the cottage, he had been enlightened.

"A promising young fellow," said Crump, after his departure, "he and that rascally young nephew of mine are great favourites with me." He glanced at his watch. And now gentlemen, I think we have time to smoke one more pipe in comfort before sallying forth. The fact that Mr. Seaton Revelle is supposedly indisposed with influenza inclines me to think that we may not pass a fruitless night. But perhaps you would prefer cigars. Personally, I'm going to indulge in a strong cup of tea; but there is whisky on the premises for those who prefer it."

The inspectors voted for tea also. Mrs. Cobb had retired to bed, before Crump, having turned out the light, quietly led the way out of the cottage. The three men made their way towards The Firs together, only separating, according to a pre-arranged plan, when the building loomed out indistinctly through the dark, to take up their respective stations.

"I sincerely trust," were Crump's last words before parting with his colleagues, "that our efforts to-night will be attended with success!"

SEATON REVELLE GETS UP AT MIDNIGHT.

THROUGHOUT the day Revelle had kept to his bed. The local doctor, who had been summoned, was rather puzzled as to the exact nature of his complaint, owing to the fact that his pulse was normal, and there was no feverishness; but his complainings of aching limbs and a violent headache, and "influenza" being a safe card for a doctor to play when in doubt, he had played it, as Revelle fully intended him to do. After the doctor's departure, Revelle had cracked a bottle of champagne, and smoked a couple of the cigars that were so highly approved of by Railton. This helped to while away the monotony of his self-imposed imprisonment.

He felt in need of a stimulant. He was conscious of a sense of failure; he was uneasy in his mind about Benny Beard. The languid air of unconcern that he had worn in the presence of his one-time partner had been a finely-assumed mask. Men's consciences, he repeatedly told himself, were uncertain, treacherous things sometimes. He regretted now that he had not come to a more definite understanding with Benny before his departure. And it was Esther that had awakened Benny's conscience. He felt the irony of it all, and inwardly writhed. It added to his bitterness. She had fooled him, he told himself, now she had caused a breach, possibly a dangerous breach, between him and his former partner and tool.

"When I've pulled off to-night's little business," he muttered half-aloud, "and if all goes well—pah! It's sure to go off all right; I've never yet made a mistake—I'll give Benny a look up, and have another little chat with him. He's not anything like such an arrant cur as Railton; but he isn't extraordinarily courageous. I'll rub it into him pretty severely. No. I don't think he would have the pluck to round on me, unless——"

He ground his teeth. But that was not likely to happen. He would not be likely to come in contact with Esther again. She was the danger. Those dark eyes of hers, with their wistful, unforgetting look might have a weakening, demoralising effect on Benny.

"He was always talking about them," he muttered irritably; "there's a wretched strain of maudlin sentimentalism in the fellow, and—that's the danger; but they're not likely to meet."

He rang the bell, and ordered Railton to bring him another bottle of champagne.

"You'll pardon me, sir, won't you? But is it advisable?" said the smooth-faced valet, a world of apology in his voice; "you have such a strenuous task before you to-night. Might I suggest, sir—I trust you will forgive the impertinence—that you refrain from further stimulant now; but, just before setting out, take one glass of champagne, with a dash of cognac in it."

Revelle laughed good-humouredly.

"You're a splendid servant, Railton. Your solicitude is almost paternal. You're quite right, though. And, Railton, when everything is settled up, you will find that I haven't forgotten you."

"Thank you, sir!"

"No," said Railton, on his return to the servants' quarters, "the master is anything but well. I hope the doctor's medicine will arrive soon."

The other servants retired to bed shortly after ten o'clock that night; Railton, having stated his intention of sitting up for some time at least, returned to his master's bedroom.

"Railton," said his master drowsily, "I'm going to put in a couple of hours' sleep; come and wake me at a quarter-past twelve."

"Very good, sir!"

Revelle was sleeping very peacefully when at the appointed time Railton crept silently into the room.

"Quarter-past twelve, sir!"

Then, having carefully drawn to the curtains so as to prevent even a stray beam of light stealing out, he turned up the gas. A very perfect servant he was!

"I had quite a shock to-day, sir," he whispered, as he took a dark suit from a chest of drawers, "but I am thankful to say that my apprehensions were groundless."

"Oh, indeed?"

"Yes, sir, I was talking to Banks, the gardener at the Woodlands, when I caught sight of a figure that recalled most unpleasant reminiscences; but I ascertained that it was Penworthy, the landscape gardener, who is responsible for the alterations to Mr. Mansfield's garden, but, at the time, sir, he reminded me most uncomfortably of Crump, formerly chief inspector of Scotland Yard. You know this Penworthy, sir?"

Revelle gave vent to a low laugh.

"Of course, yes! A most homely, harmless little fellow."

He laughed again.

"So he reminded you of your old acquaintance, Crump, did he? That must have been painful, Railton!"

"Most painful, sir!" answered the man with a little shiver, "And I did not feel quite happy in my mind till I met my young, unsophisticated constable-friend Jackson, who is acquainted with Penworthy, and who removed the last doubt from my mind."

While speaking he had been assisting his master to dress. Revelle was wearing black clothes. A black silk scarf took

Digitized by Google

OUT OF GREAT TRIBULATION.

Our Powerful Serial.

the place of a collar. Railton helped him into an Inverness coat.

"The keys, Railton!"

The valet slipped a hand into his pocket, and drew out a small wash-leather bundle. Taking it from him, Revelle unrolled it, and examined a number of newly-made keys. Railton had obtained wax impressions of the principal locks at The Towers. These had been forwarded by post to a certain locksmith acquaintance of his.

"They are excellent!" muttered Revelle approvingly.

From his waistcoat pocket Railton drew out another, and very small key.

"The key of the safe, sir! It is not, as you are aware, a combination lock."

Revelle retired into his dressing-room. On his return, he carried a small hand-bag.

"And now, Railton, I think that's everything."

"Yes, sir. You know, sir, that you have my very best wishes for your complete success."

The two figures that, a few moments later, passed down the stairs, might have been ghosts, they moved so silently. Reaching a small, side gate that led out into the garden, Railton unlocked it, and slipped back the bolts. Revelle, his coat-collar upturned, his soft felt hat drawn down over his eyes, passed out. Railton locked the door behind him.

Revelle, as he walked away rapidly and silently, was conscious of a thrill of exhilaration. He was confident of success; perhaps he would have felt less confident had he seen the shadow that had risen up from out the shrubs behind him, and was creeping along in his wake, every whit as silently as himself—the man whom, but a brief while ago, he had described as a most homely, harmless, little fellow. A few yards along the main road; then he climbed a stile, and struck across fields. After nearly an hour's sharp walking, Normanhurst Towers loomed out, grim and indistinct, through the darkness. The ghostly silence that prevailed was only broken by a distant clock striking the half-hour.

Thanks to Railton's plans and his own personal knowledge, Revelle was completely informed concerning the interior of the house. He made his way round to a side-door. A moment's pause to listen, then, having taken from his bag a small lantern, he lighted it with a silent match. One of the well-greased keys turned the lock. But the door was bolted on the inside.

Revelle smiled softly to himself. He had come prepared for this contingency. He carried in his bag a little invention of Benny's, unpatented, in the shape of a long, thin piece of steel, with a hinge in the centre and a prong at the end.

Thrusting it under the door, he pressed a spring attached to the instrument, and the prong, rising up, caught the knob of the bolt within. By pushing the instrument along, he was enabled to draw back the bolt. The door was now unlocked and unbolted; but there was still a heavy chain to be dealt with. Silently opening the door a couple of inches, he thrust in the steel instrument, and switched the chain off its hook. Once within, he closed to the door, and made his way into the great, oak-panelled hall. He was absolutely calm and self-possessed.

Up the broad, oak staircase, he stole silently as a shadow. Reaching the landing above, he paused for a moment to listen. No sound broke the stillness. Half-way down a long corridor, he paused again outside a door, drew out a key, unlocked it. The silence with which the man worked was truly marvellous. The room entered was a dressing-room, a door leading from it into the bedroom beyond. In one corner stood a small, but massive safe. From the next room came the sound of breathing. The safe contained the Normanhurst jewels. Revelle, holding the lantern in a grip firm and steady as a rock, fitted the key that Railton had obtained for him into the lock. The next moment, the door swung back on its well-oiled hinges. No sound escaped his lips as his eyes fell on the glittering gems that lined the shelves—tiaras, pendants, bracelets, and necklaces, thousands of pounds' worth of heirlooms. A few seconds later, his bag was full.

Everything had been carefully thought out. Before leaving the room, Revelle locked the safe. Outside, he relocked the door. Once outside the Towers, he behaved with the same deliberation. Having relocked the side door, he put back the bolt by means of the steel instrument. Except for the hanging chain, which it was impossible to replace, and which might have been left unfastened through the carelessness of a servant, he had left behind him no trace to show that the house had been broken into. It was quite possible, he told himself, that the robbery might remain undiscovered for two or three days. It was characteristic of the man's coolness that, before extinguishing the lantern, he first lighted a cigarette by it. The bag he carried contained enough to keep him going like a gentleman for a matter of four or five years. The morrow's evening would see the jewels handed over to Masters, who would leave the same night for Holland. The cheques that he would be presently paying into his bank, would arouse no suspicion, coming from a well-known commission agent. He himself was known to be a racing man. Only two shadows marred the rosy sky of the future—Esther and Benny! He was not given to throw up the sponge; but he despaired now of winning Esther. He could not altogether shake off the haunting thought that Benny might be meditating treachery.

But he was, even now, reckoning without his host in the shape of a little man who was not more than ten yards away from him.

It was close upon four o'clock when Railton, standing behind the side-door at The Firs, heard a faint, scratching sound outside. Noiselessly opening the door, he admitted his master.

"All well, sir?" questioned the valet.

"Quite," came back the low answer, "perfect! Not a hitch from beginning to end."

"Will you allow me, sir, to offer you my heartiest congratulations!"

"Thank you, Railton. 'Pon my word, I do really feel rather pleased with myself to-night!"

Shortly after the two men had passed upstairs, a shadow stole out from the grounds of The Firs; then a second; then a third.

"An eventful night," whispered a voice, "and—I must give the devil his due—a most skilful and masterly performance. I think, gentlemen, it is quite safe for us to return to Woodbine Cottage for two or three hours. Given a little more rope, and I think that Mr. Seaton Revelle will most effectually hang himself. No train stops at Warham before eight o'clock."

"Well, how are we this morning?" said the doctor, as he was ushered by Railton into Revelle's bed-room.

"Miles better, doctor. That medicine of yours has worked wonders. I slept like a top, and woke up with all my aches and pains gone. I'm very grateful to you. I've an appointment in town this evening, and I should have been awfully disappointed if I couldn't have kept it."

"This place," said the doctor presently, "is getting very popular with artists. I passed a fellow outside here as I came along and he was making a very presentable sketch of The Firs."

"Ah, yes. It's a favourite subject. No end of fellows paint it. Then, doctor, there's no objection to me going up to town?"

"No; if you feel up to it, certainly not!"

When the doctor left The Firs, the artist was still hard at work upon his sketch. It was one of Crump's visitors.

"Railton," said Revelle, "nothing has been missed at The Towers yet?"

"Evidently not, sir; or we should have heard something to that effect from the doctor."

Digitized by Google

"When the loss is discovered, it will cause a considerable amount of sensation."

"Yes, sir; and will be most interesting to see what theories will be advanced by the police."

Railton paused for a moment.

"Pardon me, sir, but might I ask if you parted on friendly terms with Mr. Faversham? I was considerably startled when you informed me that he had withdrawn from this venture."

Revelle glanced rather sharply at his servant. Was he anxious, too?

"Of course, sir, I never saw very much of Mr. Faversham; but I do not think that he was very favourably disposed towards me; perhaps, in consequence of that, I am somewhat prejudiced against him; but I presume he is absolutely to be relied upon?"

"I think so, Railton," he replied slowly. "In any case, I shall be seeing him some time this evening, and shall be having a talk with him."

"I am glad to hear that, sir! And at what time do you think you will be leaving for London?"

"I don't know—some time this evening."

"There's a very good train at six thirty-five, sir."

"That will do. I want you to take a telegram for me."

The telegram was addressed to Masters, Chancery Lane, and made an appointment for that evening. Railton, on his way to the post office, passed the artist, and glanced over his shoulder at his sketch. It really was remarkably good. At Scotland Yard it was firmly believed that, though up to the present he had been unsuccessful in his efforts, Inspector Winton would achieve the distinction of having a picture hung in the Royal Academy.

Reaching the village post-office, Railton copied the message on to a telegraph form. The pencil he wrote with was hard, and sharply pointed. He was still writing, when a man entered and bought some stamps. When Railton moved away from the box-like place reserved for the writing of telegrams, the man stepped up to it, bent down, and seemed to be writing a message.

"Mr. Crump's conclusions," said Inspector Wilcox, when, a few moments after Railton, he left the post office, "look like being confirmed in a remarkable manner."

In his pocket he carried a telegraph form. It bore a legible impression of the message dispatched by Railton. When he reached Woodbine Cottage, Crump was reading for a second time a letter from Esther that had arrived by the first post. She was, she wrote, over so much better. So much so that she was travelling up to London with her father, who was obliged to come to town on business. He had tried to dissuade her; but she had insisted. Of course, Mr. Crump would understand why they were not coming to The Woodlands. They were going to take rooms at the Hotel Royal. Would it be possible for him to come and see them there? She longed to see him. There was much else besides.

"It is a brave letter," said the little man to himself, "they will reach London some time to-day. No, I'm afraid to-day will be impossible for me! Ah, Wilcox!"

"Mr. Revelle," said the inspector, producing a telegraph form, "leaves this evening for London by the six thirty-five train, and has made an appointment to meet Lewis Masters at eight thirty. Mr. Crump, it looks as if your conclusions are going to work out like a mathematical equation."

Crump took the telegraph form, and glanced at it. He realised.

"Wilcox," he said, his eyes twinkling approbation, "you've done a very smart piece of work this morning!"

"Winton is still sketching near The Firs!"

"Good! We, too, Wilcox, will be travelling up by the six thirty-five train. I hope you don't disapprove of my policy, Wilcox; but not only do I want to bag the lot of them, including Mr. Masters; but I want conclusive proof of Scarsdale's innocence. And it is this man Masters from whom I expect to obtain it!"

(The result of Mr. Crump's journey to London will be told next week.)

Strange Ways of Sleeping.

The Chinese and Japanese sleep on a hard wooden pillow. The Laplander sleeps in a bag of reindeer skin. Russians in winter sleep on stone slabs resting on stoves. Most people sleep soundly for several hours at a stretch. Where this sleep cannot be obtained, depend upon it the digestive organs and liver are wrong, and that a course of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans should be taken without delay.

Mrs. W. Davidson, of Dunhead Farm, Monikie, near Dundee, says: "Indigestion and biliousness robbed me of sound sleep and made both day and night miserable. What with a splitting headache, pains across the shoulders, and extremely severe pains in the sides of my stomach, accompanied by giddiness and general debility, I have suffered to an extent which no one can imagine. A doctor in Alyth once told me that the biliousness and indigestion were of too long standing to be cured. Then, one of my sons heard of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. I tried a box, and after a few doses I got a night's undisturbed sleep—the first for twenty years! As I took the beans I got better and better, and now I am glad to say I am quite cured." Bile Beans are stocked by all chemists at one and three half-pence or two and nine a box. They cure sleeplessness, headache, female ailments, debility, anæmia, indigestion, and all liver and kidney ailments. Upon receipt of price you may obtain a box from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, E.C., post free. Mention this to sleepless friends.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

If She Had Been Faithful.

Telling of a Sacrifice for Love and its Reward.

Two of the prison warders meeting in the corridor stopped for a moment.

"Doesn't one of your men finish this week?"

"Yes, this is his cell," said the other warder, tapping the wall. "He's due out to-morrow morning, but you'd think he was in for life to judge by his face. I fancy he's fretting about something. Look here—quietly."

They advanced to the movable panel and slid it silently back. The prisoner sat upon the edge of his bed, gazing towards a narrow, barred window, through which a sunbeam slanted across the floor. His face was pale and listless, his head drooped in a sort of hopeless patience.

But all the time his brain was working, and fretting in a very maelstrom of despair. The knowledge that he was to be released the following morning gave him neither pain nor pleasure. They might open the doors and send him into the world again, but they could not rescue him from his own thoughts. Nobody could do that now.

If only she had remained faithful—he had taken her brother's guilt—he had wrecked his own honour in the eyes of the world, and for what—his thoughts plodded wearily back to their starting point. If she had remained faithful he could have borne it all, he thought wistfully.

But neither letter nor message had come from her—she was like the rest—she had deserted him.

The church bells ringing for evensong, crashed brutally into his reflections and drove home the hopeless lesson he had been learning so long—a year—two years—he scarcely knew how long he had been in prison. His despair found utterance at last. He stretched his arms passionately towards the window and burst into a wild fit of weeping that shook him from head to foot.

"It's for a lass, I reckon," whispered one of the warders gently. "Come away, Jack, tisn't fair to watch him, and we can't help."

* * * * * *

The next morning opened out clear and bright, with just sufficient breeze to keep the air cool. A little rain which had fallen during the early morning, had cleaned the streets, and the warm sunshine soon dried them.

When Will Seddon came out he felt dazzled for a moment. The keen light beat full upon him, as though it would expose his haggard face and general look of neglect and loneliness. A man approached as though he wished to speak, but the other shrank back and hurried towards a side street. The very idea of companionship was inexpressibly distasteful to him. The world had cast him away, had deserted him.

A passing cab driver pulled up his horse suddenly in obedience to a signal from the fare. The animal fell back upon its haunches, striking fire from the stones.

As for Seddon, he raised his arms weakly to defend himself, and then, finding he was still unhurt, went uncomplainingly forward.

But at the same moment a girl of about twenty-three or four years of age, opened the door of the cab, and jumped lightly to the ground. In a moment she had reached him.

He turned round and gazed at her with a look in which amazement, hope, fear, and doubt were all blended. The phrase that had haunted him for two years rose slowly in his mind.

"Oh, if only you had remained faithful," he muttered, with a sob, "I could have borne it all."

"But, Will, I have been faithful, and I never doubted your innocence, although I only knew a few days ago who was the guilty one. I had brain fever during your trial. When I wrote to you afterwards my mother intercepted the letters, and destroyed them."

"She intercepted them?"

"She thought you were guilty."

"When I taxed your brother with his guilt, he said the knowledge would break his mother's heart, and then, for her sake and yours, I took his place," he said simply.

"He went to Australia after the trial. Nothing seemed to prosper with him, and he sank lower and lower, and died there in poverty and loneliness a few months ago. He wrote to mother and confessed everything."

"And is your mother——"

"She is at home waiting for us." She led him gently towards the cab. "She has nearly cried herself to death about you, so you'll be kind to her for my sake."

"I can feel kindly towards anybody now," he said wistfully.

They took their places in the cab. Her head sank upon his shoulder, and then to his own great astonishment he found himself whispering words which he thought he had forgotten for ever. The shadows rolled swiftly from his mind, and sorrow and despair fled before the new born happiness. To have complete faith in just one person, this is half the battle of life.

Wal Frank.

NOTE.

A Specimen Copy will be sent you gratis on application to the Editor, "The Big Budget," 28 Maiden Lane, London, W.C.

THE BIG BUDGET SERIALS
COMPLETE STORIES
SCREAMINGLY FUNNY SKETCHES
EVERY THURSDAY ONE PENNY ONLY
THE GREAT HOME COMIC & STORY PAPER

Digitized by Google

Testing the Hearing.

"The Journal for the Deaf" contains in the July number a description of the proper way to test the hearing, written in such clear language as to be of the utmost value to those who suspect that their hearing power is diminishing. There are also a series of plain talks on the prevention of ear diseases, the care of the ears, and a description of the new treatment for deafness, the Drouet Method, which is gaining a great reputation for restoring the hearing in cases where other forms of treatment have failed. A free copy of "The Journal" may be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, Regent's Park Road, London, N.W. A special feature of the "Journal" is the enclosure of a Patient's Report Form, by means of which anyone can obtain full particulars and free advice as to the use of the treatment in their own case.

FOURPENCE

- - BUYS - -

The ✲ Royal ✲ Magazine

For OCTOBER.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Supplied for use in the Field Hospitals of H.I.M. The King of Greece, the Red Cross Society in the South African War, the Anglo-Chinese Hospitals, &c., &c.

Recommended by many medical men, including Dr. Alexander, M.D., Dr. Thompson, M.D., Dr. Boyd Williams, M.D., &c., &c.

There is no similar preparation, nor anything as good.

All leading Chemists sell it at 1/-, packet of 18 doses, or for 12 stamps, from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield.

BORAX Starch Glaze.

Facsimile Packet.

In Id. packets at all Grocers'.

Brilliant results are always attained when the laundress uses Borax Starch Glaze in getting up the starched things. There is no excuse nowadays for dull and flabby linen.

Borax Starch Glaze gives just that difference in appearance that smart men and women appreciate.

If you are dissatisfied with the finish of your starched wear, one penny packet of Borax Starch Glaze will effect the desired improvement and make yours equal to the best you meet.

It considerably eases the tedium of ironing, too. Good laundresses give it all the credit.

Write to-day for free sample.

Name S.S.

By Special Appointment Makers to the King.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT CUT-PICTURE COMPETITION.

PICTURE No. 1.

Twenty-five Awards of Valuable Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find fifty-four pictorial squares, which when placed together in their proper position will form a complete picture.

Each square is numbered; that, however, has nothing to do with their correct position, of course. What we want you to do is to cut the jumble below into the fifty-four squares and carefully paste the squares in their correct order on to a sheet of paper.

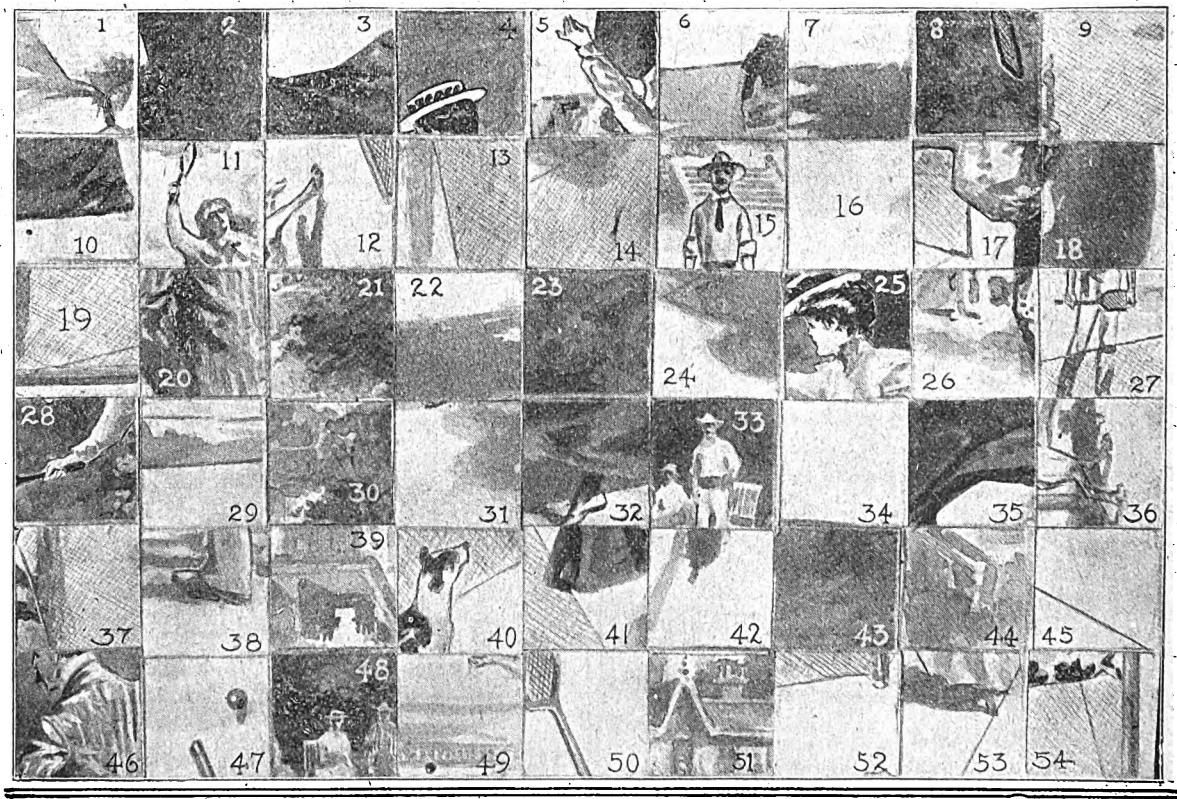
When you have pasted up the complete picture keep it carefully until we tell you in next week's Short Stories what to do with it.

Do not on any account send it in to us before you are told to do so.

The twenty-five prize-winners will each be presented with a Handsome Gramophone.

These machines are beautifully made, fit to grace any drawing-room, an everlasting source of amusement. With these Gramophones will be given two records.

The Gramophone is one of the most delightful companions for the long winter evenings. None of your friends can talk like a talking machine can, and give you the same amount of fun as it produces. It is the very essence of good and genial companionship, which never tires you. What it says, or what it sings, is always interesting. Once you have heard it you want always to hear it, and it is ever ready and willing to oblige.



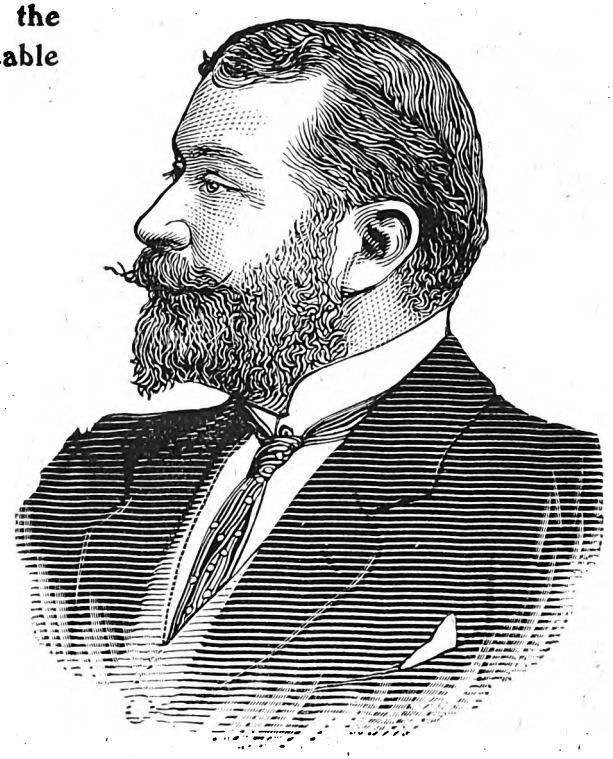
Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Get your hair back, Put your hair right, Keep your hair right with

"TATCHO"

Many will tell you that "Tatcho" is the only remedy they have found serviceable after years of trying.



The Hon. Mrs. GORDON writes:

"The Hon. Mrs. Gordon has derived much benefit from 'Tatcho.'—3 Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, August 28th, 1902."

LADY SYKES writes:

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALŒLOGUE writes:

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account.—Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N., writes:

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER writes:

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

Major-General KEATE writes:

"I find the Renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

Colonel PERRY writes:

"My Dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER writes:

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is. — Zetland House, Maidenhead."

A 4/6 full size Bottle for 1/10 carriage paid,

Is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "TATCHO" Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct from the "TATCHO" DEPOT, LINCOLN'S INN, LONDON.

"TATCHO" is a delightful Preparation, the colour of whisky, free from all smell, neither greasy nor sticky.

"TATCHO" will entirely banish that dead and dingy look of the hair.

"TATCHO" will ward off the approach of greyness.

"TATCHO" is invaluable to those suffering from actual loss of hair and who need a powerful stimulant to force fresh growth.

"TATCHO" is not a dye, and contains no harmful ingredient.

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles, at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/- New South Wales Depot, Vickery Chambers, 76 Pitt Street, Sydney.

Digitized by Google

CUTLERY.

MASTERS' "MONSTRE" PARCEL

50 High-Class Articles For 25/-

EACH PARCEL Prices separate.

CONTAINS:	s.	d.
6 Good Quality Table Knives	3	6
6 " " Dessert Knives	3	0
6 "Warewhite" Table Forks	5	3
6 " Dessert Forks	3	0
2 " Table Spoons	1	9
6 " Dessert Spoons	3	9
6 " Tea Spoons ...	2	0
1 Pair " Sugar Tongs	1	6
1 only " Sugar Sifter	1	6
6 " Egg Spoons	1	6
2 " Salt Spoons	1	0
2 " Mustard Spoons	1	0

Sent to any address on approval on receipt of 2/6

IF satisfactory, you send a further 2/6 on receipt, and complete purchase in monthly payments of 5/- each.

OR if you send the full balance WITHIN SEVEN DAYS, we will give you a handsome BREADKNIFE as Cash Discount.

MONEY REFUNDED IN FULL if Parcel is not approved of, and is returned to us AT ONCE.

Methwold, Norfolk.—Dear Sirs,—I received the Cutlery and am very pleased with it. I wish to say that everything I have had from you has given the greatest satisfaction.—F. R. WOODWARD

CATALOGUE containing thousands of designs of WATCHES, CLOCKS, CUTLERY, PLATE, &c., Post Free to any address.

J. N. MASTERS LTD.,
157 HIGH ST., RYE, SUSSEX

The PRINCE OF WALES says:

"WAKE UP, ENGLAND."

DON'T PURCHASE FOREIGN POLISHES.

"MATCHLESS"

METAL POLISH.

POLISH, TINS & BOXES ARE ALL MADE AT OUR OWN WORKS IN LIVERPOOL.

By PURCHASING this POLISH you are Supporting BRITISH TRADE.

Should you have any difficulty in obtaining supplies, two 6½d. Tins will be sent Post Free (with address of nearest Dealer) on receipt of 1/-

MANUFACTURERS:
THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

MACKINTOSH'S

is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere. A very Large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

EVERY WISE WOMAN
Will Insist on Having

CROSFIELD'S PURE CANE SUGAR

Sweeter and More Economical than Common Beet Sugars. It Produces NO Fermentation. The Best Sugar for Household Purpose. Write for Name of Nearest Agent to CROSFIELD'S LTD., Sugar Refiners, LIVERPOOL.

"MENE" clothing Houses and No. 1, 1/-; 1 doz. No. 3, 1/6; post free. No. 1 sent post free to any lady mentioning this paper.

Ladies say these Towels are superior to all other makes for cleanliness, comfort, and economy. May be obtained from all Under-Chemists, or 2 doz. No. 2, 1/-; 1 doz. A Free Sample of SANITARY TOWEL FOR LADIES.

MISS HAYNES,
55 Fann St., London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

THE DAINTY HOME FICTION PAPER.

No. 717.] Week ending September 27th, 1902. [One Penny.

She sprang forward, clothed in her bridal dress, yellow with age. "Twenty-five years ago you left me on my wedding-morn! But it was only a test of my love! I knew you would come back to me!"

Digitized by Google

A KODAK for 5/-

The No. 1 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 2½ by 2½ Inches.

Despite its small size and low price the No. 1 BROWNIE is a thoroughly efficient little camera, and yields photographs as clear and distinct as possible. No dark room is needed for changing the films. In use the Brownie Kodak is simplicity itself.

THE NEW BROWNIE KODAK

The No. 2 . .

BROWNIE.

Gives Pictures 3¼ by 2¼ Inches.

MARVELLOUS VALUE PRICE 10/- ONLY.

Finders for vertical and horizontal pictures. Everset time and instantaneous shutter. New and convenient spool-holding devices. Improved non-detachable winding key. Loaded and unloaded in daylight.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue of all Photographic Dealers or of

KODAK LTD., 43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, London, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, London, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, London, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, London, W.; 40 West Strand, W.C.

"LET'S TALK OF GRAVES"

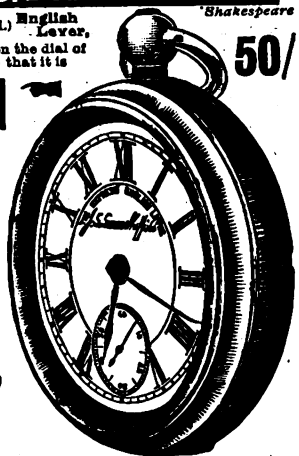
Shakespeare

'EXPRESS' (Regd.) English Lever.

That word "Express" on the dial of a watch is a guarantee that it is

BRITISH

50/



Manufacture throughout, and NOT a foreign-made movement in English Cases.

TERMS. Send 5/- and the watch will be forwarded to you. If satisfied, complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of the same amount.

If not satisfied, return the watch, and your deposit will be refunded.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Electro-plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

NOSE

RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (BT), Specialist South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc.

The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money, and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment.

EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

SHAW'S GIFT Free This Handsome Blouse

In order to clear out the Remainder of a Bankrupt Stock of Costume Cloths, we will send a tailor-made Costume Skirt in Navy or Black for the small sum of 5/0, or two for 9/6, carriage paid on all goods, and we will include with each skirt free of all charge, a handsome

5/- Two for 9/6. carr. paid.

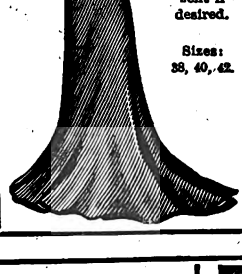
SILKETTE BLOUSE with a Detachable Collar, equal in appearance to silk, and wearing twice as long. These skirts are cut in the very Latest Fashion.



Patterns sent if desired.

Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

SEND AT ONCE, in order to secure this great bargain, as after present stock is exhausted this offer cannot be repeated. Money returned if not satisfied. Address—

SHAW & CO., The London Tailors, (Dept Sh. S.), 6 LOVE LANE, WOOD ST., LONDON, E.C.

MINERS USE THEM.

SYMONDS' CYCLES.

All classes of riders use Symonds' Cycles. They are the cheapest fully warranted cycles in the world, and are in favour everywhere. Adapted to fast and easy riding on rough roads. Prices £4 to £8. Easy payments. We will deal with you by post as well as if you call on us. Catalogue with 1,000 testimonials posted free

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 City Road, London, E.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee — it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

SHORT STORIES

No. 717. ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending September 27th, 1902.

FAITHFUL UNTO DEATH.

A Powerful Story Telling of a Deserted Bride.

It had snowed for two days incessantly.

Grayson's eyes rested upon the scene thoughtfully. His hands were thrust deep into his pockets. Occasionally he shivered with the cold that crept in between the cracks of the ill-fitting window. The sensation of hunger gnawed at his stomach. The man had eaten nothing since the day before. Finally he laughed.

"I'm beaten, that's about the truth of it. I'm hungry and cold. I haven't a penny. I've pawned everything I possess, yet I am fortified against the world with a profession—a profession—Heavens! I'd sell all I know of it for one good, filling dinner."

It had been a hopeless, merciless struggle from the beginning, yet in those first months of misfortune Grayson had remained unbroken in courage. Even when his father had gone Grayson had risen stoically above his grief. Once, years before, Grayson had watched his father drag himself by the strength of stupendous will above a heart-breaking despair. It appeared unfair then that a beloved wife and mother had been taken away. She had been so dear to them both; so necessary to the very existence they led. Yet probably because of this one fact, from the moment of her death, father and son had become inseparable.

But now it was the ending of everything—all at a stroke. There was no longer any future, any hope, any fight, any chance at all. He was homeless, friendless, penniless and hungry—fearfully hungry.

About nine o'clock the man fumbled his way to the table in the centre of the room and lighted a gas jet overhead. Then he went to his cupboard, getting out the roll and the tea, handling both cautiously. He poured some water into a tin mug, put in the tea leaves, and stood on a chair to steep the mixture over the flickering light.

While the man was drinking his hot tea without sugar or milk, soaking the crusts of the one hard roll every now and then to make it more palatable, a rap sounded on his door.

"Come in," he cried, rising and looking expectantly at the door.

It was his landlady—shambling, ungainly, but very sympathetic.

"Doctor, it's a call for you, but I wouldn't advise you to take it."

Grayson listened with eager intentness. "A call, Mrs. McIntyre?"

"Yes, sir, but I wouldn't take it."

A sudden wave of relief smote the man. "That would not be professional; but why wouldn't you take it?" He could afford to be curious.

"Because it's from over there"—the woman jerked her thumb.

All rights reserved.]

For a moment, in spite of himself, a queer chill ran up Grayson's spine, settling itself somewhere in the base of his brain. She referred to the house of preposterous mystery.

"Over there?" he repeated slowly.

"Yes, sir; they're in a hurry, too."

"Say that I will come—at once."

Crossing the street was a struggle—literally a hand-to-hand battle with the storm. Once at the door of the house the man paused, exhausted and panting. He was weak from want of food and numbed from an all-day's chill. After a moment he straightened up and rang the bell.

The wire grated harshly. Somewhere in the distance, like a phantom sound, he heard the vibration of striking metal. When the door was opened Grayson faced a tall, lean, hard-mouthed woman. She barred the way.

"I am the doctor from across the street," he volunteered.

"What do you want?" she demanded.

"Someone came for me. I understand my services are needed here."

Grayson's elation was falling.

"Well, you can go back. We don't——"

Before the woman finished a scream rang through the house—a scream that rose above the cry of the wind and came to them a fearful, paralysing sound. In the stillness that followed, Grayson's jaded senses became alert. There was no longer any hesitation.

"I am needed here. Stand out of my way." He put his one empty hand on the woman's shoulder, making her stagger under the grip. Immediately he slipped into the hall, letting the door fly to with a jar that shook the house. Before the last echo died away a young girl came running towards him. She was pallid and trembling violently.

"Oh, thank Heaven, you are here," she cried, her words coming with dreadful rapidity. "I sent for you because something is the matter. I don't know what. I've only been here a few days, and she is always strange, but not like this. It is terrible to watch. She must have help. Please, please hurry!"

Meanwhile the woman, expressing no emotion of any sort, moved away. "You'll find out by to-morrow that it's all nonsense," she announced as she disappeared.

Silently the girl and he walked the length of the long hall.

"She's in here," she whispered, stopping before a door.

In spite of all he could do, Grayson was uneasy. Following the girl and moving noiselessly, he entered the room. For a moment the dimness prevented him from distinguishing objects clearly. But bit by bit it all lay before him. The richness of the furnishings and the decay everywhere so evident; the room was abominably dirty, heavy with grime and filth; the air reeked with the smells of age. Blackbeetles crawled lazily in and out of the crevices in the woodwork. Once a large rat scurried across the floor. At sight of it the man dodged back in horror. Over between two windows stood an immense desk made of black wood and inlaid with silver wire. Plunged on her knees before it, Grayson's eyes made out the figure of a woman, her body rocking to and fro with a persistent regularity.

Digitized by Google

Presently the distant figure arose and the man's eyes widened in astonishment. He saw that she was as white as the dead, with eyes that burnt deep in their sockets and a face from which all expression had fled. She was arrayed in wedding garments—garments as grisly as finery taken from the tomb.

Pushed back from the face, but falling over her head and to the bottom of the bridal dress yellow with years, hung the limp veil, ragged and frayed. Covering the emaciated hands were long gloves, rotted and torn. Her feet were hidden in tiny slippers, broken through where the satin had long since refused to hold together.

"Go to her," whispered the girl.

The man obeyed, wondering what he ought to do or say, willing to have given at that minute, years of professional life for a knowledge broad enough to encompass a case like this. He told himself that, perhaps, if the woman would come to him voluntarily, the skill of questioning her without arousing antagonism might arrive instinctively.

But the opportunity for those questions never came. Suddenly the woman raised her head. She met Grayson's eyes full upon her. For a moment she gazed spell-bound, then straight as a child who in trouble goes to the one it loves for help and comfort, this woman went to Grayson. There was no doubt, no uncertainty, hardly any surprise. It was as if she had looked for him daily all her life.

But the transition in her face was stupendous. All in a moment the lines of hardness and the scars of suffering were obliterated by a radiance of divine happiness. Silently, swiftly, but very surely, this woman came with a bound out from a dementia of hideous sorrow.

"I knew it! I knew it!" she gasped. "Charles, I was right. You meant it as a test to my love. It was not desertion. No, no, never that. I did not know what would become of me. Yet I never really doubted. Oh, it was not desertion! I loved you too much to believe such a thing. But sometimes I was afraid. It has been so long, so many, many years." She threw herself into the man's arms, caressing him, fondling his hands, talking all the while with pathetic rapidity. But while the doctor was all at sea, something told him that this was not the chatter of insanity.

Presently she held a letter out to him; a scrap of paper that had not left her hands. "When this came to me on our wedding day I was here, dressed like this—waiting for you. First I was frightened. I screamed. I remember that. Afterwards I seemed to wake from my fright. I knew it was not desertion. I tried to be brave and not to mind. I never once blamed you, for you could not know how you were to make me suffer. But my father would not understand. He was so angry I believed he would hunt you out and kill you. I forgot my own grief in talking—explaining to him. Finally I saw the tears in his eyes and I knew he was understanding at last.

"I have been faithful to the day. Every anniversary I have come to this room in my bridal clothes and waited from dawn till dark. I knew you would come if I waited long enough. Some of those days were hard, but I always trusted." She pointed to the letter again. "I always read this, too, on the anniversary, and though I never meant to, the scream would come just as it did on that day long ago."

The woman's body was shaking with excitement and the girl had crept up to her side, tears of pity brimming in her eyes. But Grayson was speechless. During that torrent of words some sixth sense was suddenly born in him—a sense warning him of what he might expect.

"Auntie," whispered the girl, touching the woman gently.

At once the bride turned. "Elizabeth, my dear, this is my fiancé. We were to have been married twenty-five years ago to-day. But he has only just come for me. This is Charles Grayson, Elizabeth." There was great pride in the quavering voice.

But at the mention of his name the man reeled, his senses stunned. What did it mean? Who was this woman? Who was that other, the man of his name, who had wronged her so cruelly?

The girl watched him curiously.

"It was an unkind letter, wasn't it, dear?"—she held up the paper. "I have just been reading it again."

The man clenched his fists. "Let me see it—again," he gasped.

She gave it to him, at the same time drawing herself from his arms. Grayson opened the paper, sick with dread. It began abruptly: "I am doing a dastardly thing, yet I should be more of a coward if I stayed. Do not judge me more harshly than you can help. I am to be married to-day to the woman whom for years I have loved. Loved madly, loved with all my soul. She is penniless—so am I—yet I have more courage in facing life with her whom I adore than in coming to you who would make my life easy with luxury. Am I not right in going before I commit a greater crime against you than I have already done

"CHARLES."

"Father! Father!" moaned the man. "How could you?" A spasm of pain ran through him. For a brief second his anger rose hot against his father. But the woman claimed him again instantly.

"Don't grieve," she began, her voice weak and trembling. The radiance, too, was leaving her face. "The sorrow is past."

"Yes," he groaned, "but does that make up for the suffering that has been?"

"You are so little changed," she said, finally, "and I am so different. But you will care for me just the same, dear, won't you? Just the same?"

He might have answered in a dozen different ways. What he said was, "My whole life shall be devoted to you, from now until—death."

"This is the wedding gift I spoke of. It is all my property willed unconditionally to you for life; afterwards it goes to your heirs. I hid it long ago to show my faith."

The last word faltered, for a great faintness was creeping over the woman. She could no longer stand unsupported by Grayson's arms. The twenty-five years of waiting had done their work.

From now on, she was a little light-headed, talking continually. Bit by bit the extent of the mental anguish she had endured came out. She never chided, never once complained; but the man was not deceived. All she asked now was his care and love and presence, and Grayson gave what he could—expiating his father's wrong.

He sat through the night holding the poor, thin hands in his, making his father's peace.

Towards morning everything became suddenly silent. The woman roused herself from a half stupor, murmuring, "I am very cold. Hold me closer, Charles." She had lost all idea of time, imagining herself a girl once more. After a little she spoke again:

"You are here, dearest? Really here, near me?"

For answer the man picked the fragile body up in his strong arms, holding her tight against his breast. With a contented sigh her eyes closed. Elizabeth, sitting apart, dozed from sheer weariness of watching. About three o'clock Grayson spoke across the room:

"She is unconscious. I do not believe your aunt will live long."

A little later she opened her eyes. They were bright with the clearness of renewed youth. She looked up into the man's face.

"My beloved——"

Grayson bent. He leant down and kissed her full on the lips. A thrill swept through her. A second later she sighed for the last time on earth, but the smile of divine happiness did not fade from her face.

G. P. Daniels.

Digitized by Google

Won by a Tune.

"GOOD-BYE, dearest!"

"Good-bye!"

For the twentieth time Mark Jermyn uttered the words of farewell, and for the twentieth time the girl responded, but, realising that the parting was not an ordinary one, they were loth to part even then. Years hence they might meet again; perhaps never!

"And dearest, you'll remember, if the recollection of me ever stands in your light, you're to forget I existed. Promise me that!"

The girl looked into the earnest face bending over her, into the depths of the grave, brown eyes.

"I cannot," she said softly. "Moreover, is it necessary? Is it what you would do were you in my place?"

Her logic was unanswerable, and he sighed.

"If you were the only child of somebody next door to a millionaire," she went on, "and your father forbade you to marry anyone who was not wealthy whilst you really loved one poor as a church mouse, would you give up without a struggle? Of course you wouldn't, Mark! You'd wait, and wait, and hope!"

"But waiting doesn't always bring wealth," broke in Jermyn, "especially in the musical profession. Why did my father ever destine me for his own career?" he added bitterly.

"Because it's what you're most fitted for," Elsie Renton replied. "Mark, dear, you're going to be a great man."

He waived away her words with a smile and another kiss.

"You flatter me, sweetheart" he said, "although it's true my father was far from being a mediocrity. He changed his name on marriage, and died when I was only five years old. But his existence really ended, so far as the world was concerned, when he forsook his old name, for he never composed a single thing after."

"How strange!" remarked the girl, wonderingly. "And what a terrible example to you, dearest."

He laughed.

"You may think so. Of course, I was too young to know much then, and never heard how it all happened, for my mother soon followed my father."

"And his name before, was——?"

"Wegar—Mark Wegar—one of the foremost composers of his time!"

* * * * *

A couple of years later, Mark Jermyn was in London. It seemed much longer since he had parted from Elsie Renton in Paris, where they had been fellow students at the Conservatoire; she for the sake of finishing a musical education, he because he had his future living to consider.

In Paris, the girl had been free from the hidebound conventionalities of home and her doting parents would doubtless have been horrified had they known she had dared to regard someone with affection. The two had parted; he, to work for a name, and she to enter Society.

And now he was in London, his fame having preceded him, and Mark Jermyn, the celebrated pianist was announced to make his début before the most critical audience in the world. Success had not spoilt him, and he remained the same modest man that had held Elsie's hand in his two years since; deeply, madly, in love with her still. Several times she had written to him, and with her last letter in his pocket as a talisman, he faced the eager crowd that evening.

The performance was a success, Mark Jermyn's reputation was more than upheld, and he quickly became the lion of the hour. Invitations from the highest in the land literally showered upon him, so numerous, that they would have taken years to respond to all, one of the earliest coming from the Renton's offering a princely fee for a short recital at a forthcoming "At Home" To this, Jermyn stiffly replied that he only accepted social engagements. An answer soon came altering the tone of the invitation, and a day or two later, he found himself about to meet his loved one once more.

The place was already thronged with guests when he arrived, but Elsie was the first to greet him, and as he took her hand he would have knelt down there and then and kissed it, had not decorum forbade. She welcomed him gaily, and he felt all at once the happiest of mortals, for a single look served to tell him he held her heart still.

"I'm hostess for the moment," she observed. "Let me take you to mother."

He followed her, and a little later was being introduced to Mrs. Renton.

"Mr. Jermyn, mother!"

The stately lady addressed, looked up, and as she saw his handsome, clear-cut features, started.

"Mr. Jermyn?—ah, yes, of course! Your appearance seems familiar. But then, aren't your photographs all over London?" she asked.

Mark bowed, but guessed by her tone that she had never seen his portrait.

Soon he became swallowed up in a crowd of people anxious to be introduced, but he detested the necessity of being polite; five minutes alone with Elsie was all that he craved for.

The millionaire's daughter, however, was now busily engaged in chatting with a cavalier who gazed upon her with unmistakable admiration, and the scene caused a pang in Mark's heart. Had he, after all, any semblance of a chance?

He sauntered aimlessly about, conversing first with one and another, till at length he found himself addressing the host himself. And Jermyn was agreeably surprised; Elsie's father was not nearly so formidable as he had pictured him to be; on the contrary, his attitude towards the young lion of the season was courtesy and geniality itself.

"Ah! my daughter tells me she met you in Paris," he remarked. "One of the first to discover your genius, I believe? Elsie's a dear girl, my dear sir!"

"She is," assented Mark, earnestly.

"Always a dutiful girl, and a prize worth the winning," continued Mr. Renton, briskly. "It's a pity we're to lose her so soon—but there! the men, the men! I was young myself once."

"You mean someone will fall in love with her?" queried Jermyn, anxiously.

"Has fallen in love. Scores of them. By the way, there she is with Lord Mapleson."

Mark Jermyn turned, and followed the other's glance to where Elsie stood talking with the man he had noticed a few moments before.

"Are they——?"

"Engaged, my dear sir, engaged. And to be married shortly. My wife's a wonderful woman, she's arranged it all!"

Mark's first impulse was to flee, but he resolved to learn the truth from Elsie's lips first. At last he caught her glance, following her into a small ante-room leading from one of the principal apartments. When the door closed, he took her hand, and looked into her eyes.

"Elsie," he asked. "Is it true?"

She averted her gaze.

"Is what true?" she murmured.

"That you're engaged to Lord Mapleson?"

Her eyes filled with tears and she turned towards him passionately.

"No!" she said vehemently. "He's asked me frequently, but I've always refused. But mamma insists, and the rumour we're engaged is about already. Oh, Mark! Mark!"—with an outstretching of her arms that was irresistible; "what's to be done?"

He took her into his arms.

"You love me, what is to prevent our happiness?"

"Mother—she insists. Father, I know, would rather I married a man of my choice."

"And I insist on your marrying me!" he cried earnestly. "That is, if you're willing to become the wife of a nonentity?"

She looked up quickly.

"Who is the nonentity?" she asked. "You, the clever artiste or"—with a gesture of disdain—"Lord Mapleson?"

"Then, darling," he cried, "if your mother will not consent, it must be a runaway match. You're sure you don't mind intrusting your happiness to me?"

"No, indeed. Mark, no! I love you, oh! heaps more than I did two years ago, and that's something, isn't it?"

He admitted that it was, and kissed her, when someone calling Elsie, she had to leave. Mark strolled back to the drawing-room with a lighter heart. Someone was asking Mr. Renton whether Jermyn was to play; the host shrugged his shoulders, but the musician at once interrupted with the remark he should only be too delighted.

A move was made to the piano, whilst all voices were hushed as it became known that the great Jermyn was at the instrument. He ran through several of his better known things in succession, playing as he had never played before, his audience, spellbound and enraptured. The applause at his conclusion, unlike most drawing-room applause, was for once sincere.

Mr. Renton was profuse in his thanks, and then his less genial wife inquired as a special favour, whether he would give them a novelty.

"A novelty?" repeated Mark, anxious to please his prospective parent. "Ah, yes! I had almost forgotten. To-day's the twenty-second, isn't it? There is one thing I only play once a year, and always on the twenty-second of this month."

His hearers looked puzzled, but his fingers had already wandered over the keyboard and at first seemed to evolve nothing but chaos. But suddenly came forth the notes of a sweet love song, delicious, haunting and uncanny almost. And as the melody flowed on, full of pathos and quaint touches, like the outpourings of a lovesick heart, tears came unwillingly to the eyes of the fashionable listeners. Mark himself, seemed lost to his surroundings, for was not the piece his father's last composition, one that had been too sacred to give to the world?

The last notes of the song were gradually dying away, when all at once there was a tense scream from a distant corner of the room.

All turned and saw that Mrs. Renton had fainted!

A few days later, Mark Jermyn called to inquire after Mrs. Renton, whom it was understood was seriously ill. The young fellow was at once shown into Mr. Renton's study, where the millionaire greeted him cordially.

"My dear Mr. Jermyn," he said "you're the very man I wish to see! You remember the effect your wonderful playing produced on my wife the other evening?"

"Unfortunately," responded the famous musician. "Believe me, I'm exceedingly sorry."

"It's not your fault, my boy," he answered kindly. "The event has brought something to light which I hope may mean your happiness. I have learnt that my daughter loves you."

"Yes," responded Mark, quietly. "And I love her too."

"Just so, just so! What I was going to say was this; my wife, it appears, was once engaged to your father."

Mark Jermyn looked up in astonishment.

"Yes," continued Mr. Renton, "and, from what I can gather—of course, this is in confidence between you and me—she broke Mark Wegar's heart. My wife jilted him for myself, and it seems, that out of pity, he afterwards married his cousin whom he discovered had been in love with him for years. The air you played the other evening was one of Wegar's compositions, was it not?"

"Yes," replied Mark. "My father left me the MSS. with the injunction it was only to be played on the twenty-second of November every year—the anniversary of what, I could never make out."

"Ah! my wife recognised the theme; it was the old love song he used to play to her and of which she had been so fond. The date you mention was the one on which she broke off the engagement. Old memories came back to her, and—and—"

"Say no more, sir, it's a painful subject."

"To be sure, to be sure! My wife wishes me to tell you that although she broke your father's heart she has no wish to break either yours or her daughter's. We are both willing you should marry Elsie."

Someone opened the door just then, and Elsie Renton, seeing Mark, threw herself into his arms.

T. Bonsall.

Only Practising.

OLD LADY (on her way to church): "Don't you know, little boy, that it is very wicked to play cricket on Sunday?" Little Boy: "We ain't playing; we're only pracisin' for to-morrow's game."

How He was Stung.

"HENRY, you look worried; what's the trouble?" "I was stung to the quick by an adder this afternoon." "Heavens! How did it happen?" "Why, I went to the bank this afternoon, and the manager told me my account was overdrawn."

OCTOBER 7TH OCTOBER 7TH

IS THE DATE OF THE PUBLICATION OF THE FIRST INSTALMENT OF

"A Foe in the Family."

"SHORT STORIES'" SPLENDID NEW SERIAL.

OCTOBER 7TH. OCTOBER 7TH.

Digitized by Google

A Fatal Wooing.

The Tragic Story of a Woman's Love.

LADY SELBY'S picnic had been a great and glorious success. Everything had gone off well, from the champagne and lobster salads to the various little flirtations for which the kind-hearted hostess loved to make herself responsible. It is no easy task to entertain a large party of fashionable young men and women all day long, but Lady Selby's energy was inexhaustible. Her sole object was to make everybody happy, and, with one exception, she had succeeded even beyond her own expectations.

Her old friend, Major Bohmann, had been moping about in a state of abject misery ever since he had arrived. Lady Selby, being a woman with unlimited experience in such little difficulties, soon saw what the matter was, but for the life of her she could not remedy it. She did her utmost to throw Mrs. Corbolis in the Major's way, but that lady was far too much taken up with a young friend she had chosen out for herself to pay any attention to her hostess' gentle hints. And so the day had passed away.

It was evening now, and Lady Selby was rushing about here and there, and, with the help of three or four energetic young men, trying to whip in the various couples who had strolled away far into the forest glades, where the sinking sun was throwing long, wavering shadows on the green sward, and the cool, mossy banks tempted them to unburden the secrets of their hearts to one another.

At last they were all collected on the river banks, and there was more than one couple who thought the delightful wanderings through those woodland paths had come to an end all too soon.

Most of the party were going home by water. In the cool of that midsummer evening the gently rippling waves which lapped so musically against the boats, fastened by their painters to the overhanging willow trees, certainly looked more inviting than the dusty roads.

But someone must give up their place to drive home with Major Bohmann in the dog-cart. He looked imploringly at a little woman in black, who was just gathering up her skirts in the daintiest fashion to jump on board the tiny sailing yacht, her fingers lightly resting on the hand of a young man who stood in the bows with a happy smile upon his well-bronzed face.

All the afternoon the Major had been trying to get a word with her, ably seconded by his thoughtful hostess, but she had persistently and purposely evaded him. Something in his glance must at last have touched her, for, kissing her hand to the others, who had already taken their seats, she turned round, and in another moment was clambering up beside him.

The young man in the boat, whom the others familiarly called Jack, and whose name was Vaughan, threw himself down on his cushion with an angry, disappointed scowl, which deepened as his companions frivolously discussed the chances the widow had of "catching the Major again," and told one another stories about the previous adventures of the little lady, who seemed to fall in love with every other man she came across, and yet never by any chance to get further than the preliminary flirtation stage.

The Major had been her most intimate friend ever since her schoolroom days, and it was well known he had stood by and seen another claim her hand, which at that time he would have given his soul to possess. When she began to recover from her terrible grief, first at her husband's disappearance, and then at his reported death, the Major had come forward in his simple, honest, straightforward way, and once more renewed his attentions to her.

Led on by false hopes, he had proposed one day at the very house at which they were now staying, only to be laughingly refused. From that time forward the Major had been a confirmed woman-hater.

To his intimate friends he would confess that he would never trust a woman again, and to see two people flirting, as society people will flirt to amuse themselves, and to pass away the long days in a country house, would drive the honest Major almost frantic. His own bitter experience was still deeply impressed, or rather engraved, on his mind, for nothing could ever obliterate it.

It is just possible that if young Vaughan could have overheard the conversation between the two people in the dog-cart he would not have felt so miserably unhappy, but perhaps it was well that he did not.

For the first half mile neither of them spoke a word. The Major was looking straight away over his horse's ears; Mrs. Corbolis was snatching carelessly at the bunches of half-ripe nuts as the cart brushed by them in the narrow lane. The Major's eyebrows were working nervously up and down.

The truth was, he was very angry, and was trying to compose himself, which is no easy task for a middle-aged gentleman who has been inexpressibly worried and bored for ten whole hours at a stretch.

"Mrs. Corbolis," he said at last, speaking with a careless affectation, which he was very far from feeling, "I have been waiting for a quiet moment to speak to you all the day, and you have purposely avoided me. Not once, but time after time. How have I managed to offend you?"

"Perhaps I had someone I liked better to amuse me," said Mrs. Corbolis, keeping her eyes steadily fixed on a little foot encased in patent leather, which peeped out from beneath her black serge skirt.

"So it seems," said the Major drily.

Just the faintest tinge of pink coloured the widow's cheeks.

"And even so, what is that to you?"

The Major uttered an impatient exclamation.

"After all these years, Maria, I really think this affectation is rather out of place. I have been your friend," he went on bitterly, "for nearly forty years, and it is somewhat ridiculous to treat me as you are doing now."

"When I got up here to drive with you, I did so because I thought that you had something special you wanted to say. If I had known you were only going to speak nonsense, I should not have come."

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Corbolis spoke very slowly, and her tone was icy cold and forbidding in the extreme.

"And I have something special to say."

"Then, Major Bohmann, I think, under the circumstances, I should say it, and leave off flogging that poor horse like that. It's quite unnecessary. Besides, it's cruel."

There was nothing which annoyed the Major more than the treatment he was receiving, and the little widow was perfectly alive to the fact. The truth was, she was frightened by his serious manner, and hoped to exasperate him so that he would not take advantage of their tête-à-tête.

"I want," the Major began after a long silence, during which he had been trying to keep his temper, "I want to speak to you about my young friend Jack Vaughan."

Once more the colour rose to his companion's cheeks, but the Major did not notice it.

"Well?"

"I think, Maria," the Major went on with sudden vehemence, his irritability getting the better of his prudence, "that it is a disgrace, a shame—a wicked, cruel shame—to lead him on in the way you do. Do you think he is a cold, heartless being like yourself? If so, you are mistaken. You will break the boy's heart, as you have succeeded in breaking mine, and as you have already succeeded in breaking the hearts of a hundred other men besides.

A FOE IN THE FAMILY,

"Short Stories" new serial, commences in two weeks time.

"You forget, or else you purposely refuse to remember, the sacred nature of the fire you wantonly kindle; you forget that often and often it can never be quenched again. He is innocent of the ways of the world. He thinks you really love him. And when he finds, as others have found before him, that you are only playing with his affections, using them to while away your spare time, it will ruin his whole life.

"I love the boy far too well to see his future happiness blighted for your temporary amusement. If you must flirt, flirt with men of the world who are as heartless and frivolous as yourself, or at least can read your character, and do not tamper with——"

"Major Bohmann, how dare you insult me like this? I shall flirt with whom I like!"

Mrs. Corbolis had risen from her seat, and the Major, half frightened at his own vehemence, would not have been at all surprised if she had struck him, but she sank back again, her lips as white as death.

"Then, my dear lady," said the Major with forced calmness, "I shall take the precaution to warn my young friend what a hollow, heartless woman you are, before you have time to do any more mischief. I have watched you encouraging him.

"Yes, I have seen it all," and the Major's eyes gleamed angrily. "You, a widow of forty-three—yes, I do not mind saying it—the prettiest, the most charming, apparently the most unaffected woman I know, but still on the wrong side of forty, actually flirting all you know with a boy, who until to-day was not even twenty-one.

"A boy straight from the wilds of Australia, inexperienced, and knowing nothing of the rotten state of society, or the heartless women who adorn it, and who has already learnt to love you, to look up to you, to trust you mutely, believing every word you choose to whisper in his ear, totally unable to resist your cunning wiles, the wiles which you have twined around more men beforetime than you could remember if you would."

At that moment the house was reached. What Mrs. Corbolis would have said will never be known, but probably she would have said nothing. The Major, who believed he had only been doing his duty, although he had not done it in the quiet gentlemanly way he had been rehearsing to himself, offered Mrs. Corbolis his arm with a polite little bow, as they mounted the steps together, but she brushed past him and entered the house.

She crossed the passage, and flew straight up the broad, oaken staircase, and did not stop until she was safely in her own little room. Then she locked and double-locked the door, threw herself upon her bed in a paroxysm of grief, and raged and wept as if her heart would break. Poor little woman, she had found it hard to keep back that flood of tears so long!

She was angry, frightened, and tired; terribly tired. Angry with the Major for daring to speak to her as he had done, and angry with herself for having given him in years gone by ample excuse for the words he had uttered, and frightened more than she herself knew lest he should carry out his threat and turn the boy's heart against her, the only creature she had loved since her husband had deserted her more than twenty years before, deserted her on the birth of her first-born son, and carried the little baby away with him almost before she had pressed it to her lips.

The terrible quarrel which had brought this about does not concern us here, but it left poor Mrs. Corbolis deprived of husband and child at one cruel blow, with all her faith in man shattered. It made her look upon all men with suspicion, and treat them as she thought they would treat her. It made her cold and heartless and unfeeling.

Then she had met Jack Vaughan at Sir Robert Selby's house, and she had loved him. From the first moment that their eyes had met they had been drawn together by a strange fascination. The difference in their age was no barrier between the two. She loved the boy as she never thought she could love again, and her one fear had been that he could never return it.

When she at first listened to Major Bohmann's angry words they filled her with delight, and now—now—he would be warned that she did not care for him; would be told to keep away; would be taught to look upon her as a cold and heartless wretch, who used him merely as a thing to toy away her idle hours. The thought was almost distraction.

The Major was perfectly right when he had said that Jack did love the little widow. He did not know what it was which drew him towards her as irresistibly as a moth is drawn to a candle-flame, but he felt his whole life was wrapped up in hers. He felt as if he had met her in some previous existence, so well could he foresee what made her happy and also what displeased her.

Their tastes were exactly similar. What she liked he liked, what she hated he hated; it seemed as if Nature, in spite of the score of years between their ages, had ordained them for one another's company. When he had seen her go off with Major Bohmann that afternoon his heart had been filled with a sudden dread, and he made up his mind he would confess his love to her that night and have the warrant of his future sealed and signed.

Meanwhile, Major Bohmann did not feel at all comfortable. Somehow or other what he had meant to deliver as kind words of semi-paternal advice had been thrown like a shower of poisoned darts. The widow's manner had aggravated him, and ruffled his hasty temper.

He did not for one moment regret the course he had taken, but he wished he had ridden over it more lightly. He had been rude, unwarrantably rude, and even though he had been doing his duty, he was rightly indignant with himself for using the words he had used.

Digitized by Google

He threw down his gloves on the hall table, and, changing his felt hat for a light shooting cap, he strolled down towards the river, trying to drown the unpleasant reminiscences of the past half-hour in the smoke of a very strong cigar. Tobacco was, as a rule, an unfailing tranquiliser with the Major, but to-night, somehow, it seemed to have lost its charm. At the landing-place he found the rest of the party had already arrived, and were unpacking their boats of the empty bottles and disgorged hampers.

He singled out Jack, who was standing disconsolately by himself, and looking as black as thunder. Linking his arm in the lad's, they strolled off towards the house.

Although the Major had never set eyes on the boy until a few weeks before, he had taken a violent fancy for him. There was something about his plain, straightforward, unaffected manner that went to the heart of the old soldier. The two strolled through the fields together, and a fine pair they made —the one smallish and decidedly stout, the other tall and slight, but both with backs as straight as an Indian's arrow.

The Major meant to give his friend a timely hint about Mrs. Corbolis, but, somehow or other, when it came to the point, his courage failed him. How was he to tell this boy that the woman he trusted in was false—that she whom he loved with his whole heart was merely trifling with him? He smoked one cigar through and lit another, but still the right words did not find their way to his lips. How he thanked the constellations in after years for this timely hesitation! As it was, Jack was the first to break the silence.

"Major Bohmann," he said, "when my father died ten years ago in the Australian bush he gave me a letter, in which he told me I should find written my real name and the true history of my family. This he made me solemnly swear I would never open, until I came of age. And yet another oath he made me take. It was that if my mother should still be alive at that time—my mother, whom he never forgave for some great injury even on his death-bed—I should never make myself known to her.

"To-day, Major, is my birthday. I may open that letter I have guarded all these years, and now when the time has come I am afraid. I have felt so long that I must not break that seal, that now I dare not do it."

The Major pressed the lad's arm kindly. "Tell me," he said, "of what you are afraid."

"I cannot," answered Jack. "All I know is that I have a presentiment that evil will follow, and that the contents of this letter will bring me no happiness. Why should I want to know the past? What should I gain by knowing a woman as my mother who may never give me a mother's love? Think how terrible it would be if I ever were to meet her. To know that she was my mother, and yet never to say so, never to tell her of our relationship. Oh, it would be terrible!"

They had reached a stile which led into the park. Jack Vaughan clambered on it, and sat there dolefully, while the Major, very uneasy at the turn affairs had taken, and very much dreading a scene, said what he could to laugh the matter over. He stood there with his elbows resting on the stile, and keeping his eyes fixed on the herd of dappled deer which was browsing on the lower branches of the trees.

It was a pretty scene. The old park, with its long vistas of trees leading up to the old house in the distance, with its many waterfalls running between endless beds of flowers and its sloping banks of well-kept lawn. But neither of the men was admiring the beauties of nature just then. Presently the younger drew from his pocket an envelope, which, perhaps, once had been white, but now was almost black with the wear of many years.

"It's rather dirty," he said, with a little laugh, as he weighed it in his hands as he had done a thousand times before. "It has never been out of my pocket since my father—since it was given to me. I shall be quite sorry to lose its company. Will you open it?" he went on suddenly, swinging round and facing his companion. "Will you open it and tell me what I dare not read myself?"

The Major winced inwardly. He barred this sort of thing altogether. However, he took from his pocket a neat little ivory knife, and slid it along the top with a great deal of unnecessary precision. He opened the mysterious package and drew out a letter, and within its folds a photograph. "Here," he said, "'pon my word, you'd better read it. It might be private."

"No, you read it, please!" said young Vaughan eagerly.

The Major undid the letter. As he did so the photograph fell to the ground. He stooped to pick it up, and then started back with a little cry.

From his waistcoat pocket came a little bit of tissue paper with which he brightened up his glasses. Then he put them on and looked again.

"Well," he said slowly, "of all the curious coincidences—of all the—well, look at it yourself. Take it, man—take it. Do you know that face?"

Jack took the photograph eagerly.

"What, do you know her?" he asked.

Then he looked at the photograph. Not a word did he say. He turned a deadly white, and his face fell on his hands with a little sob.

The picture was one they both knew well. It was the picture of one they both had uppermost in their hearts just then. Presently he raised his head and looked into the Major's grey, compassionate eyes, which were bent upon him.

"It's awful!" he said, and then covered his face again.

"Then Mrs. Corbolis is your—your mother." The Major got the words out very slowly, as if half fearing that he had lost his senses.

It was all clear now. It was clear why Jack had so loved the widow. His strange infatuation was no longer a mystery to the Major. He saw it all.

How long the two men stopped there they neither of them knew. It was dark when Jack slid off the stile and said, "Come along."

"What are you going to do?" asked the Major, as they neared the house.

"I shall go away to-night," said Jack, looking up with tears in his eyes. "I cannot see her again. It would kill me!"

For the time the Major did not speak. He felt it was his duty to advise the young man as to the course he should take, but for the life of him he could not think what had best be done.

Such a problem had never been faced by man before.

"I don't think I should do anything rash like that," he said at last. "Why not go on as you are now? You love her with all your heart and soul, and so you ought to love your mother. Your love need not alter because its nature must. If you may never tell of your relationship, upon my word, I don't see that it matters much. I don't really. It would break your heart to go away now," the Major was just going to add, "although I don't say that it would break hers," but he stopped himself in time. It was useless to say anything of the matter which had been uppermost in his mind all day after the extraordinary turn affairs had taken.

At this moment they reached the house. Everyone had gone to bed. They let themselves in quietly through the conservatory, and in the hall they said good-night.

Digitized by Google

"I think you are right," Jack said, as the Major pressed his hand and handed him the letter which could tell him nothing more he wanted to know now. "I will stop near her and love her still!"

Poor fellow, it was hardly surprising that he did not get any sleep that night. Surely no man ever before had fallen in love with his own mother, only to find out the relationship on the very night he had determined to offer her his hand in marriage, and then be bound by a promise he dare not violate not to tell her what they really were to one another.

* * * * *

Nearly three years had passed since that memorable day on which Mrs. Selby had given her picnic, and those three years had brought little change to the principal actors in this romantic drama.

It was one morning in May that Jack found a letter on his breakfast table at his London rooms inviting him to go down and spend a week or two with Major Bohmann at his house in Bournemouth. He was delighted at the prospect of seeing his old friend again, the one human soul who shared his secret and felt for him in his trouble.

Only one thing worried him. Since he had found her he had never let a day pass without calling on his mother. He had purposely taken rooms near the house in Kensington where she and her younger sister lived. He had devoted his time to making the widow's life a happy one. Every evening he would call in and see her, would sit and read to her, and confide in her his troubles and his griefs, all except the great one she could never share.

And he did not like to leave her even for a little time. He wondered what she would say when she heard he was going. Their strange, lop-sided affection had ripened exceedingly of late. Ripened, though, as it were on different stalks. How dangerous this affection was neither of them guessed. But, oh! the pity of it, that he had not followed his own impulse and gone away from her for ever that night when he talked with the Major in the park!

He went to his mother's house with the letter in his hands and a little bunch of rosebuds, which he never failed to take. He told her he was going away for a short time, and she looked at him sadly out of those great eyes of hers. But she made no protest. How could she? What could she have said to bind him to her side? It was a sad parting, but at last it was over. They were very dear to one another.

It was down at the seaside that Jack fell in love with a certain blue-eyed, golden-haired girl whom the Major had introduced to him. Those days spent down there were a new experience to him. All the pretty girls he had met at Lady Selby's had been as nothing beside the widow he loved so sweetly, but now he could love her and another too.

That last evening when he strolled along the cliffs with Margaret Fanshaw on his arm, with the indescribable, invigorating odour of the sea filling his lungs, was like the essence of a new life. As he stood and watched the great waves dashing against the rocks below, and dreamt of future happiness, he was more full of bliss than ever before in his life.

For had he not told her of his love and pleaded for hers in return, and had not the girl laid her hand in his in mute answer to his appeal? Oh, that fatal love! How shall I tell the end?

Jack Vaughan came back to London a changed man; a new-born spirit had taken hold of him.

And even while he had grieved at parting with his new love he had not forgotten his old. He longed to be back at his mother's side. He went straight there from the station and told her of his visit. He told her all he had done, all he had seen, everything up to a certain point, and then he could go no further. And that point was where Margaret Fanshaw appeared upon the scene.

He could not pluck up courage to tell her that she had a rival in his affections. He knew he ought to; but he went on as he had gone on before and he loved her too well to make her sad with the news of his betrothal; at least, he could not do it yet. Some day he knew it must all come out, and what would happen then he dared not think.

It was at Nice the next winter that the climax came. Lady Selby, Major Bohmann, his niece Margaret Fanshaw, and Jack Vaughan, all were there.

Jack had been out riding with the Major. They came back to the hotel, and on the steps stood Mrs. Corbolis. Why she had come out so suddenly, so unexpectedly, she told no one. One quick, searching glance at the lad's face and the secret was out. When his yes met hers he could have killed himself for not having told her of his love before. It was too late now. The opportunity had gone.

What would she think of him? He dared not even wonder. He was as one in a dream. How he went through dinner that night he never knew. Only one thing was clear in his mind—Margaret had promised to marry him next week, and his mother would be there to see the ceremony. He had hoped to get it all over before he told her. But now——

That night he invited Mrs. Corbolis to go out with him in the garden.

For half an hour they sat there silently on the terrace overlooking the sparkling waters of the Mediterranean.

"Why," she said at last, speaking, oh, so coldly and collectively, "why did you not tell me of your love before? How dared you treat me as you have done—to sit at my feet and whisper words of love into my ears, when all the time you were loving another—I who have waited these long years until you should care to make a home for me?

"Oh! it is cruel. It is more than I can bear. You, the one fellow-creature I believed in, the one fellow-creature I could trust, you have treated me worse than any other man has treated me before. Yes, worse than the cruel deserter who robbed me of the child I have never known. Oh! it will break my heart, it will break——"

"Mother!" The word was on his lips, but he could not utter it. He tried three times, but each time the enemy of his oath haunted him, and the word died on his lips. That one word alone would explain his conduct, could heal the terrible wound he knew he was inflicting, and that he dared not mention. His head sank to his knees for a moment, and then he dropped senseless at the widow's feet.

Poor creature, great as was his grief, hers was even greater. After those years of love it was more than she could bear to find, as it seemed to her, that the one soul who had really cared for her was only trifling all the time.

The poor woman could not have had a more cruel punishment for her frivolity in those years before she came across her son.

She roused herself at last. She called Jack by his name, but no answer came. She cast one long look at him, a look in which all her love had been transformed into a hate such as the face of woman seldom bears, and then she went.

* * * * * * *

Next morning she had disappeared. No one knew where. All she had left was a little parcel for Jack Vaughan. With it was a letter.

He tore it open. It read: "I am going for ever now, and I forgive you. This bottle of wine is old Madeira, my favourite, as you know. From this drink my health on you wedding day, drink it with your bride, and as you do so, have a kind thought for one poor sinner who died with your name on her lips."

* * * * * * *

Two years afterwards the marriage took place between Jack and Margaret Fanshaw. The former had aged greatly since his mother's death. His grief had been beyond description, for was he not her murderer? When the wedding breakfast was finished, he opened, with tears in his eyes, the bottle which she had left him.

He poured out two glasses, one for his bride and the other for himself. He had told her his strange story now that Mrs. Corbolis was dead. It was a moment full of sad memories, and he cared not if people saw the tears trickle down his cheeks.

There was a great lump in his throat as he raised the glass and said the simple word "Mother."

That wine had been drugged with the most deadly poison the hate of woman could devise.

C. K. Robson.

Digitized by Google

The Palmist's Prophecy.

Its Utterances—Its Motives—Its Fulfilment.

CHAPTER I.

The Line of Life.

"And you say that this will certainly take place in three months from now?"

"Sir Howard Wynne will die, as I have said, at noon, on the seventeenth day of July next."

"And this, although his health is not now, apparently, threatened in any way?"

"Yes, in spite of his present good health."

"When was he here?"

"Why do you ask? You know, no one better."

"I?"

"Yes, you! He was not out of your sight from the time he drove from Brook Street, at eleven o'clock this morning, till he left here at a few minutes to twelve."

Madame Cecille, palmist, thought-reader, and "Society" second-sight juggler, looked keenly into the small, closely-set eyes of her visitor.

Accustomed as she was to the arriving at the inner thoughts and intents of men, by, and through a cunningly clever interpretation of individual facial expression, she was fain to confess that the features of Martin Trevenna, bronzed by the heat and glare of ten years of Indian suns, offered but little ground for coming to a right conclusion with regard to their owner's reliability or otherwise of disposition.

An ex-officer of a native regiment, he seemed to have imbibed by virtue of professional contact with his men, some of the more undesirable phases of the native character. Dissimulation, an unreasonable, because unnecessary reserve, together with a strange inability to discriminate between right and wrong (his own actions considered) made it difficult for even a clever character like our palmist to get at the heart and soul of the man, and to read his life-book.

It was at his suggestion that his cousin, Howard Wynne, had visited the Sloane Street Sybil, a suggestion having for its object his relative's moral bewilderment and intimidation.

Howard Wynne was not only the possessor of the family title and estates, he was also, as Martin Trevenna well knew, first in the affections of Mollie Doyle, the girl who, of all the world, had it in her power to hold him, Martin Trevenna, in the hollow of her hand, and to bind him as a slave to the chariot wheels of her sovereign will and pleasure.

Wynne was, by the accident of just half-an-hour only, the younger man, and indisposed by sheer laziness of nature to kick against any semi-assumption of superiority on the part of the other, as toward himself. So it was, therefore, that the somewhat weak-minded, but altogether single-hearted young baronet fell, all unsuspiciously, into as cleverly a devised trap as could well have been set.

The owner of Llanwrist Castle, County Carmarthen, Howard Wynne had, for the first sixteen years of his life, been brought up in close companionship with his cousin, Martin Trevenna.

The latter's mother, a Wynne, had married, in absolute opposition to the wishes of her family, a Cornish mine captain, one Martin Trevenna; a man rugged-natured, and blunt of speech and manner, but as professionally expert and enthusiastic, and as honest of soul, as any in all the "West Countree."

Killed, five years before, by the falling-in of the great Tremallick Mine, that stretched for nearly a mile under the sea, his son and namesake was indebted to Howard Wynne's father for a home, education, and an entrance into life as a subaltern in the native Indian army. Young Martin had, in fact, been born at Llanwrist, during one of his mother's rare visits to her old home.

He had from boyhood been envious of his cousin's position and prospects, and when a year prior to this present relation, he heard at Simla of his uncle's death, and of Howard Wynne's succession, he then and there devised a plan and course of action, the one end and aim of which was the ultimate securing for himself of his cousin's heritage.

Losing no time, and having a few thousands in reserve (thanks to his uncle's testamentary bounty), he forthwith sent in his resignation, took passage for England, and, at the time of his interview with Madame Cecille, was the undoubted master spirit in his daily and hourly intercourse with Sir Howard.

His acquaintance with the palmist was by no means recent, he having met her a year or so previously at the court of a native prince, who, attracted by her dealings in the occult, had invited her to take up her temporary residence in his capital.

Casting about, therefore, for an unscrupulous ally in his scheme for his cousin's undoing, he remembered the pretty French adventuress, and while not committing himself to the extent of dangerous personal compromise, he contrived to so far gain her adherence as that she should sow the seed of vague alarm in the mind of the young baronet—for a consideration.

"Remember!" she said, on his leaving the Sloane Street flat. "I am not responsible—I know nothing!"

It was a curious coincidence that, while standing at the kerb-side awaiting a hansom, the very woman with thoughts of whom his soul, or what passed for it, was at that moment full, should signal him from a passing brougham.

"Martin!" she cried as the carriage drew up, and she extended her hand to him. "I thought you were in Cornwall! Howard said something about your intention to see if something could not be done with the re-opening of that dreadful mine."

"Yes, it is quite true, Mollie, I am going to see about it, but not till next week. I leave for Tremallick on Sunday night. But when did you come to town?"

Digitized by Google

"Yesterday. I saw Howard half-an-hour ago in the Park, and I am glad I have met you, for I want you to tell me what is the matter with him."

"The matter with him? Nothing that I am aware of. But why do you ask? What have you noticed wrong about him?"

"He would hardly speak," said the young girl, with an anxious look into Martin Trevenna's expressionless eyes, "and I am sure he is either ill, or worrying about something, for he was white and set, and—and—surely, Martin, he has no secret from you, who are so constantly with him—who are like his brother!"

"I can assure you, Mollie, that I am as ignorant of that which you imagine ails him, as you are yourself. More, when I last saw him this morning at breakfast, he seemed to me to be unusually jolly, and full of almost boyish good-humour."

Molle Doyle, unsophisticated, innocent as are the majority of country-bred girls, could not be expected to successfully measure swords with so accomplished a master of fence as the ex-lieutenant of Native Light Infantry. Yet she was not convinced at his off-hand disclaimer, though quite believing in him as a good friend to his cousin.

You cannot deceive the average woman, even if you do not actually declare your love for her. She knows of its existence by subtle intuition, and discourages or encourages you according to circumstances, and as she herself feels towards you.

Lady Mollie Doyle loved Howard Wynne, not because he had asked her for her heart, but because she couldn't help it. On the other hand, she knew of Martin Trevenna's overmastering passion, though as yet expressed by dumb signs of admiration only, but having but one heart for disposal, and as that heart could never in any case have gone a-wandering in Martin's direction, the knowledge she had gained only served to intensify all the womanly courtesy and tenderness of her nature as towards the man who had dared to stake his happiness upon her smile.

"Well, Martin," she said at parting, and regarding him steadfastly. "I shall never rest until I have found out what is the matter with Howard. You may not, as you say, know the cause, but something tells me that the truth lies with you, and with you alone, and that it is to you, and to none other, that I must look for the real explanation of the mystery."

CHAPTER II.

A Missing Letter and a Secret.

"Has Sir Howard returned yet from London, Edwards?"

"No, my lady!" replied the Llanwrist station-master, "but I did hear that he might be expected by the late express that always stops here for him."

"Which it certainly will not do to-night, Edwards!" said a man's quiet voice.

"Howard!" exclaimed Lady Mollie, turning sharply round and facing a tall, kindly-eyed young fellow in grey-tweed shooting suit and gaiters. "I am so glad you have come, for I want to see you awfully."

"Do you?" he said, looking wistfully down at her. "You must lose no time, then, dear, for I leave again for Milford Haven in less than four hours from now."

They had by this reached Mollie's dainty little pony-carriage in the station-yard.

"Milford Haven, Howard? Are you going across to Kingstown?"

"No, dear, I am to meet Martin at Milford, where my yacht is, and we are to make for Portreath, on the North Cornish coast. But if you will drive me to the Castle I will give you details on the journey."

"Well?" she asked as soon as they were on the open road. "What takes you to Cornwall, Howard?—and with Martin! I can't exactly explain, perhaps, what I mean, but I don't want you to go."

"Not go, Mollie, why?"

"That is what I cannot tell you, because I don't know; but for all that, dear, I shall be very—very unhappy if you do go this trip with Martin."

"Haven't you any reason for feeling like this?"

"Only a dream, Howard! A silly dream, very likely, you will say, and yet you know that I am not superstitious—not even a little bit."

"Well, I won't ask you for the details of your vision, Mollie, if that is all the reason you can give me for your not wishing me to go to Cornwall. But supposing that I have a strong, a very strong reason for going—how then? Although, curiously enough, there is a decidedly superstitious flavour about my reason too."

"Tell me," was all she said.

"Nearly three months ago I went—for the want, I suppose, of something better to do—to that palmist woman in Sloane Street, London—Madame Cecille."

"Whatever for, Howard?"

"I am sure I couldn't tell you. But, never mind that, I did go; and I'm ashamed to say that I haven't had an easy five minutes since."

"Why?"

"Well, you will hardly believe it, perhaps, but she prophesied, after pretending to read my hand (for it's all humbug and pretence, you know) that I should assuredly die at or about noon on the seventeenth of this month—two days hence."

"The wicked woman!"

"Say rather, dear, foolish me for listening and paying serious attention to such arrant rubbish."

"Of course you deserve a scolding, but you haven't shown me yet the connection between the prophecy and this yachting cruise."

"That is where my shame comes in. I am going just because I am afraid to face possibilities among those who know me."

"And Martin?"

"Oh! Martin is doing his best to help me to throw off this wretched something, which, after all, may and no doubt will prove to be nothing."

"Then why go?"

"Don't seek to dissuade me, dear. It is all very childish, I know; but I promise you, that next week, when I return to Llanwrist, you shall punish me in your own way. Will that content you?"

"I suppose it must. But here we are at the lodge. I shall not see you again before you leave. Good-bye, Howard!"

He bent over and kissed her.

"Good-bye, dear!"

Another minute, and the little carriage had disappeared round the bend of the road.

* * * * * *

Mollie was penitently reading a brief note from Howard Wynne, just delivered at Eloyne Court by the butler from Llanwrist.

There was not much in it, only a few words of regret that he was resistlessly impelled to go his own way in this matter, with an earnest expression of belief that in some, as yet unaccountable way, good would come out of evil.

The letter arrived immediatelyly after breakfast, and she had scarcely read it for the third time, when a mounted messenger from the housekeeper at the Castle, begged for her presence there without delay.

Not staying to even tell anybody of her intended absence, she ordered her ponies, and within the half hour was sitting in the housekeeper's room at Llanwrist.

"It is old Nurse Wyatt, Lady Mollie," said the stately domestic head of Howard Wynne's establishment.

"Sir Howard's old nurse, do you mean, Mrs. Evans?"

"Yes, my lady! And she wants to see you as soon as you can go to her."

"Wants to see me? Why, I don't know her!"

"Well, my lady, she sent word, an hour or more ago, that being as she was suddenly struck for death, she had something of the greatest importance to tell Sir Howard if he would go to her at once."

Digitized by Google

"But Sir Howard is not here!"

"No, my lady, and so I told the boy that brought the message. Back he comes, however, almost directly, with the old woman's request that you would go. I didn't know what else to do, and though I thought it a liberty of her to ask it, sent on to you."

"You did quite right, Mrs. Evans. See that my ponies are put up for an hour, please, and I will walk across the park to the north lodge."

* * * * *

In the little room under the eaves old Rhoda Wyatt lay a-dying, while, sitting by the bedside, Lady Mollie heard from the dry, trembling lips, the most astounding story to which, during her short life, she had ever been fated to listen.

In effect it was this:

On the night of young Martin Trevenna's birth, twenty-nine years before, at Llanwrist Castle, she, Rhoda Wyatt, was in charge of the nursing arrangements connected alike with the advent of the Wynne heir, and with the coming of the little, poor relation.

Mrs. Trevenna, as Miss Wynne, had known the nurse from her own childhood almost, and when she saw that her new-born looked weakly, and needed better nurture than she, as a mere mine-captain's wife, could hope to give it, she tempted Rhoda to exchange the children, in order that she might secure for her own the advantages of a son of the house.

Rhoda Wyatt's task was made easier, in that the same night the suggestion was made, Lady Wynne died, so that no mother's unerring instinct was there to proclaim the substituted babe as an impostor.

"Remember," she said; "I am not responsible—I know nothing."

Satisfied now that her son would, as the reputed heir, have his chances for life increased a hundredfold, and trusting to the chapter of accidents that in some mysterious fashion the wrong would, in the future, right itself, so that no one should suffer by her practically criminal action, Mrs. Trevenna wrote and gave into Rhoda Wyatt's keeping a short, signed statement of that which she had done, which, in the event of her own death, she enjoined upon the nurse to communicate to her own boy without delay.

Mrs. Trevenna died just before young Howard's twenty-first birthday, by which time Rhoda Wyatt had lost the letter. Fearing to make so momentous a statement on her own bare word, and fearing also the consequences of her own share in the matter, she decided to hold her tongue, and let things remain as they were.

It was only now, when death stared her in the face, that she felt she must unburden her mind, and disclose the secret, which, if her story was believed, would change the whole course of two men's lives.

Howard Wynne (so-called) not being at hand to receive the confession, who so fit as the girl of his choice to take it, and to pass it on to one or both of the victims of Mrs. Trevenna's indefensible duplicity and wrong-doing.

It would be difficult to describe Lady Mollie's feelings upon the conclusion of the old woman's narrative. Sorrow for her lover's blighted hopes and prospects, for his sure disappointment, his almost certain social ignominy and shame, filled her heart to breaking-point. But in the presence of the mighty leveller, she could utter no reproach, no condemnation; and so she watched life's light flicker out, closing gently the eyes of her whose tardy revelation consigned the man she loved to a future for which alike by nature and by up-bringing, he was ill-fitted and ill-prepared.

CHAPTER III.

The Old Mine Workings Under the Sea.

During the run across the Bristol Channel, from Milford Haven to Portreath, Martin Trevenna played the game in such fashion, that his cousin, had he been even in the least suspicious, would have been disarmed and at ease.

It was late on the night of the sixteenth of July that the Ariel arrived off Portreath; so late indeed, that after consultation with his skipper, the baronet decided to stand "off and on" outside till the morning.

For some reason this did not appear to fall in with Trevenna's plans, for pleading an appointment with the resident representative of the Tremallick mine, he availed himself of an opportunity for going ashore offered him by the master of an in-bound fishing-smack.

Thoughwondering a little at the other's somewhat feverish haste to land, Howard, it being none of his business, made no remark beyond promising to meet his cousin at nine the next morning at the house of Micah Trevithick, the captain of the mine.

Though as a property of but small value nowadays, the Tremallick, in the opinion of many, only needed money to be spent upon it, to come out a paying concern.

Martin Trevenna's father had possessed a small share in the proprietary, and this having, after his death, devolved upon his son, who, owing to various causes, was now the sole remaining proprietor, Martin had for some time past been seeking capital in order to carry out his ideas of resuscitation.

This being so, his present visit to the mine, with his cousin for companion, was no surprise to anybody, and it was only in the light of after events, that his real motive was disclosed.

As has been said, the mine was situated close to the sea, running under it in fact, at right angles to the coast line almost, for a distance of nearly a mile.

Digitized by Google

When Martin's father met his doom, it was in a desperate endeavour to penetrate the extreme limit of the subterranean workings—the mass of earth, rock, and ore forming the crown of the gallery, which then fell in, walling in the unfortunate man, as in a huge tank, under the ocean bed, which must have immediately filled with sea-water, and at once drowned the explorer.

The present captain's residence was a small hut (it was nothing better) at the shaft mouth. Here Martin Trevenna sought him just before midnight.

The grizzled old Cornishman's reception of his employer was not particularly cordial, or even commonly respectful.

"Look here, Mr. Trevenna, I've done your bidding, but to my mind it seems all wrong and dangerous, the knocking away of those props mid-way in the under-sea working. Mark my words, sir, the crown of the gallery won't stand many hours, and when it does cave in the whole mine will be flooded to sea level, and Tremallick will never give another ounce of copper so long as the world lasts!"

"Pooh, nonsense, man! So long as there is no movement or hammering down there, the place is safe enough. Besides the iron supports to replace the old wood props are on their way from Cardiff, and then you'll have no reason for croaking."

"All right, sir, the responsibility's yours, not mine; only don't ask me to go down again, for I won't! I'll live the rest of my life out natural, if I can."

"Oh, I shall not ask you to risk your skin, but to show you that I have the courage of my opinions, I mean to descend now, and have a look round before taking my cousin, Sir Howard Wynne, down in the afternoon."

"Very well, sir, I won't seek to persuade you to 'keep on the grass.' You know your own business best, I suppose."

"Now you're sensible, Trevithick. Get me a hat and candle, and a suit of overalls, and get yourself ready to go to St. Ives when I come up again. I have a letter and message to send there."

"Right, sir. I'll be ready."

The old man came to the door of the hut and watched Martin Trevenna, the lighted candle flickering in the front band of his old grey slouch hat, disappear from view over the shaft mouth, down the first of a series of ladders placed perpendicularly against the sides of the opening.

* * * * *

It was not Trevenna's first descent by many down the old mine shaft, and he faced the down journey of over five hundred feet without a tremor.

In places the rungs of the ladders were slippery, and in some instances perilously loose and insecure, but with care and prudent deliberation he managed to reach the bottom in safety.

By this time the candle was more than half burnt out, but as he had a supply in his pocket that did not trouble him much.

The limited light almost necessitated the blind man's resource, a feeling with the hands for the gallery opening under the sea.

At last he found it.

Above him, fully a hundred and twenty feet over his head, rumbled, with a sound like to distant thunder, the watery uneasiness of the mighty Atlantic.

Evidently a storm was in progress (it had threatened a gale before he left the Ariel) for to his imagination it seemed that mountain dashed against mountain, as if all the artillery of the world was roaring and booming up beyond the bed of ocean.

Still he crept on, intent upon one thing, the satisfying himself that his instructions had been carried out by old Trevithick.

Stumbling over a baulk of timber he recognised that he had reached his journey's end.

Only one prop remained, hardly sufficient, as the old captain had said, to keep danger off for more than a few hours at most.

"It will last till I get him down here, and then, for the upper air!—and love!—and—What's that?"

He stood a minute and listened intently. Again through the booming of the surge above sounded distinctly a sharp, quick, crack. He listened again, his heart stopping its beating almost, so deep was the mysterious suspense.

Then a louder, longer report, resembling a volley of musketry.

"My God! It can't be!" he half whispered to himself in terror.

Throwing all schemes and plans to the winds he turned swiftly to make for the gallery opening again, and for the bottom of the shaft. But the horror of his situation must have bewildered him, for instead of a free passage, he collided blindly with the gallery wall, his candle going out in the frenzied struggle to pull himself together.

Then out of the black, solid darkness rang a cry, which, if it could have been heard in the upper world, would have frozen the blood in the veins of the very vilest of humankind, so full of agonised and death-dreading despair was it.

Simultaneously with it the whole crown of the gallery at that point seemed suddenly to collapse, and with the triumphant roar, as of the final consummation of all things, the sea swept the tunnel from end to end, and—all was chaos.

* * * * *

It was ten o'clock when Howard Wynne knocked at old Trevithick's door; but to no purpose, for it remained fast shut.

"Twelve," sounded from Portreath Church-tower before the young man saw Trevithick returning along the road from the town.

Mutual explanations resulted in an adjournment to the shaft mouth.

Hastily throwing himself face downwards upon the ground, the old "captain" leant over and listened, making a motion with one hand to his companion for silence.

Even Howard Wynne could detect a faint swishing sound of water in motion.

When in a moment or two Trevithick rose to his feet, it was with a blanched face and trembling limbs.

"Sir," he said, with an awe-stricken catch in his voice, "the end of Tremallick has come, and Mr. Trevenna, God rest his soul!—has seen it!"

"You mean——!"

"That the sea has broken in, as I told him it would, and the son has gone to find his father."

* * * * *

The collapse of the Tremallick mine is talked of to this day on the north coast of Cornwall, but the contemplated crime of Martin Trevenna is hidden in his grave. If old Trevithick suspected anything he died a year or two after the catastrophe without word or sign.

* * * * *

Upon the Ariel's return to Milford Haven, the first to come on board were Lord Eloyne and his daughter, Lady Mollie Doyle.

That which they had to tell Howard Wynne, that he had no right to the name, but that as his dead cousin's next-of-kin, he was now the true and lawful owner of the Wynne title and estates, had, after his joy in the sure and certain possession of Mollie's love, one dominant meaning, namely, that palmists may sometimes arrive at, and prophecy the truth, seeing that on the day and hour indicated by Madame Cecille, Martin Trevenna, otherwise Martin Wynne, tenth baronet, duly met his death.

Ralph Enderby.

Poor Poet!

POET: "How beautiful, how enchanting is the moonlight! There is nothing in nature so poetical. How often have I sung the praises of fair Luna in my poems." She: "Perhaps that's what makes her look so pale."

And Again he Failed.

"WILL you be mine?" he faltered. She looked upon him with disdain. "I thought you knew better!" His head sank upon his breast. "I do," he answered, in a hollow voice, "but they have all refused me, one by one."

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT CUT-PICTURE COMPETITION.

PICTURE No. 2.

Twenty-five Awards of Valuable Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find fifty-four pictorial squares, which when placed together in their proper position will form a complete picture.

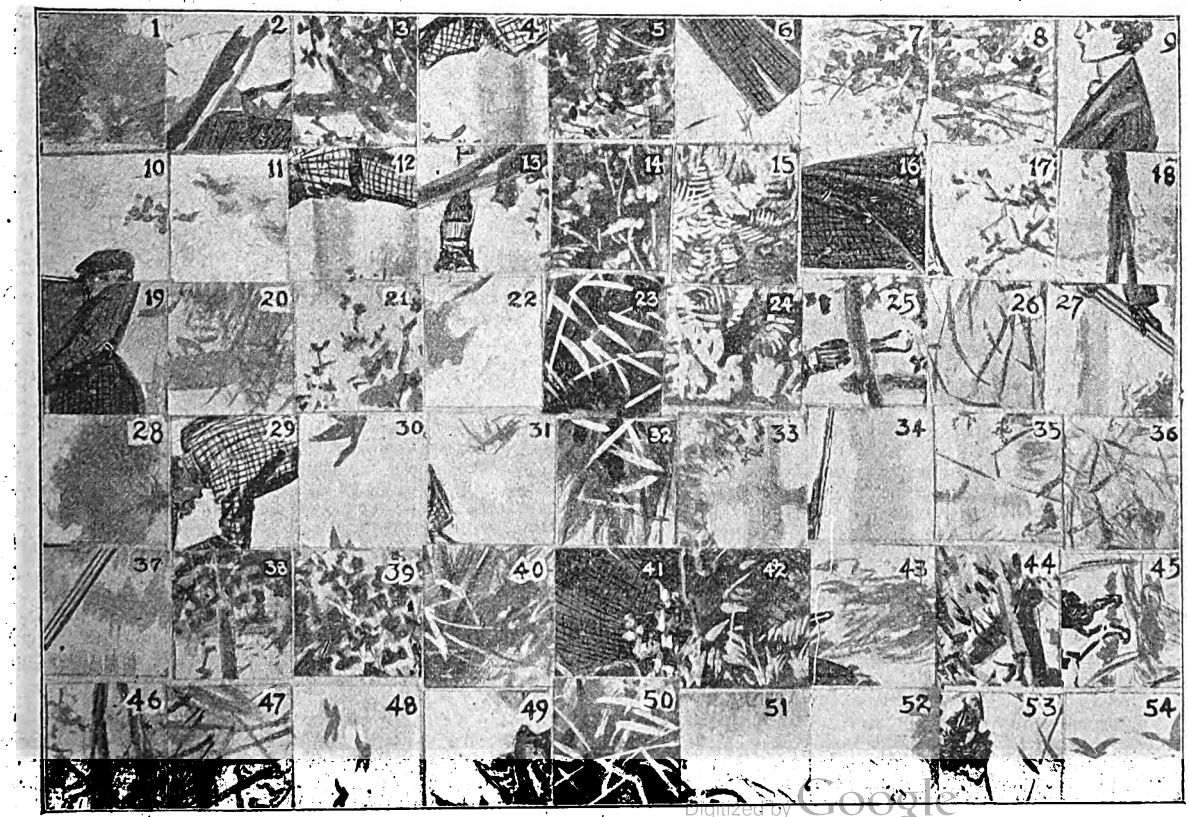
Each square is numbered; that, however, has nothing to do with their correct position, of course. What we want you to do is to cut the jumble below into the fifty-four squares and carefully paste the squares in their correct order on to a sheet of paper.

When you have pasted up the complete picture keep it carefully together with the picture which appeared last week until you get next week's Short Stories containing the final picture. Do not on any account send it in to us before you are told to do so.

The twenty-five prize-winners will each be presented with a Handsome Gramophone.

These machines are beautifully made, fit to grace any drawing-room, and an everlasting source of amusement. With these Gramophones will be given two records.

The Gramophone is one of the most delightful companions for the long winter evenings. None of your friends can talk like a talking machine can, and give you the same amount of fun as it produces. It is the very essence of good and genial companionship, which never tires you. What it says, or what it sings, is always interesting. Once you have heard it you want always to hear it, and it is ever-ready and willing to oblige.



Digitized by Google

Penfold's Hidden Lover.

YOUNG PENFOLD was leaving those comfortable rooms of his in South Street. He had not been very careful with his money of late, and what with one thing and another, there had been little irregularities in regard to the payment of his weekly rent which had led good Mrs. Davies, his landlady, to suggest to him that he should find other quarters.

The luggage the cabman lifted on to the top of his vehicle was not on a very elaborate scale. There was a tin trunk, a couple of worn portmanteaux, and two or three boxes shaped with an unquestionable regard to hats. As he stepped into the cab he gave a final glance at the house where he had spent that last twelvemonth.

They had been a giddy twelve, those months. Could he count the number of supper parties Mrs. Davies had been ruefully summoned to cater for? Could he remember all the gay, boyish faces that had from time to time made merry there with him over countless bottles of wine? No, but still it had been a giddy time.

Now he was to bid farewell—not merely to the house, but to the chapter in his life to which it formed the background. That giddy life was, for the nonce, over. There was now nothing before him but work—hard, very hard work—for the little legacy his dead mother had bequeathed him a year ago was now all gone. He had nothing but his brains. They were good brains he fondly believed.

He had also, what was perhaps as much to the shallow world, a good face, at least, so Annie Garth thought as, from behind a curtain in his late bedroom, she took a last peep at it, as its possessor drove away in the cab. Annie was the housemaid at South Street, who had ministered to Leslie Penfold's needs during that twelvemonth. He had never said an abrupt word to her. If dinner had been late, and had kept him feverishly waiting, he had never been nasty about it. He had always accepted her lame excuses with a forced smile. If he had ever given an order, it had been as a kindly request, prefixed always by a "Would you, please." He had often smiled at her, too, and made a jolly remark, and he had, thought Annie, such a beautiful smile.

And now he was going—perhaps she would never see him again. Perhaps that flitting glance he gave towards the window would be the last that would ever meet hers. The dear boy she had looked after, to whose little wants she had ministered with feelings of delight—unconscious to him—was vanishing. And Annie knew only too well—servants diagnose these things on a system entirely their own—that Penfold was not facing a world of roses as he sped away in that cab. The address he had given for the forwarding of his letters was not a good address. It was far from as "classy" as South Street, and Annie knew, too, that he was not free from financial trouble, and was woman of the world enough to doubt if the boy would meet with much better a fate than most of the gentlemen she had known who "lived by their brains."

These thoughts it was, that accounted for the fact that when good Mrs. Davies entered the bedroom of her departed lodger, she found her faithful domestic sitting by the window in a flood of tears—a headache, she explained—and tears that, even when they did cease, only made way for sobs. Annie Garth had a heart, and, impossible though it seemed, that heart was a present accompanying Leslie Penfold and his belongings on that uninteresting journey to new and smaller lodgings in Bloomsbury.

This was all in the Spring, when people don't very much think about destiny and such things, and Leslie was not particularly downcast or dispirited when he entered those new lodgings. After all, he told himself, he had brains.

But there was to be an Autumn, and Autumn did not find him even in those lesser lodgings in respectable Bloomsbury. We must turn many times to the left and right, cross many mean, tram-lined thoroughfares, and evil-smelling streets, to trace our youth where Autumn found him.

It was not in respectable Bloomsbury, but Clerkenwell; not on the first floor, but the fifth, and in the back, too, that a young fellow sat with his head between his hands that following November. There was not here any neatly-laid meal on a clean tablecloth, awaiting him as he had entered that evening. And he was not wearing that fashionably-cut suit, and one of those spotless collars and neat ties that had in the old days shown his good looks to such advantage. The clothes he wore were threadbare, and his collar had known three days of active service, and a past which left its traces on its frayed edge.

He had not shaved very recently, and his light brown hair hung very shaggily on his head. His eyes were red, too, and underlined by black marks, the revelation of late hours and, perhaps, hard drinking. This was after six months of attempted employment of those brains, the goodness of which he had so confidently trusted the previous Spring.

On the table in front of him lay an outward and visible revelation of those brains in the shape of a manuscript, lying half outside an envelope, and inclosing a little single sheet of printed paper—that callous usher of evil, the editorial rejection form. Penfold had known many of these, and most of them had merely caused him a passing spasm of disappointment. He had never known despair, for, despite his worn appearance, he still hoped and trusted in those brains of his. But this last returned manuscript fell less lightly on him. He had not eaten much that day, and it was a matter of speculation where he should eat the following day. Under previous circumstances that would have troubled him little.

But to-night they were not. He felt, for the first time almost in his life, that insidious fever of depression which is the invariable forerunner of despair. In a moment it had overwhelmed him. A dark flash came to his eye, and he clenched his fists, and walked absently round the room. He opened the window hurriedly, and glanced down at the crowded street a hundred feet below. He wondered if there were palings at the bottom, and, remembering there were, closed the window. He glanced round the room as though seeking for something, but apparently did not see it. Then, as in a moment of resolve, he seized that faded, soft felt hat, and thrust it on his head, and with that same, wild look, and those clenched fists, he descended the narrow, creaking stairway, and emerged into the street.

He did not notice the figure of a woman standing close by, a woman dressed in neat black. And, as he walked hurriedly down the street, and turned several corners, emerging into Holborn, he did not know that a few yards behind him walked that same, solitary figure. Pausing here and there, as if in thought, he continued his course southward, reaching Fleet Street. It was empty and deserted. Those myriads of newspaper offices, now denuded of their occupants, seemed to mock at him as he passed. They seemed to be shouting welcome to all but himself. Such feelings of despair as had marked his departure from his lodgings increased as he walked down this thoroughfare, which was adding another to the list of the victims of its contemptuous rejection.

Digitized by Google

He wandered into the Temple Courts, silent and gloomy, and finally emerged on to the Embankment. He heard behind him a soft, pattering footstep, but had not looked round. If he had done so, he would have seen a little woman in black. And as he stood on the Embankment gazing into the black river, he little knew he was observed from behind the fence of the Temple Gardens. He stood looking into the water, his hand lightly gripping the stone. The grip was strengthening, he was beginning to raise himself up by his muscles to a seat on the Embankment wall. He was sitting on that wall, and was about to——

"Stop, for God's sake!"

He swung round from his dangerous position on the wall.

"Who are you?" he gasped.

He seemed to recognise the face; he could not remember where he had seen it. He had always had a bad memory, especially for girl's faces.

"Annie," she answered, "Annie Garth. Don't you remember me, Mr. Penfold, the housemaid at South Street? Don't jump over, Mr. Penfold, don't, for — for my sake."

"For your sake, Annie? What can I be to you?"

"You are all the world to me, Mr. Penfold. I have never dared to think of addressing you, but I have seen you often—every week—since you left South Street. I could not bear the idea of losing sight of you, and—but it's very silly."

He had hopped off the parapet to the ground, more with the motion of an athlete in form than a thwarted suicide.

"You, Annie? You love me? Good Heavens, then, there is someone in the world."

He grasped her hands in his.

"Tell me, Annie, how you came to trace me to this dreadful place."

"It is Thursday, sir, and my evening out. Where should I ever be on this night but somewhere where I might see you? As I always do on Thursday, I was waiting outside your lodgings for you to come out, and, as I have always done, I followed you as far as I could keep you in sight."

"But how came you to know where I was? I had drifted there, you know."

"I had found out. The servants had told me your address, and I had spent each Thursday evening outside, waiting for a glimpse of you."

She burst into tears.

"You are the only one in the world to me. You did not know it, but every word you spoke to me when I waited on you went through me. Oh, how mad I am! But at last something seems to have brought us together—the shadow of death. Had it not been the shadow, it would have been death itself, for if you had gone over there," she pointed to the river, "I should have followed you."

He kissed her.

"You have saved me from folly, Annie. You have showed me that my miserable being is something to somebody. Come on, let us forget about the hideous world."

And, her arm in his, he took her with a rapid stride back through the courts, into the Strand, and half an hour after, Fritz, the waiter of a little Italian restaurant, was getting two suppers for a "broken down gent" and a "skivvy," who, chatting as merrily as a pair of young lovers, sat gazing into each other's eyes.

The next day brought the usual-looking dispatch to Penfold. But inside it was not that callous rejection form, but a neat, red cheque for £5. His luck had turned. From that day his old life came back to him. He wrote and wrote, and buoyed up by success, his work grew better and better until it now confronts one's eyes almost everywhere the periodical reader looks. And in a little room in a cosy flat near Holborn sits a little woman, who incessantly types away as he dictates to her. Penfold's wife, Annie, makes an excellent amanuensis.

Vivian Carter.

Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

September 23.—Those whose birthday occurs to-day will have a good year for health, and with care business will progress favourably.

Young girls will have anxiety over their love affairs; letters cause trouble.

The day is good for buying and selling; evil for marriage and pleasure-seeking.

A child born to-day will be very changeable, untidy, and much given to pleasure and the opposite sex.

September 24.—An unfavourable birthday, except to clerks, teachers, and travellers. Avoid speculation and keep business well in hand.

Girls born between four and five p.m. will need to be careful in their love affairs; much deceit and anxiety.

A good day to write letters; evil to ask favours, buy, or change residence.

A child born this day will be clever and ingenious, but improvident, and subject to accidents.

September 25.—A quiet, but rather fortunate year for business, health, and domestic affairs.

Love affairs are very interesting, and girls born near two and five p.m. become engaged or marry.

A good day for visiting, pleasure seeking, marriage, dealing with jewellers, doctors, or military men.

A child born here will be quick, good-tempered, and make many friends. Will be fortunate in business.

September 26.—An unfortunate year is shown; sickness in family; annoyance over business and many minor drawbacks. See to health.

Girls meet with disappointment in love affairs.

The day is evil for signing papers, dealing with elderly people, or buying property, or land.

A child born to-day will be timid, overcautious, and reserved. Should keep in the employ of others.

S ptember 27.—Beware of law, accident and losses during the next year. Insure against fire and mishap.

Young girls will need extra caution and prudence in love affairs.

An evil day to speculate, to make new friends, or engage servants. Beware of mishap from two to seven p.m.

A chi d born here will be unfortunate in life, headstrong, and improvident. If a girl, unlucky in marriage.

September 28.—An active and fortunate year for business. A lot of travel and movement. Many pleasant events occur.

Young girls have a favourable time for their love affairs; if born near four or seven p.m. they will receive offers of marriage.

A child born this day will be fond of travel, and never settle long in one place. Will be clever and of a cheerful disposition.

September 29.—A quiet year is promised, things go much as usual. Rather more favourable for those in employ.

Young girls receive attentions from married men and need care where they place confidence.

The day is good to ask favours, engage servants, and deal with shipping agents, and superiors.

A child born to-day will be rather fortunate. Fond of the mystical and of the sea. Will lack self-confidence.

Asture!.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. FRANCES NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA HAMILTON .	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.
CASELLIS	A man from Jamaica who knows Mrs. Norton's past history.

Frances Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia Hamilton: Her companion.

NEW READERS START HERE.

HAVING arrived in England from a Bruges convent to be companion to my cousin, Frances Norton, I soon discovered that my cousin was taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money were lost and won. The climax came one night when Mary Vernon staked her diamond earrings (a gift from Lord Kinross), and one of the onlookers found them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton.

A few weeks later, my cousin stole a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew, an American millionaire, at the Café Regal.

We moved into a house in Pont Street, and it was here that Sir John Strickland proposed to Frankie, and was refused.

Later on Lord Kinross called at Pont Street for a private interview, and during that interview Percival Hope entered the room unannounced, and made the startling statement that Mary Vernon had discovered the thief who stole her diamonds. Shortly afterwards Frankie left the room; but I stayed, and, unknown to Kinross and Percival Hope, overheard Hope (who turned out to be Kinross' cousin) tell Kinross that in a fortnight's time he would prove that Frankie was an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends.

The next evening Lady Gaveston, Frankie's chaperon, informed her that she didn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decided at once either to marry or refuse him, she would return to Scotland. My cousin was given a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind.

We went to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis-Blount, instigated by jealousy, enticed me to bet heavily, by which I lost £800. Frankie also lost heavily, and to pay our debts, she prevailed upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000.

That same night, at the Duchess of Warminster's ball, my cousin came face to face with Casellis, a man from Jamaica, who knew all about her past life. Percival Hope brought him in. It was a critical moment, but once again Frankie scored, for she managed to buy his silence.

The next day marked the end of the fortnight, during which Hope was to obtain proofs of Frankie's guilt. Owing, however, to Frankie's ingenuity, the indictment failed miserably.

Kinross then formally asked Frankie to be his wife. They were still in conversation when Sir John Strickland arrived, He had not heard of Frankie's engagement.

Before I could stop him he had gone into the room where my cousin and Kinross were talking. At sight of them he staggered and fell in a dead faint. Doctors were called, and pronounced it a paralytic seizure. Toby next called. In three days his uncle's bill must be redeemed. If this was not done he vowed that he would shoot himself.

Frankie being in a desperate strait, then got a large sum of money by worming a state secret out of Dollie Grendale, the wife of an M.P., and selling it to Pettigrew.

Frankie's next adventure was to drug an American billiard player, whose opponent she had backed heavily. Pettigrew was present, and, seeing what was done, accused her when they were alone.

Digitized by Google

FRANKIE REDEEMS HER DIAMONDS.

FOR a minute they faced each other, the man keen and determined, the woman flushed indeed and trembling, but resolute to fight to the last.

"Prove it," she said, "prove it."

"The proof's here in the drink," Pettigrew took up the glass again, "nothing else is wanted."

"Tell that to Lord Kinross, or any other of my friends, and see if they'll accept it as a proof. Something more will be required to convince anyone that a woman in my position drugged a fellow guest, here, in Lord Chesterton's house. We're not in the wilds of Texas, Mr. Pettigrew; we're living under civilised conditions. Such melodramatic happenings don't take place here."

Pettigrew smiled grimly.

"You play the game, Mrs. Norton," he said, "but I'm too old a hand to be bluffed. I'm not likely to mistake the taste of opium for anything else."

"That doesn't say I put it there?"

"I think I can settle that question. I happen to know you want £3,000—want it desperately, want it to-night. I can pretty well fix up the reason why you want it, and I know how you hoped to get it. You stood to win £3,000 from me if Slade lost the match."

"What then?" she asked, defiant still, though her eyes glanced restlessly, fearfully, towards the door, and her face grew white. "What then?"

"You determined at all risks that Slade should lose the match—and the risk you chose was this," and he held up the glass. "Do you want further proof? Do you think I shall have much difficulty in convincing Kinross or any other of your friends that you drugged Slade?"

"What are you going to do?" she asked.

"I shall make the affair public. To commence with, I'll inform Chesterton, Slade too, if he hasn't left the house."

"No!" she cried vehemently. "No!"

"Can you give me any reason why I should not?"

"What good will it do you? After all, nobody has been harmed, Slade will be all right in an hour or two. You haven't paid your bet," she added fiercely. "You haven't lost a penny."

"That's no thanks to you, Mrs. Norton."

"Think of the scandal, the awful scandal it will make. It will ruin me, do you hear?—ruin me—and how will that profit you?"

"It is a thing that no decent man could tolerate," he answered firmly.

Tall, and grim, and square, he stood, unyielding as a rock. Many things it was possible for Hiram Pettigrew to overlook and to forgive, but a mean and treacherous act towards a man whom you called friend, aroused him to passionate indignation. He was long past pity, nothing could touch or soften him.

As I looked at him, I feared poor Frankie's hour had come. It seemed to me that she, who had boasted herself more than a match for any man, at last had found her master.

The next moment I thought differently.

"You think I have acted meanly, despicably," she said, "and in your indignation you think no punishment can be too great. Do you know why you think so? Why are you so bitter and so hard towards me? Because"—she faced him proudly, her eyes ablaze, her head well up,—"because I am a woman. Oh, you may smile, you may deny it, tell yourself a thousand times it is not so. But I know better. Answer me this, if I were a man driven to desperation for the want of money to carry out some scheme, speculation, politics, any of the things by which men make both fortunes and success, would you judge me so hardly for having run so great a risk? If I were a man with a future, a brilliant future before me, would you, because of this one act, crush me, ruin me, spoil my chance for ever?"

"The cases aren't the same. The man as you present him, would have had some urgent reason for the act. You—" he sneered. "What was your reason? You wanted to indulge in some expensive folly, some extravagant freak—if you're not stopped to-day, you'll go to greater lengths to-morrow. When will you stop?"

"When I've attained my end—marriage with Lord Kinross. Can't you understand how hard I've had to fight, how desperately I've had to struggle to get as far as this? How can I help it if I have to use my wits to get out of this, my strength of will to out-manœuvre someone else? You won't treat me as an equal. You wouldn't have played a match at billiards with me to-night, nor employ me on the Stock Exchange to-morrow. And yet there's not a man more capable than I." Then with a swift change she bent towards him.

"As you are strong, be merciful," she said. "I'm not a craven or a coward, but I ask, I beg for mercy."

She clasped her hands round his arm, and looked beseechingly at him.

Pettigrew cleared his throat.

"I'm sorry," he commenced, but she drew closer, clinging tightly to him. He made an effort to disengage himself, but it was only a faint one.

As they stood together, her white face raised to his, there came a sound of footsteps in the hall.

In an agony of terror lest the others should return before my cousin had persuaded Pettigrew to silence, I rushed to the door, hoping to delay them. I was too late, Chesterton had already crossed the threshold. Frankie, watching over Pettigrew's shoulder, saw him enter. In another moment the American would see him, would speak to him, and then—

With a despairing effort she flung her arms round Pettigrew's neck, and reaching up, kissed him on the lips.

Chesterton advancing, saw the embrace. He stopped short with a hurried exclamation. Frankie, in blushing confusion, disengaged herself. Pettigrew stood motionless, silent as a sphinx.

I caught my breath, surely he couldn't tell after—after what had happened. Besides, Chesterton would hardly listen to anything to Frankie's discredit from Pettigrew now.

The American caught my imploring look, and a smile twitched at the corners of his mouth.

"I congratulate you, Mrs. Norton," he said quietly. "You've won—the bet." And with that he departed, with a farewell nod to Chesterton, who returned the salutation somewhat coolly.

His lordship saw us to our carriage in silence. He smiled at me, however, when he said "good-bye." Turning to Frankie he remarked pointedly—

"Does Kinross return soon?"

"To-morrow," answered Frankie.

"I think it's time," he said. Then—"Do you think I'd better advise him not to leave town again just yet?"

"I know he's always glad of your advice, Lord Chesterton. But," she bent forward, leaning out of the carriage window, "if you tell tales, so shall I."

"My dear Mrs. Norton, I protest——"

Frankie interrupted with a laugh.

"I've not forgotten Mrs. Curtis-Blount," she said, "neither has Cynthia. Home, Fletcher," she called to the coachman, and we drove off, leaving his lordship quite discomfited.

I was too nervous and

Digitized by Google

excited with all I had gone through to wish to talk that night, but Frankie showed an unusual disposition to chatter.

"I never thought I could persuade him, Cynthia. I never should if Chesterton hadn't arrived just at the critical moment. I am so thankful, so delighted. It's glorious to win a fight with a man like that against you."

"Frankie, did you really mean all that you said about Pettigrew's judging a man differently from a woman?"

She shrugged her shoulders.

"I don't know if I believe it—but it's true. Look, Cynthia," she leant towards me, tilting her face in her hands—a rose leaf 'twixt two lilies. "What value do you think my cleverness would be to me without my face? Brains are all a man wants to get on in the world, they're no good to a woman without beauty."

"But you have both, Frankie."

"Yes, so I beat both men and women."

I pondered over what she said. Frankie had never spoken like that before, at any rate, I had not heard her. Her speech to Pettigrew much impressed me. It sounded a little like a speech I had heard at a political meeting I'd attended with Lady Gaveston, a meeting in favour of giving women votes.

Frankie had always warned me not to be political, she said it was the last refuge of disappointed spinsters, and that no man would tolerate them at any price.

I came to the conclusion that Frankie must have read the report of the speech I mentioned, she couldn't have said that sort of thing herself.

The next morning I woke early, troubled with the reflection that Kinross was returning that evening to accompany Frankie to Lady Daventry's dance, and that despite all her manœuvring, my cousin had not been able to get the money for her diamonds.

I expected to find Frankie horribly depressed, but, on the contrary, she was in the highest spirits. She had put on a delightful gown of pale blue linen, and wore a knot of cornflowers in her belt.

"Somebody's coming to see me this morning, Cynthia," she said. "Guess?"

Of course I mentioned every name but the right one; Kinross, Percival Hope, Chesterton, Cassilis.

"Wrong every time," she cried. "You little goose, who should it be but Pettigrew?"

"Surely not, after last night?"

"What happened last night will make him come all the more. There"—as the door bell sounded, followed by a sharp, short knock. "I knew I was right, that's he. Come, Cynthia," she took my hand, "we'll beard the lion together."

Hiram greeted her in his usual fashion, friendly and admiring.

"You're looking very well," he said, "and seem quite pleased to see me. Perhaps you can guess why I'm here?"

"Of course I can. You've come to pay your debts. You're going to hand me over the £3,000 I won last night."

Her audacity took my breath away. Pettigrew, however, seemed amused by it.

"I do admire you, Frankie," he said with a drawl.

It was the first time he'd used my cousin's Christian name. Somehow I did not like the way in which he said it.

"I always knew you had good taste," she answered.

"It's an expensive luxury at times," he said, and looked straight at her.

She laughed.

"I find it so," she said. "What of my cheque, Mr. Pettigrew?"

"I haven't my cheque-book with me—or my pocket-book, the one you gave me, either."

"That's of no consequence. You can write 'pay bearer so much' on a sheet of note-paper. It will hold good."

"I'm not signing anything like that this morning."

"I think you are. I will go further and say I'm sure you are."

"You're clever, Mrs. Norton."

"Sometimes, not always. To-day, for instance, I fee too utterly soft-hearted. A child could impose on me."

"A mighty cute child it would have to be."

"You're fond of children, Mr. Pettigrew?"

"I am. My own are both grown up, and I'm half sorry that they've left off being small. I've two sons, Mrs. Norton, one sixteen, the other twenty."

"I shall hope to know them some day."

Pettigrew smiled inscrutably, somehow I fancied he did not share the hope.

"You haven't told me how your wife is, Mr. Pettigrew? I trust she's better? She must feel your being away from her so often?"

There was a suggestion of malice in the speech, but he ignored it.

"Thank you, Mrs. Pettigrew is better. She suffers with her heart; so long as she is quiet she is fairly well, but anything in the nature of excitement upsets her directly. I'm told a shock of any kind would have a very bad effect."

"How sad. You must keep unpleasant things from her at any cost."

"I do. My wife has every care."

He did not speak with much enthusiasm, I thought; there was no tenderness in his voice such as had crept in when he mentioned his sons.

"It would be a bad thing for your boys to lose their mother," she said.

He nodded and displayed a wish to change the conversation.

Frankie relentlessly kept him to the point.

"It's a shame that the woman always has to stay at home, while a man can roam at will. A wife gets all sorts of fancies in her head when her husband is away, and then"—Frankie rose and went to her escritoire—"people say such hard things. No one is ever safe from gossip. What with paragraphs and interviews and what Society says and does facing one in every paper, it's a wonder anybody's name escapes. Have you seen this"—as she spoke she picked up a paper, apparently a press cutting, and held it towards Pettigrew.

"It's a proof of an article that's going into next week's Gossipy Notes. I'll read you a paragraph, it will interest you."

"The latest society beauty is adding daily to the ranks of her admirers," she commenced. "On dit the last addition is a certain wealthy American who is more than a little infatuated. It is suggested that sensational developments are expected likely to lead to a cause célèbre in the divorce courts."

"Well," said Frankie. "What do you think of that?"

"It's pretty scandalous. I suppose the beauty referred to is yourself?"

"Precisely."

"And the—American?" She looked up in his face.

"Can you doubt it is yourself?"

"Well, if you don't mind," he said, "it won't affect me."

"No?" She put down the paper and came quite close to him. "But your wife—what of her?"

Their eyes met in a quick challenge.

"She is delicate, you know, and can't stand the least excitement," Frankie's voice was mocking, "she is jealous and exaggerates trifles into happenings of great importance. Oh"—as he made a gesture of denial, "I know what I'm saying, you're not the only person who finds out other people's affairs. I have studied your family history to some purpose. If your wife sees this," she glanced at the proof, "she will magnify it, enlarge upon it, she will throw herself into an illness, and in a burst of outraged affection make the affair a nine days' wonder in the press. Then"—Frankie threw out her hands—"your domestic peace is shattered, your wife a helpless invalid, your sons estranged, worse than all your credit damaged, now shall she see it?" Frankie advanced and stood triumphantly before him.

Pettigrew's face grew dark, his mouth tightened, and he clenched his hands. For a moment I thought passion would get the better of him, but with an effort he mastered himself.

"Your price?" he said.

Frankie swept him a deep courtesy. "I only ask my own,"

Digitized by Google

she said, "three thousand pounds in payment of my bet."

Without another word he sat down at the escritoire, and taking a sheet of note-paper wrote out a cheque for the amount.

Frankie smiled and thanked him sweetly.

The millionaire did not respond. "We've tried two falls, Mrs. Norton," he said slowly, "and each time you've come out, as the boys say, on top. I never bear malice, I always own when I am beaten. Only"—he turned and looked at her keenly—"beware the third." He left without another word. Frankie, in a fever of excitement, rang for the carriage, and tore off to redeem her diamonds.

She went straight to her room when she returned and remained there the rest of the day. Not till Lord Kinross called to take her to the dance did she appear.

She was looking exquisitely lovely. A shade paler than usual, there was a suggestion of delicacy in the waxen skin, the heavy lidded eyes. Her gown a shimmering tissue of gold, sewn with pearls and glittering with tiny rubies, was a cream. In her hair she wore a ruby star, and the diamonds—the diamonds that had cost so dear—were round her throat.

Kinross was very tender to her. She looked so young and so fragile, so appealing, with a touch of sadness in her eyes—and a pathetic droop to her mouth. Quite unlike the brilliant Frankie we all knew so well.

Lady Gaveston, in snuff-coloured satin with chrysanthemums to match, was entirely pleased with herself, and condescended to express approval of my frock. I wore lettuce green chiffon over seashell pink, with pink carnations in my hair.

The evening was a great success, the theatricals were good and the tableaux better.

Frankie as usual created a sensation, and hadn't dances enough to satisfy half the demand.

The event of the evening was the arrival of a certain Grand Duke, who condescended to grace the assemblage for a short time. Among his aides-de-camp was a Hungarian, one of the most magnificent creatures I have ever seen, very tall, handsome and most distinguished, his litho figure set off by his splendid uniform blazing with orders.

He asked almost immediately to be presented to my cousin; they met in the middle of the room, the handsomest man and woman there.

As he bent over her hand I saw a faint flush steal over my cousin's face, her eyes drooped, she seemed to lose her self-possession.

What could it mean, she who never knew timidity?

Later I learnt the reason. It was one fraught with danger—danger to Frankie, to the Hungarian—danger to me.

Much, much was to date from that meeting.

(The outcome of this meeting will be told next Tuesday. This series began in No. 702 of SHORT STORIES. Back numbers may be ordered through any newsagent.)

Your Editor Chats.

THIS week I would impress upon readers the usefulness of the Gramophones which are being offered in connection with SHORT STORIES. Each instrument, together with two records, is worth £2 17s. 0d., and will give an enormous amount of pleasure to those who are lucky enough to secure them. The instruments are remarkable for their power, and the human voice is reproduced with such exactness that it is practically impossible at a distance to tell whether a person is singing or whether it is the Gramophone.

Moreover, it is possible to make money out of the Gramophone by hiring it out at concerts or musical evenings during the winter. It is quite possible to make ten or fifteen shillings a week in this manner. So that you see, if you win a Gramophone it may be the means of considerably adding to your income.

MISS MADGE MORRIS ALL RIGHT AGAIN.

I am happy to be able to tell you that Miss Madge Morris has quite recovered from the shock which she received as the result of being thrown out of a hansom cab. As you will see, she has now resumed her duties as conductor of the feature "In Confidence."

THE TARTAN COVERS.

Several lady readers have written to tell me that the Tartan covers which have already appeared on SHORT STORIES have been used by them for pasting up in scrap books. Sometimes the complete Tartan has been pasted in, at others, a framework of Tartan has been placed around some picture or other, forming a very pretty frame. This idea is certainly a bright one and I recommend it to all those readers who keep scrap books.

Another correspondent wants to know how many Tartans we are going to produce. . . . They will appear at intervals for some time to come, and will form quite a valuable collection when they are all published.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Cousin Goldbags.

In which Love and a Fortune are Offered as Alternatives.

Poor George Clements! To look at him as, morning by morning, he passed up the same street, crossed the road at the same point, met the same fellow-worker on the same spot opposite the same shop, was to realise that the man whose life was so monotonous was indeed in need of sympathy. And truly Fate had not been kind to George Clements—until lately. The afterthought of "until lately" is the addition he himself would have made if anyone had so spoken to him.

Bereft of his mother, and with a father rendered hopelessly incapable by an accident, he had been thrown at an early age on his own resources. A clerkship in a London firm, very long hours for very small pay, had been his lot since then, and that was fifteen years ago. He had laboured hard for all those fifteen years with scarcely a break, but his advancement was terribly slow and the drain on his purse heavy, for he and his married sister in the north shared the expense of supporting the poor old father in something like comfort. They came of an independent family, and so it came about that after fifteen years of laborious work George Clements had still no money in the savings bank.

About thirty months before this time he had taken a trip into the country—his one holiday—and there he had fallen in with two companions who, it appeared, were distant relatives. They patronised him rather, it is true, but to him anything was better than the deadly monotony of the same morning walk, the same high office stool, which was beginning to eat into his soul, and it was on his return that his life—as he put it—began.

For now he noticed another who came out of a house a few doors below his own, walked up the street at the same time as he did, crossed at the same corner. It was a girl in her twenties, in a simple black dress—how neatly arranged—with soft, brown hair, a pale, tired face, and a certain sweet dignity of manner; for Jenny—dear, gentle Jenny—was a lady, alone now and penniless, who worked for a living wage.

Chance threw them directly in contact with each other one day, and an acquaintance was formed which soon developed into a friendship, and this still sooner into unavowed love. For Clements was too poor to marry, and Jenny could bring nothing towards a home. Still, it had come to be tacitly understood between them that if, and when it was possible, they would join their little, sad fortunes; and so, perhaps, George Clements was not so "poor" after all. He would not bind her, for he was independent and honest, and Jenny must be free to make a better marriage as was only her due, so he said to himself, but Jenny thought otherwise.

And now Fate suddenly remembered the toiling clerk.

There came to the boarding-house where he lived a breezy old gentleman, an old gentleman gruff of voice and kind of eye; a dictatorial old gentleman who laid down the law to the landlady till she was quite bewildered, and then filled her children's pockets with sweets. An eccentric old gentleman, who tipped the crossing-sweepers and helped nervous ladies across the street. He installed himself in the house, this hale, bluff, hearty old man, turned everything upside down until he was thoroughly comfortable, which, curiously, at the same time made everybody else thoroughly comfortable, and then settled down to an indefinite stay. He seemed to take a fancy to "poor George Clements," and was always ready to scold him, lecture him, advise him, encourage him, cheer him, and from whom he drew out all the story of his grey, uneventful life.

It was some three months after his arrival that one evening he called the younger man into his room, and then proceeded to double lock the door, and draw a heavy curtain across it.

"Sit down, my boy, sit down," said he, heartily. And Clements obeyed, feeling considerably puzzled. "You didn't know," said the old man after an embarrassed pause, "that I was a relation of yours. I thought not. No, don't speak"—he held up his hand imperatively—"yet I am a sort of uncle to you. I have hunted it all out, and yet four months ago I had never even heard of your existence. I have lived all my life in America, far out in the backwoods for many years, and the country has been kind to me and brought me in money by the sackful. And now this is how I found you out. You passed a holiday two years ago at Cavemore, didn't you? Yes, I thought so"—up went the hand again—"and met two of your relatives there, very cock-a-hoop young men. Well, I was there a few months back, and those same two soon hunted me up. Oh, yes; it was 'Cousin Dawes Cousin Dawes' from morning till night. Cousin Goldbags was what they meant. I told them at last—ha, ha!—that poor relations of mine should never touch my dollars, and it was wonderful how they proved to me that they were fine young gentlemen farmers. And from them I learnt of you, my lad—that hint about the poor relations had put them off the scent—and so I came to this house just to see you, my boy."

He clapped the other on the shoulder, blew his nose loudly, and then went on:

"And why did I want to see you? To find out whether I liked you well enough to—— My boy, I'm a very rich old chap, and I haven't got an heir, and I want someone who will be a son to me. Well, what do you think of it?"

He brought out his great proposal so abruptly and boldly at the end that for a few minutes Clements sat stunned. What, no more drudgery, no more deferred hopes, and Jenny—dear, sweet Jenny—to be his at last; his to surround with comfort and beauty, his to protect against all pain and evil as his heart had often ached to protect her!

The old man turned back from the window, where he had been gazing out on the street.

"Well, my boy?" he said. George looked up. His eyes were full of tears and his hands trembled.

"Sir," he gasped, "thank you! God bless you——" and here his voice failed.

His benefactor fidgeted about the room, altering the ornaments, moving the chairs, even opening and shutting the door; but at last, coming to a halt in front of his visitor, he broke out in his gruff voice and most dictatorial manner:

"But I must make some conditions."

"Dear Mr. Dawes," cried Clements, who had somewhat recovered himself, "what could I refuse you? Your great kindness—but I cannot find words to thank you, sir; only I would like to say that I am most gratefully and entirely at your orders."

The old man nodded approvingly.

"I belong to America," he said, "and I am going back at once. We will go together." He brought his fist down upon the table. "You must leave this life behind you. You are not happy here, so you won't mind, and I do not wish to be reminded of it either. You must break with your present surroundings entirely, sir. This is what I want you to do."

Clements raised his head, his face slowly turning white. It was a sturdy, honest face, and now the mouth tightened into lines of invincible determination.

Digitized by Google

"Mr. Dawes," he said, "if that includes Jenny, I can't accept your offer. I couldn't desert Jenny, sir; not for any money you or anyone else could offer."

"But don't you see, you silly fellow? You're not formally engaged?"

"No, sir."

"And it's very unlikely if you stay as you are that you'll ever be able to marry. You break no pledge; you even give up no happiness of which you are sure. Now, with me and the position my money gives us, you can marry any lady you please. Come, my boy, you surely won't throw all your future away upon a chance!"

"That can't be helped, sir. She trusts me, and comes to me with her affairs, and I look after her as best I can. I can't desert Jenny, sir. Even though I could never marry, still, here I am at her side, and I can do much for her protection in many ways, and that is sufficient happiness for me. Thank you, sir, for all your proposed kindness, but I couldn't desert my Jenny."

Clements lifted his head with unconscious dignity as the emphatic words that put all success for ever beyond him fell from his lips.

"Listen to him!" broke in the old man testily. "I offer him everything, I propose making him my heir, a man who has no claim upon me, and whom I had never even heard of before this year, and he throws it all back in my face. You'll accept, sir, oh, yes, easily enough, as if you were doing me the favour, on the principle of taking all and giving nothing, and throw it up ungratefully the moment I ask for any return. Without even reflecting for a time over my condition, without paying me such a small compliment as that. Oh, no, I'm the hard taskmaster at once; my offer is rejected, flung back in my teeth, and all because of what—because of a chance when you are a decrepid old man of being able to marry a woman who will probably be in her grave by that time. There, get out of my room!"

"Sir," said Clements, rising, "I am, indeed, most grateful to you for your undeserved——" But his uncle waved him impatiently to the door, and he crept sadly away.

He spent a sleepless night, and Jenny cast many a troubled look at him the next morning as they trudged side by side to their work. He was very gentle to her, very protective, and once he stopped and bought her a tiny bunch of flowers, offering it almost apologetically. She had been so nearly an heiress, he mused wearily, for it was already as "Jenny's fortune" that he had thought of the proposals of yesterday. As it had haunted him all the night, so it haunted him all the day—that offer of yesterday that had so suddenly opened up a vista of happiness before him only to withdraw it even more abruptly.

It was Saturday—happy Saturday—and he was free at an early hour, but instead of waiting for Jenny as was his wont, he dragged himself sadly back to the boarding-house and up to his room, tired in body and mind. The first thing that caught his attention was an envelope on the empty table, and mechanically he picked it up and opened it. The next moment he started back in amazement, almost in fear, for there fell out of the paper and slowly drifted to the floor, a fifty-pound banknote and with it a torn leaf, on which were scrawled a few words.

George Clements was trembling; almost reverently he replaced the money on the table. Was this really to go towards that almost impossible home for Jenny, or was there some condition attached again that would wrest the banknote from him as it had wrested his hope of a fortune?

In an agony of apprehension he bent down for the letter. It had slipped under a piece of furniture, and he spent a feverish five minutes before he could capture it.

It contained only a couple of lines in a crochety scrawl, and wonderingly he pieced out the hieroglyphics.

"To buy an engagement ring for Miss Jenny. She will explain it all."

He stared at the paper in mute astonishment. It was from Mr. Dawes; he had guessed that from the beginning, but—but this was such a contradiction. And what did Jenny—dear Jenny—know about it?

A flash of light burnt in his eyes which a moment before had been dull with disappointment and sleeplessness. There was something behind this—something he had not guessed at—something that suggested a hidden hope. Vague possibilities began to crowd in on his brain, at times threatening, but always opening out in the end into wide dreams of an intangible, happy future. Jenny knew—he must see Jenny at once.

Then, snatching up his hat, he bounded down the stairs and out into the street. Had he ever moved so boyishly before? Had such a rainbow-tinted vision ever flashed before his eyes in the past with such suggestions of a probable fulfilment! A minute brought him to Jenny's lodgings; he was in the sitting-room; the door was opening; it was Jenny's own sweet face that he saw.

But now suddenly a bashfulness fell upon him, a terrible fear lest his golden hopes were to be broken again and for ever. He could only murmur hoarsely:

"Tell me! tell me!"

She stopped his stammering words with uplifted hand.

"I think you ought to read this," she said simply.

She held out a letter to him, and his blurred eyes recognised the handwriting. Eagerly he took it from her, and she half turned away as if to hide her face as he opened it and began to scan the lines:

"DEAR MISS JENNY,—You have won a heart of gold. I am his uncle, and I have lived in this house for three months on purpose to satisfy myself about him, and I am now about to give a signal proof of my opinion. I am a very rich old man, and I long ago determined not to leave my money to any relation who set it above other ideals. In my search for such a man I travelled far, and I never knew before I started on this hunt what crowds of blood relations I possessed. But they none of them satisfied me. Quite recently I heard for the first time of the existence of George, and I came up to London with small hope of satisfaction so far as he was concerned. He soon put my doubts to rest, Miss Jenny, and last night I offered to make him my heir but on condition that he sacrificed you, my dear. I do you the honour of believing that you will understand my reason, and he has fully justified my trust in him. As I expected, he flung back my proposal, and even without hesitation. I need not tell you that after this I have adopted him as my son. And you, my child, come and be a daughter to a lonely old man who needs a little love very badly. George knows nothing of all this—I have left him to hear it from your own lips.

God bless you, my dear,

"PHILIP DAWES."

Clements looked up at the girl. A bright colour burnt in her cheeks as she drooped shyly over the table, and as he gazed, a gentle tear gathered and lost itself unheeded in the lace at her breast. She raised her head and her sweet eyes met his, now as bright and eager as any boy's.

The letter fell to the ground between them as he stretched out his arms.

"Jenny!" he called softly.

* * * * *

A month later, a brisk old gentleman and two younger companions, evidently a newly-married couple, stood upon the deck of one of the great ocean liners and watched the blue English shores slowly dip below the horizon. The father—or so he seemed—turned to the husband and wife, and his bright eyes were twinkling as he saked:

"Well, Mrs. Jenny, and have you forgiven me yet for my horrible treachery to you?"

The lady was hanging on his arm, and she only smiled in reply. It is curious how much a smile can be made to mean by a pretty woman.

J. Pritchard.

Digitized by Google

The Man of the Miniature.

Or, in Love with a Portrait.

No one suspected that the visit to that old country house would leave an impression on the mind of seven-year-old Agnes Wilton that the course of her life in later years would be materially affected by it. Her mother, Mrs. Wilton, certainly did not suspect it. Yet, so it was.

It was a quaint house, not a large one, but full of curious antique furniture and ornaments, dating back to the early years of the reign of George III. There were strange brass candlesticks, miniatures of persons who had flourished about the year 1800—in short, it was more like a curio shop than a dwelling house. Its owner was Mrs. Monmouth, an old lady of sixty, or thereabouts, whose dress and manners were old-time, and in complete accordance with the furniture and all that surrounded her.

Mrs. Monmouth had been the bosom friend of Mrs. Wilton's mother, and Mrs. Wilton felt it incumbent on her to pay the old lady a visit from time to time. While her mother was talking to her hostess, Agnes decided that she could roam over the house and inspect all the curious things it contained.

The oaken chests attracted her, with their ornamental carvings of goblin heads; the great, four-post bedstead was an object of awe, but the hand-painted miniatures interested her more than anything else. She went from room to room in search of a fresh one, and at last entered an apartment where she espied one that captivated her entirely.

The others had been of elderly men and women, but this one was the portrait of a young man, probably of five-and-twenty years, with a bright, handsome face, merry-looking eyes, and a firm mouth just curved for a smile. Agnes was too young to read those details, but she was charmed by the general appearance of the young man, and the position of the lips, denoting a desire to laugh, impressed her greatly. A pleasant smile always attracts children, and Agnes was emboldened to take the miniature from the bracket and gaze at it more intently.

"If you were my uncle I should love you very much!" she decided, turning the miniature at different angles, and noting that the eyes appeared to follow her at every turn.

She looked at the back of the gold setting, and there she saw two locks of hair, one dark and the other fair, with the initials H. F. The discovery did not interest her particularly, so she again looked at the face.

"Agnes!"

Her mother's voice recalled her to herself. She hurriedly replaced the miniature, and ran downstairs to answer the call. They went into the garden, but Agnes took no notice of the flowers that were growing, nor did she remember how long they stayed with Mrs. Monmouth; all her thoughts were centred on the miniature.

Agnes never visited the house again, and the memory of it faded from her mind, except that she retained a hazy vision of the face in the miniature. She went away to school and developed into a beautiful maiden ere the recollection of that face was brought back to her in all its vividness. She seemed to recall the smile, and that it was a face to love, but the whole picture did not come back to her till Fate threw the miniature once more into her hands.

Whether it was that the love of the antique was born in her, or whether that childish impression had engendered the fondness for ancient things, she could not determine, but the fact remained that she developed a great liking for antiques and curios. She was constantly on the watch for small "bargains" of that description, such as she could afford out of the generous supply of pin money allowed by her father. Among her young lady friends she was secretly regarded as a bit of a crank on the subject, and they wondered how so charming a girl could bestow so much attention on musty, out-of-date articles.

There was one curio dealer, in a little shop situated in an off-street in a large West End thoroughfare, who knew Miss Wilton very well. She was often in his shop, looking for things that she was able to buy, and admiring other articles which were beyond the limits of her purse. When anything likely to suit Miss Wilton came into his hands he invariably reserved it for her to have the first chance of acquiring it.

"Good morning, Miss Wilton," said the curio dealer one morning, as Agnes entered the shop, "I have something here which appears to be in your line."

"Oh, what is that?" queried Miss Wilton, with evident interest. "Let me see it, please."

The shopkeeper brought a small, cardboard box from the back of the dingy office and placed it on the counter. Removing the lid and a layer of tissue paper, he drew out an object that made Agnes utter a cry of surprise and pleasure.

"I believe it is the very one!" she cried, taking it from him. "Yes, it is! The miniature I saw in that old country house, and there are the two locks of hair, and the initials at the back!"

It all came back to her. There was the handsome face, the merry eye, the lips parted ready to smile. The costume of the early years of the nineteenth century—the frilled shirt, the scarlet coat and the stock round the neck. Agnes gazed at it with eager eyes.

"I must have it!" she declared. "Where did you get it, and how much do you want for it?"

The dealer smiled at her eagerness, but he was too honest and too partial to his beautiful young customer to take advantage of her enthusiasm and raise the price.

Digitized by Google

"It was brought here about a week ago by a respectable old lady, who said it was hers, and who wanted to sell it. I did not doubt that it was her own property, and, to speak the truth, I believe she was very hard up. Quite an old woman I should say, although she carried her years well. I'll let you have it for five shillings more than I paid her; I think that's fair—I must earn a living out of my business."

"Hard up!" echoed Agnes. "Poor old lady! But you have her address?"

No, he had not asked for it. Agnes was disappointed, for she knew how small a chance there was of finding the old lady and helping her. She was positive that the seller of the miniature was Mrs. Monmouth.

It was with rather a sad heart, in spite of her pleasure at having secured the miniature, that she returned home.

Her mother smiled and quieted her fears; the dealer had no positive information and, moreover, the old lady was well-connected, and her relations would not have allowed her to be in want. Mrs. Wilton had lost sight of Mrs. Monmouth, who had removed from the old house.

Had Agnes' friends known how she treated that miniature they would have felt perfectly justified in calling her a crank. There was a ring in the setting, and Agnes attached a gold chain to the miniature, passing the chain round her neck, and wearing the miniature in the bosom of her dress. Often and often when alone, she drew forth the treasure and gazed long and earnestly at the features of that young gallant of a century ago, whose features appeared so real, so life-like, that she sometimes looked up, fancying that the original might have stepped into the room unawares and be smiling at her admiration.

At night, before retiring, she hung the miniature on a nail over the head of her bed, and one night she laughed confusedly as she caught herself saying—"You will act as a protecting spirit. I can imagine that you were a strong and honourable defender of our sex when you were alive. With you near her, a woman need fear no danger!"

"How foolish I am!" Agnes exclaimed. "Yet, I think my opinion is correct. I am sure it is! Alive? It seems as if he ought to be alive and just like that, but he is—dead!"

Her gaiety vanished, a troubled expression overspread her lovely features, and she sighed unconsciously as she turned from her contemplation of the miniature to that of her own reflection in the mirror.

Two days later there came an invitation to a fancy-dress ball, which threw Agnes into an ecstasy of delight.

"Do you know, mamma, that is the very opportunity I have been waiting for!" she declared. "Ever since I discovered that old-style dress in the chest upstairs I have been looking for a chance of wearing it. Now it has come. The dress fits me fairly well, and with a few alterations and a little touching up, it will do splendidly."

Mrs. Wilton laughed.

"I suppose the dress belonged to some ancestor of your father, Agnes. I really cannot understand why it was so carefully preserved, but that is how things happen in this world. The mother saves it for the daughter, who venerates it because it was her mother's, and she hands it down to her daughter, who, not having known much of her grandmother, doesn't set much store by it, and keeps it to please her mother. In time, the old thing is turned out by some practical descendant, who doesn't want useless articles. I don't believe anyone knew what was in that chest. Well, wear it if it pleases you."

Agnes arrayed herself in the ancient gown and ruffle, and did her hair after the fashion of long ago. She looked quite like a grand young lady of the Georges'; one might have fancied the Regent bowing to her and requesting the favour of a dance. Agnes thought something of the same kind, but with this difference—that instead of the future George IV. standing in front of her, it was H. F., the man of the miniature.

Agnes was all excitement during the intervening days, but at length the great evening arrived. She created envy and admiration in the ballroom, for she was the prettiest girl there, and her quaint costume became her marvellously. Round her neck was a chain, the end of which disappeared within the front of her bodice. It is needless to say that the miniature was attached to the chain.

Agnes' eyes wandered over the room in search of someone, and just a shadow of disappointment clouded her bright face.

"I felt certain that I should meet him here," she murmured. "Yet it was foolish, I suppose! But that dream last night was so real. He came up to me and was about to speak, my heart seemed to give a bound of delight, and then I awoke! I wonder what he was going to say?"

She was seated in a quiet corner just then, while Mrs. Wilton was chatting to a friend near by. She drew forth the miniature and gazed at it longingly. Her mother's voice caused her to put it away hastily.

"My dear Agnes, we must be making our way to the scene of action and not sit here in this quiet nook. Whatever made you bring that portrait?"

"Part of the costume, mother dear!" replied the girl brightly, affecting not to notice the tone of reproof and vexation. "Oh!"

Mrs. Wilton, startled by the exclamation, followed the direction of her daughter's glance, and also uttered a little "Oh!"

"There he is, coming this way!" murmured Agnes.

"That young man looks just like the portrait—your miniature, I mean, Agnes! How extraordinary!"

Two gentlemen were approaching, one was an elderly man who looked inelegant in a cavalier's dress, and the other was a handsome young fellow who, as Mrs. Wilton remarked, was exactly like the treasured portrait. If Agnes had looked pretty previously, she now became positively bewitching as the colour mounted to her cheeks and her eyes sparkled with joy.

"May I introduce my friend—Harry Fairfax——"

That was all that Agnes heard. Her brain was in a whirl for a few seconds, and when she recovered her self-possession she was seated next to him, and he was talking to her.

"Do you know, Miss Wilton, I was afraid that I should find no one here with a costume corresponding with mine chronologically. My friend, Mr. Bateman, was even willing to bet on it, and I was so sure that he would win that I declined the offer. But I had not been here five minutes before I saw you, and I maintain that our costumes match exactly. It is almost as if we had known each other, but——"

"I seem as if I do know you, although we have never met," said Agnes shyly. "Is this not like you?"

She drew the miniature from its hiding place and held it out to him. He stared at it in amazement.

"It certainly is!" he exclaimed. "But where did you get it?"

Agnes briefly explained.

"Your name, too, is 'H. F.' is it not?" she asked. "Can it be the likeness of a member of your family?"

"Mrs. Monmouth," he mused aloud, "I seem to have heard the name. That portrait must be the likeness of my great-great-grandfather. We have a similar one of his brother, and it was from that miniature that I got the idea of dressing in this fashion. I have been told that I resemble my ancestor. I bear the same name, certainly. Mrs. Monmouth was probably his daughter, the sister of my—— Oh, I forget who, but that doesn't matter! Do you know, Miss Wilton, I envy you!"

"Why?" asked Agnes wonderingly, and she could not help observing how, at that moment, he resembled the portrait. It was the same curve of the lips, ready for a smile, the same merry eyes.

"Because you have known me so long, and I have only just made your acquaintance!" he answered pointedly. "See what an immense advantage you have had over me!"

There was no time to reply, for the first dance was beginning and Agnes was claimed for it, but she could not hide the tell-tale blush which made Harry Fairfax wish to push her partner aside and take her off to a seat where he could say all that was surging within him.

They danced together several times, and an attentive observer would have noticed that Agnes was all life and movement when Harry Fairfax was her partner, but appeared somewhat listless, even a trifle awkward, when dancing with others. And while he was not dancing Fairfax was scheming to obtain an invitation to the home of the Wilton's.

Digitized by Google

Agnes, quite unwittingly, gave him the desired opportunity. It was during the interval.

"Mr. Fairfax," she said in an anxious tone, "I have an idea that the dear old lady, Mrs. Monmouth, who must be some sort of a relation of yours, was in distressed circumstances when she parted with that miniature. Would it be possible to find out and allay my anxiety?"

"Of course!" exclaimed Harry Fairfax, jumping at the chance. "And I hope that Mrs. Wilton will permit me to call and report the result of my inquiries."

Mrs. Wilton threw a quick, shrewd glance at her daughter and the young man, and replied in the affirmative.

"We shall be pleased to see you, Mr. Fairfax," she said quietly. "I feel an interest also in the old lady, who, I am half inclined to believe, was distantly related to us, as well as to the Fairfaxes."

Harry bowed, and his heart throbbed with satisfaction.

"I will not fail to make diligent search and to let you know the result," he declared.

Harry Fairfax kept his promise to report; in fact, he "reported" before there was anything of interest to mention. Agnes, however, seemed to think that it was a matter of importance and listened with marked attention. Mrs. Wilton who was not one of those elderly persons who forget their own youthful days, judged it best to leave Fairfax to her daughter for a time, which fact had the effect of prolonging the young man's stay.

Harry Fairfax made three calls within twice as many days, and on each occasion the young people deemed it necessary to minutely examine the miniature together, no doubt in the hope of discovering a clue. On the occasion of the fourth visit, Fairfax was able to announce that he had discovered the whereabouts of the old lady, who was a daughter of the man in the miniature; she was living in very reduced circumstances, having been too proud to apply to the distant members of the family for help. He had made arrangements whereby she would be relieved from anxiety on the ground of obtaining the wherewithal to pass the remaining days of her life in peace.

"I told her," he said to Agnes, when Mrs. Wilton had once more left them alone, "that the miniature had fallen into the hands of one who thought a great deal of it, and——"

He paused. Agnes looking up at him for an explanation of the pause, saw something in his face that made her confused and happy, although she could not define the sentiment.

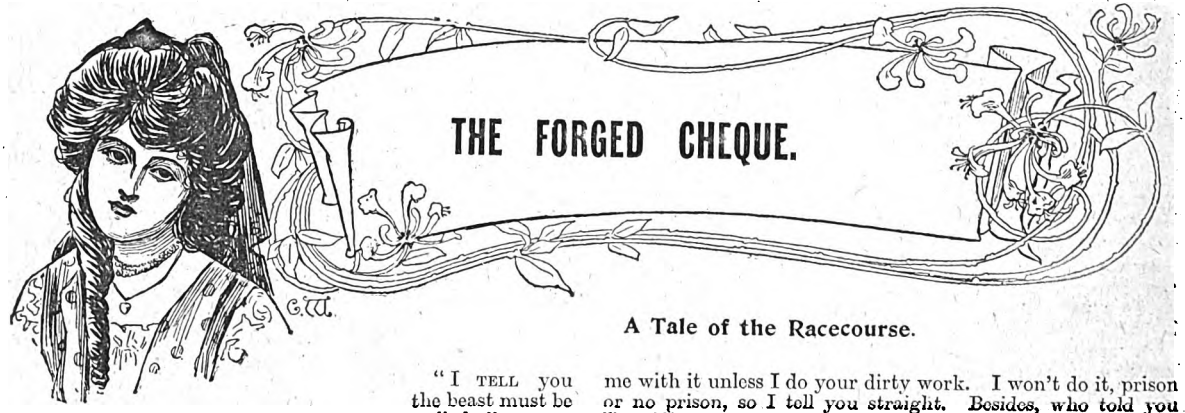
"Shall I say what I was on the point of saying?" he asked. "Why should I not? Agnes, it is the first time I have called you by that name. Agnes, I told her that the portrait was in the hands of one whom I hoped would soon become the wife of a man bearing a striking resemblance to the man of the miniature, and having the same name. Was I right in hoping so much? You have bestowed much love on that portrait, can your transfer that love to me and increase it?"

"I think," said Agnes, with a divine blush, "that you may hope, for I feel that it is not the portrait, but you, whom I have loved ever since I have possessed it."

"I do not know what magic influence has been at work—magnetic influence, telepathy or what not," he said a moment later, when he had released her from his strong grasp, "but it appears to me that the attention given by you to my portrait, as I shall call it, had the effect of drawing me to you. I dislike fancy dress balls as a rule, but I was impelled to go to that one by some secret power. I didn't want to go, and yet I did want to go. How was it?"

"I was waiting to see you, expecting that I should meet you somewhere and at some time in the near future, and my desire drew you to me, Harry!" she declared with a mixture of gaiety and gravity. "I am so happy that you have come!"

George Day.



A Tale of the Racecourse.

"I TELL you the beast must be pulled!"

The slightly-built man, who looked little more than a lad, fixed a pair of sad, hollow eyes upon the ground between the pointed toes of his boots, and listened to his companion's imperious directions in mute despair.

"It's done every day for much less than this affair means to either you or me," the other urged. "It means beggary to me and prison to you if the beast gets home. If it doesn't, you shall have that unfortunate cheque together with a hundred-pound note the evening following."

"I never pulled a mount yet, Mr. Hall, and I'm hanged if I do now!" the jockey ejaculated through his set teeth.

"It will mean prison for you, then."

"I daresay it will," cried the jockey, in a shrill voice. "You kept that cheque until you knew it was too late for me to prove I didn't forge it, and now you come and threaten me with it unless I do your dirty work. I won't do it, prison or no prison, so I tell you straight. Besides, who told you I'm riding Merrymay?"

"Do you take me for a mole?" said Mr. Hall. "I know you have been asked to ride the beast, and if you refuse or fail to pull him—well, you know how unpleasant will be the consequences."

"I suppose you've got on to The Baker for all you're worth?" Sillings said thoughtfully.

"That's none of your business. The Baker's got to win, that's all you need worry about, and if you pull Merrymay, all will be well."

"For you—yes, I don't doubt it. But what about Lord Shannon? P'raps you don't know that he backed my mount for all he's worth, and that Merrymay is relied upon to pay off the mortgage on his estate? A win to The Baker would be absolute ruin to his lordship."

"More fool he! I can't be expected to drop all my money because a friend has backed the horse to win. Now, look here, Joe, don't let us have any more words about the matter. Will you or will you not ride and pull?"

Digitized by Google

"No!"

"Tut! Confound you! What do you think Miss Mastman will say when you're thrown into gaol, and branded a felon? What will she say when she knows that you have been courting her with the crime of a forgery upon your conscience, such a high-minded young woman as she, too?"

"She'd think less bad of me than if I pulled Merrymay," Sillings returned in a hushed voice.

"Well, put it another way. How can you marry her after three or four years in prison? You may not get 'beefy' in gaol, but your skill will be spoilt, your name will be ruined, your career, which at present promises to carry you into the first rank of jockeys, will be cut short. In a word, you will be hopelessly ruined!"

"Surely the Prince of Tempters might come to you for hints!" the jockey hissed. "But even if Merrymay loses, The Baker may not win. He may go all wrong within the next three days. Then where will you be?"

"Fool! I have not backed The Baker; I have laid against Merrymay. If The Baker turns up fit on the course, then I may back him. But that is quite beside the point."

There, apparently, was Joe Sillings' last hope gone. No compromise between him and his tempter was possible. He had to choose between prison and ruin, the loss of the girl he loved and degradation in her eyes, which was perhaps even worse than losing her, and the mere tightening of a rein.

"Which will you do?"

"I'll think it over, and you shall see," the jockey replied weakly.

"Can't you decide now? Think what 'No' means to you."

"Can't you decide in your own mind what I shall do when the time comes?" Sillings replied doggedly.

"Yes, I think I can, Joe," said Mr. Hall, smiling quietly. "You're a wise man, Joe. The pros are out of all proportion to the cons."

"Have you anything else to say?"

"No, I don't think so."

"Then get out of my paddock, Cuthbert Hall."

Mr. Hall knew he had succeeded in his mission, and therefore took this insult with better temper than he would otherwise have done.

He went away without a word, but with a smiling face and a light heart.

Sillings watched him disappear, and groaned.

He was in the hollow of the man's hands, and how could he surrender a successful career, a life's possiblities and a life's love to racecourse ethics? Yet was it merely a question of racecourse ethics? Was it not rather an ephemeral effort which would be reflected by his conscience through all his life; an effort which would ruin many a home, and wreck many a life?

On the other hand, there was no certainty in horse-racing, and those men who had backed, or would back, Merrymay to win, knew they might lose; and if he pulled the horse, and the world knew why, would not his reason justify him before all except those who had lost by this act?

He wandered through his stables, his heart lonely and sick within him, debating with himself which course he should take, and it suddenly occurred to him that if he could discover the whereabouts of his old friend, John Grainger, all would yet be well; John could prove that he never committed the forgery.

But where was John? Perhaps a thousand miles away; perhaps in the very next town. He had not heard anything of him for three years, and knew no one who had. John might be dead. Still, there was hope in this idea. He would endeavour to find John before the day of the race, and if he failed—then he would have to choose.

* * * * *

Late in the evening of the following day Cuthbert Hall was hurrying about his chambers in Sloane Street, preparing everything so far as he could to enable him to get down to Epsom early, without the necessity for rising before his usually late hour.

He was in high feather, flushed, and not absolutely sober. He was looking for the morrow as a day that would see his making, a day of events which would wipe out his financial difficulties and put a handsome fortune in his pocket, and a day, too, which would ruin for ever the chances of his friend, Lord Shannon, redeeming his fortune sufficiently to marry Clair Dudley.

Mr. Hall was not the man to play half the game; he laid a plot to enrich himself and developed it to ruin his rival. He had schemed for months to reach these ends, and he had omitted nothing which could further either object.

He had even forged a note to meet a creditor, whom he could easily have paid, to husband for a day or two a few hundred pounds which he would lay to his own gain. Then he would redeem the note, he decided, and wipe the matter out.

It was all planned to the finest point, and he was naturally elated. It was the honey of satisfaction to him to prepare for the eventful morrow.

At last when all seemed done, he paused and pondered to know if there were nothing else he could do to anticipate the next day. Then he sat down at his writing-table, and took a cash-box from a drawer. From the cash-box he extracted a folded cheque.

He satisfied himself that it was the one he wanted, took a sheet of plain note-paper, and, pinning the cheque to it, wrote, "The B. N. follows to-morrow." He folded the two up, slipping them into an envelope which he closed, addressed and stamped.

"He shall have the hundred to-morrow," he said, glancing down at the letter upon the blotting-pad, as he rose and lit a cigarette; "meanwhile I can make four or five of it. I will take this with me, post it at the station on my return to town, and he will see that I am a man who keeps his word in either way."

He smoked the cigarette half through in restless meditation, and then, as if struck by a sudden thought, went out of the room, picked up a hat and stick from the hall rack, and passed out of the building.

He had not been gone three minutes when his man entered the room. His heavy eyes wandered over the room from one object to another until they rested upon the letter.

Picking it up, he read the superscription apathetically, and he glanced at the clock on the mantelshelf.

"Juggins!" he muttered calmly. "I thought he was a bit wavy to-night. Two minutes to twelve. I can just catch it, and if I don't, I suppose I shall catch it—in another way."

Reluctant to cross the muddy road in his indoor shoes, he made a detour to a crossing, and posted the letter at the box opposite the chamber buildings. He returned by way of the crossing, availed himself of the lift and entered the flat just behind his master who had used the staircase.

"Been out, Pink?" Mr. Hall inquired.

"Posted your letter, sir."

"Posted—my—— You blithering idiot!" cried the master, white with fear and rage. "Where did you post it?"

Pink told him, and followed him down the stairs three steps at a time, and across the road.

With fumbling fingers Mr. Hall struck a match and looked at the little enamelled plate, which indicated the time the box would next be cleared.

"Eight-twenty! The box is cleared. Oh, you vast fool!" he cried, turning passionately upon Pink.

He sprang into a hansom and drove to the district sorting office, with all possible haste.

"By mistake a few minutes ago my man posted a letter in the pillar-box at Camden Street corner," he said to an official who came forward. "It is of vital importance that it should not be delivered. It was addressed to Mr. Joseph Sillings, Darcy Lodge, Epsom. The box has been cleared."

"Are you sure it was posted?"

"Absolutely."

"Then I cannot help you; once posted the letter belongs to the Postmaster-General until it is delivered at the address of the addressee."

Digitized by Google

"But I must have it, man!"

"Out of the question, sir."

It was useless to argue; the official was obdurate.

"What time will it be delivered?" Hall asked anxiously.

"Epsom, you say? Between eleven and twelve—about eleven."

And Joe Sillings would not be on the course until one or two o'clock! He would probably get the letter before leaving home. Why, in that case, should he pull Merrymay?

Hall strode out of the office in a frenzy of rage and despair.

Somehow he must draw Sillings away from his house before the letter arrived there, and keep the letter from him till after the race. But how?

"Pink," he said, when he had got back to his chambers, "I want you to send a telegram for me."

"Sillings, Epsom. Meet me at Leatherhead Station eleven sharp, Wednesday. Important. John Grainger," was how he worded the message.

"That will draw him if nothing else will," Hall said, as he affixed a sixpenny stamp.

But even when this was sent off he was uneasy in his mind. He knew Sillings would be at Leatherhead Station at the time appointed, that he would wait anxiously for the appearance of Grainger, and that the chances were a thousand to one against Sillings returning home before the race was run.

But there was the bare chance that the prematurely-posted letter would get to Sillings' hands in some way before Merrymay was paraded, and Hall could do nothing to obviate this contingency.

Next morning, however, refreshed by sleep and no longer muddled by drink, Hall was perfectly sanguine. On his way down to Epsom, he had sent a telegram to Sillings' head groom to ask where his master was, and at Epsom telegraph-office he found awaiting him a reply to the effect that Sillings had gone early to Leatherhead to meet a friend.

This was good news indeed, but opened an ugly doubt for Hall.

Sillings' groom was almost certain to attend the race, and the letter must already have arrived at Darcy Lodge; and might not the groom take it to his master? It was a torturous doubt.

By chance, however, Hall met the groom just outside Epsom station, and satisfied himself that the man had not brought the letter, which had not arrived when Sillings left home, and that no one was coming from Darcy Lodge to the meeting.

Lounging about the paddock some considerable time later, Hall caught sight of Sillings out of the corners of his eyes.

The jockey's face was pale and haggard, and there was a hard, sad look about his mouth.

"What a fool the man is." Hall said to himself. "One would imagine he was required to do murder."

Shortly afterwards Merrymay passed by where Hall was standing. Sillings was up in his purple and white silk.

Instinctively he turned his head, and as he caught sight of Hall, he gave him a look of mute despair. But Hall did not see it.

He was running his eye over The Baker and admiring the horse's wonderful condition, which so impressed him that he moved off and laid every penny he had with him upon the animal.

By the time he had edged himself into a good position for viewing the race, the starters were already off. He could just make out the coloured jackets of the jockeys bobbing along in the distance.

The Baker was third to get off and Merrymay was running in a batch of five of the field behind the first three.

"How-d'ye-do, sir?" said a voice over Hall's shoulder.

Hall turned and blanched as he recognised the sunburnt, chubby face of John Grainger.

He could find no words to speak in his surprise and alarm.

Fate was surely trying to unhinge his mind; first by the hideous mistake about the letter, and now by John Grainger, the vanished man, turned up at such a time. If he had seen Sillings the day was lost, the lifetime ruined!

"I only arrived from South America last night, sir, but seeing my old friend, Joe Sillings, was up on a favourite in the big race, I was bound to come down," Grainger explained.

"Have you seen Sillings?" Hall inquired hoarsely.

"Not to speak to, but I've put a pony on his mount, you may be sure."

Hall turned his head away and shuddered. Fate had played a waiting game with him, he thought, but luck was all on his side.

There, behind him, breathing in his very ear was the one man on earth, who, by a few moments' conversation with Sillings, could have ruined his masterly schemes, and snatched Sillings out of his net; and he had come too late.

Twice in twenty-four hours Hall had been within an ace of ruin, and had been saved by chance.

There was a roar and a pushing forward of the crowds that lined the course, as the horses swerved round the bend and began to come down the straight.

"Marcus!" roared half the crowd. "Harefoot!" yelled the other half, as two horses broke from the leading five and challenged each other.

There was a panting pause, then a roar that made the blood tingle in Hall's flushed cheek.

"The Baker!" shouted the crowd together, as another horse overtook Marcus and Harefoot and showed them his heels.

A moment later a fluttering patch of white and purple seemed to leap forward.

It flashed passed Marcus and Harefoot, and began to overhaul The Baker.

"Merrymay does it! Merrymay!"

Inch by inch Merrymay drew down upon The Baker. The shadow of the favourite's nose flickered on The Baker's thigh, then upon its flank, ribs and shoulders, and then The Baker's nose began to fall back from the level of Merrymay's shoulder to its thigh. when suddenly Merrymay seemed to pick himself up and leap forward a hundred yards—two hundred yards, and Merrymay had won.

* * * * * *

Half an hour later Hall, white, haggard, and aged by many a year, too desperate to hurry from the scene of his ruin without an understanding with Sillings, met the jockey face to face.

Sillings was no less pale and hardly less haggard than Hall, but there was a triumphant light in his face which was naturally wanting in Hall's.

"You blackguard," Hall hissed, half raising his stick.

"You can't honestly call me that," said Sillings quietly. "Not now, at least; I've given all my world to keep faith with Merrymay's backers, and I gave you the chance to hedge. I know what it means to me—ruin, unless I can find John Grainger."

"To hedge?" Hall ejaculated.

"Aye. I sent you a telegram to tell you that Merrymay was not as fit as might be, but if the horse could win he should.

Hall turned and slunk away.

He crept to the station, into a train. He crawled to his chambers by back streets to avoid meeting acquaintances.

Pink greeted him.

"There's a telegram for you, sir," said Pink. "It came a few minutes after you'd gone."

Hall snatched it up and read:

"Merrymay none too fit. But if can win shall—Sillings."

Hall groaned.

At precisely the same moment Sillings at Darcy Lodge was burning a cheque he had found waiting him.

He watched it crumble away in the flames, and smiled up at John Grainger who stood by, watching him.

C. R. L.

Digitized by Google

Nobody would be Hurt.

HE: "You were getting ready to go out, and I'm afraid my call is inopportune." She: "Really and truly I would much rather stay here and talk with you than keep an engagement this afternoon." "I am delighted. But can the engagement be broken without causing bad feeling?" "Oh, yes. The dentist won't mind."

Not a Private.

MISTRESS: "Well, I'm sorry you want to leave me, Mary; but what's your reason?" (Mary keeps silent.) Mistress: "Something private?" Mary (suddenly): "No, mum; please, mum, he's a lance-corporal."

Pessemistic.

MISS A.: "The wedding was as sad as a funeral." Mr. Benedict: "Why shouldn't it be? Both have the same result. In one case two are made one; in the other, one is made nothing. One less each time."

The Sort of Work he Wanted.

APPLICANT: "Please, ma'am, can you help a poor man who is out of work?" Woman: "I think I can find something for you to do." Applicant (gratefully): "Thanks. If you could give me some washing to do I'll take it home to my wife."

A Gentle Hint.

MR. SPRIGGINS (gently): "My dear, a Kensington man was shot at by a burglar, and his life was saved by a button which the bullet struck." Mrs. Spriggins: "Well, what of it?" Mr. Spriggins (meekly): "Nothing, only the button must have been on."

A Dress Rehearsal.

HARRY: "Clara, dearest, you are the only woman I ever really and truly loved." Clara Dearest: "You said that very same thing only last week to May Blossom. She told me so herself." Harry: "True but that was only a dress rehearsal; this is the first performance."

Same Old Story.

FAIR PATRON: "Look here! You told me a horrid story about the way my husband was acting, and I've found out, on investigation, that it is not true. He's just as good as can be." Fortune Teller: "I've told that same story to about ten thousand different women, and you are the first who has made a complaint."

The Sixpence Gave out.

THIS is the message the telegraph messenger handed to him: "Come down quickly. I am dying.—Kate." Eight hours later he arrived at the hotel, to be met at the door by Kate herself. "Why—what did you mean by sending me such a message?" he asked. "Oh," she gurgled, "I wanted to say that I was dying to see you, but my twelve words for sixpence ran out, and I had to stop."

Clever Little Wife.

YOUNG WIFE: "I knew you would like the slippers, Harry, if for no other reason, because I made them." Husband: "You don't mean this is all your work? Why, what a talented little wife I have, to be sure." Young Wife: "Yes, all my work, of course. I bought the uppers and Mary sewed them together, and I got a man to sole them, but I put the bows on and did them up in the box. And do you know, Harry, I am awfully proud of myself. I didn't think I could ever do such things."

Very Jealous.

"Is Mabel jealous of her husband?" "Jealous? I should think so. Why, on the honeymoon, she wouldn't even let him admire the scenery?"

Not Entire.

MAUD: "How could you be so free with Mr. Gable, an entire stranger?" Kate: "He is not an entire stranger. He lost an arm several years ago."

Rather Biassed.

SHE: "Oh, yes; I quite believe there's a fool in every family. Don't you?" He: "Well—er—my opinion's rather biassed. You see, I'm the only member of the family."

There was a Wedding after all.

ADA (pensively): "I hope you'll invite me to the wedding when you get married." Jack (boldly): "I'll invite you before I ask anyone else, and if you don't accept there wont be any wedding."

He Could Make it go Further.

HUSBAND: "My dear, I wish you would let me carve that fowl. I am sure I could make it go further." Wife: "I know you could. I've seen you send it right off the table, and I wouldn't attempt to make it go further than that."

When Fortune would Smile.

YOUNG VAN MARKS (in a melancholy tone): "Oh, I suppose I shouldn't brood, but Fortune seems reluctant to smile on me." Harry Gray: "Well, never mind, old fellow, she will when she sees some of your pictures."

A Terrible Loss.

HE: "Then I am to understand that you absolutely reject my offer?" She: "There is really nothing else for it." He: "Well, I think it very selfish of you! Here I've actually gone and purchased a guide to Margate for our honeymoon."

Another Angler.

MRS. BROWN: "I had to cook that fish at once as I was afraid it wouldn't keep." Brown: "Great Scott! I'll go straight down to the market and give that man a piece of my mind." Mrs. Brown: "Stop a minute, my dear; it was the fish you caught yourself this afternoon."

Somewhat Muddled.

LINDA: "Bella, I'm greatly puzzled over a matter." Bella: "So am I. Tell me your trouble and I'll tell you mine." Linda: "Well, Dick Hardaway told me last night he loved me, but did not ask me to marry him." Bella: "And he asked me to marry him, but didn't say a word about love."

A Matter of English.

MINNIE: "Jennie's engagement with the French count is broken off." Mamie: "Good gracious! Why?" Minnie: "You know her hair is so long that it can almost touch the ground when she is standing. He tried to tell one of his friends the fact, and said she had 'hair almost as long as her foot,' and the goose got so mad about it that she won't see him any more."

He was Particular.

BROWN: "Why don't you marry and settle down?" Jones: "Well, I've got my reasons for it. The woman I want to marry must have lots of money and be smart, but when I find a woman who has money and who is willing to marry me, her willingness to marry me is positive proof to my mind that she is stupid, and then, of course, she doesn't suit me. I want a smart woman for a wife."

Uncertain as yet.

LADY OF THE HOUSE (to cook, having discovered a policeman in the kitchen): "You told me when you came here that you had no sweetheart." Cook: "Yes, I told you so, and it's the truth, too." "Who, then, is the policeman in the kitchen if he is not your sweetheart?" "He isn't my sweetheart. Indeed he isn't. He is only trying to be, and I don't know whether he will succeed or not."

Digitized by Google

Out of Great Tribulation.

By Henry Farmer.

Benny Determines on Treachery.

But we must return to Benny.

The night that had seen his one-time partner artistically burgling the Towers had been one of unrest and torturing anxiety for him. Visions of Esther, of a haggard-faced convict, fettered and wearing the black and yellow dress, had haunted him. He rose from his bed, unrefreshed and leaden-eyed. He scarcely touched his breakfast. As he mechanically opened the newspaper that his landlady brought him, he was looking a very different person from the dapper, comic-faced Mr. Faversham who, at the village concert at Warham, had convulsed his audience with his humorous singing. His conscience seemed to have made a physical as well as a mental wreck of him. He looked an older man altogether.

He was wondering how the Marquis had fared on the previous night, as he glanced down the columns of the paper; but he could expect no news till the evening papers came out. But the Marquis—nothing ever went wrong with him, at least up to the present! Then Benny glanced nervously to right and left, and the paper crackled with the restless movement of his fingers. The next moment a sharp ejaculation burst from his lips, and he struck his forehead with a clenched hand. A paragraph, tucked away in the corner of the paper, had caught his eye.

Alec Scarsdale, well known to the public now as the notorious convict 35, had broken down in health, and had been removed to the infirmary of Wrackam prison, where he was lying seriously ill.

Benny flung the paper from him, sprang to his feet, and paced the room, in an agony of remorse. Presently he was seated at the table, writing at a feverish pace, only to stop abruptly and tear up what he had written. Then he rang the bell, and asked his landlady for a time-table. There was no such thing in the house.

"Masters won't be back till this afternoon or evening," he said to himself. "I must see him first. Wonder how the trains run to Dover to-night. Post a letter after eight o'clock and it wouldn't be delivered till first post to-morrow. If there's a decent train to-night, I should be across the water and well away by then. Or shall I wait till I'm well away before writing? Well, I'll first find out about the trains."

Shortly after, he was on his way to Victoria station. He had risen late. It was one o'clock before he reached his destination.

"I'm altogether chippy," he muttered, making his way on to the platform. "I want a brandy and soda or something of that sort to buck me up."

A train had just run into one of the arrival platforms. A number of passengers were streaming through the barrier gate.

Benny suddenly reeled a little. His lips quivered. All the others passengers seemed to have faded away, all but two—a grey-haired man and the white-faced girl whom he was supporting.

John Mansfield and Esther. The lines had multiplied on the banker's face. His eyes were bent upon his daughter.

"Esther, my darling," he whispered tenderly, "I hope this journey has not been too much for you?"

She smiled up at him bravely. There was no barrier between them now. Crump had swept that away. John Mansfield no longer doubted Alec Scarsdale's innocence. He, too, had suffered. He, too, like Esther, was waiting and hoping. He dared not trust himself to return to Warham, lest he should meet the man whom Crump had unmasked, whom he knew now to be an unutterable scoundrel, the man whom once he had hoped to welcome as his son-in-law.

"No, father, I feel ever so much better than I expected. Of course, I feel a little weak; but one can't expect to get well, quite well, all at once!"

Her eyes and her father's almost simultaneously caught sight of Mr. Faversham. The banker's face flushed red. His free hand clenched up. For a moment he had forgotten the promise of secrecy made to Crump.

"The scound——"

"Father!" whispered Esther, her arm tightening on his. "Remember!"

It was too late for Benny to make believe that he had not seen them. He raised his hat, and would have thanked Heaven had the platform opened and swallowed him up. John Mansfield, with an effort, returned his salutation. Esther bowed.

Benny was only conscious of one thing now—her eyes. The old expression was there, only intensified, more wistful. It stabbed him like a knife. He must do something, say something. She had been ill, lying at death's door, so it had been said. He could not pass by with a mere salutation. If she had only been wearing a veil or something, it would have been easier for him; but those eyes, with their wistful, I-haven't-forgotten-him look in their depths, seemed to fascinate him, draw him towards her.

Why, in God's name, had he ever taken a hand in that foul night's work? He hesitated; then, as if irresistibly drawn, stepped towards Esther and her father. He raised his hat for the second time. Again Esther's arm tightened on her father's.

"I had no idea," he stammered. "I'm so glad to see that you're able—er—to be out and about again, Miss Mansfield. You—er—Mr. Mansfield, must also feel a—er—happy man to-day!"

He was looking everywhere but into Esther's face.

"But I—er—mustn't keep you. Only I'm glad—er—more glad than I can ever tell you to have seen you again, Miss Mansfield; to know that you—you—well, that you're better. I'm going abroad for a bit. Perhaps, it may be some time before I see you again. Good-bye, Mr. Mansfield. Good-bye, Miss Mansfield. Never forget how good you were to me when I came that cropper. Excuse me; but I'm not quite myself to-day. Worries, business worries. And I'm keeping you. Good-bye!"

There had been no shaking of hands. He had spoken after the fashion of a man who was desperately pressed for time, giving those to whom he was talking no chance of getting a word in edge-ways. With a jerky, nervous salutation, he hurried away abruptly. When, a few moments later, he entered the refreshment buffet, his limbs were shaking, and tiny beads of perspiration were standing out on his forehead.

He was in the act of gulping down some brandy, when the door swung back, and a man sauntered up to the counter, and ordered some refreshment.

"The scoundrel!" breathed out John Mansfield, after Benny's abrupt departure.

"But I'm so thankful," whispered Esther, "that you didn't betray yourself. And, father, he talks of going abroad! Mr. Crump ought to know this. Would you send him a telegram now!"

And when the banker had seen Esther safely into a cab, he dispatched a telegram to "Penworthy." But it was superfluous.

It was Grogan who had entered the refreshment buffet. When Benny, who tried to steady his nerves with more drink, left, he had made up his mind. That glimpse of Esther had given him strength. The die was cast.

Digitized by Google

He intended to betray the Marquis!

A train left for Dieppe at ten o'clock that night. He returned to his rooms. The evening paper contained no account of any robbery at Warham. Had the Marquis changed his plans at the last moment? Shortly after dusk, Benny left his lodgings for Chancery Lane.

"Mr. Masters returned yet?" he inquired of the office boy.

"No, sir. I have had a telegram from him, saying that he has been unexpectedly detained, and won't be back to-night; but he'll be here for certain first thing to-morrow morning!"

Benny rapped out an oath under his breath. The sooner he was out of the country, and the load, that pressed so heavily, off his conscience, the better! Should he wait till the morrow, or leave that night, and trust to chance for some future opportunity of changing the diamonds into cash? He had sufficient money in hand for immediate purposes. Wavering in his mind, he returned to his lodgings. A later edition of the evening paper contained no news of any jewel robbery.

Shortly after his return, Benny was writing again, and tearing up. Sometimes the doomed letter commenced "To Miss Mansfield." Sometimes "To the Chief of the Criminal Investigation Department, Scotland Yard."

"Oh, God! How Long?"

"I SHALL not be back to-night, Railton. I shall put up at the Hotel Royal."

"Very good, sir!"

Railton opened the front door for his master. A brougham was drawn up outside the Firs. Revelle, a cigar between his teeth, portmanteau in hand, entered it.

"Good evening to you, sir!" said Railton, with a respectful obeisance.

"Good night, Railton."

As the broughan rattled away stationwards, Revelle leant back, and laughed. The Normanhurst jewels were in his portmanteau; at what time they were presumably supposed to be lying, snug and secure, in the safe at the Towers. The irony of the situation tickled his sense of humour.

"'Pon my soul!" he muttered. "They'll probably be off my hands and across the water before they're missed. A record, I think!" He laughed again. Then the handsome face hardened a little. "And when I've done my business with Masters I'll give Benny a look up. I think he'll probably be deuced sorry now that he showed the white feather, and backed out of the business."

At the station a porter sprang to his brougham, and opened the door. Revelle did not, however, intrust him with the carrying of his bag. He sauntered on to the platform. It was growing dark, but the station lamps had not yet been lighted. A few moments after a man passed on to the platform—the artist who had been sketching the Firs. He took no notice of two other men already on the platform, seated apart in quiet corners. Nor had Revelle noticed them. When the train arrived he entered a first class carriage. The three men entered the same third class compartment.

"Gentlemen," said Crump, when the train was in motion, "I am experiencing a feeling of excitement such as I have not known for years. Our plan of campaign is perfectly clear to all of us, is it not?"

"Quite!"

"He is an unutterable scoundrel; but it has been a most remarkable and masterly performance on his part. I have postponed interviewing Rumbey till to-morrow. I trust to be at leisure then."

London reached, Revelle sprang into a hansom, bidding the man drive to Chancery Lane. A couple of hansoms followed. Shortly after Revelle had entered the block of buildings in Chancery Lane where Lewis Masters rented chambers, three men sauntered up. A fourth man joined them.

"Masters," he said, "isn't in. He's not returning till to-morrow morning."

"Gentlemen," whispered Crump, "this is disappointing.

Some Big Eaters.

Many men who have made their way in life have been big eaters. Premier Seddon and Pierpont Morgan are names which immediately occur to the mind; while it is a well-known fact that the great Napoleon died from a disease brought on by eating too freely of his favourite dish—stewed onions. Eating means, or should mean, the intaking of energy. While this was the case with Napoleon, he was great. When his digestion gave out, he became weak, ill, and at last succumbed. Every worker, man or woman, should know that the appetite is the index to the health. Can you eat? Can you store up energy? If not you should not work and expend it. Is your digestion sound? If not, look to it. If it is weak and disordered, it is a screw loose in the great machine which continues your existence, and if it once becomes lost, it can never be replaced. Fortunately, nature has provided a remedy for all digestive ailments. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans when taken, assume in the body the exact form of nature's own bile. They aid digestion, clear the bowels of accumulated impurities and fermenting food, and stimulate the liver in the only way which nature has said this shall be done. Don't take mineral medicines, but take nature's own vegetable cures. Nature makes your ailments, let nature cure them. Bile Beans being purely vegetable are nature's own remedy. You get them from any chemist at one and three half-pence a box. Economical buyers get a two and nine-penny box which contains three times the quantity of the smaller box at a little over twice the price.

MAKE MONEY

by dealing direct with the factory. You obtain goods of the highest value, and

POCKET MIDDLE PROFITS.

Write at once for

H. SAMUEL'S

GREAT FREE

BARGAIN GUIDE

FREE FOR A POST-CARD.

260 Pages, 3,000 Engravings of Diamonds, Watches, Clocks, Chains, Cutlery, Plate, &c.

SENT YOU FOR 5/-.

THE "ACME."

Solid Silver Case, fine ¾ plate movement, jewelled, dust and damp proof cap, and the latest patented improvements.

H. SAMUEL'S PRICE 25/-.

Warranted for Seven Years. Test it for a week. If satisfied, remit balance, 20/-.

FREE SILVER ALBERT

To all sending full amount with order.

SEND YOUR POST-CARD NOW.

H. SAMUEL (Dept. 29) Market Street, MANCHESTER.

Let us move a little way from the entrance. We shall be having Mr. Revelle back in a moment."

He was right. A moment later Revelle emerged, and hailed a passing hansom.

"The Hotel Royal!" he cried to the driver.

The words reached Crump. Hotel Royal? Esther Mansfield was staying there with her father. Crump's lips tightened up. Was it coincidence, or intentional?

When he reached the hotel Revelle engaged a bed-room; then asked to see the manager.

"I've one or two important papers and things in my bag," he said to the manager, "I should be obliged to you if you'd lock it up in your strong-room, and give me a receipt for it."

"With pleasure, sir."

This having been done, Revelle obtained the key of his bed-room and ascended by the lift.

"And now," he muttered, on reaching his room, "a wash and a brush-up, and then Benny! A confounded nuisance, Masters being away; but to-morrow will do, and the stuff's safe where it is!"

When he left the room and passed out into the corridor, the lift-boy was in the act of pulling the trellis gate.

"Wait a second! I'm coming down!"

The boy flung back the gate, Revelle stepped in; then, catching sight of a seated, girlish figure, started in spite of his admirable self-control.

Esther Mansfield!

She had glanced up as he had entered. Their eyes met.

The gate crashed to. The lift was descending. He had not seen her since that day when, on the brow of the cliff, he had held her unconscious in his arms, had pressed a burning kiss to her cold lips. For all his self-control the hot blood surged to his face.

"Miss Mansfield!"

He held out his hand. She rose to her feet, took it mechanically.

"I have never thanked you," she whispered, speaking after the manner of someone repeating a lesson, "for what you did at Gurlston Bay!"

"Ah!" he said, hoarsely, quickly, "don't speak of that. Any man would have done what I did. But you are better? Tell me that you are better?"

"I'm much better!"

But she could not trust herself to look at him. Yet she must play her part! The lift stopped. The boy flung open the gate. Esther moved away.

"You are staying here?" questioned Revelle quickly.

"Yes!"

"May I hope to see you to-morrow?"

"I don't quite know what my father's movements will be. Good-night, Mr. Revelle!"

She passed out into the corridor, never glancing at him, and hurried away to her room. Once within, she clasped her forehead with her thin, transparent hands.

"Oh, God!" she whispered, "how long, how long?"

A moment later there was a tap on the door. The chamber-maid handed her a note—a slip of paper that had evidently been torn out of a note-book for want of more suitable material. The address was in pencil, and had evidently been written hastily. The handwriting was familiar. Esther feverishly untwisted the paper.

"In great haste I scrawl this. Mr. Revelle is staying at this hotel. I trust you will be spared the pain of meeting him. The end is looking very much nearer now. Courage, my dear young lady. Circumstances prevent me from seeing you now. To-morrow, perhaps.—PENWORTHY."

It had come too late to save her the pain of meeting the man she loathed beyond all expression; but not too late to cheer.

That scribbled note almost seemed an answer to her passioned cry of a few seconds before: "Oh, God! how long, how long?"

Revelle quitted the lift on the ground-floor. He was fiercely biting his lips. The game was up where Esther Mansfield was concerned, and a great bitterness was rankling in his soul. And she had seemed to him more beautiful than ever. Never had he desired her more! All his scheming, all his villainy had ended in nothing. She loathed him, saw through him, and he knew it now. He left the hotel and sprang into a hansom, his destination the quiet rooms in the north of London where Benny was staying.

Crump and Inspector Winton followed in another hansom.

The Shadows on the Blind.

"To the Chief of the Criminal Investigation Department, Scotland Yard."

Having thus topped a sheet of paper, Benny laid aside his pen, and, springing to his feet, proceeded to pace the room nervously. The slamming to of a door in the house caused him to start violently.

"Yes, I won't wait for Masters. I'll get across to-night; post the letters from the other side; but I may as well get them written now."

He drew a small revolver from his pocket, then returned it.

"I've got the jumps to-night. Have a sort of feeling, somehow, that perhaps the Marquis will be turning up. I was a fool to give him my address. And yet if he does turn up—but why should he? No, I've got the jumps, that's what's the matter with me!"

He sat himself down at the table again, and had covered a sheet of paper with writing before the old restlessness seized upon him again. He read through what he had written.

"Yes, that seems pretty clear, as far as it goes!"

He placed the sheet under the blotting paper, and began a fresh page. It was all but covered, when a sharp knocking on the front door produced another violent start.

Quickly he thrust the paper under the blotting-paper; then sat listening with straining ears.

"In here?"

It was the Marquis' voice. The next moment the door opened.

"Hallo, old chap, taken you by surprise, eh? 'Pon my soul!"—Revelle closed the door behind him—"you don't look very glad to see me, Benny!"

He laughed languidly, and held out his hand.

Benny sprang up. As he did so, his cuff caught the blotting-paper and shifted its position slightly.

"Oh, but I am, Marquis—ever so glad; but you've taken me by surprise—I wasn't expecting you—but sit down, old chap. I'm dying to hear about things! You needn't be afraid to talk out here. My landlady's the only person in, and she's as deaf as a post. Sit down. No fizz on the premises; but whisky, brandy. Have a drink! Have you pulled it off? There's been nothing in the papers!"

"Yes!" drawled Revelle, sinking into the chair that Benny had vacated, and resting one elbow on the blotting paper. "Not a hitch. You were a fool, Benny, not to stand in with me!"

Outside, two men were watching the blinded window, and a shadow upon it.

"I would give a great deal," whispered Crump, "to be able to hear the conversation."

"No, Marquis, I wasn't. I was best out of it. I congratulate you. You deserved to succeed; but I was better out of it. Same time, it hasn't made any difference to our friendship, has it?" Benny seemed very restless. "And, Marquis, don't stick on that chair. Take—take this easy chair. You'll—you'll find it more comfortable. Do, old chap, and let me mix you a brandy and soda! Of course I don't live up to 'The Firs' style; but, come over here, and make yourself comfortable!"

"No, thank you, Benny. I'm all right here. Of course, dear old chap, your standing out hasn't interfered with our friendship in the least!"

Then suddenly his dark eyes dilated.

A piece of paper sticking out from under the blotting paper on which his elbow rested, had arrested his attention.

He could just see the words—

"To the Chief of the Criminal Investigation Department, Scotland Yard."

(Developments regarding Benny's letter are recorded next week.)

Digitized by Google

A Plain Talk about Catarrh.

In a late number of an Ear, Nose and Throat Journal the Editor devotes a considerable space to a very clear description of the different forms of catarrh, and of a treatment which is curing cases where other methods have failed. A large number of these cases are described so plainly as to give every hope of a cure to those who have suffered for years, especially as the new treatment can be followed at home. For deaf people there is also a report upon the successful treatment of defective hearing by external application, with a summary of some really remarkable cases cured even after operations have been performed. For the benefit of those who are interested it is announced that a free copy of the "Journal" can be obtained by addressing the Editor, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W. With the Journal a special "Supplement" will be enclosed, which gives details of upwards of forty cases cured by the new Method during the past month, also a Report Form by means of which anyone can obtain full particulars and free advice as to the use of the treatment in their own case.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. Mrs. Conyers, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the Skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

Cures in Ten Minutes

Never Fails!

Nothing "Like It" or "As Good"

KAPUTINE

The Safe Remedy for

HEADACHE & NEURALGIA

Supplied for use in the Field Hospitals of H.I.M. The King of Greece, the Red Cross Society in the South African War, the Anglo-Chinese Hospitals, &c., &c.

Recommended by many medical men, including Dr. Alexander, M.D., Dr. Thompson, M.D., Dr. Boyd Williams, M.D., &c., &c.

There is no similar preparation, nor anything as good.

All leading Chemists sell it at 1/-, packet of 18 doses, or for 12 stamps, from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield.

A WRINGER FOR 2/6

ALL OUR WRINGERS ARE TESTED AT THE FACTORY.

1/- WEEKLY

RESPECTABLE MEN with spare time will do well to take up an agency. There is good money to be earned.

PRICE 54/6

1/- PER WEEK

CASH 45/-

SEND 2/6 or 2/- Fortnightly

Deposit, we then forward it at once, carriage paid, to nearest station, and you pay 1/- Weekly, until paid for. If however you wish to pay cash the price is but 45/-.

MAXEY & CO., MEADOW STREET, SHEFFIELD.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Is Deformity a Bar to Marriage?

SHOULD a deformity be allowed to interfere with marriage? This question often crops up in various forms in my correspondence, and I may say that all must depend on the depth of the affection of the parties. "ERIC" was engaged to Ethel, "the best girl in the world," but some time ago she lost her left hand. Now she thinks she ought not to marry "ERIC" because her opinion is that a woman thus disabled could not make a good wife and housekeeper.

* * * *

In "ERIC'S" case, I see no reason for any cessation of the engagement. The loss of a hand is perhaps one of the least serious results of an accident, as, in course of time, one can learn to use the other hand with almost the same effect as two. So, "ERIC," tell Ethel from me that I think she is misjudged in overrating her misfortune, and should not allow it to disturb the happiness of you both.

The Law Regarding Presents.

CAN "W. H." claim presents from a girl to whom he was engaged, but who has since broken the match off? Some of the presents were very expensive, and the girl, after offering to return them, now refuses to do so. "W. H." asks if he can recover them by law.

* * * *

Certainly not, "W. H." A present is a present all the world over, and law cannot possibly compel her to return them. At the same time, I think a girl with any pride or decency, knowing that a man has asked for his presents back, could not hesitate for a moment about returning them. But the matter must be left to her, and no gentleman should have the bad taste to press for the return of presents if the other party shows no disposition to return them. What has been given, "W. H.," has been given.

The Best Age to Fall in Love.

THANK you very much, "ETHEL W.," for your kind congratulations. What is the proper age for a girl to have a young man? Well, I don't know that propriety enters much into the question. Everything depends on when the young man comes along. Some girls are predisposed to receive attentions at seventeen, others not before twenty, or seventy.

* * * *

I think the best judge of your own susceptibility will be the young man, and when he comes along don't bother much about the age. At the same time, I am not referring to the age at which one should think about marriage. That must depend on a host of other things, such as your own mental and physical fitness, and the position of the young man—quite another question.

Don't Give Him Up.

"TROUBLED ONE," if your sweetheart really loves you, as he evidently does, seeing that he has revealed to you what he has about his past life, I think you should not allow the circumstance you mention from standing in your way. There are very few single men who have led spotless lives, and the fact that your lover's experiences in a previous love affair have brought him trouble does not make him any the worse than thousands of more fortunate fellow men. Take it philosophically, "TROUBLED ONE," and look to the future, not to the past.

The Mother to Blame

"DESPERATE" is in love with a young lady who returned his affections. Her mother has been notified of the fact, and since then the young lady has been very cold towards "DESPERATE," but still accepts gifts from him.

* * * *

I should imagine the mother has not received "DESPERATE'S" suit for her daughter with very much enthusiasm. She might almost have forbidden her daughter to allow matters to go too far. The girl's coldness is possibly caused by her anxiety and worry over the matter. "DESPERATE" had better see the mother himself and make a clean breast of his own feelings, and find out the true state of affairs.

Etiquette when Out with a Lady.

"S. S. S." wishes to know three things: Firstly, on which side of a lady he should keep when cycling with her; secondly, on which side when walking with her; and thirdly, how he should introduce the lady to a gentleman.

* * * *

When cycling with her, of course ride on the outer side, so as to place yourself between her and any vehicle that may be passing. The same rule applies in the case of walking; where there is no footpath always give the lady the inner side of the road. Lastly you do not introduce a lady to a gentleman at all. If you are out with a lady and meet a gentleman friend, introduce the latter to the lady saying "May I introduce Mr. Blank?" adding, as you indicate the lady, "Miss Dash." This rule obtains in all ranks of Society, where the gentleman, no matter what his social standing, must be presented to the lady.

Romance of a Photograph.

"DOLLIE" has been impressed with a young man, whom, she says, she has never met. The whole affair arose through her constantly seeing his photograph in a friend's house, and hearing accounts of his character which have so attracted her that she feels herself madly in love with him. How can I advise one who is in love with a man she has never seen?

* * * *

I think it is a form of attachment likely to lead to disappointment. No doubt "DOLLY" attributes to him all sorts of qualities he does not possess at all, and when the meeting does take place he will probably strike her as a different being from the ideal of the photograph frame. I once knew a girl who had taken a great fancy to the likeness of the brother of a friend of hers. The friend worshipped her brother and had told my acquaintance all sorts of beautiful things about him. Consequently she began to fall in love with him herself.

* * * *

One day it was announced that he was to visit his sister, and my friend was astounded to see, not a tall, broad, handsome man enter, but a small youth of only moderate attractiveness. His conversation was the very opposite to what she had hoped and expected, and before the meeting was over she was disappointed to the verge of despair. In "DOLLY'S" case there is no harm in falling in love with a photograph, but she should be careful of building too great hopes on its likeness to the original.

Correspondents, Please Note.

WILL "SINCERE," who wrote to me some months ago about the question of educating his fiancée, kindly forward his address, as I have a communication from another correspondent to forward him which is likely to be of interest to him regarding the information he is seeking.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

"WORTH A GUINEA A BOX."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

FOR ALL

BILIOUS & NERVOUS DISORDERS, Sick Headache, Constipation, Wind and Pains in Stomach, Impaired Digestion, Disordered Liver, and Female Ailments.

SALE OVER SIX MILLION BOXES YEARLY.

In Boxes, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. each, with full directions.

Prepared only by the Proprietor,

THOMAS BEECHAM, St. Helens, Lancashire.

Sold by all Druggists and Patent Medicine Dealers everywhere.

Many will tell you that "Tatcho" is the only remedy they have found serviceable after years of trying.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back. Puts the hair right. Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

The Hon. Mrs. GORDON—

"The Hon. Mrs. Gordon has derived much benefit from 'Tatcho.'—8 Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, August 28th, 1902."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALŒLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account. — Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find 'Tatcho' excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Colonel PERRY—

"My dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

"A hair on the Head is worth two in the brush."

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the World, in Bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

A 4/6 full size Trial Bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

Digitized by Google

To Keep in Health

YOU NEED A HEALTH-GIVING BEVERAGE, which must be pure and unadulterated.

Cadbury's cocoa

is universally admitted to be a health-giving drink—most refreshing, invigorating, and sustaining. It is beneficial to everybody: Men, Women, Boys, and Girls.

CADBURY'S Cocoa is Absolutely Pure, the Lancet pronouncing it "the standard of highest purity." It is Cocoa, and the best Cocoa only.

CAUTION.—How to test the Purity of Cocoas.—If treated with alkali and chemicals such cocoas will have a medicinal scent when the tin is opened, and will be a darker colour when in liquor. Cadbury's Cocoa has no addition of any kind, and is guaranteed absolutely pure.

ROBIN

The New

Starch

Makes
LINEN GLOSSY, STIFF & FLEXIBLE
Does not Stick to the Iron.
Made by the Manufacturers of the celebrated Reckitt's Paris Blue.

A DAILY LUXURY.

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

BIRD'S CUSTARD is Pure, Creamy, Nutritious, and easily digested. It is a wholesome, delicious article of diet for daily use. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

AS AN ARTICLE OF DIET
BIRD'S CUSTARD
is unrivalled for nutriment and delicacy of flavour.
BIRD'S CUSTARD is the one thing needed with all Fresh, Stewed, or Tinned Fruits. Practical housewives always keep a supply ready at hand.

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

THE GREAT HOME STORY PAPER.

TARTAN COVER
No. 4.—ROB ROY.

No. 718.] Week ending October 4th, 1902. [One Penny.

Digitized by Google

Every Lady her own Dyer.

New Style Old Style

MAYPOLE SOAP

Solves the Whole Riddle.

THE MAYPOLE DYES in the form of Soaps that wash as they Dye, enable Dyeing to be done at home rapidly, cleanly, and economically, and give which never fade, but endure to the last thread.

THE MOST BRILLIANT COLOURS

Send for Free Pamphlet on Home Dyeing to the MAYPOLE Co., Ltd., 17, Cumming Street, London, N.

FREE TO ALL

MR. H. STANSFIELD (from a photo).

A trial of an entirely new method of curing

RUPTURE,

the same method that cured Mr. H. Stansfield. No cumbersome steel truss, and no loss of time from work. Write to-day for free trial and for interesting literature, including a book containing many testimonials.

DR. W. S. RICE,
57 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

"LET'S TALK OF GRAVES"

Shakespeare

'EXPRESS' (Regd.) English Lever,

That word "Express" on the dial of a watch is a guarantee that it is

BRITISH

50/

Manufacture throughout, and NOT a foreign-made movement in English Cases.

TERMS. Send 5/- and the watch will be forwarded to you. If satisfied, complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of the same amount.

If not satisfied, return the watch, and your deposit will be refunded.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Electro-plate, Fancy Goods, etc., etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

NOSE

RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (B T), Specialist South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

FREE TO YOU

To advertise S.L.S Records, we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp.

Symonds' London Stores, 128, City Road, London.

THE ONLY EFFICACIOUS SUBSTITUTE FOR COD LIVER OIL.

DEVONSHIRE CREAM

ABSOLUTELY PURE.

NO PRESERVATIVES USED.

(Really Genuine). In Patent Air-tight Tins.

½-lb., 1/4; 1-lb., 2/4; 2-lb., 4/-, including Tin & Postage.

Mrs. Conyers,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

CYCLES £4 19 9

A sound, handsome cycle, complete with double-tube pneumatic tyres, warranted only £4 19s. 9d. In appearance and strength they are equal to cycles often sold at £10 to £12. Our prices are marvellously low for perfect machines. Buy now and save money. Catalogue free. We fit Clincher, Dunlop, Rimlock, and other noted tyres.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 City Rd., London, E.C

You must try

E. & T.

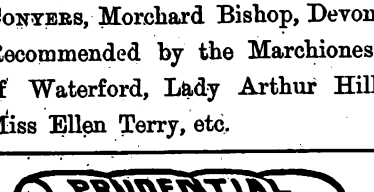
PINK'S JAMS

they are

Absolutely Pure

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.



THE BIGGEST BARGAIN EVER OFFERED.—This Bale contains Pair Full-size heavy Witney Blankets, 1 Quilt, red and white, blue and white, White Honeycomb, Marcella or Red Twill, your choice of these; Pair full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 5 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 8 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths. 28 articles for 49s. 6d. How to pay—Send 4s. 6d. only, we send the Bale, carriage paid, for your approval; the balance can be paid 5s. monthly. If you prefer to pay balance on receipt of good send only 40s., saving 5s. cash discount.—Write for list of our bargains.

PRUDENTIAL SUPPLY STORES,
150 & 152 Seven Sisters Rd., Holloway, N.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street London, W.C.

Short Stories

No. 718.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending October 4th, 1902.

A Fair Maid's Mischief.

"So you refuse me the very first thing I have ever asked you? So much for your speeches and professions. You're distressingly young, Jim —and not clever."

"I'm not so stupid that I can't see it's not the thing for you to have this fellow hanging about you."

"Pooh! when did I consider etiquette? Besides, it's my own business."

"May be. It won't be mine to take your message."

"Beware of jealousy, my lord, it is——"

"Jealous? Not I. Do you think I'd be jealous of a nigger? Not if he were fifty times a prince."

"Do try to hide your ignorance, Jim. Prince Osma is as little like a nigger as you are to a gentlemen—when you go on in this ridiculous fashion. Such nonsense; why he's the son of a Rajah, and, as you know, has been educated at Oxford."

"I won't quarrel over terms, Gladys. You may consider him white, if you prefer; to me he will always be a nigger, and a black one at that."

"All the same, Jim, dear, I'm sure you will give him my message, and tell him I have something particular to say."

"I'm—I'm hanged if I do."

"Ah, but I want you to, and you're such a nice boy, Jim, quite the nicest boy I know. Give me your reason—your true reason why you won't?"

The boy flushed and raised his eyes to hers.

"Well, then," he said doggedly, "I don't think it's treating Edward squarely. You ought not to go sitting out dances and that sort of thing with other fellows when he's not there, and as to the Prince, I believe Ted would knock him down if he found him in the conservatory with you."

"But I'm sitting out with you, Jim dear?"

The little white hand that had been lazily fluttering a huge red fan, crept up the boy's sleeve till it rested on his shoulder.

"Oh, Ted knows all about me. I don't count. In fact, he relies on me to keep you out of mischief."

"Really?"

The boy shot a glance at the fair face resting against the silken cushions.

"He knows I'd give my life for you, Gladys," he said slowly.

She shook her head.

"Sounds pretty," she murmured sweetly, "but it isn't real."

"Test me."

"Take my message, my message to Prince Osma." Her voice was still soft but the eyes flashed, and the pale cheeks were tinged with red.

All rights reserved.]

"Do you really mean it, Gladys? Is it really important, or only one of your freaks?"

"Jim!" she started to her feet. "It's terribly important. Fail me, and I don't know what I shall do."

"But what does it mean? Has the fellow dared to annoy you? Has——"

"Don't ask me, Jim, don't ask me. Only if you care for me, go at once."

Her slim figure was drawn to its full height and she pointed to the door with a gesture half imploring, half commanding.

But he still hesitated—and the time was going fast.

For a moment they faced each other, then with a catch in her voice, but with her eyes bright, she leant against him.

"Will you go, Jim—will you go?"

And while the answer trembled on his lips she stopped them with her own.

"Now will you do as I ask?"

And, man-like, he consented.

A moment later he was regretting his own weakness. Who was this Indian chappie? he reflected, and what did this mystery mean? Besides——but he had promised, and to promise, with Jim Carton, was to perform.

He managed to deliver the message he had been charged with into the Prince's ear alone. Then, filled with a vague idea of keeping his cousin's name from the tender mercies of the scandalous, he fell to pacing to and fro the passage, with a dogged sort of persistence eminently characteristic.

To Gladys it seemed ages before the Prince arrived, and yet when the door opened she wished, how ardently, that the delay had been longer.

"You have sent for me?" Despite a certain duskiness of skin Osma was an imposing, even a handsome figure. His air of distinction marked him out no less than the pale olive skin and the brilliant eyes.

"Yes," she answered quietly, "I have something of importance to say."

"Everything you say is of importance—to me," he answered, and raising her small white fingers to his lips, bent low his head.

The girl trembled under the gaze of those passionate eyes, and something in her own made the Prince draw back. Next instant she was speaking quickly, with emphasis.

"I sent to tell you that, that——" She flung out her hands—"I am engaged," she panted, "engaged to be married."

"Since when?"

She wished he would look anywhere rather than at her;

Digitized by Google

that she could feel contempt, hatred for him, anything rather than as she did—like a culprit detected in a peculiarly despicable crime.

"I was engaged when I met you last year. I know I have treated you badly—behaved shamefully, in fact; but"—here she raised her eyes pleadingly, only to let them fall before the intent look in his—"you will forgive me, and forget."

"Forget? It is impossible."

"But——"

He stopped her impatiently.

"It was not without a struggle that I allowed myself to love you. There were reasons why it would have been better that I should not take an English girl for my wife. But I could not resist. Gradually you dominated my thoughts, my will, my life, until all that was worth living and striving for, was you. You knew this; you cannot look at me and deny it. True, I did not ask you in so many words to marry me. But—you understood. You read my heart and knew that when the time came I should ask you to be mine."

"I have no excuse to make," she said piteously.

"Ah, but you loved me also. This engagement that you speak of is some family affair arranged by your relations. You tell me of it in obedience to their commands. You do not love this man?"

For a moment words failed her, then she said simply, "I love him with all my heart. Edward Vaughan and I were engaged three years ago, but last year we quarrelled. He went to India to shoot big game and find distraction. Being a woman I had to stay at home, and—" Her eyes finished the sentence. She had found distraction in Osma's conquest.

"And this man whom you love, and who showed his love for you by going away to India, has he returned?"

"He is expected every day."

"But perhaps he would not be anxious to renew the engagement?"

Her eyes flashed at the sneer, but with an effort she controlled herself.

"We are already reconciled," she answered.

"And you imagine that you will marry him—this man?"

Her hand went to her side with a gesture of pain. Truly she was paying a high price for her vanity.

"Will you not be a little merciful?" she said piteously. "I know I have acted meanly, wickedly towards you. But I am sorry, very sorry; surely I can say no more."

"You can say more, much more than that. You can say, as I mean you to, that it is not him nor any other that you love, but me."

"This must end," she said firmly. "I have told you how deeply I regret any pain that I have caused you. I can only once again ask your forgiveness and bid you farewell."

She gave him her hand as she spoke—a slight fair figure in her draperies of shimmering white.

For a moment he hesitated. She thought the game was hers, and smiled in the slow, sweet fashion that he remembered all too well. She was so lovely, it was impossible that he could leave her—resign her to another.

"Farewell," she murmured softly.

"Never," he answered fiercely. "I will hold you against all the world. Of your free will if you are wise. If not—against it."

She was powerless to stem the torrent, her words were impotent to check the passion and despair which overwhelmed him.

"Be warned," he cried at last, "be warned. If not mine, you shall never be another's. I will kill him first—you after."

"Coward!" she cried. "Coward!"

But in a moment he had his arms about her, calling her strange love names in a curious tongue, kissing the fair head that rested all unwillingly upon his shoulder.

She could hear Jim's voice in the passage. "Gladys, Gladys, Edward's come." But she was powerless to reply. The room seemed filled with a thick cloud, through which a pair of dark eyes glowed, holding her own in bondage.

"Go," she murmured hoarsely. "In Heaven's name go!"

The voices were coming nearer, her uncle's voice and Jim's.

"For pity's sake," she cried, and strove to free herself. Then, with a woman's cunning she simulated yielding.

"Leave me," she said, "and I will see you again to-morrow evening."

"Give me a token," was the answer, and shuddering she let him kiss her face.

"Jim," she cried, as her cousin's boyish face appeared, "Jim, I'm—I'm tired. You must tell Edward that I'll see him in the morning. I can't meet him to-night. Promise, promise you won't let him know of Osma."

The boy nodded. "Is he annoying you in any way?" he asked, jerking in the direction of the Prince. "Because if so, I'll give the governor a hint to bring his visit to a close."

"Don't ask me anything to-night, dear. I'm ill; I'm tired, and I wish—I wish I were as old as Methuselah!"

With which astounding statement Gladys went upstairs to bed.

Next morning Gladys gave herself up to the happiness of conciliation with Edward—Ted as she loved to call him.

"Why did you behave so badly, Gladys?" he asked, stroking her hair. "It would have been as easy to say you were sorry a year ago as now. And you did flirt with Charlie Carew, you can't deny it."

"Only a little," she whispered penitently. "But I've turned over a new leaf now, Ted. I'm never going to flirt any more."

"After all, I was to blame. I might have known you only acted as you did in pique. But there's something—to me, so utterly ignoble in the idea of a woman encouraging a man to love her when all the time she means nothing. It is little to her; a tribute to her vanity; an hour or two's amusement; but to him it is often a hard and bitter experience."

The girl trembled a little and hid her face upon his shoulder. She had been within an ace of telling him about Osma, but now it was impossible. She dared not face the possibility of his scorn, contempt, more than all the possibility that she might lose his love. She nestled closer to his side; how she worshipped, adored him! She, the woman who had played with hearts so often and so cruelly, at last had lost her own.

The day passed all too quickly and with a little shiver of apprehension Gladys remembered her promise to see Osma.

"I must go now, dear," she told Vaughan. "It's time to dress for dinner, and I want to make myself look beautiful for you."

As she passed up the stairs a low voice called her.

"When shall I see you, Lady Gladys?"

She stumbled, nearly falling, in her agitation.

"In half an hour, in the library," she whispered.

Fear suggested that Ted might have heard, and almost losing courage, she tapped at Jim's door.

"Will you be down by seven, dear?" she asked. "I want you to keep guard for me while I see Osma."

Jim came out and stood by her on the landing.

"Will this be the last time, Gladys?" he asked gravely.

"The last," she answered.

"At all costs keep Ted away," she implored some half hour later. "Oh, Jim, you are very good to me."

The boy's eyes followed her tall, slim figure longingly. He worshipped his cousin, did this seventeen-year-old Jim, and to his mind only one man in the world was worthy to possess her." And that man was Edward Vaughan.

Digitized by Google

"I can't stay long," Gladys commenced hurriedly, as she entered the library; "as it is I've had to fly over dressing, and my bracelets are not properly fastened."

She moved near the window as she spoke, and the sun caught her hair, and seemed to wrap her in a golden veil. She was gloriously, mercilessly beautiful in her gown of creamy satin, caught here and there with jewels, that shimmered with every movement of her long, lithe limbs.

"May I help you?"

Osma's voice was soft; his manner, as usual, quiet and self-restrained. Surely she could bend him to her will. With a charming gesture she held out her soft white arm.

"You won't hurt me?" she asked.

"Never—how could I?"

"Do you mean it—do you really mean you have no wish to harm me?"

He bowed still lower over her hand.

"What do you wish?" he said calmly.

"That you will forgive my thoughtless, unkind treatment and forget me."

"The first—yes. The second—never."

"You—you——"

"I was wrong," he said slowly. "Yesterday I spoke in the heat of passion. To-day I see things in the light of reason. Vaughan loves you. Vaughan shall marry you. I swear it," he added, with a sudden emphasis. "You shall not be cheated of your happiness."

"How can I thank you for your generosity?"

"Tell me one thing," he answered. "Had there"—he hesitated—"had there been no Vaughan, could you have found happiness with me?"

"Had I never met Edward," she answered, "I might perhaps have grown to care for you."

"Thank you," he said, raising her hand to his lips. A moment later Gladys was alone. "Thank Heaven, that's over," she murmured. "Jim," as her cousin entered, "here is the end of my last flirtation. Osma has behaved beautifully."

In any case the Prince took his defeat with unexpected good humour. He even congratulated Vaughan with well-feigned heartiness, gracefully complimented Gladys' uncle on the match, and won every lady's good opinion.

"I'm really quite sorry to lose him," Lady Fairfax exclaimed. "But he insists he goes to-morrow. Some wretched business or other compels him."

Jim did not share the general regret at Osma's departure. That young man had his own views on the subject of niggers, and opined that it would be a good thing when the Prince cleared out.

"I believe the beggar's hatching some mischief or other," he thought, watching the dark face with its passionate eyes. "I don't like the way he looks at Gladys—By the bye, Prince"—he turned to Osma—"there's a parcel just come for you. At least a sort of packing-case arrangement. It's in the hall—will you go down and inspect it?"

"It contains some curios from India," answered Osma. "I have been expecting them. They will, I think, interest you"—he bowed to Lady Fairfax—"with your permission I will unpack the case and show you the contents."

"I should like nothing better," said the lady. "India is such a wonderful place. It always makes me think of idols with big diamond eyes. Are there any idols in your case, Prince?"

"I fear nothing so interesting; a few trifles merely."

The case was brought upstairs and Osma deftly opened it.

Some beautiful specimens of Indian embroidery, and curiously carved ivories were handed round, examined and enthused upon. Then came bangles in gold, silver and copper. Lastly Osma produced a box of sandal wood.

"The inhabitants of a certain province in my country," he commenced, "have a curious custom of testing whether ill-luck or good is likely to attend an enterprise. They take a dart—a thin arrow-shaped piece of wood about eight inches long, sharpened to a point and aim it at a shield of parchment. On the shield they write the name of the place where they wish to go, or a malady they fear. The name of their beloved, or their enemy. They aim the dart at the name on the parchment. If, so the story goes, the dart enters the parchment, fortune is favourable to the thrower. If, on the contrary, the dart glances off the surface of the shield, and falls to the ground, luck is against him. I have here"—he opened the box of sandal wood—"a few of these darts. It might, I thought, be amusing if some of us were to try to work the oracle for ourselves. There are some six darts here—a piece of cardboard would, I think, take the place of the shield."

"What a sweet idea!" chirped Lady Fairfax.

"Too lovely!" said a dear young thing in blue.

"Beats fortune-telling all to fits," remarked a go-ahead young woman.

Altogether the suggestion was rapturously received. A stout piece of cardboard was formed into a sort of shield, and Gladys, as the most intrepid of the company, was selected as the first to try her luck.

"I think perhaps if someone held the shield it would be better. The darts are only wooden, not in the least likely to hurt anybody even if they do miss the mark. What do you think, Vaughan?" and Prince Osma smiled.

"Certainly. By all means. Gladys, I'll be your shield bearer. Let fly your dart at me and see if fortune speeds it." Laughing he grasped the pasteboard and posed some few yards distant.

Gladys scrawled something on a piece of paper and fixed it on the shield.

"What have you written, Gladys?" asked Jim inquisitively. "Oh! Ted, of course. Well, if there's any truth in the tale your dart ought to go right home."

And so it did; the little weapon flew straight as an arrow from Gladys to the shield, entering the cardboard with a twang.

"Again, Lady Gladys. Three is the mystic number, you know."

She laughed and pinned another name in place of Ted's. The name was that of Osma. Jim read and frowned.

Once more Gladys let fly. This time the dart fell short, and dropped inert upon the floor.

"Bad luck," said Osma; stooping he picked the weapon up and handed it to her.

Gladys smiled a little uneasily. It was all nonsense, of course. Yet it was strange. She still half-feared the Prince. According to the legend the dart had told her she had cause.

"Good luck to Jim," she cried and hurled the dart. It touched the shield, then fell limp as the other.

"My dear Gladys, don't tell me I'm to be the victim of misfortune," laughed her cousin, "for I shan't believe you. Here, Ted, you have a try."

Vaughan was succeeded by the girl in blue, who quickly gave place to another of the party. Lady Fairfax screamed in horror when the oracle declared her pet pug was in danger, but otherwise was quite content with the performance.

"Now, Osma, it's your turn. We are all anxious to hear your luck."

Osma bowed gracefully and quickly threw a dart.

"Myself," he called, and everybody clapped as the dart went home. "Lady Gladys," fresh applause and equal success.

Digitized by Google

"Mr. Vaughan." The Prince stepped back and took a fresh dart from the box. "I want to make sure this time," he said. "Vaughan's too good a fellow for luck to miss him." He poised the weapon, Ted holding the shield laughed encouragement. A moment later the dart was flying through the air. It struck Jim that Osma had aimed too high, as though the mark was not the shield but Ted himself. Acting on a sudden impulse prompted by a strange indefinable sense of fear, Jim pushed Vaughan to one side, and instinctively put up his own hand. It was done so quickly that Ted himself was hardly aware what had happened. The next moment there was a general outcry; the dart was sticking in Jim's hand!

"Poor Jim," said Gladys, "your ill-luck has overtaken you. Let me pull it out."

"Allow me." Osma gently moved her aside.

"I can never apologise sufficiently," he said to Jim. He spoke huskily, and his dusky face looked curiously grey.

"It was my own fault," said Jim. "You weren't a bit to blame." But when on removing the dart it was found to be, unlike the others, fitted with a small steel point, Jim did not feel so sure that Osma was so innocent as he had stated.

It would be to Osma's advantage, or he would think so, if Ted Vaughan were out of the way. The Prince regarded him as a rival. "Niggers," reflected Jim, "weren't particular how they got rid of such. It was quite in the nature of a nigger to have planned the whole thing, and to have arranged to throw this very dart at Ted."

Altogether the business had a very ugly look. Jim decided he would confide his suspicions to Vaughan the next day. He wouldn't speak to-night, he felt horribly done up, and the scratch on his hand—the dart had entered the extreme tip of his third finger—was getting uncomfortable.

It was ridiculous to think a mere scratch like that could hurt a fellow so. Still it did hurt. He took a stiff brandy and soda and got off to bed.

He was awakened by a stinging pain in his right hand. The third finger was numb, from its base sharp agonising thrills shot up to his shoulder.

As he groaned, he heard a quick sharp sigh. Someone was in the room. "Who's there?" he called.

"'Tis I, Osma. I want to talk to you."

The Prince struck a match, lit the gas and locked the door. Then he crossed over to the bed and sat down by Jim's side.

"I have something to tell you," he said. "Promise me before I speak that you will hear what I have to say in silence. You will not cry out, make a disturbance, noise or alarm."

"All right, I promise. What is it?"

Osma leant over him and spoke in a quiet soft voice.

"The dart I threw at you was poisoned. In two hours you will die."

"Die!" Jim sat up dazed. Then as the meaning of the words came home to him he started out of bed and threw himself upon the Prince.

"You dog! you scoundrel! If I die it won't be till I have killed you!"

"Your promise, remember your promise," said Osma, forcing him back upon the bed. "There is still much to hear. I did not mean to hurt you. It was Vaughan I wanted to kill. I planned it all, no one would have known, the poison cannot be detected. He would have been removed from my path."

"Why do you tell me this," gasped Jim. "What good does it do now? Call somebody, fetch my mother, send for a doctor. I'm not going to give in without a fight."

Osma shook his head. "There is only one way you may be saved," he said.

"And that?"

"Wait. There is yet time. Tell me first why did you push Vaughan back? Did you feel any fear that I meant mischief to him?"

"Yes, I did. I always knew you had your knife in him and I wasn't going to let old Ted take any chances."

"But why should you suffer in his stead? That is what I cannot understand. You love Gladys also, I have seen it. If Vaughan were killed there might have been a chance for you."

"A chance no decent man would take. You fool, don't you see, it was because I love her I wanted to save her from unhappiness. For her sake, I would lay down my life. For her sake, I took the chance instead of Ted."

"Ah," The Prince drew a long deep breath. "You are a strange people," he said slowly. "Tell me, would it grieve her very much to lose you?"

"She'd be sorry, very. Gladys has been chums with me all my life."

"Then I give her that life. I also will make sacrifices to my love. Quick, throw on your clothes; come, follow me."

Urged by his voice and gesture, mastered by his impetuous will Jim obeyed and followed Osma from the room, down the stairs out to the stables. The dogcart stood ready, Osma's black servant at the side.

"Quick, it's a race for life. Another half hour and it is too late. I am taking you to a doctor that I know. If we are in time you will be saved. If not——" Osma closed his lips significantly, and furiously lashed the horse.

"Don't forget that this means ruin for me," he said hoarsely. "I shall have to tell the truth—and then"—he shrugged his shoulders.

Jim made no answer.

The horse had fallen into a swift and steady stride. They flew along the country road, past hedges, white in the summer moon, past homestead, cottage and farm, up hill and through the valley, a wild, mad race, the mare's hoofs clicking, the wheels skidding on the road.

"At last!" The Prince drew up at a small white house. Throwing the reins to his servant, he clutched Jim, dazed and sick with pain and terror, and dragged him to the door. A peal of the bell, a hurried parley from the window. Five minutes later Jim was in the surgery.

"You understand," he heard Osma say, "the poison is most virulent, amputation is his only chance. Otherwise"—he glanced significantly at Jim's white face. "The wound is from a poisoned dart. I——"

Jim feebly interrupted him.

"I was playing the fool with the confounded thing," he said in a faint, weak voice. "Pure accident—no one to blame." His voice died away. He fell fainting.

* * * * *

When Jim reappeared, some few weeks later, in Society he found himself the centre of attraction. The story of his race for life had leaked out, and had created an immense sensation. In default of Prince Osma, who had suddenly returned to India, Jim found himself the hero of the situation. He had to tell the story twenty times a day.

"Poisoned dart, don't you know, got mixed up with the others. Stuck it in my fingers. Osma, like a good chap, hauled me to the doctor. Saved my life? Rather, but I lost my hand."

This was the only explanation that Jim ever gave, even to Vaughan. But the latter had his own suspicions, and a wonder and reverence tinged his friendship for the boy.

Some few months after Ted and Gladys were made man and wife, the news reached them of Prince Osma's death. He had been killed tiger-shooting in the jungle.

"I'm sorry," Gladys said to Jim, with a little shudder, "but I was horribly afraid of him."

"He was not such a bad chap," answered the boy. "Consider, Gladys, he had some excuse." They were alone at the moment, Ted had gone into the garden.

"He had. Oh! Jim, it might have been much worse." She lifted his maimed arm gently. "I guessed about this long ago. I can never, never thank you."

Jim laughed. "It's all right, dear," he said, "the loss of a hand does not make all the difference."

She clung to him tearful and penitent.

"Think," she said softly, "what might have happened if——"

"We won't think of it. Sufficient to the day are the consequences even of your mischief. Though," he sighed, "you're still mischievous, you know."

She shook her head. "Never again," she said, "never again."

But at that Jim gave a smile.

John K. Prothero.

Digitized by Google

Caught in the Act.

The Story of a Burglar's Adventure.

I HAD all but done the trick when suddenly the room was illuminated by a brilliant flood of electric light. So unexpectedly it came and so dazzlingly, that I was struck all of a heap, as it were, and stood stupidly caught in the very act, with one hand lingering over my booty and the other raised instinctively to shield eyes and face from the blinding glare.

A pretty position for a professional burglar. Taken completely at a disadvantage, like any greenhorn. Held up, as you might say, at the very psychological moment and by a girl—the prettiest creature, I swear, that ever donned lace and cambric for the distraction of mankind.

She sat up in bed, a symphony in white, all be-laced and be-ribboned, and confronted me, bending upon me two eyes as blue as twin sapphires, in which were neither alarm nor supplication, but satisfaction only—satisfaction complete and apparently long-anticipated.

The loveliest hand in the world, white as the lawn that fell back kindly to reveal it, and moulded like that of the Medicean Venus, held, as if well-accustomed to it, a silver-mounted revolver—a toy, yet unmistakably a weapon; a trinket such as a dainty woman might hang at her chatelaine, but still sufficiently convincing to hold me planted there deprived of any inclination to run the risk of testing its mettle.

"Well," said my apprehender, in a voice that betrayed no more emotion than did her lovely face, which was so intoned as to set my susceptible heart beating, "at last I've got you! Now, drop into that chair if you please. No, keep your hands in front of you, if you don't mind. Yes, so; and let me talk to you. Good gracious! But I'm in luck! To think of my getting hold of a burglar at last!"

Her charming features beamed with delight. She even smiled, revealing a double row of the whitest, dearest little teeth it is possible to imagine. Still keeping the muzzle of the little pistol levelled straight at me with a hand that never trembled, with the other she reached down to the foot of the bed and drew up a delicate woollen wrap of pale blue, which she flung deftly about her shoulders. After which she raised the pillows at her back so that they should support her in an upright position and sank back upon them with a luxurious air of establishing herself in comfort. It was evident from look, tone, and gesture that the situation was exceedingly agreeable to her and that she was bent upon enjoying it to the utmost.

"Now," she commanded, with a nod in my direction, "tell me about yourself. All my life I've longed to hear something of a burglar's history from his own lips. Pardon me, but would you very much mind removing your mask? It is only anticipating matters a little, you know. The police will do it anyhow when they come in."

"The police!" I exclaimed involuntarily.

She nodded.

"Yes; they're all over the place, you know. Or perhaps you didn't know that we were warned of your coming? One of their confidence-men (stool pigeons, I think they call them) discovered your intentions and divulged them."

"Confound it!" I ejaculated beneath my breath. "That skunk of a Boynton!"

The girl leant forward earnestly, it seemed to me almost solicitously.

"What did you trust him for?" she said, with a note of reproof in her voice.

"Heaven only knows," I replied, in fierce self-condemnation. "But he'll pay for it yet. Just let him wait till I get my grip on him——"

My fair captor interrupted with a mocking laugh.

"He'll have to wait a long time, I expect," she remarked. "I shouldn't wonder if you get about five years for this. Shouldn't you consider that would be about it?"

I regarded her anxiously through the eye-holes in my mask.

"So you mean to give me up, then?" I hazarded.

She returned my scrutiny with a look of humorous surprise.

"What had you supposed I meant to do with you?" she asked. "Wear you on my watch-chain as a curiosity, or fill your pockets with those trinkets, which appear to have caught your fancy, and show you a safe and sure way of making off with them?"

"I don't know," said I, gloomily, for I really appeared to be in rather a bad hole. "Women sometimes have tender hearts. Beauty and youth have often shown themselves generous and merciful to the unfortunate——" I broke off doubtfully.

The gleam of humour in her eyes deepened.

"Yes," she remarked, "the female heart might well be moved to pity a man in your embarrassing position. Are you, perhaps, an orphan? And is your present condition solely the result of the evil influence to which you have been exposed since early youth?"

I shook my head, entering into her mood. The girl was certainly a character, and I lost sight of my own danger for the moment in enjoyment of her raillery.

"No," I replied, "I cannot plead such extenuating circumstances even for the sake of saving my own skin. Thief though I am, the spirit of truth pervades my breast. Alas, I was born in a respectable street, and of respectable parents. Religion (of a kind) has ever been instilled into my mind, and I have more doctrines at my fingers' ends than I well know what to do with."

Her merry look changed to one of profoundest commiseration.

"Ah, poor man!" she exclaimed. "No wonder you have been driven to irregular courses with such incentives to crime. Now, would you mind removing your mask, I am consumed with curiosity as to your looks. But wait a moment, I feel quite nervous over the event. You see I've been anticipating this moment for years. I've formed a dozen pictures of you in my mind, and do so hope you won't disappoint me. Tell me first, are you good-looking?"

She paused, regarding me with most flattering interest. Certainly she was the most original creature under the sun. Moment by moment she bewitched me more and more.

"On the honour of a house-breaker, an Adonis," I answered, immensely amused.

A troubled expression crept over her face.

"Hm—m," she mused, half aloud. I don't think you should be. It's rather upsetting, don't you know. I didn't look for it at all. Aren't you in the least ruffianly-looking?"

"Not in the least," I said with conviction.

She looked quite dissatisfied.

"Perhaps you are not a competent judge," she suggested hopefully.

"I have perfect confidence in my own discernment," said I firmly. "But since you doubt me, pray permit me to——" I raised my hand to the mask, but she cried out loud and sharp.

"No, no; you are not to move your hands, you know. It is never allowed."

"Pray, then, my dear young lady, how am I to uncover my face?"

She considered a moment.

"I think," she remarked presently, "that I shall be obliged to do it for you. Please come nearer."

Still with my hands uplifted in the traditional attitude and covered by the small revolver, I advanced to the side of the bed. When I got quite close she reached out a beautiful hand and touched the mask that hid my face. I breathed the perfume of the exquisite flesh, and felt my heart beat in ecstasy at the near proximity of the lovely form. Joy was it to be a burglar, to find one's self detected in crime, to suffer, imprisonment—aye, even death itself, for the delight of feeling that soft hand steal to one's cheek, of drinking deep of the intoxicating beauty of those wonderful violet eyes, of tasting that fragrant breath upon the lips.

One moment—and the fair shapely hand dropped again to its former position, the mask held daintily between its white fingers. Another, and a soft murmur of pleasure and approval escaped the curved, red lips.

My divinity was evidently well-pleased with her capture. She smiled triumphantly. And I—I was completely captured in more senses than one.

But hark, what was that? A noise overhead! With astonishing rapidity, I was transformed from the spellbound lover to the commonplace burglar.

My divinity was far too much occupied at her own anxiety as to the noise to notice my change of expression. Burglar-like I took advantage of her pre-occupation and deftly snatched the revolver from her hand, and in another second was gazing back at her from the window-sill. She had completely recovered her self-possession.

"Yes, perhaps you'd better go," she suggested, "but please leave my revolver on the garden seat below."

I needed no second bidding, for footsteps were plainly audible. In another minute I was in the garden, expecting every moment to run into the arms of the police. But my divinity had lied. Not a soul did I meet, and my only memento of that night's adventure is a pretty little revolver which has not left my person from that day to this.

E. P. Train.

The Girl Who Dreamt.

And who Awoke when Too Late.

She stood under the boughs of an apple tree in the old orchard, and there never was, perhaps never could be, another orchard just like it, with its green hills and valleys and old apple trees with their moss-grown limbs. To-day they upheld a profusion of pink and white bloom against the blue and grey of the sky; and she stood there while the bees hummed over the clover at her feet. She was barely seventeen, and beautiful. The sunlight discovered gold in the brown of her hair, and there were golden lights in the depths of her dark eyes, and she was fair—too fair, some said who wished to find fault with her because she was fair.

She lifted one slender hand towards the apple boughs, and the sleeve fell back from an arm white and finely formed. Then she murmured softly: "Nature, I love thee, I love thee, and I shall devote my life to studying thy beauty, and nothing shall come between this love and me."

The vow was scarcely spoken when a youth of about nineteen, accompanied by a large setter dog, came over the hills to where she stood.

"Ruth!" he exclaimed on seeing her, and she said: "Henry!" then there was silence for a moment, and she said: "I did not know you were at home. When did you come?"

"Yesterday. Grandfather has been ill, but he is better to-day. Aunt Martha sent for me."

"I did not know your grandfather was ill."

"No, it seems you don't care to know anything about us any more. Aunt Martha says you seldom come to the house now. It seems rather hard when a fellow's old playmate gives him and his relatives the go-by like that."

"Well, Henry, we are no longer children, and mother does not approve of our playing together any longer"—this with a little smile—then, seriously: "She never did, much, you know."

"No, but you are making her an excuse for throwing me off, and you know, Ruth, that you are the only one in the world I ever shall care for."

"It's silly for you to talk that way; you have never seen the world. What do you know of it?"

"I know it contains nothing half so lovely as Ruth Dartmore."

Without commenting on this assertion she continued: "Mother says our stations in life are different. You are heir to all things desirable, while I must work for all I hope to possess."

He had pushed his cap back, and his fair hair lay in a wavy mass on his forehead; a most disconsolate look had crept into his blue eyes, while his handsome mouth quivered with a mingled expression of scorn and amusement.

"Heir to Gehenna!" he exclaimed. "Heir to a tumbled-down old house"—waving his hand toward the old, red brick building—"heir to an orchard whose every tree is mortgaged! Yes, our stations in life are different. Your father owns his little home and earns his living. I have no father, no mother, sister, or brother; but I have a hope of making my way in the world, and sustaining the honour of my name."

Ruth felt a yearning tenderness towards him when he spoke of having no mother or sister; but she always enjoyed making him angry. She loved to see the attitude he assumed, the fine scorn that flashed from his eyes, the varying expression of his flexible mouth. So she stood still and watched him, and when he lifted his cap and walked away she still stood there and said nothing.

After he had gone she gathered some apple blossoms and walked home—a pretty little ivy-covered cottage at the other end of the orchard—and the old orchard with all its bloom and beauty in the springtime, with all its golden harvest in summer and autumn, represented a great gulf fixed between the cottage and the tumbled-down red brick mansion, because a labourer lived in one, and a judge in the other.

* * * * *

Ruth said nothing to her mother about meeting Henry in the orchard. She arranged the apple blossoms, took out her paints and palette, and was very silent and busy all the morning; but that day at dinner Ruth's father remarked to her mother: "I saw Henry Carridine to-day; the judge is ill." Next morning when Ruth put on her bonnet and started out, Mrs. Dartmore said: "I think I would find something besides apple blossoms to paint to-day."

There was an old man who lived in a suburb of the town in a little house, with his dogs and cat and an old housekeeper. He was a painter, and he had a strange theory that painting should be a labour of love, and the reward sought after—perfection in the work. He lived alone; for no one intruded upon him.

When Ruth Dartmore discovered her talent she applied to him for instruction. He would have turned away anyone else; but her youth and beauty were an inspiration to him and her enthusiasm pleased him, so, taking a younger brother or sister with her, three times a week she went to him for instruction.

Shortly after the incident in the orchard she came to him with a sketch of a youth and a maiden and a fine setter dog, under a large, old apple tree, laden with bloom, and told him her plan for the painting—and he was greatly pleased. So she worked all the summer, and he helped her, but she was hard to satisfy. The youth was not handsome enough; the pink and white blossoms did not melt softly enough into the blue and grey of the sky; the tender green of the foliage was not delicate enough, so she would lay aside a nearly finished canvas and begin again. This unrest delighted the old painter.

"You are coming along finely," he said. "You have caught the divine fire."

One morning in early autumn she looked up from the canvas to the old painter.

"It will do, it will do!" he said nodding his head. "It's as beautiful as a dream."

And it was indeed a dream-picture—the youth and maiden and the dog under the grand old apple tree.

"Do you think it is good enough for exhibition?" she asked timidly. A shade passed over the old man's face.

"And you feel the thirst for fame?" he said slowly.

"No; not that," she answered quickly and earnestly.

"It is necessity—I need money."

"And you will sell your birthright? Well, we will see what it is worth in the market."

The old painter had once lived in the world, and still retained a knowledge of the places where such work was sold. So he packed up the painting and sent it, with all its breezy freshness of youth and beauty and country air, away to the city. The young painter had said to him, "I can do nothing now until I see," and he had looked disappointed, and she grew thin and nervous while waiting.

She had seen Henry but once since their meeting in the orchard, and that was the evening after the picture was packed. She met him in the road, and he held out his hand and said: "I am going back to college to-morrow, Ruth. My vacation has not been what I hoped it would be when I came home, but two more terms at college, and then I hope to get into a place where I can command your attention."

"You had better build your air castles without me, Henry."

"You are building yours without me, I suppose?"

"Yes."

And he went away in anger. It was heartbreaking to have him go in this way; but her mother had said: "The Carridines are proud people, and you had better keep away from them." She thought of this, and it helped her to control her feelings.

One day the old painter sent for her; she came to him, white and breathing hard. He held out a roll of bank notes towards her. "Oh, is it enough, enough for a term at a good art school?" she gasped.

"And it is an art school, then, you aim at?" he asked, somewhat appeased.

"Yes, it is enough; we'll make it enough."

Then she left the country and went to London to study art, and her life became a life of labour, where a partial success was followed by failure; then a struggle to succeed again. She taught for a time, and studied for a time, and her name was printed in a paragraph of other names of toilers along the same hard way.

She rarely had time to visit her old home; time passed, and she realised it not. But there was a mixture of vanity and selfishness with all this devotion to art—a desire to write her name above that of Carridine. With this in view she triumphed over all natural feelings, and lost the sweetness that is in work for the work's sake. Her younger brother and sisters grew up, married, and moved away. Her father died while she was in London—and still she was not famous; still she had never painted anything as well as she had painted the youth and maiden under the apple tree.

Sometimes the memory of that early painting came back to her; sometimes in the heat and dust, tired and travel-stained, she would be wafted away in vision and be again in the old orchard.

"If only mother had let us alone!" she would exclaim fretfully.

She had admirers; but having discouraged her youthful lover it was easy to turn away the others.

Henry studied law and rose high in the profession. He married a lawyer's daughter. Ruth had read the details of the marriage in the papers. Even that was long ago now, and in Ruth's hair there was a touch of silver where there had once been a glint of gold; and the light was fading from her eyes.

She received a telegram one evening. It said: "Your mother is dying; come to her." She started for the old home—the home she had not seen for years. When she had changed trains and was on the little train that ran into the old country town, her attention was attracted toward a well-dressed lady and handsome youth, who sat opposite her. There was something about the boy that was familiar to her—something that brought again a vision of apple blossoms. She watched him intently, and noted his fondness for and devotion to the lady whom he called mother, and as she watched a feeling of loneliness came over her and a desire to have him come to her and smile into her eyes.

Then a gentleman who sat next to her leant forward.

"Mrs. Carridine," he exclaimed, "I am glad to see you and Master Henry coming home again."

"Thank you. My husband always wants us to spend part of every summer with his aunt. She is very feeble now and can't be induced to leave the old place."

Ruth Dartmore looked out of the window and knew that this woman was Henry Carridine's wife and the boy, his child.

She arrived in time to see her mother buried, and beside the grave she awoke and found that she was alone in the world!

L. E. Hays.

The Spider and the Fly.

"WILL you walk into my parlour?" said the spider to the fly. But the insect only tossed her head, and tossed it very high. "Why, no," she said, with hauteur, "your style with mine won't run; your dining and reception rooms are, vulgarly, in one."

Wanted, a New Sensation.

THE girl was very rich and the young man was poor but honest. She liked him, but that was all, and he knew it. One night he had been a little more tender than usual. "You are very rich," he ventured. "Yes," she replied, frankly. "I am worth three hundred thousand pounds." "And I am poor." "Yes." "Will you marry me?" "No." "I thought you wouldn't." "Then why did you ask me?" "Oh, just to see how a man feels when he loses three hundred thousand pounds," and the girl smiled

Digitized by Google

The Temporary Substitute.

The Tale of a Kitchen Adventure.

Felix Livingstone was not in a good temper.

He had a fortnight's leave, which duty required him to spend with his maiden aunt in the country, while inclination strongly urged him to go up to town in order to see the girl he loved. But on this occasion duty had to be considered, for Miss Drury, the aunt in question, was a wealthy old lady, and he was practically dependent upon her.

All things considered, however, Fate had not been so very unkind to Felix. Left an orphan at an early age, he had been adopted by his mother's elder sister, who had done her duty nobly by him. Now at the age of twenty-five he found himself a subaltern in one of the line regiments, with a handsome allowance from his aunt, and every prospect of becoming her heir. But—there is always a "but" in most people's lives—although Miss Drury had been more than liberal to her nephew and forebore to exercise any but a very nominal restraint over his actions, yet she had given him to understand that she meant to exert her authority in one important matter, namely, the question of his marriage.

In due course of time she intended Felix to become master of Woodlands, her beautiful old house, and since his wife would occupy her place as mistress, Miss Drury meant to limit, if not direct, her nephew's choice of a bride.

She did not approve of the modern woman, the up-to-date girl, with her cigarette and her slang, her talk of golf and bridge, her contempt for needlework, and all things pertaining to domesticity, Felix could see in his mind's eye the wife his aunt destined for him—a meek and modest young woman of ultra-refined speech and appearance, and always with a piece of fancy work between her fingers—and he shuddered at the picture. Then he thought, with a sudden tightening of his heart, of Kitty Bellairs, as he had seen her last summer at the house of a brother-officer—beautiful, mischievous, high-spirited, a keen tennis player, a brilliant horsewoman, full of life and laughter. She had charmed the young man's heart out of him, and though Felix tried desperately hard to banish her from his memory, absence, in this case, had certainly made the heart grow fonder.

"I daren't tell Aunt Minnie about Kitty," thought the young man disconsolately. "Of course, if she knew her as I do she couldn't help but love her, although she isn't quite her style, but I don't see how ever they are to meet, since my little darling knows no one in this neighbourhood, and Aunt Min never will come up to town."

In the depths of his heart, Felix was genuinely fond of the old lady, who had so generously mothered him all his life, and he was therefore rather disconcerted to find when he reached Woodlands that Miss Drury was very much perturbed and upset about something. Generally his aunt was a very dainty-looking little old lady, exquisitely dressed, and the perfection of a hostess. But on this particular afternoon she greeted her nephew in an absent-minded fashion, her cap slightly awry, her cheeks flushed, and her beautiful old hands trembling.

"Why, Aunt Minnie," said the young man anxiously, whatever is the matter?"

"Oh, my dear Felix," replied the old lady, looking into his handsome face with troubled blue eyes, "I have had such a dreadful upset. Two of the housemaids are down with influenza, and now Parkins, who is quite invaluable, has declared she can hold up no longer, and has gone to bed seriously ill, I fear."

Felix gave a long whistle of dismay. Parkins was cook-housekeeper at Woodlands, and the pivot upon which the rest of the household turned. She was an exceptionally good cook, and he knew that his aunt prided herself that her dinners were unsurpassed in the neighbourhood.

"I would not have minded had we been alone," continued Miss Drury, "but the house is full of people, and I have a large dinner-party to-morrow."

"What a catastrophe," exclaimed her nephew sympathetically, who knew how vexed was Miss Drury's orderly mind when any household affairs went wrong. "Can't you get a woman from the village to help?"

"Of course I can but you don't know what these village women are like, my dear Felix; dirty, incompetent creatures, and as incapable of sending up a dinner as you are. No, I must just leave Susan, the kitchenmaid, to do her best, but I know I shall be disgraced to-morrow, and I do mind so much if my guests don't have the best of everything. And to make matters worse, that greedy old Sir Gregory is coming, and he always says he never dines so well anywhere as here. You don't know of a cook that you can recommend by any chance, do you, Felix?" she asked desperately.

This wistful appeal touched the young man's heart. As a rule, a subaltern home on leave is not the person one would naturally apply to for a cook, but Miss Drury was at her wits' ends. Felix knitted his brows and thought hard for a minute, at the end of which time a brilliant inspiration came to him.

"Look here, Aunt Minnie," he exclaimed suddenly, "don't you worry any more. I'll go straight up to town first thing to-morrow, and I'll find you a cook somehow, and bring her back with me in the afternoon."

Miss Drury looked at her nephew with tears in her eyes. "Felix," she said solemnly, "if you get me out of this difficulty you may ask me for anything in the world."

Felix was as good as his word. He departed for town directly after breakfast next morning, smiling good-humouredly at the chaff of his fellow-guests, and reappeared triumphant in the afternoon proudly escorting the new cook.

"I've brought her, Aunt Min," he announced, rushing excitedly into Miss Drury's boudoir. "She was at the Rawson's last summer, and an uncommonly good cook she is. Blair is her name, it's a great piece of luck that she was disengaged, you know."

Miss Drury went hurriedly downstairs to inspect the new arrival, and to explain to her the arrangements for the evening's dinner.

"I was a little taken aback at first," she said later on to her nephew. "Blair looks so young and so pretty, and so—er—refined, but she seems very capable and fully qualified to send up an excellent dinner."

Digitized by Google

"Yes," replied Felix eagerly, "she has had a course of cooking lessons at South Kensington. I believe she is no end of a swell at it."

"Really, my dear boy," said Miss Drury, looking affectionately at her nephew. "I am most touched by the interest you have shown in this domestic difficulty and the trouble you have taken. If only Blair does not falsify our expectations I shall owe you a debt of gratitude."

The dinner proved an immense success, and even Miss Drury had to confess that Parkins could not have done better. As for Sir Gregory, he chuckled with delight and went steadily through the menu from beginning to end.

"Really, my dear Miss Drury," he said when at length he was obliged to desist, "that cook of yours has surpassed herself. I don't know when I have eaten a better dinner, that soufflé was simply a work of art."

Only one contretemps marred the harmony of the evening, and fortunately Miss Drury did not witness this little incident, as it occurred when the ladies had retired to the drawing-room.

Felix was doing the honours of his aunt's table when the sound of a scuffle arrested his attention, and with a hasty excuse to his guests he left the room and rushed into the passage, where he found an ardent young footman trying vainly to embrace a very angry but bewitchingly pretty young woman in a white cap and apron.

"You impudent wretch!" she was saying, "how dare you try and kiss me? Mr. Livingstone, help!"

Felix turned on the man in a perfect fury and dragged him away.

"John," he said, looking as if he could have killed him with pleasure, "leave that lady alone at once and clear out. Here are your wages, go!"

"John," he said, looking as if he could have killed him with pleasure, "leave that lady alone at once and clear out."

The man gazed at him dumb with surprise.

"I beg pardon, Mr. Felix," he stammered at length, "I meant no 'arm. I often used to kiss Mrs. Parkins. I didn't know as 'ow Miss Blair would mind."

The cook's angry face relaxed, and she burst into a peal of laughter, in which, after some hesitation, Felix joined.

"Never mind, John," she said, "I'll forgive you this once, only don't try it again. I dare say Mr. Felix will allow you to stay, if you behave yourself."

Felix nodded impatiently, and the man fled to the lower regions, but it was some minutes before "Miss Blair" took her place at the servants' hall supper looking rather flushed, or before Felix rejoined the men in the dining-room.

Parkins' illness lasted a week, and throughout that time Blair continued to charm the palates of the inmates of Woodlands. All the same, Miss Drury was rather relieved when the last day of the temporary cook's stay came, for try as she would to disbelieve the evidence of her senses, there was no disguising the fact that Felix was always hanging about the kitchen on some pretext or another. That her nephew could so far forget what was due both to himself and to her, as to even carry on a mild flirtation with a servant, Miss Drury would not allow for a moment. Her horror can therefore be better imagined than described when, on descending to the kitchen the last afternoon for the purpose of paying Blair her wages, she saw, on opening the door, a pretty white-capped head reposing on her nephew's shoulder, while his arm was tenderly clasping an aproned waist.

"Kitty, darling," she heard him say tenderly, "I couldn't let you go away without telling you I loved you. I know I ought not to have done so, for goodness only knows when I shall be able to marry you."

"Do you think Miss Drury will be very angry?" asked the girl.

Miss Drury coughed, and at the ominous sound the guilty couple started apart and looked with dismay at the intruder.

The old lady's face had turned very white, and Felix, cut to the quick by her piteous expression, crossed the room hastily and took her hand.

"Don't look so shocked, Aunt Minnie," he said, "this is not a cook really; it is the lady I love, Miss Kitty Bellairs. I met her at the Rawson's last summer and fell in love with her, and I knew she could cook beautifully, so when you were in such a fix I asked her to come and help. We—we thought, perhaps, you might take a fancy to her and ask her to stop."

"Are you Archie Bellairs' daughter?" asked Miss Drury in astonishment.

"Yes," said the girl gently, "he is dead, you know, and I am an orphan and very poor—but I love Felix."

The old lady's eyes grew very wistful and tender as she remembered the far-off days of her youth when poverty had stood between her and the one whom she loved—Archie Bellairs.

She took the girl's hand and smilingly put it into that of her nephew.

"So do I, my dear," she said, "and I am sure you will make him an excellent wife. I shall be exceedingly glad to offer the temporary substitute a permanent place in my household."

Edith Bass.

Digitized by Google

The Secret of the West Wing.

Telling of a Terrible Discovery.

"Welcome, Alf, my boy!"

My old friend Stephen Gregory grasped my hand as he said these words, and did not release it until he had led me up the steps of his home, and begun to assist me to unfasten my great coat.

"And how are you, my lad?" he continued, without giving me time to reply to his hearty reception. "Why, you look as brown as a berry, and certainly none the worse for your fifteen years nabobism."

I had just returned to England after having endured the trying climate of India for fifteen years, and had hastened at once to the old mansion where I had spent so many happy days in the company of my school chum Stephen and which was, at the time of my story, in his sole possession.

A substantial repast was provided for me in the old dining-room, and after I had done justice to it, and the grey-headed butler (who had officiated in my father's time) had brought in the wine, Stephen and I were soon deep in conversation on topics peculiarly interesting to me.

"So you think the old place is changed?" he said musingly, in reply to a remark that had fallen from me. "I've not noticed it; but it may be, it may be."

"Indeed it is, Stephen," I said; "and I think you are allowing the best part of the house to fall into decay. Now, in your father's day the west wing——"

"Hush!" he cried, interrupting me with a startled look in his eyes. "Don't mention that, for Heaven's sake! She loved those rooms."

In a moment I had grasped his hand.

"Forgive me, Stephen!" I exclaimed, as the terrible past flashed across my mind, and I saw I had opened an old wound.

"There is nothing to forgive, Alf, my boy," he said, looking into the bright fire with an anxious, troubled face. "You could not know of all the horror of that terrible time."

Indeed I could not; for I was but a boy when I went out to India. Nevertheless, I had heard sufficient whilst there of my friend's unfortunate marriage to convince me of the pain which any allusion to it would give to him.

I had heard how he had married a beautiful girl, and how fondly he had loved her, and how, after three months of married life, she had deserted him. With whom and whither she had gone, no one knew; and her name had become almost a forgotten sound at Stanley House.

I changed the subject of conversation, and tried to make him forget the unpleasant recollections which my words had raised, by relating some of the most amusing adventures that had befallen me whilst abroad; but, though he listened with interest, and seemed to try to shake off the gloom that had settled upon his mind, he never quite regained his wonted cheerfulness during the remainder of the evening, and retired early to rest, excusing himself by saying it was his custom.

Amongst the evils of civilisation which my somewhat stormy passage through life had taught me, that of late hours was by no means the smallest; and, knowing it would be useless for me to turn into bed before midnight, I put on my hat, lit another cigar, and strolled into the grounds to get a breath of fresh air.

It was a fine summer night. The moon was shining brightly from a clear starlit sky. I knew every foot of the ground, and visited many of my favourite haunts; and it must have been after eleven o'clock before I began to think of returning. My cigar had gone out when I reached the bottom of the long avenue of tall trees, and, beginning to feel chilly, I walked somewhat quickly towards the house, crunching the gravel beneath my feet as I went.

As I drew near the front door my attention was attracted by the sudden appearance of a man bearing a lantern, who had evidently heard my footsteps, for he stopped and awaited my approach. At first I thought he was one of the servants; but, upon drawing nearer, I was surprised to find it was Stephen. I hastened to speak to him, when, to my great astonishment, after glancing at me eagerly, he turned away without any sign of recognition, and hurried rapidly in the direction of the deserted west wing.

My first intention was to call out after him; but, upon second thoughts, I decided not to do so; for I was persuaded that he had seen and recognised me, and that perhaps my company might not be desired; so I retraced my steps, entered the house, and was soon in bed and asleep.

The next morning when I came downstairs, I found Stephen already in the breakfast-room awaiting me. He was standing with his back to the fire.

"Good morning, Alf," he said, smiling in his cheerful manner. "You are an exception to most lovers of late hours, I see."

"Yes," I replied; "I sleep soundly and therefore rise early."

"You'll find the nights long and dull here, I'm afraid, after the excitement to which you have been accustomed."

"Oh, no, not at all," I said. "There are so many old associations about Stanley House that I think I shall never be dull here. Now, last night, I strolled through the grounds, and did not return until close upon midnight."

"These late hours seem to me to be a very stupid custom, and one which I could never cultivate. I think, my boy, that you would have been much wiser if you had turned in when I did, and slept until morning."

"Why, I daresay I was in bed before you."

"In bed before me?" he repeated, with a puzzled look, "What do you mean?"

"I mean just what I say—that I was in bed and asleep before you were; unless you finish your rest and rise before midnight."

"You must be joking, Alf," he said incredulously. "I was in bed by nine o'clock, and was up this morning at six."

"Surely you must be mistaken, Stephen; for I met you, or your double, at the top of the avenue last night, as I was returning to the house."

"Impossible."

"Indeed I did. I would have spoken to you, but you hurried away; and I thought you had seen me, and wished to be alone."

Digitized by Google

"It could not have been me. I was never out of the house after seven o'clock."

All that day I was haunted by the recollection of what I had seen on the previous night, and of Stephen's denial. I had heard singular stories of his being a somnambulist, before I had left England, and could not help wondering if he was still addicted to freaks of that kind; but as I had never seen him walk in his sleep, and as I had only half believed the tales I had been told, I was inclined to accept this explanation as a solution of the problem. However, I was determined to solve the mystery.

As soon as all were in bed, therefore, on the night following that on which I had arrived at Stanley House, I again went out into the grounds, determined, if I met the mysterious person whom I had seen on the previous night, to follow him and discover who he was.

I had taken up my point of observation just in front of the west wing of the house, which had been so long shut up and left to fall into decay. So great indeed had been my friend's horror lest any portion of it should be touched by human foot, that not only had he boarded up every window and door that had communication without, but he had also caused to be built up every door that had given access from it to the main body of the building.

I walked to and fro until past midnight, and was about to give up my quest as hopeless, and return to the house, when I heard a footstep on the damp gravel walk approaching. I drew back into the shadow of the trees, and peered forth into the darkness, for at that moment a thick cloud shut out the light of the moon.

Nearer and nearer the footsteps came, and at length the glimmering of the lantern shone out on the darkness. The man bearing the light went up to the principal entrance of the west wing, where he paused, and a moment later I heard a key shoot back the heavy lock; the next instant the light and the man disappeared as the door closed behind them.

Animated and excited, I stepped quickly but softly, across the gravel walk to the door, where for a moment I paused and listened. A footstep was ascending the creaking staircase. I waited until I heard it on the second flight before I tried the door. I found it open, and entered softly, closing it behind me. Before proceeding further, I cautiously took off my boots, and then I ascended the cold, clammy stairs, that smelt of the tomb.

From the second landing there opened a suite of apartments, which I remembered had been called the strong rooms because they were in the very heart of the building, had few windows, and only one doorway for ingress and egress. The heavy oak door that opened into these rooms I found was ajar, and a bright light streamed out between the opening.

To my great astonishment, when I entered this room, I heard voices in the apartment beyond. At first I was so amazed that I could not distinguish a single word that was spoken; but as I became calm, and after drawing close to the door of the room from which the sound proceeded, I distinctly heard a woman's voice, in tearful accents, saying:

"Oh, if you love me, deliver me from this place! What have I done that I should be forced to bear this punishment? Have I not loved with a true woman's love? Speak to me. Do not look at me with eyes so glassy that they seem to see not. Give me one word, that I may hear you as the same Stephen that you were before this fearful malady overtook you. Let me again see the light of Heaven, and the faces of my friends."

I crept softly nearer to the door, and got into a position from which I could partly distinguish the occupants of the room and their surroundings. It was a handsomely-furnished apartment, half boudoir, half drawing-room. Every luxury which the heart could desire was scattered about in endless variety.

In the centre of the floor stood Stephen; but with such a strange, wicked, frenzied expression on his face, that, had I not known his features well, I should have thought it could not be he. Before him knelt a woman whose face was buried in her hands.

"You shall not leave me thus!" she said, as he turned to go, "I must, and will have my liberty!"

She had started to her feet, and ran to the door. But Stephen, still without any change in his fixed, staring countenance, seized her roughly by the arm, and pushed her from him, and walked quickly towards the door.

I had hardly time to draw back into the shadow of a heavy curtain, when he entered the room where I was, and walked quickly across to the landing, closing this last door after him, and locking it. Thus I found myself also a prisoner. I heard his footsteps descend the stairs, and then the sound died slowly away.

For a few moments I stood puzzled and wondering what course I should pursue.

I was aroused from my thoughts by a sob from the occupant of the next chamber. Going up to the door which Stephen had closed after him, I knocked, and then entered. My tap had evidently not been heard, for I found the graceful form seated in a chair, in an attitude which betokened despair, her arms upon the table, her head leaning forward, and her beautiful dishevelled hair falling in waving folds about her.

"Madam."

I had walked up to her, and placed my hand upon her shoulder.

"Oh!" And she turned towards me her pale, tearful, horror-stricken face, then shrank away in fear. "Who are you? Pray do not hurt me. I know I am helpless."

It was some time before I could convince her that I was really a friend; for so long had she been buried in these rooms that her mind had become almost unhinged, and her sense of perception blunted. By degrees, however, I made her understand who I was, and how I had come there; and then, in answer to my questions, I gleaned the history of her captivity.

When Stephen married her she was a handsome young girl of eighteen, and he was verging on the period of middle age. For three months after their marriage he had been kind and attentive—all, in fact, that a wife could desire of her husband. Just at the end of that time, however, he discovered accidentally several letters, which had been written by her before her marriage, to a former lover; and for some days afterwards, he was moody, jealous, and strange in his conduct.

One night he entered her room with that fixed, frenzied, wicked look upon his face which she had never seen there before, but which had marred his features in all her interviews with him since, and directed her by signs to follow him, a mandate which in her terror she readily obeyed.

He conducted her to a gloomy chamber, lighted only by a small oil-lamp, and then left her, locking the door behind him; but always coming in the night, and bearing himself in a silent, changed, peculiar manner.

At length he led her back again to her own suite of apartments (those in which I had discovered her), where, during her absence, all the windows had been built up, thus cutting off communication with the outer world. Here he had visited her almost every night since, bringing her the necessaries saries of life, coming like an apparition, and going as he came.

Digitized by Google

"I think those foolish letters of mine," she said, in conclusion, "written before I had learnt to love my husband, have turned his brain. I was warned before I married him that he was affected with the malady of sleep-walking, and that when under its influence he not only lost complete control over his reason, but also seemed to live a double life.

"When awake he was generous, frank and good; but when in a somnambulant state, I was told he was morose, jealous, wicked—in a word, insane; and that in his waking hours he had no recollection of what took place or what he did when in this latter state."

Between us we managed to smash open the door by battering it almost to splinters with the heaviest furniture we could wield.

I took my protégée to the rectory, where the rector, who was an old college friend of mine, was not a little surprised to receive such visitors at so early an hour.

Before returning to Stanley House, I rode on the rector's cob to my brother's doctor, who lived about three miles away, and consulted him upon Stephen's sad condition. He told me that he was quite aware of the facts of the case, but that he had not for a moment thought the malady could have been capable of working so much mischief.

He then made the suggestion that in all probability a crisis in the disease would now be reached, brought about by the mental shock which the discovery of the escape would give when next the somnambulist visited the west wing. The result of this crisis would either leave him a hopeless maniac or completely cure him.

At the doctor's request I arranged to meet him the same night at twelve o'clock, in order to watch Stephen's movements. I then rode back to the rectory, and from there proceeded with all haste to Stanley House.

After resting in my room for a short while, I came downstairs, and found Stephen more cheerful and genial than usual, all unconscious poor fellow, of the fate hanging over him.

At night he retired to rest at the usual time, and I went out into the grounds to meet the doctor, about an hour and a half afterwards. When I met him we proceeded to the west wing together, to watch the effect of the shock of discovery upon the patient.

As soon as we reached the door, I saw that Stephen had been before us, for the door was ajar. With a heart that beat fast with my fears, I hurried into the house, and was about to run upstairs, when I tumbled over some obstacle at the bottom. The doctor, who was following closely, carrried a dark lantern, and its light soon revealed to us the bleeding form of my unhappy chum.

"He is dead," the doctor said, rising from his knees, after making a hasty examination of the body. "In his frenzy he must have dashed himself down the stairs. Poor fellow! we have been too late to save him!"

Five years have fled since that time. Stanley House has been newly painted and renovated, and again holds a happy bride and bridegroom. A fair face looks over my shoulder as I write, and drops a tear upon the paper that contains a history of her sorrows. But a smile flits about her lips as I kiss her; and we look out together upon the beautiful scene, in the midst of which stands our home, and forget the darkness of the past in the brightness of the future.

G. P. Lane.

OUR TARTAN COVERS.

Reproductions of famous Scotch Tartans are appearing at intervals on the cover of Short Stories. The following have already been issued: Menzies (with No. 709); McPherson (with No. 711); McLeod (with No. 715). Copies of these numbers may be obtained through any newsagent.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

September 30.—Those whose birthdays fall to-day will have a favourable year; travelling and change are promised. Domestic affairs go better.

Girls have attentions paid them, and if engaged, they marry.

The day is good for serious and permanent undertakings; for marriage, visiting, and engaging servants.

A child born this day will be affectionate, thoughtful, and persevering. Will make a good speculator, and do well in business.

October 1.—A promising year for business, and making new friends; those in employ meet with preferment.

Young girls will find love affairs interesting; if born between six and seven p.m. they become engaged or marry.

A good day for most things, between one and five p.m. especially. Buy, sell, and speculate; ask favours of superiors.

A child born here will be fortunate in life, making many powerful friends. Will be generous, high-minded, and far-seeing.

October 2.—Those who celebrate birthdays to-day will need some extra care with health and in their business affairs. An active year.

Girls born near four p.m. will experience some disappointment in love and need care with opposite sex.

The day is not good for dealing with land or property, engaging servants, or for marriage. Guard against chills and falls.

A child born here will be fond of travel and change. The mind will be quick, original, but lacking in self-confidence.

October 3.—A better year for health and domestic affairs. Many pleasant events in the home circle.

Young girls will have opportunities of marriage, and find it a good year for such an event.

A child born to-day will be clever and skilful with its hands. The mind will be quick, strong, and business-like.

October 4.—An unfavourable year; quarrels, and much anxiety in business and home affairs. Health will need some care.

Girls born near nine a.m. or seven p.m. will have some worry and annoyance with opposite sex.

The day is not good to speculate, travel, or begin new undertakings. Have a care against accident.

A child born here will be stubborn, rash, and improvident. It should keep in the employ of others.

October 5.—With care business and domestic matters will progress favourably. Better for aged people.

Young girls will have attentions from elderly men or widowers.

A child born to-day will be fortunate in business. The disposition will be kind, steady, and persevering.

October 6.—A good year for business and money matters; health may need a little care. Those in employ will do well.

Girls born near eleven a.m. or eight p.m. will find love affairs very interesting.

The day is good to ask favours, deal with lawyers, the clergy, and professional men.

A child born this day will be fortunate and will rise in life. Will be ambitious, generous, clever, and active.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT CUT-PICTURE COMPETITION.

CLOSES OCTOBER 7.

THE FINAL PICTURE.

TWENTY-FIVE AWARDS OF VALUABLE GRAMOPHONES.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find fifty-four pictorial squares, which when placed together in their proper position will form a complete picture.

Each square is numbered; that, however, has nothing to do with their correct position, of course. What we want you to do is to cut the jumble below into the fifty-four squares and carefully paste the squares in their correct order on to a sheet of paper.

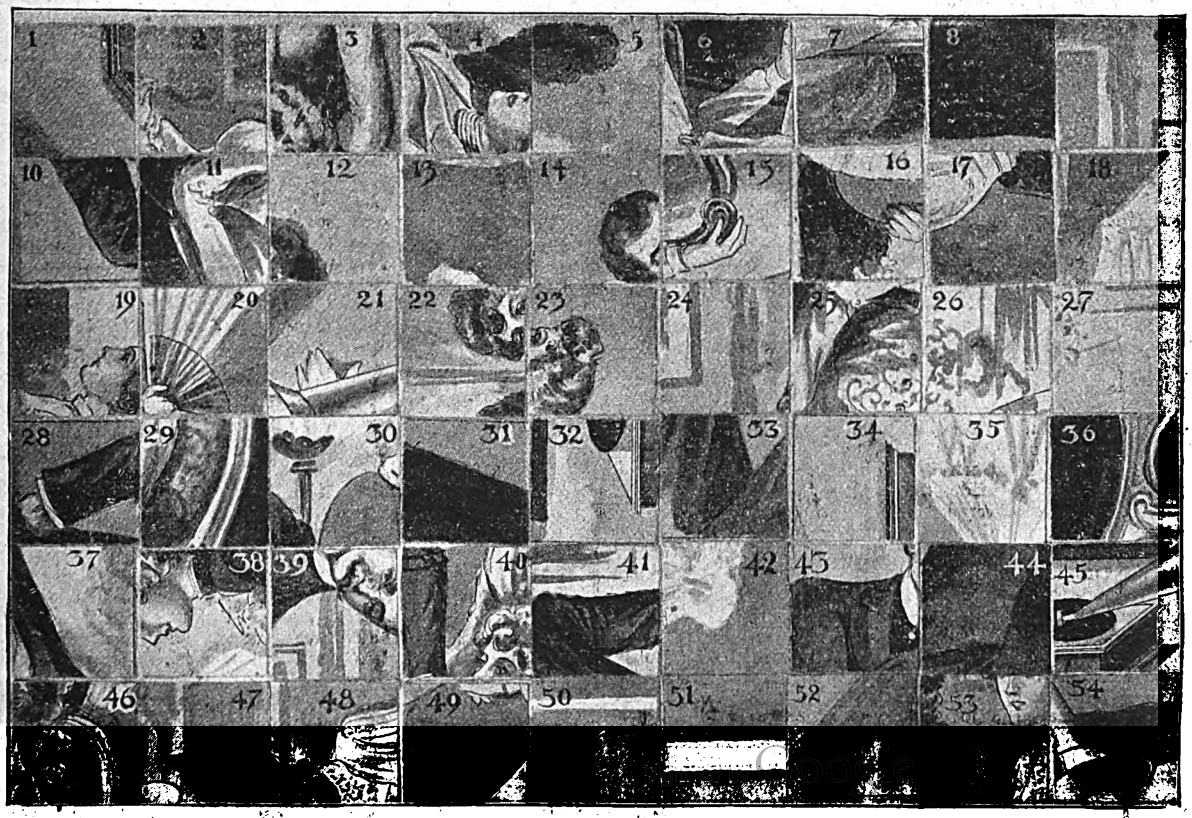
When you have pasted up the complete picture, pin it to the two pictures that have already appeared, attach your name and address, and send the three to us in an envelope marked "Cut-Picture."

All attempts must arrive by first post Tuesday morning, Oct. 7th.

A splendid Gramophone will be presented to each person whose pictures are correct or equally nearly correct. In the event of there being more than twenty-five competitors correct or equally nearly correct the prizes will be awarded to those whose attempts are most neatly done.

The Gramophones are beautifully made, fit to grace any drawing-room, and an everlasting source of amusement. They are fitted with concert sound boxes, and with each will be given two records.

The Gramophone is one of the most delightful companions for the long winter evenings. None of your friends can talk like a talking machine can, and give you the same amount of fun as it produces. It is the very essence of good and genial companionship, which never tires you. What it says, or what it sings, is always interesting. Once you have heard it you want always to hear it, and it is ever ready and willing to oblige.



Readers will please bear in mind the fact that the references in this week's article to Percival Hope (expressing Cynthia's feelings) were written long before her meeting with him in the early part of last month. After that meeting Cynthia wished to make certain alterations in this and the following instalments, but I felt that to allow her to do so would be to spoil the whole idea of the articles, so I was compelled to refuse.—ED.

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. FRANCES NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA HAMILTON .	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.
CASELLIS	A man from Jamaica who knows Mrs. Norton's past history.

Frances Norton: Adventuress.

NEW READERS START HERE.

Cynthia Hamilton: Her companion.

HAVING arrived in England from a Bruges convent to be companion to my cousin, Frances Norton, I soon discovered that my cousin was taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money were lost and won. The climax came one night when Mary Vernon staked her diamond earrings (a gift from Lord Kinross), and one of the onlookers found them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton.

A few weeks later, my cousin stole a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew, an American millionaire, at the Café Regal.

We next moved into a house in Pont Street, where Sir John Strickland proposed to Frankie, and was refused.

Later on Lord Kinross called at Pont Street for a private interview, during which Percival Hope entered the room unannounced, and made the startling statement that Mary Vernon had discovered the thief who stole her diamonds, and that in a fortnight's time he would prove that Frankie was an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends.

The next evening Lady Gaveston, Frankie's chaperon, informed her that she didn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decided at once either to marry or refuse him, she would return to Scotland. My cousin was given a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind.

We went to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis-Blount, instigated by jealousy, enticed me to bet heavily, by which I lost £800. Frankie also lost heavily, and to pay our debts, she prevailed upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000.

That same night, at the Duchess of Warminster's ball, my cousin came face to face with Casellis, a man from Jamaica, who knew all about her past life. Percival Hope brought him in. It was a critical moment, but once again Frankie scored, for she managed to buy his silence.

The next day marked the end of the fortnight, during which Hope was to obtain proofs of Frankie's guilt. Owing, however, to Frankie's ingenuity, the indictment failed miserably. Kinross then formally asked Frankie to be his wife. They were still in conversation when Sir John Strickland arrived. He had not heard of Frankie's engagement.

Before I could stop him he had gone into the room where my cousin and Kinross were talking. At sight of them he staggered and fell in a dead faint. Doctors were called, and pronounced it a paralytic seizure. Toby next called. In three days his uncle's bill must be redeemed. If this was not done he vowed that he would shoot himself.

Frankie being in a desperate strait, then got a large sum of money by worming a state secret out of Dollie Grendale, the wife of an M.P., and selling it to Pettigrew.

Frankie's next adventure was to drug an American billiard player, whose opponent she had backed heavily. When alone she was accused by Pettigrew, who swore to condemn her before the whole world. She secured his silence by managing to be found in his embrace by Lord Chesterton.

My cousin now meets a Hungarian attaché.

Digitized by Google

FRANKIE FALLS IN LOVE.

THE name of the Hungarian attaché was Reichardt Von Essler. He belonged to a very old, and therefore a most high family. That was proved by his lack of title—only very superior persons in Hungary can afford not to be Counts or Barons.

I was quite used to men admiring my cousin and falling awfully in love with her. But the effect that love and admiration produced in Von Essler was something quite uncommon. Early each morning there arrived from him a floral offering, acres of roses, lilies, orchids, rarest and choicest of blooms. The flowers were followed by a special messenger with a note of inquiry about Frankie's health. Close on the letter, Von Essler would himself arrive, and whirl my cousin off—he was impetuous as Frankie herself—for a spin on his motor or a drive on his tandem.

They made a splendid couple, her fair beauty set off by his dark and brilliant face, his gleaming eyes, his flashing smile. As for Lord Kinross, Frankie impatiently waived aside his claims on her attention.

"I don't care what he thinks," she said, when I suggested he might not like her to go out so frequently with Reichardt.

"I've given way to him too much already. If he doesn't approve of me"—she flashed a glance over her shoulder into the long mirror that showed her tall, lithe figure to perfection—"well, I can sustain the loss of his regard."

"Frankie, you don't mean you are going to break off your engagement with Lord Kinross? Why——" I paused, the thought of all she had done, all she had suffered and caused others to suffer to bring about that engagement choked me.

"Don't worry yourself, dearie, I'm not going to throw Hartland over. But I mean to enjoy myself. Cynthia, you can't tell what a joy it is to meet a man so fascinating and so clever as Reichardt. He is so strong, so fearless, and so light-hearted. He is——"

Her soliloquy was interrupted.

"Lord Kinross, please, ma'am," said the maid; "he's in the drawing-room.'

With an exclamation of impatience, Frankie swept downstairs, a vision in a dinner gown of pale green mousseline de soie.

"I can't spare you a minute, Hartland," she said. "I'm going to meet Von Essler at the Carlton at eight o'clock, and it's past seven already. Lady Gaveston is coming and Cynthia also. Well"—as he looked grave, almost troubled—"what is the matter?"

"I see so little of you lately, Frankie. It's a week since Lady Daventry's ball, and you've hardly spared me an hour."

"My dear boy, consider how much we shall see of each other in the future! Next week at Cowes, for instance, we shall be together every day, and all day long. I'm not going to run the risk of boring you."

"My dearest Frankie!" Hartland kissed her hand, and I felt horribly in the way; I knew my cousin wished me to remain, so, much embarrassed, I took up a book and studied hard.

"All the same, dear, it's hardly necessary to bestow so much of your society on Von Essler. Break your engagement for this evening, at any rate; send him a wire, and come out with me instead. I'll go anywhere, do anything you like, Frankie, if you'll throw him over."

"I do believe you're jealous. Don't deny it, it's quite charming of you, Hartland. But even for you I can't afford to be ill-bred. It takes a duchess at the least to act rudely and remain distinguished. I've promised Von Essler, and"—she paused—"I always keep my word," she said.

The flicker of a smile twitched at the corners of his lordship's mouth.

"Well, I'll give way to-night," he said. "What of to-morrow, are you engaged also?"

"Yes, and the next day, and the day after that. You're exacting, Hartland, and that's the truth. The more I give way to you, the more you ask. You are becoming a perfect tyrant. First, I mustn't bet or gamble, then I must not run up bills, or flirt, or be admired. Now——" she laughed and shook her head. "I'm going to make the most of my liberty, dearie; September isn't far off now, and then I shall have to be prim and decorous as—as Lady Gaveston. It's no use to look cross, Hartland—I mean to have my own way."

She looked up at him, mutinous, bewitching, and, as usual, she prevailed. As with others, so with Kinross, the admiration of other men for the woman of his choice increased his own. A month ago, and Frankie would not have ventured to dispute his will. Now things were changed. By a show of indifference she had riveted her chains more firmly. Fearful of losing her, Kinross gave way on every point.

He departed, troubled but amenable. Frankie kissed her hand to him from the window, then turned away with a gesture of relief.

"I've some good news for you," she said, smiling. "I've wired to Chesterton to join us at the Carlton. I didn't see why you should be afflicted with the 'testifier,'" such was my cousin's irreverent soubriquet for Lady Gaveston.

"It's very nice of you, Frankie," I answered. "But you know what Milady is. She will talk to somebody, and she likes Chesterton—he listens so attentively."

"She likes somebody else better," said my cousin. "Who? Why Hiram, to be sure; she'll revel at the opportunity of getting a subscription out of him for one of her societies. I've wired to him as well."

"Does he know?"

"What, that Milady is to be his fate at dinner? Rather not, he thinks he's going to take me out—alone."

It was quite unkind of Frankie, but it was most amusing all the same. The three men were waiting for us at the Carlton—Von Essler, Pettigrew, and Chesterton. I am bound to say the last named was the only one who seemed entirely pleased when we arrived. The Hungarian appeared disappointed to see me, and Pettigrew was not enraptured to meet Lady Gaveston.

I shall never forget that evening; it was one of the brightest the most delightful times I ever had, for the first part, at all events. Frankie was in one of her irresistible moods. Laughing, scoffing, grave and gay by turns, all smiles one moment, all demurity the next.

Even Lady Gaveston responded to her influence, and so far unbent as to express herself satisfied with the dinner, if not the conversation.

Town was already beginning to get empty, and the Carlton was not so crowded as the last time we were there, though it was far from being empty. When we were half way through our dinner we had a surprise not altogether pleasing. The table next our own was vacant, and when the party for whom it was reserved made their appearance I received something of a shock. It proved to be Mrs. Vernon and her daughter Mary, Lord Kinross and Percival Hope!

Frankie smiled and bowed to them all, with a specially kindly glance for Mary. Lady Gaveston made a grave salutation, and immediately assumed an air of great aloofness from the rest of us. Reichardt flushed angrily, and Chesterton looked glum.

HIRAM PETTIGREW

I don't know how I looked, but my heart beat so loud and fast that it was painful.

I nodded to Mary and Lord Kinross, but I could not meet Percival's glance. I stole a look at him unobserved. He was graver, older, I thought, than when I first knew him. I hoped he would not look at me; if he smiled or spoke I felt I should lose my self-control. The memory of that night at the ball, the Duchess of Warminster's ball, came back to me. I lived again those cruel five minutes, when, with his hand clasping mine, he waited for my answer. If I had answered differently!

Digitized by Google

Ah, well! It was no use to look backward. I had done as well as I was able, as well as circumstances and my cousin would permit me. But——

I drank some champagne and laughed a little hysterically at some remark of Chesterton's. His Lordship was behaving quite strangely that night. He gazed at me so long and so earnestly that I became embarrassed. He was looking very well; evening dress, the severest test of a man's distinction, became him infinitely. Next to Von Essler, he was the best-looking man present. Yes, he was better-looking far than Percival.

We finished dinner some time before our friends at the next table. Kinross sent a note over to Frankie, suggesting we should all go to the theatre. He had procured two boxes at the Lyceum. Reichardt seemed to understand instinctively what the note contained; before my cousin had time to finish reading it, he leant over, and in a clear, cool voice remarked:

"Don't forget, Mrs. Norton, that you are engaged to see my pictures this evening. I've quite a little gallery at my place. It's not five minutes' drive from here, you know, in St. James's Street."

I knew quite well that there was no engagement of the kind, and so, I think, did Kinross. He flashed an indignant look at the Hungarian, and seemed positively enraged when Frankie smilingly pencilled her regrets that she could not go to the Lyceum.

Oblivious of his frowns and Mary's reproachful air, she signified her intention of viewing Von Essler's pictures.

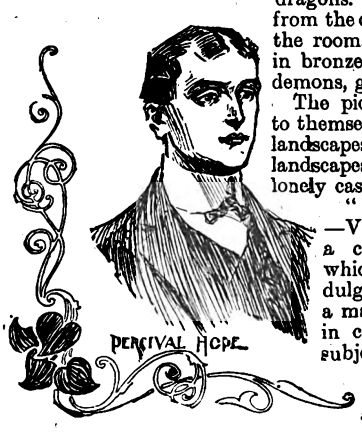
"We'd better be going," she said, glancing at Lady Gaveston, "I can't bear to be hurried when I look at beautiful things. I want to spend a long time over the pictures."

Lady Gaveston was bound to respond to the suggestion. She liked pictures but little, and the Hungarian still less, but her duties as a chaperon compelled her to endure both. She rose, and Pettigrew respectfully draped her shawl—she persisted in wearing a shawl—about her shoulders.

As Chesterton stooped to clasp my cloak, Percival's eyes met mine. Sorrow, regret, reproach, I read therein, and a faint tinge of the old tenderness. My cheeks grew hot, I felt the smart of tears, and a sob came in my throat. He saw my agitation and half rose from his seat. At the moment Chesterton leant down to whisper something in my ear. Percival gave a contemptuous shrug, sat back, and resumed his dinner.

I felt hurt, mortified, and most unhappy. That look in his eyes haunted me. I felt a tug at my heart every time I thought of him throughout the evening.

Von Essler had a lovely flat in St. James's Street. The rooms were beautifully furnished in the most perfect taste. The one I like the best was panelled in oak, with a wonderful Japanese freize of scarlet poppies and weird-looking dragons. A narrow shelf, a foot from the ceiling, went right round the room, supporting statuettes in bronze and silver of Japanese demons, gods and goddesses.



The pictures were in a room to themselves. They were chiefly landscapes, romantic Hungarian landscapes, remote fastnesses and lonely castles.

"There is a picture here—Von Essler paused before a curtained alcove—"for which I must ask your indulgence. It was painted by a man whose presumption in choosing so difficult a subject can be forgiven only by the earnestness with which he has striven to master it. I am that all-unworthy painter, and my picture"—he drew back the curtain. From a canvas, yet wet, there looked at us the face of Frankie. It was a wonderful likeness, the face, with its ever-changing eyes, now soft, tender, beseeching, now brilliant and hard, seemed real.

It was Frankie herself that looked at you, Frankie in her most brilliant, most inspired moment.

"It's a masterpiece," said Pettigrew. "I congratulate you, Mrs. Norton," and he smiled in an odd sort of way at Frankie.

"It's a great piece of work," said Chesterton, "I'd no idea you could paint like that, Von Essler?"

"It is rarely I have a subject so inspiring," answered Reichardt, with a low bow to my cousin.

Frankie stood silent, almost subdued, before her picture.

"Cynthia," she said suddenly, "am I like that? No, don't interrupt," as the men murmured a convinced assent, "I want the child to answer for herself, she can't help telling the truth. Well"—she paused—"speak out, Cynthia. Am I like my portrait?"

"Yes," I said softly, "only more beautiful."

Frankie flushed and squeezed my hand, and Reichardt looked gratified. Lady Gaveston evidently did not approve. She gave a loud and prolonged sniff. Then, as though her patience were exhausted, she turned on Pettigrew, and, with sudden and alarming unexpectedness, asked for a donation to her society for abolishing the idols of the heathen!

Hiram seemed inclined to question the aims and objects of the society. Nothing loth, Milady launched a stream of statistics at his head. The rest of us fled, leaving them to argue it out together.

Reichardt and my cousin walked into the smoking-room. I was about to follow them when Chesterton laid his hand upon my arm.

"Come in here," he said, opening the door of a cosy little apartment, one of those queer-shaped rooms you find in flats, all sides and angles.

I settled myself on a comfortable lounge and glanced expectantly at his lordship. He looked grave, as though he had something on his mind. I felt sure he had some bad news to tell me.

"You're going to say something dreadful," I cried. "I feel it, I know it; people always look like that when they've something horrid to say. They think it's better to tell it by degrees. What is it?"

He smiled, and shook his head.

"It's nothing very dreadful," he said quietly. "But it's most important. May I sit by you, Cynthia?"

I nodded, much astonished. Chesterton didn't ask my permission to—well, to sit beside me as a rule.

"You're looking very sweet to-night," he went on after a pause, "I like you in pink, Cynthia."

Somebody else I remembered had said that. I caught my breath. I wished I had not seen Percival that evening.

"What little hands you have," he said tenderly, "so soft and white." As he spoke he clasped my hand in his, and there was a pause. I did not dare to look at him, but I felt his eyes were on my face. Dimly I realised what it was he had to tell me, and—I was sorry.

"I wish I could say pretty things!" he exclaimed. "If I could only tell you what I feel—but"—he bent his head and kissed my fingers—"you know I am fond of you, little girl? You must, women always understand these things. And"—he drew nearer—"I don't think you quite dislike me. You know I asked if it was any use for me to enter for the Cynthia Stakes, didn't I? You said I might, and I've made all the running I know how. Is it any good, Cynthia? Tell me, speak out. Say 'Yes,' or 'No'! I'm not one to shirk a fence if I've got to take it."

He strove to meet my eyes, but I turned my head away. I liked him, sometimes I liked him very much. But was it fair only to give liking in exchange for love? And he did love me, I was sure of that. I could not answer, I wished he would not ask me for an answer. I did not want to lose him. Life would have seemed very strange to me without "big Chesterton," as his chums called him. And yet——

He grew impatient.

"Speak to me, Cynthia," he said. Then, as I still kept silence, he sprang to his feet, and with a swift movement pulled me up to him.

"I'm going to kiss you, Cynthia," he said deliberately, "Then perhaps you'll know your own mind, one way or the other. If you say 'Yes' it's all right. If not—well, I think you deserve it as a punishment."

"Lord Chesterton," I cried indignantly, "I—I——"

"You're a coquette, my dear," he said, "and deserve to be punished." And then I blush to say he kissed me—twice!

What did I do?

Collapsed into a chair and hid my face, crimson to the tips of my ears. I felt—I can't tell how I felt.

"You're not angry, Cynthia?"

I shook my head. Somehow, I wasn't angry, though, of course, I should have been.

"And you'll marry me? You must now, you know, after——" he smiled in a hateful way. I know it was hateful, though I wasn't looking at him.

"Look here, little girl," he said softly, "I'm not going to take 'No' for an answer. What is more, you don't want me to. You're not quite sure yet? Well, it's best to take time. I'll give you six weeks to think the matter over. Then you must answer. You agree?"

I looked up at him, big, tall and strong—and I agreed.

"I bar flirting, Cynthia," he said, "mind that."

"I'm glad to hear it," I returned. "Mrs. Curtis Blount——"

"Don't, dear"—he turned quite red—"there's a good girl, don't! Your cousin——" he paused. "She flirts a little, don't you know?" he said tentatively.

"Whatever Frankie does is right in my eyes," I said firmly.

"I know, and I like you all the better for it, still——"

"Make your mind easy," I said, laughing. "I'll be very good—for six weeks!" and with that I left him to find Frankie.

All the way home that night I thought of Chesterton. "Jack," he had asked me to call him, He had been very nice. Not a word had he said against Frankie, although I knew he doubted and suspected her of more than flirting. And yet he was every bit as honourable, as upright, as Percival Hope! He would not try and part me from my cousin, my dear Frankie whom I loved so much!

I did not tell my cousin what had happened between me and Chesterton, but, with her usual quickness, she surmised that something had taken place.

"Any news, Cynthia?" she said, as I wished her good-night.

I shook my head.

"Well, I've some for you!" She threw off her opera-cloak and stood before the glass, a flush on her cheeks, a light in her eyes.

"Reichardt Von Essler is the one man in the world I could care for!" she said passionately.

"Frankie!"

"I mean it; there's nothing I wouldn't do for him. For him I'd give up money, position, the frocks, the jewels, all that I've striven to gain. I'd leave everything, I'd go barefoot, I'd live on a crust, I'd work, ay, work hard for him."

"I don't see there's anything very wonderful about Von Essler, Frankie. He's good-looking, certainly, clever and—and tall. But so are other men."

"You foolish child, it makes no difference. He is the one man who made me, even for a moment, forget myself. I've been fond of others, yes, in a way. I was fond of Sir John, Kinross, and—and——" she paused. "But Reichardt——" she paused and flung out her hands in an ecstasy. "I'm as silly as you, Cynthia; no girl was ever more in love!"

"But you've only known him for so short a time. It's—it's impossible you can feel all this for a man you hadn't seen a month ago!"

"It's not the length of time you know a man, my dear, but the strength of the feeling he rouses in you. I might know some people twenty years, and care no more than when I met them first. Directly I saw Reichardt I knew that he was a man I could love with my whole heart, my whole strength. And he"—she paused, and a flush of rose tinted the whiteness of her cheeks—"he loves me, loves me more than all the world. He is ready to prove it, he will abandon his career, throw up his prospects, all for my sake!"

"Are you going to marry him, Frankie?" I asked in horror.

She smiled. "Why not?" she asked.

"You're engaged to another man, and—and—oh, Frankie, don't be angry, but I don't like Von Essler—I don't trust him. I think he's insincere. I beg you not to place your future in his hands. He is——"

Frankie interrupted me.

"That will do, Cynthia," she said quietly, "you've said enough. Get to bed now, you must be tired."

Much disquieted, I obeyed her. I felt frightened and distressed about my cousin. I could not understand this new development, and I feared it.

The next day or two I saw but little of Frankie, who spent the time riding or driving with Von Essler. My anxiety concerning her, however, was lessened by a piece of information which I had from Jack—perhaps I ought to say Lord Chesterton? He said that Reichardt was leaving England at the end of the week, and would not return until the following Spring.

I was immensely relieved at the intelligence; Frankie would soon forget the Hungarian. It would surely be out of sight, out of mind, with her.

We were due at Cowes in a few days, the change of scene would restore Frankie's spirits, even if she missed him at first.

One evening, however, my fears returned. Frankie had slipped out after dinner without saying where she was going or when she would return. It was the very evening that Von Essler was starting for the Continent. The coincidence alarmed me.

To make matters worse Lord Kinross turned up at half-past nine, and looked very glum at Frankie's absence. After waiting about half an hour he asked me straight out where Frankie was.

"I don't know!" I said, trembling.

"Have you no idea?"

I shook my head, a sudden terror seized me. Von Essler was leaving England this evening within an hour or two. Was it possible that Frankie had been mad enough, reckless enough, to make a runaway match with him?

I rushed upstairs to Lady Gaveston's room.

"You must come down and speak to Kinross, he's annoyed that Frankie's out, and is getting impatient and suspicious as to where she is. You must quiet him—you must, I say! Get him away, somehow, you can do it. And then——" I paused breathlessly.

"Where is your cousin?" said Milady.

"I—I—oh, Lady Gaveston, won't you help me?" I cried desperately. "I'm afraid for Frankie. She wants to marry Von Essler, and—and—send Kinross away," I pleaded, "but don't let him know about Reichardt!"

Milady rose, a stiff, unbending figure, her inevitable knitting in her hand. "I will see Lord Kinross," she said slowly.

"You won't say anything nasty about Frankie?"

Lady Gaveston stared in frozen astonishment.

"I do not need to be instructed in my duties to your cousin Frances!" she replied. "You forget yourself, Cynthia."

Humbled in pride, but thankful in heart, I followed her downstairs.

"I am sorry Frances has not yet returned," she said. "Did she expect you, Lord Kinross?"

He nodded. "Do you know when she will be back, Lady Gaveston?" he said anxiously.

"That," replied her ladyship, "is somewhat uncertain."

"Pardon me, but do you know where she has gone?"

Lady Gaveston lifted her glasses and stared Lord Kinross up and down. "Mrs. Norton is visiting some friends," she said.

Kinross coloured.

"Forgive me, but——" he paused.

Milady smiled. "Frances is a little heedless at times," she said, "but that is a fault of youth. It was thoughtless of her to go out when you were coming. But"—she stared at him hard—"it is only for thoughtlessness she is to blame."

"Thank you," he said, evidently much relieved; "thank you. I'd better go now, perhaps. I shall see Frankie to-morrow?" Lady Gaveston stepped towards him.

"Yes," she said slowly, "to-morrow you shall see her."

Barely had the door closed on his lordship when Lady Gaveston turned to me.

"Get on your hat," she said quickly, "we are going out."

"Where?" I stammered. "What for?"

Lady Gaveston gave a grim laugh. "We are going to find your cousin Frances," she said. "Make haste!"

(The result of their journey will be told next week. This series began in No. 702 of Short Stories. Back numbers may be ordered through any newsagent. Readers interested in these revelations should turn to page 443.)

A Tardy Reckoning.

The Story of a Long Trail.

"No, I'm absolutely certain that there is nothing in it, Lettice—nothing at all! Philip Tracy mayn't be everything that is nice, perhaps, but—so contemptuously unscrupulous as to, underhandedly, and for no apparently, earthly reason, compass my ruin, well—I can't bring myself to believe it; even though it is you that say it is so!"

"Stephen! I tell you Philip Tracy is your enemy. I know it!"

"You?"

"Yes. I!"

"But how?"

"Isn't it sufficient, dear, that I, who of all women, have the best right to fear for you, warn you—just warn you—against a man whom I instinctively dislike and distrust, and who, I am most certainly convinced, is scheming to bring about your undoing?"

"Of course, Lettice, darling! I appreciate your motive. I only suggest that you are, well—that you must be mistaken."

"Tell me, Stephen! Look me between the eyes, and tell me! do you not, in your own mind; and if you rightly interpret your own estimate of Philip Tracy, as a man with whom you have enforced business, and semi-social relations, judge him—much as I judge him—to be false whenever expediency and opportunity appeal to him that it is desirable so to be."

Lettice Orde was a girl who, without being in the least mannish, or ultra up-to-date in her tastes and principles, was sufficiently firm-willed and self-reliant not only to have opinions of her own, but also to have the courage of them.

She was one of the few beautiful women in the world, who, having absolute control of large means, hold it to be a special delight and glory to bestow their good things upon the men of their choice.

But Lettice Orde was more even than this—she was industrially artistic, and worked away at her residential studio in Chelsea, as though her income of eight hundred a year was non-existent, and that her living depended upon a steady output of pot-boilers.

Stephen Borrodaile met her on one of her sketching tours in Brittany, whither he had himself gone for his yearly holiday.

Bank clerks, are sometimes more than mere machines and Stephen Borrodaile was one of the exceptions. He was an artist spoilt, exceptional facilities for getting him into the "Consolidated Bank," together with the immediate necessity of earning, to help support a large family of unprovided-for young brothers and sisters, being responsible for the undoubtedly great mistake.

Lettice and he soon discovered mutual community of tastes, alike in things personal and artistic. She was going on to Paris before leaving for home, and though it made a big inroad in his not unlimited resources, Stephen, in the spirit of protectiveness, travelled with her to the French capital.

The journey was to be the life crisis of both of them.

The characteristic neighbourhood of Savernay had been their meeting-place, and they had, therefore, to reach Nantes before touching the railroad for Paris.

Most people will remember a terrible accident to the mid-day express on this line some half-dozen years ago.

It was midway between St. Pierre and Orleans that the thing happened.

It was suddenly discovered by the terrified occupants of a "wagon-lit" that the carriage was on fire.

Communication with both guard and locomotive was cut off, by reason of the early burning of the cord, while the pace at which the train was running but accelerated the mischief.

Stephen Borrodaile and Lettice were in the carriage immediately next to the one that had taken fire, and it was only when they, and a French lady and gentleman, their companions, were half-choked by the smoke, that Stephen awoke to the danger of the situation.

Briefly, he did a thing which stamped him as a hero in the men's minds, and won for him the more than admiration—the love of the girl whom, but a mere month before, he had not known even to exist.

Everything depended upon a quick setting-up of communication with the locomotive, and Stephen, leaving the carriage by the window, made his way, by means of the footboard, and by a risky clinging to any and every available projection, to the engine.

The train was pulled up, and though seven poor souls in the fatal carriage met their death, the bulk of the passengers, including Lettice, were saved by his timely heroism.

Two years have gone by since then, and it it is not wonderful that the pair should be all-in-all to one another, and that Lettice especially, as shown in the above recorded conversation, should have more than ordinary apprehension and anxiety with regard to her lover's personal interests.

Stephen tried to think it out, after he had left Lettice with some mutual friends, but by the next morning was no nearer to a solution of the warning mystery.

It might have been an hour after the bank was opened that Philip Tracy, standing at the counter, in his capacity of paying-out cashier, had handed to him a cheque for £500, signed by Lettice Orde, a customer of the bank, and counter-signed by Caleb Haughton, her trustee.

This double signature was necessary, under the provisions of her father's will, and would continue until Lettice's twenty-fifth birthday. It was an arrangement designed solely for her protection, without any reference to her ability to dispose of her means at will.

"Five hundred pounds!" remarked Tracy, with meaning deliberation. "Are you the payee?"

"No."

The tenderer of the cheque was a short, stout, and somewhat seedily-dressed middle-aged man.

"Then your name is not W. J. Scott?"

"No; my name is Hurd—Thomas Hurd."

"Ah! And you received the cheque, I suppose, in the ordinary way of business from Mr. Scott?"

"Yes."

"What is Mr. Scott?"

"A—a racing man."

"A bookmaker! Well, Mr. Hurd, I shall have to trouble you for your address, and to request you to remain for a moment while I show the cheque to the manager."

It was curious that the man did not betray any signs of alarm or extraordinary interest, such as nine persons out of ten would have done under the circumstances. He merely sat down on a bench, took the day's paper out of his pocket, and was soon deep in the latest turf quotations. In less than five minutes Tracy returned, without the cheque.

"We cannot pay this cheque until certain inquiries have been made."

The man who had presented it did not appear to be so very much astonished at this decision.

"Oh, very well!" he said indifferently. "When shall I call again about it?"

"To-morrow, this time."

"But, excuse me," the man asked, in the way of after-thought, "what's wrong?"

"Well, as a matter of fact, the cheque is a forgery."

"A forgery, eh!"

"Yes. The cheque is one out of Miss Orde's last issued book, but though the body of it is evidently in her hand-writing, the two signatures, her own and that of Mr. Caleb Haughton, are palpable forgeries."

"Oh! Then I suppose somebody will have to pay the piper?"

"I think it very likely," said Mr. Tracy, with a sidelong look at Stephen Borrodaile. "Very likely, indeed—good-morning!"

Stephen had promised to take Lettice to the Lyceum that evening, both being devoted admirer's of "Sir Henry."

The usual bank rule which compels attendance 'till the day cash is balanced, was in operation that evening until past seven, so that, by the time he had swallowed a chop and some tea, and driven westward, it was close on the stroke of eight, as he joined Lettice in the box lobby.

The play was The Lyons Mail, in which the innocent Lesurgues is dramatically made to ultimately triumph over Dubosc, the thief and murderer.

Lettice seemed strangely moved during the whole of the performance, the great actor's wonderfully sympathetic portrayal of patience under suspicion and accusation, suggesting to her mind disquieting ideas, which, try as she would, she could not shake off. It was Stephen's invariable practice to see Lettice to her door, after such expeditions as the one in question.

A journey by the Underground, a walk from Sloane Square to Hogarth Studios, and the two prepared to say "good-night."

"What's the matter, darling?" Stephen asked her; for her face was white, and she was, for her, absorbedly silent.

"Matter, dear? Oh, nothing!—well—that is—you know what is troubling me."

"That notion about Tracy?"

"Yes; I can't help it, Stephen! The belief is forced upon me that Philip Tracy is playing a game in which he hopes and expects to win the odd trick."

"You must have some good reason, Lettice, for thinking so."

"I have. Does he know of our engegament?"

"I think so—yes, of course he does!"

"Then, being aware of it, what do you think of him for asking me to marry him?"

"He—Phil Tracy ask you to——?"

"Yes, more than once. I have refrained from saying anything to you about it, for fear that it should cause friction between you."

"That was not right of you, dear."

"No, I see now that it was not. But you must forgive me, Stephen. I did it for the best."

"I quite believe that, darling, but——"

"Wait a moment, dear," she interrupted him. "During the past forty-eight hours I have had a cheque stolen from my new book. I have nothing tangible to go on, but it was borne in upon me—irresistibly so—that the stolen cheque and Mr. Philip Tracy are more closely connected in fact than he would, perhaps, care to acknowledge."

"Why, what have I been thinking of!—there is a bother with one of your cheques. It was paid over the counter to-day, and the signatures were disputed by Tracy."

"That must be it, then! It was made out for five hundred pounds, but was unsigned. It was for Laurie, my brother, who sails for Canada next week. Well, Stephen, dear, what was the result?"

"Oh! the man who presented it is to call again to-morrow. But it's strange that the bank haven't communicated with you!"

"Probably they have, but, as you know, I have been out since eleven this morning, and have not been home till now. I shall find a note inside, I dare say."

They were so interested in the subject of their talk that they failed to notice a couple of tall, respectably-dressed men come up from the direction of the King's Road, and halt within a short distance of them.

Stephen had just said "Good-night," and was stooping to kiss Lettice, when a hand was laid upon his shoulder.

"Mr. Borrodaile?"

"That is my name; but I will thank you to remove your hand."

"I am afraid that is impossible, now you have admitted your identity."

"What do you mean?"

"Perhaps it will be as well for this young lady—Miss Orde, I take it—to get inside the house before I tell you."

"Certainly not!" said Lettice, hotly. "I will stay and hear anything you may have to say to Mr. Borrodaile."

"As you please, Miss," said the new-comer. "Stephen Borrodaile, I arrest you on a warrant for forging and uttering a cheque for five hundred pounds in the names of Lettice Orde and Caleb Haughton."

"Me! forge Miss Orde's na——! why you're mad, man!"

"Mad or sane, sir, you will have to come with me."

"Stephen! I don't understand! Officer, I am Lettice Orde! The money is mine! Mr. Borrodaile is my friend! I order you to let him go!"

"I regret, Miss, that it is impossible. I am acting on warrant, and any statement which you may wish to make in the prisoner's favour, you can do so to-morrow morning at Bow Street."

The other individual now came up, signalled a passing cab, and put Stephen into it.

His last words to poor stricken Lettice were, "I'm beginning to think you're right, Lettice, after all; and if it should be that Philip Tracy has laid this trap for me, he shall answer to me for it, if I have to wait a lifetime!"

Digitized by Google

The Picture of the Year.

It is more than two years since Stephen Borrodaile stood in the dock of the New Court at the Old Bailey to answer the charge of forging his own sweetheart's name to a cheque for five hundred pounds.

It was most subtly conceived, this plot to ruin an absolutely innocent man in the opinion not only of his fellows, but in the eyes of the woman he loved.

Not that the schemer reaped anything beyond revenge; the revenge of the unsuccessful pretender. When Philip Tracy presented himself at Hogarth Studios, a month or so after Stephen Borrodaile had been sentenced to two years' hard labour, Lettice would not see him.

"Return Mr. Tracy's card," she said to the commissionaire in charge, "and say, please, that I decline to see him now, or at any other time."

He hung about the neighbourhood for some two or three hours, thinking to waylay her if she came out, but he got tired and went home.

In spite of her rebuff, he called again in about a week, only to be told that Miss Orde had left the Studios and had gone abroad.

From then onward, until the opening day of the Royal Academy two years after, Stephen Borrodaile's conviction, he neither saw nor heard of her.

There had been mysterious talk, for long before the exhibition opened, of a wonderful picture by a Miss Lettice Orde, a young artist, who till now had been unrepresented on the walls of Burlington House.

It was more than hinted that there was a story connected with the picture; that, indeed, it had been painted with a purpose.

Philip Tracy, though caught by the many press references to Lettice's name, was not disposed to attach much importance to current rumours concerning her work.

Still, he felt irresistibly drawn to go and see, and, taking a day's leave from his duties, found himself one of the enormous and fashionable crowd that thronged the rooms.

So big and dense was the throng in front of "Not Guilty," which enjoyed a conspicuous place of honour upon the line, that it was fully an hour before he could shoulder himself into the front rank of viewers.

His first glance at the picture told him that he was in the presence of the accusing spirit.

Three feet by a little more than two in size, the canvas pictured with marvellous dramatic power the sordid interior of the Central Criminal Court.

Not much prominence was given to the legal accessories, human or otherwise; the whole interest being centred in two figures, the one at right angles to the other.

One was a man taking his trial at the bar, the other was also a man, but in the witness-box.

The whole motif of the picture lay in the expression of the faces of prisoner and witness. Instinctively the spectator felt that the man giving his evidence should of right be standing in the place of that other, whose evident plea of "Not Guilty" was fully borne out by his upright bearing and look of conscious innocence.

A curious murmuring of many voices around him, caused him to take notice that people were regarding him strangely.

"Most astonishing likeness, isn't it?"

"Wonderful!"

"Might have sat for the face," whispered one art critic to another.

There was certainly but little doubt about it; the witness in the picture and the sallow-faced man leaning with trembling hands on the rail, were assuredly one and the same.

Who was the prisoner?

That was what was exercising people's minds.

Then the drama developed a new and startling interest.

The Chairman of the Board of Directors of the "Consolidated Bank, Limited," Lord Hempstead, was a notable art connoisseur, and patron; and, of course, made it an inviolable rule to be present at the Academy on the first of May.

A rather stormy board meeting in the City had made him late in arriving in Piccadilly.

Never a man to be easily led away by popular runs after certain pictures or artists, he prepared to go the round in his own way.

Audible comments, however, as he proceeded, drew his attention to the crowded space in front of Lettice Orde's picture.

"Good gracious! why they're absolutely mobbing that man," he said to himself, regarding Philip Tracy with keenly searching eyes.

The latter's back was turned to him, so it was impossible to establish the identity of the man.

By dint of hard, if courteous, pushing, the old nobleman got almost abreast of Tracy, who seemed incapable of stirring from his position.

Then, as if goaded by the not too polite remarks of those behind, and about him, Tracy turned and faced his tormentors.

Self-conviction was stamped upon his face. He could not, for all he was worth, cease from justifying the suspicion of those about him.

"Why, Tracy!" cried the peer in astonishment. "Understood you were sick. Shall expect you to explain this to-mor—— Eh! wait a minute!—stay where you are!—the most extraordinary likeness!—and the other!—why it's poor Stephen Borrodaile to the life! There must be something in this."

"Lord Hempstead," said a woman's voice at his elbow, "if you will permit me, I think I can explain."

His Lordship faced about to see a girl, with the most expressive dark eyes he had ever come across, waiting for his acknowledgment of her presence and of her request.

Hastily glancing at the card she had handed to him, and which he had taken mechanically, he just said in an undertone to the cashier: "To-morrow, at eleven, in my room at the bank," and by a respectful inclination of the head, Lord Hempstead motioned his fair companion towards the entrance hall.

Half-a-dozen sentences, established perfect confidence between them; while across a lunch table at Prince's, Lettice told the story of her life-sorrow, and of all that she had done during Stephen's absence to bring the truth to light.

The trail had been long and weary, for it was only the day before that the last link establishing her lover's innocence and Tracy's guilt had come into her hands.

Time after time she had determined, in sheer despair, to abandon her quest—the intensity of her love for Stephen alone making her to take up the clue again.

"My dear young lady," said Lord Hempstead kindly, and with unfeigned admiration in every tone of his voice, "let an old man say—and mean it when he says it—that for your sake he is more than tempted to wish himself forty years younger. Stephen Borrodaile, in spite of all that he has endured, is to be envied. He must be a very happy man."

"It is good of you to say so, Lord Hempstead. Of course you know that he was released a week ago to-day. He is ill and has gone to Nice, to some friends of mine."

Digitized by 1908

"Poor fellow! But, tell me, what have you discovered?"

She then told him that, through the agency of the commissionaire, at her old Chelsea Studios, she had yesterday been able to find the man, Ephrah Noone, who had paid over the counter the cheque for five hundred pounds.

For a substantial consideration he had revealed every detail in the rascally plan to ruin Stephen Borrodaile, which had proved only too successful.

It seems that Noone had been employed by Tracy to convey a letter to Hogarth Studios on one occasion. While waiting in the corridor for a reply, he picked up an envelope half hidden under the mat outside Lettice's door. It contained a letter to the latter's trustee, Mr. Haughton, and a cheque, filled up for five hundred pounds, but unsigned.

Delivering his find to Tracy, the cashier forged the names both of Lettice and her trustee, arranging with the man Noone to present it. He himself posed as the virtuous detector of crime. Noone swearing at the trial that Stephen had given him the cheque, the proceeds of which he was to hand over to Lettice's lover.

There was now no longer a doubt of Tracy's conspiracy with the shady money-lender's tout No one to bring about Stephen's ruin. This, in addition to Tracy's disquietude in the presence of the picture, made the day of reckoning to be complete and sure.

The bank authorities did not wait for the unlikely—viz., for their cashier's voluntary attendance at St. Swithin's Lane to explain the unexplainable. Before the end of the afternoon of the Academy opening day, a warrant was applied for, care being taken in the meanwhile to secure the person of Ephrah Noone, as that of an important witness.

Late the same night, however, Tracy was arrested at Charing Cross Station as he was about to enter the Boat train.

At the subsequent trial, Noone received a comparatively light sentence, in view of necessary aid given the prosecution. Philip Tracy was sent to penal servitude for ten years.

* * * * *

At the marriage which took place at the British Embassy in Paris three months after Philip Tracy's conviction, Lord Hempstead specially gave the bride away.

Lettice looked not only lovely, but proud and happy. Stephen Borrodaile was as a man who gratefully takes a good gift, but whose heart is too full for words.

The last one to shake them both heartily by the hand, and to wish them "God-speed" as the Southern express left, the "Gare du Nord" was the old lord who firmly believes that Lettice Borrodaile is the only woman in all the world who both could and would have done as she did.

Ralph Enderby.

Rose to the Occasion.

Young Tutter (drawing closer): "I hope, Miss Clara, that your father, in the next room, can't hear what I am saying." Miss Pinkerley (with dignity): "I hope, Mr. Tutter, that you will say nothing to me that you would not be willing, if necessary, to say to papa."

A New Recipe.

They expected the hot weather, and were discussing lemonade. Tommy: "Ah, you should see the funny way that Mr. Smith and Clara make lemonade." Mother: "How, darling?" "Why, Clara holds the lemon, and Mr. Smith squeezes her."

Special Terms to Such Customers.

Hotel Clerk (suspiciously): "Your bundle has come apart. May I ask what that queer thing is?" Guest: "This is a new patent fire escape. I always carry it, so in case of fire I can let myself down from the hotel window. See?" Clerk (thoughtfully): "I see. Our terms for guests with fire-escapes, sir, are invariably cash in advance."

Your Editor Chats.

The new serial romance begins in the next number of Short Stories. It is a splendid story—the best of its kind we have ever had—and you will enjoy it thoroughly.

It is cleverly written, full of stirring incident and teeming with dramatic scenes.

And now, I will let you into a secret. Selecting serial stories is by no means an easy task. Although I don't wish to pose as a wondrous worker, yet you may be interested to hear that in my search for a story sufficiently excellent to please my readers, I have read, within the past few months, no fewer than eleven serials, varying in length from 60,000 to 150,000 words. This reading, of course, has to be done in addition to the ordinary work of editing, and most of it was done while the majority of you have been sound asleep.

So I hope that, after all this toil, I have succeeded in getting hold of a story that will please you all. If so, my labours will not have been in vain.

* * * *

Every reader will be interested in the discussion (republished on page 443) which has been going on in a big London Daily about the "Confessions of Cynthia."

* * * *

This week the last picture in the Cut Picture competition appears. Next week we shall hold another competition, complete in itself, of a bright and novel description, in which ten Gramophones will be awarded as prizes.

* * * *

If any reader has been sufficiently interested in the present serial to feel that he or she is justified in distributing a few leaflets about the new story I should be ever so much obliged, and I will gladly forward a small parcel for distribution.

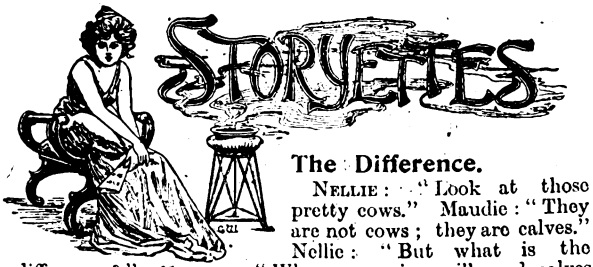
If you decide to help us in this way please send a post-card stating the number you think you can distribute to the Publisher, Short Stories, 17—18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

A prize of £5 will be given to the person who distributes these leaflets to what I consider to be the best advantage.

Full particulars will be sent you with the leaflets when you have made your application.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google



The Difference.

Nellie: "Look at those pretty cows." Maudie: "They are not cows; they are calves." Nellie: "But what is the difference?" Maudie: "Why, cows give milk and calves give jelly."

And George Tried.

Bride: "George, dear, when we reach town let us try to avoid giving the impression that we are newly married." George: "All right, Maud; you can carry this portmanteau."

Very Unkind.

Mr. A.: "Just look at that dolt of a man. What a charming wife he has. How true it is that the biggest fools always marry the prettiest girls." Mrs. A.: "Oh, you flatterer!"

After the Coronation.

"Yes," remarked Mrs. Malaprop, "it was a grand sight. First came the king, carrying a spectre in his hand, and wearing a beautiful red mantle all trimmed with vermin. It was a grand sight."

The Lips of Experience.

Penelope: "I don't like to see you dangling about with mere boys all the time. What do you find that's so interesting in that smooth-faced young Faris?" Perdita: "Why, Pen, his face isn't so smooth as it looks."

Rough on Kidder.

Askins: "Good gracious, Kidder! How came you by that fearful cold?" Kidder: "My wife leaves the window wide open every night when the baby is wakeful, and allows the wind to blow on me becauses it amuses the baby to hear me cough."

John's Mistake.

Husband: "Did you see me kiss my hand to you this morning after I had left the house?" Wife: "Why, John, I wasn't near the window then." Husband: "I wonder who it was?" Wife: "I don't know; but, by the way, John, Mary told me this morning she had decided she would stay with us another month."

A Question of Economy.

"Laura," said the young lady's mother, not unkindly, "it seems to me that you had the gas turned rather low last evening." "It was solely for economy, mamma," the maiden answered. "There is no use trying to beat the gas company, my daughter. I have noticed that the shutting off of the gas is always followed by a corresponding increase of the pressure." "Well, that lessens the waist, doesn't it, mamma dear?" replied the artless girl. And her fond parent could find no more to say.

A Level-Headed Maid.

Day was trembling on the edge of night. The sun had dropped behind the hills, and splashed the sky with red. For two hours Susan and Henry had been talking. Susan was sweet-faced and tender, and the amethystine tints of the evening touched her face softly, and the fading lights threw a halo about her head. He folded her to his throbbing bosom, and then slowly unfolded her. "We shall be so happy," he whispered. "Yes, Henry," was her murmured response, "and so harmonious. Whatever you say I shall believe now, henceforth and for ever." "I can never be such a husband as you deserve, Susan," he almost sighed. "No, Henry," she said, "I suppose not, but at my time of life I can't afford to be too particular. Come in and have some supper." And Henry went in.

Very Much Broken.

"I am a broken man," said the playwright. "So I should think," was the answer, "for I have seen your pieces."

Must be One or the Other.

"Notice that man over there, how nervous he appears, constantly looking round to see if anybody is watching him. I'll bet he's a burglar." "Yes, or a bridegroom."

A Very Good Match.

Mack: "Was the girl Hibee married considered a good match?" Robins: "I imagine so. She fires up at the least provocation."

A Blonde Income.

Clara: "Charlie Jackson prefers blonde girls." Laura: "Indeed. I am quite a brunette, you know, and he is always very attentive to me." Clara: "Probably because your income is fair."

She Got a New Bonnet.

He (indignantly): "Those insulting vergers put us into a back pew." She (calmly as a quiescent volcano): "They probably noticed that I wore a bonnet which I wouldn't care to have seen."

Another Chance Lost.

She: "If it were necessary, and I were your wife, would you go through fire and water for me?" He: "Do you think it would be necessary?" She: "It might." He: "Then I think you had better marry a fireman. Good evening!"

An Inspiration.

"Here are some sultana cakes I made myself," she said. He paled. "Thank you, darling," he faltered, and partook. That night the painter dreamt, whereat he rose, and in feverish haste painted an art poster, which brought a hundred and fifty-two pounds. Then he kissed his wife fondly, called her a brave little woman, and wondered what he would do without her.

Wanted Consolation.

"Don't you give any premiums for twins?" asked an anxious-looking man who had edged his way through the crowd in front of the railing behind which sat the judges at the baby show. "No, my friend," replied one of them. "We have thought it best not to offer premiums for twins. Here is the premium list. You can see for yourself." "I didn't know but you might have a consolation prize to offer," said the anxious-looking inquirer, edging his way out of the crowd again.

Saved in Time.

Wibble: "I hear that young Jinx has broken his engagement with Miss Flyer." Wabble: "Yes; and it's odd the way it happened, too. You see, he left a phonograph at the house, so she could whisper a 'good night' into it just before she turned out the gas, and send it to him through the post. Quite romantic, you see. Well, you see, in the excitement of the affair, she forgot to shut the machine off, and he not only received her words, but a large and varied assortment of snores that had accumulated while she was asleep."

The Modern Yellow-Back.

Farmer Hodge (reading novelette): "I'm out of all patience with that Gladys Fitzallwyn in the story—the way she's abusing her beautiful eyes. She doesn't deserve to have none." Mrs. Hodge: "What's she been doing now?" Farmer Hodge: "This book is full of it. First she threw her eyes up to the ceiling, and then let them drop on the floor; then she darted them down a long corridor, and rested them on the cool waters of the lagoon. Then she must have called them back somehow, for it says she bathed them in sad, salt tears, wiped them, and swept them with long lashes. Once she was fool enough to rivet them on the dome, and when I left off she was fixing them on the mantelpiece."

Digitized by Google

The Double Knot.

The Tale of a Boot-Lace Union.

SYBIL FARRINGTON had come up to London, bent on that most delightfully feminine enjoyment, known by the name of a day's shopping. She lived with her father, the rector of Fern Dell, a most primitive and rural village in Kent, and a day spent in London was for her a delightful break in the monotonous round of parish work and duties.

Not that Sybil ever felt dull, her bright disposition made her feel happy anywhere, and she was the joy and pride of her father's heart, who called her his ray of sunshine.

Not alone to him did she appear to be a beam of gladsome light, but to all the cottagers of Fern Dell, and no one was ever more popular than she was among young and old. Even Mother Ricket, the most surly and grumpy dame of the parish, would welcome Miss Sybil with a smile when she tripped across the threshold with her pet Irish terrier, Sam, whose popularity bid fair to equal that of his mistress.

Sybil ran down the steps of the Army and Navy stores where she had been shopping rather promiscuously—gloves, veils and ribbons for herself, garden implements for her father, groceries for the old housekeeper, and sundry little commissions for different cottagers—and jumped into a 'bus. She was going to have tea with a former school friend now married and settled in a flat off Baker Street.

"Bother it," she mentally ejaculated, as she noticed that her shoe-lace had got undone for the fourth or fifth time that day. She was firmly wedged in between a gentleman and an old lady and had not much elbow room, still she bent down and set about tying the refractory lace. She gave it several vicious tugs and pulled it into a big black knot determined it should not worry her again by getting loose, and then she sat up with quite a sigh of relief, feeling that this time at any rate she had conquered the nasty stubborn thing, as she phrased it to herself. Then she opened the pages of her favourite paper and was soon deeply immersed in the thrilling details of a love-sick damsel's heart troubles.

Suddenly she felt her foot violently jerked and she looked up rather indignantly thinking her neighbour was both awkward and rude. Well, he was apologising most profusely and was very red in the face, and he looked very ridiculous too, he appeared to want to stand up and yet not know his own mind on the subject. What could be the matter with the man, marvelled Sybil, when she felt her foot jerked again. This was too much.

"Sir," she uttered in the most frigid tones, and was not mollified when she saw by his garb that he was a clergyman.

The unfortunate gentleman turned a deeper shade of crimson.

"Excuse me, madam—but I really wish to get out——"

Sybil raised her eyebrows in astonishment; was the man mad? What hindrance did she bring to bear on his getting in or out, and what could that have to do with his so unduly jerking her foot? But, still murmuring confusedly he went on:

"And er, madam, ahem, the fact is, er—you have, I am sorry to say, tied your shoe-string to mine!"

He jerked out this extraordinary statement in the last stage of confusion, being evidently distressed to inform Sybil of what she had done. But it was her turn now to get rosy red and to look the picture of misery. Good gracious! was such an awful thing possible? She quickly moved her foot, and nearly jerked the unfortunate gentleman over.

By this time the other passengers in the 'bus, who had so far been mute spectators of this drama being enacted in their presence, grasped the gist of the situation, and roars of laughter made the unhappy pair feel they would give anything for the earth to open and swallow them.

"Untie the knot," Sybil whispered imperiously, feeling inclined to vent the vials of her wrath upon his head which, of course, was most unfair as she herself had done the mischief. But Sybil was after all only a woman, and what woman can remain perfectly fair when she is angered? And, poor girl, she did feel terribly hot and miserable over this absurd situation. The young fellow smiled grimly.

"Easier said than done," and he bent down in obedience to her peremptory order.

Alas! Sybil had indeed succeeded this time in making the string into a hard and fast knot, only she had been unfortunate enough to be sitting next to a gentleman whose shoe-laces also had this unfortunate propensity to get loose, and she had tied the two wrong ends.

The gentleman strove and strove, but all in vain, and still the mirth of their fellow-passengers increased. He drew out his penknife.

"Do you mind?" he whispered. "It is the only thing to be done."

"Oh, yes," she answered back in an agonised voice, "cut it, do anything to put an end to this."

He severed the strings at last, as Alexander of old cut the Gordian Knot with his sword when he failed to untie it with his fingers. Hastily lifting his hat he prepared to get down, but Sybil felt she could not remain in this unpleasant atmosphere of mirth for which she had provided the subject, and she too hurriedly left the 'bus. She hailed a hansom and jumping in drove to her friend's house.

She poured forth her tale of woe but found little sympathy. Her cherished friend, dainty and pretty little Mrs. Rivers, actually found it in her heart to send forth a merry peal of laughter.

"Oh, Sybil, do forgive me, dear, but it is so excruciatingly funny! I would have given anything to see you coupled, tied by the leg—oh, no, excuse me, by the foot, to this stranger."

"Oh! Ada, how can you? It is cruel of you! And I feel so miserable, so crushed!"

"Never mind, darling, a cup of tea will revive you. Tell me, Syb, was he young and good-looking, this knight of the shoe-latchet?"

"Ada, it is disgraceful of you to go on so. I never thought you could be so horrid."

"Nonsense, old girl, do not be a goose. Do tell me, was he nice?"

"I am sure I do not know and do not care. I did not look at him even, and hope I shall never lay eyes on the hateful man again!"

"That's a bit hard on the poor chap, you know Sybil After all, you linked yourself to him, not he to you!"

Digitized by Google

*
"A FOE IN THE FAMILY,"
Our splendid new serial, starts next week.
*

"He had no business to have his nasty shoe-lace just close to mine; horrid wretch!"

"Oh, come, Syb, you are hard on him! Had he a patent leather shoe? You must have observed that, surely, and at any rate one can always judge if a man is a gentleman by the way he is shod."

"I never looked at his vile shoe, but the man was in the Church, so I suppose he was a gentleman."

"Nonsense, that does not follow. Some parson folks are the biggest cads out!"

Sybil drew herself up with mock dignity to reprove her friend's levity.

"Ada, you forget; I belong to the Church."

"Well, the ritualists do wear petticoats! Still, I thought the female element was not considered quite the thing for ordination. What a jolly thing it would be though, Syb, if you ran up against this parson some time or other, fell in love with one another and had the knot tied, not in a 'bus next time, but before the altar."

"Ada, I am not going to stop here one minute more to listen so your sickening nonsense. Besides, I must be off to catch my train."

* * * * *

"Syb, dear."

"Yes, daddy," and Sybil Farrington looked up over the tea-urn and well-appointed breakfast service to smile at her father, the Rev. Mark Farrington.

"You know I have applied for a curate to help me at least temporarily in my work, as I do not feel quite so young as I used to be."

Sybil jumped up from her place and fondly hugged her father.

"You darling, dad, why you are as young as ever, and fit for more work than half these young fops of curates who think more of their collars than of the parish work."

Mr. Farrington smiled.

"You are rather hard on the youngsters, dear. However, I have just received a letter from a Mr. Cedric Vernon telling me he is taking a holiday from his work in the East End and can come to me for six weeks. That sounds good, and a worker in the East End is not likely to be one of these young, good-for-nothings you anathematize."

"He is a nuisance all the same, daddy, because he will be a very awkward third party and destroy our delightful solitude a deux. You and I never feel we want a stranger here, do we, dad, darling?"

"Well, little one, no doubt some day a stranger will come between us, only then you won't think him a stranger."

"Oh, daddy, for shame! As if I ever meant to leave you and marry! What an absurd suggestion!"

Mr. Farrington laughed.

"Why, Syb, the idea of your remaining an old maid is much more absurd!"

"I mean to, though! I can quite fancy myself in a mop-cap, with silver hair and gold-rimmed spectacles. At any rate I shall never marry."

"Yes, dear, all girls say that till Mr. Right turns up!"

"But, there is not a man in the world worth my giving up the dearest of all old dads!"

"Twaddle," responded her father.

"But, daddy, dear, it is not twaddle. I mean it!"

Having thus issued her decree which she thought then to be as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, Sybil stepped out through the open French window on to the lawn which stretched in front of the Rectory as far as the shrubberies which shut off the delightful old-fashioned rose garden. The beauty of the Fern Dell Rectory roses was celebrated all over the county.

Sybil called "Sam, Sam," and immediately the dog came bounding towards her holding in his mouth a basket in which lay a pair of garden scissors. Sybil had long since trained him to bring her these every morning after breakfast, ere she started on her rounds to pluck the supply of flowers with which she loved to deck every room in the house.

The girl knelt on the green sward, as she took the basket from the dog, and throwing her arms around his shaggy neck she kissed him.

"Dear old Sam, just fancy you and I are not going to have the grounds all to ourselves any more. That horrid curate is sure to be always sauntering about where he is not wanted. I dare say he will smoke too! Ugh, it is disgusting!"

Sam wagged his tail and quite seemed to understand all about the advent of this trouble—some curate which so worried his mistress.

* * * * *

"Syb," said Mr. Farrington a few days later, "Mr. Vernon is to arrive this afternoon at Sunly station; would you mind driving over in the dog-cart to meet him?"

"Oh, daddy, of course I mind very much. I hate it. I know I am going to dislike that man intensely."

"Child, do not be so unreasonable. Besides, you are incapable of disliking any one!"

"Oh, but dad, you do not know me. I could find it in my heart to hate people. I really could!"

And she tried to flash her lovely blue eyes in a most vindictive manner, and only succeeded in looking bewitchingly pretty.

"Will you please remember little spitfire, that Mr. Vernon is coming at my request to help me in my work, and that as my guest, I wish my daughter to treat him with every possible courtesy."

"Yes, dad, I'll do anything to please you."

"Even going to meet him, as I feel rather tired and you would be rendering me a service by going?"

"All right, then. And I shall promise to behave beautifully! There now, are you satisfied?"

A couple of hours later, Sybil drove up to Sunly station to meet the London train. She looked particularly sweet and fresh in a white tailor-made dress and a large white straw hat with roses crowning her halo of golden hair, Sam too accompanied her and trotted at her heels.

"Sam, old boy, I wonder what sort of a fellow he is," she muttered. "At any rate this is such a quiet station, it will be easy to spot him in his parson's rig"—and followed by her trusted companion she paced up and down the platform till the train steamed in.

A tall, dark, very good-looking young fellow jumped out who in his shovel hat and clerical tie was unmistakably the man. Sybil went up to him. "Mr. Vernon, I believe, my father being unavoidably prevented from coming to meet you, asked me to do so and——"

Sybil stopped; as she spoke the stranger turned his eyes full on her, and she recognised the gentleman of the shoe-lace episode. She flushed hotly and, in the wildest confusion, thought of turning her back on him and flying. Alas! such a course was not to be thought of. He was the first to recover his composure, and smiling mischievously:

"Miss Farrington, I am afraid this meeting is for you most unexpected and disagreeable. I am sorry, but cannot well help it! To me, it is unexpected, but"—he hesitated and added in a lower tone—"most certainly not disagreeable."

Sybil bowed stiffly, but not one of her features relaxed in a smile as she said coldly:

"We had better drive back. My father is waiting for you, and"—she went on viciously, determined to punish him for the impertinence of his personality, for which, poor man, he was certainly not responsible, "your business is with him, and not with me!"

"Oh, come, Miss Farrington, please do not take up this hostile attitude towards me, it will make things so uncomfortable for you and for me, and you know we are going to live in the same house for two months."

"Oh, no, there is no necessity for this. I can go and visit one of my friends during that time."

"You shall do nothing of the sort, Miss Farrington."

"Indeed, and who shall prevent my doing what I wish, pray?"

Digitized by Google

"I shall, most certainly."

"You!" and there was a touch of scorn in her voice.

"Yes, simply by wiring to Mr. Farrington that I am sorry to find I cannot help him in his work as had been settled."

"Oh, you would not do that," and Sybil thought of the nice rest which the advent of the curate meant for her father.

"Most certainly I shall, if I find that my coming drives you away from your home."

"Well, I shall not go, but you must not disappoint my father. He has not been at all well lately, and he wants rest so badly."

Her voice softened with infinite sweetness when she spoke of her father, and Cedric noted how different she was so.

"I shall not disappoint your father, Miss Farrington, and I can promise I shall do all in my power to lighten the burden of church and parish work from his shoulders."

"Oh, thank you," and Sybil looked up and smiled for the first time, and then he saw how exquisitely fair her face was when so lit up.

"Miss Farrington, won't you forgive me? You know, it was not my fault—what happened the other day," he jerked out awkwardly.

Sybil frowned; this was rather too bad of him to revert to that hateful subject again.

"Come, the trap is waiting," she said shortly.

They left the station together and took their seats in the dog-cart; Sybil, gathering the reins in her hand lightly, touched the cob's side with her dainty little whip more used as an ornament than for any other purpose.

They sped down the village street in silence. Sam lay at their feet. Suddenly he raised himself, and put his nose right into Cedric's hand, looking up most confidingly into his face with his big brown eyes.

"Good old dog, why you are trying to make friends with me."

"More amiable than I am?" the spirit of mischief in Sybil prompted her to say.

"Excuse me, Miss Farrington, I made no rude insinuations; I am never rude."

"Meaning that I am!"

"Well, you said so, not I. Did I, my friend doggie?" And he stooped and patted Sam's shaggy head to the animal's evident delight.

"I can't think why Sam is so friendly to you; he hardly ever makes up to strangers."

"Yes, I suppose you do think it is marvellous how any living thing can be friendly to me."

Sybil laughed. "Oh, come, it is my turn to say I made no such unkind insinuations."

"Well, there's one thing, I have Sam's friendship if I cannot get yours."

"Is it not sufficient?"

"Most certainly not," he said, changing his light bantering tone for a more serious one. He sought her eyes.

"Miss Farrington, I never can bear to be at war with anyone, much less a lady. Do let us be friends."

"Nonsense, of course we shall be friends, if only to please my father. He would be very cross with me if he knew I had been so rude to you."

"Could anyone be cross with you?"

Sybil ignored this altogether, but somehow she began to feel that she must appear in a most ridiculous light, showing all this unfair resentment for the absurd shoe-lace incident. She could not help realising how thoroughly gentlemanly and good-humoured he was over it all. She was impulsive in all her moods and she now turned towards him.

"Please forgive me, Mr. Vernon, I have been so abominably rude to you, and you must think me horribly unreasonable and bad tempered."

"Well, I should not like to tell you what I think of you."

"Really, is it so bad?"

"No," he said slowly and deliberately, "but it might make you feel conceited."

Sybil blushed, but somehow she had ceased to feel angered with him.

"Miss Farrington!"

"Yes?"

"As we are really going to be friends now, won't you give me a token of this new friendship?"

"Well, it depends on what the token is," and her merry blue eyes looked laughingly up into his.

"You were so angry at the station when you discovered who I was, that you never even shook hands with me. Would you do so now?"

"What, and leave hold of Dolly's reins and give her the chance of bolting?"

"I shall see to that," and masterfully taking the reins from her, he gathered them into his left hand, and held out his right to her. She put hers into his, rather wondering inwardly at her docile meekness to his unreasonable demands. He clasped her hand in his in a strong grip.

"Now this seals the compact of our friendship, does it not?"

Sybil did not meet his eyes; there seemed to be a nervous flutter at her heart which she did not understand. She whispered, "Yes."

He immediately released her hand, and keeping possession of the reins.

"You are tired, you had better let me drive for the rest of the way."

She let him have his own way and the drive was after this more or less a silent one, except when Sybil gave him the necessary directions about the way. When they turned in at the Rectory gate, they found Mr. Farrington on the lawn to welcome them.

* * * * *

It was the old, old story, and what is bound to follow when two young folks are much thrown together, and when their tasks and pleasures lie in the same path. Cedric and Sybil visited the poor together, and played tennis and ping-pong when he was free from his clerical duties. The eloquence of his sermons touched her more than any had ever done before, not even excepting those of her darling father. Mr. Farrington soon guessed the true state of things, but he felt happy. His beam of sunshine would indeed pass from his life, but he loved her too unselfishly to wish to keep her when her love had gone out to a true, good man such as he knew young Vernon to be. Still, they had never spoken to each other and the two month's stay of the young curate was drawing to a close. Sybil could not bear to think that a time would come when he would no longer be with them.

One morning when she sallied from the breakfast room with Sam and the rose basket, Cedric stepped after her.

"May I be allowed to accompany you and hold the basket?"

"Certainly."

A happy light danced in her eyes, as they wandered toward the old-world rose garden. Sam barked and frisked about, but the young people got far too much absorbed in each other to notice poor old Sam. They entered the arbour which was a perfect wealth of crimson ramblers and honeysuckle. The fragrance filled the air; the birds twittered among the trees, and the sun's rays slanted down on the face of the old sun-dial to mark the speed of passing time. But they took no heed of all these things as they sat down on the old stone bench under the roses. Sybil felt strangely embarrassed, and yet her heart seemed to overflow in a new-found happiness.

"Sybil!" He had never called her by her name before. "I shall be going back to London soon; will you miss me just a little?"

She did not answer, but a lump seemed to rise at her throat, and silently the mist gathered in her eyes. He was quick to notice this.

"Sybil, darling, is this so, do you really care so much? Is it possible that I have won that pearl beyond price, a good woman's love?"

"Oh, Mr. Vernon, I am not good at all; it is you who are so far removed above me. I am not worthy of being loved by you."

A Grand New Competition Starts Next Week.

DON'T MISS IT!!!

Digitized by Google

"My darling, how can you talk so?" and slipping his arm around her, he drew her to him till her fair head rested on his shoulder. Gently, almost reverently he pressed his lips to hers.

"Sybil, I love you. Tell me, sweet one, dare I hope that you care for me a little?"

She did not answer but nestled closer to him, feeling safe and happy by his side, as if no harm could ever come to her now; she felt secure in this great and noble love.

"Sybil, won't you tell me that you love me?"

"Oh, Mr. Vernon, you know I do."

"Sweetheart," and again he kissed her, "don't call me that horrid, stiff and formal Mr. Vernon. To you now and for ever I must be Cedric."

"It seems so strange to call you so," she murmured shyly.

"Well, Syb, darling, but it won't after a time. Surely you do not intend all your life through to call your husband Mr. Vernon," and he laughingly pinched her rosy cheek.

"Oh, you are a naughty, bad man," she replied with feminine inconsistency, all the time believing him in her heart to be the noblest and best of men.

"Well, but I want you just to say once, Cedric, I love you!"

She hid her head on his shoulder, but murmured very low, "Cedric, I love you."

"My darling! Look here, Syb, I want you to promise me something."

"What is it, Mr. Vernon—no, I mean, Cedric?" As she read the reproof in his eyes.

"You are solemnly to pass your word of honour you will never again tie your shoe-lace to any strange gentleman's whom you may happen to meet in the 'bus."

"Oh, Cedric, for shame! How can you?"

"How can I? Oh, quite easy, thank you. It will be a most delightful occupation to tease my sweet little wife!"

* * * * *

When Mr. Farrington heard of the engagement, he had the generosity not to remind Sybil of her rash vow about never marrying, and all things were arranged to the satisfaction of everyone when it was decided that Cedric Vernon should remain at Fern Dell Rectory as Mr. Farrington's permanent curate, as the work, he declared, was really far too much for him nowadays.

Sybil was supremely happy in this thought of living with these two whom she loved better than all else on earth.

When Mrs. Rivers was apprised of Sybil's engagement to a clergyman, she briefly wrote back: "Darling, Syb, let me congratulate you. Is the happy man the knight of the shoe-latchet? Something tells me it must be he. Wire back 'yes' or 'no.' Yours fondly, Ada Rivers."

Sybil telegraphed laconically, "Wretch," and Mrs. Rivers rested content that her random surmise was right.

Lily Butler.

NURSERY NEWS.

This is the title of an eight-page magazine for Children, which will in future be given away every week with Pearson's Weekly.

100 Prizes for Children every week

No. 1 of NURSERY NEWS will be found in the issue dated October 9th.

A BOON AND A BLESSING.

It has been remarked that the babies who are born in this age show greater wisdom than any ever born in the past, inasmuch as they have selected the golden age of babies.

Never before was known such ornate rattle-boxes, such successful teething rings, such satisfactory remedies for small interior pains, such ambrosial artificial food!

And now, with it all, comes the invention of Mr. Thomas Phipps, though we do not know that this is not more for the parent than for the baby. It must, however, prove a great boon to both.

It appears that Mr. Phipps is the father of a healthy and vigorous baby. This baby, like many others, delights in nothing so much as walking with his parent through the still hours of the long night, the parent, of course, being the active party to the pedestrianism.

Three months ago Mr. Phipps determined to devise some sort of odd mechanical means for doing his work. He fully recognised the many difficulties in the way of this, the chief of which he conceived to be, as his experiences proved, the crafty and suspicious mind of the infant himself, then some three months old.

Naturally Mr. Phipps's first idea was to make a steam-man to take the place of himself in the nocturnal pedal exercises. After a month of hard work he succeeded in making this sort of a man, and the first trial was fairly satisfactory. He experienced considerable difficulty in getting a lifelike expression on the wax face, but finally succeeded.

The great difficulty, however, was in guiding the automaton properly, and after the second night he insisted on falling over the furniture to such an extent that Mrs. Phipps would no longer allow him to be trusted with her offspring.

Accordingly Mr. Phipps abandoned the idea, and began working on slightly different lines. The result is the Phipps' Patent Panoramic Baby Walker. Mr. Phipps had become convinced that it was not so much travel as the appearance of travel which was demanded by the infant mind.

He now erected wire framework, somewhat resembling the "dummies" seen in front of ready-made clothing shops, which are sometimes mistaken by near-sighted people for our gilded youth.

By ingenious machinery in the cellar, which was connected with the figure through a hole in the floor, Mr. Phipps succeeded in giving it the exact motion incident to walking.

He then cried "Eureka!" in a loud voice, and placed the child in the arms of the figure, which he had fittingly clothed in white.

But it appeared that he had in his own words "eurekaed too soon," for what was his surprise when the child cried and refused to be comforted. He soon saw the trouble; the intelligent infant had got his eye on a picture of "Cæsar Crossing the Rubicon," which hung on the wall, and by this told that he was not moving at all.

Mr. Phipps was again baffled. He took the little treasure and walked on with him through the dark hours; but Mr. Phipps' mind was not inactive the while. Mr. Phipps saw that what was lacking was the moving panorama idea.

He accordingly mounted an endless strip of scene canvas on upright rollers. This he painted with the same pattern as the wall paper, and on it hung the picture of "Cæsar Crossing the Rubicon."

On the other side he placed a panorama of the opposite wall, with its picture of the Houses of Parliament.

He then arranged the figure to turn quickly every ten seconds, adjusted the infant, let on the steam in the cellar, which started the figure and the panoramas, and watched the result.

The child felt the swinging, rise-and-fall, lean-over-and-sway-back motion of the figure, saw Cæsar go past on the Rubicon' felt the turn, observed the Houses of Parliament roll past in fitting sequence, and closed his eyes and went to sleep.

Mr. Phipps crept into bed and enjoyed the first night's rest in five months. He expects to have his machines on sale shortly.

P. L. A.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Are They Proper Reading?

A Discussion in a Big London Daily.

On Thursday, September 4th last, a letter appeared in the London DAILY NEWS on the subject of "Is the Middle-Class Decadent?" After putting forward several arguments in the affirmative, the writer, signing himself "Verax," goes on to prove to his own satisfaction that one of the surest signs of decadence in the middle classes is the manner in which they appreciate articles that tell of the doings of the Upper Classes. He says:

What is the case to-day? "The Visits of Elizabeth," already discussed, Sir, in your columns, following on "Dodo" and "The Massarenes," has been followed up by a crowd of kindred books, all painting the roses and raptures of aristocratic vice, and now we find in the weekly periodical output of one of our journalist princes (we have no merchant princes now), a publication called SHORT STORIES, which has as its leading item a series of revelations entitled "The Confessions of Cynthia." This series, be it noted, is appearing in a publication which appeals solely to the middle class. It has as its central figure an adventuress, whom the author shows to be thoroughly unscrupulous and to move "in the highest circles," a very type of "smart set" wickedness. The editor refers in his paper to the interest displayed by his readers in this lady, whose doings, it is but fair to say, are chronicled with a force and clearness worthy of a higher model.

Now, what is the sadly significant fact about this? Not that the art of the fictionist is used to expose misconduct, but that in a purely middle-class journal the vices of the aristocracy should prove an attraction, vices which our forefathers reprobated and would not tolerate.

This letter was followed on September 5th by another epistle, defending the famous series of articles. It ran as follows:

SIR,—The point raised by your correspondent "Verax" regarding the series of articles entitled "The Confessions of Cynthia," now appearing in SHORT STORIES, is of great interest to me. I am one of the middle class to whom "Verax" refers, and know nothing about the way in which people in high society live. The articles in question considerably opened my eyes as to the real way in which the very wealthy pass their lives. I had been under the impression that wealthy people were supremely happy, and spent all their time in pleasure. I had no idea that money troubles ever worried them, consequently my own unhappiness resulting from comparative poverty was greatly intensified. After reading, however, of the misery and wretchedness of the adventuress and other characters in this series, I have realised that money is far from being everything, and consequently I am no longer eaten up with envy for the wealthy. I do not think it fair of "Verax" to deprecate the publication of this kind of literature. If vice and misery exist amongst the upper classes why should it be kept a dark secret from the middle classes? Yours, etc.

MIDDLE CLASS.

Following this were two or three further letters, including one from a school teacher:

SIR,—The point "Verax" raised concerning the depraving influences of cheap literature sold to hundreds and thousands of our young people to-day is very important. We are often asked to congratulate ourselves because the penny dreadfuls of the "Dick Turpin" type have been superseded by so-called "pure literature." But this pure literature is in some respects worse than the old blood-curdling romance. It casts a false and vicious glamour over a mode of life just as evil, and, alas! more real than that of the highwayman hero. Young girls who need this literature are taught to regard riches, a fine house, and a handsome husband as the sole aim of their existence. There is nothing in these so-called pure works to teach them that life has duties and responsibilities which must be faced, and that a time comes when a girl must put away childish things. "The Confessions of Cynthia," to which "Verax" alludes, is only one of many hundred productions which I find my pupils excitedly perusing, with the result that good literature, that perennial source of spiritual strength and pleasure without alloy, is a sealed book to them, for once a bad literary taste has been formed, the beauties of great writers can never be appreciated.

This point, I think, should receive attention. I am well aware that no law and no censor can regulate books, but let us at least recognise that there is nothing "pure" or beneficent in these cheap productions, which are still vicious and enervating, although they do not chronicle crimes of violence.—Yours, etc.,

TEACHER.

This violent attack on the morals of the series then brought forth a letter from the author of the series herself.

SIR,—It is a good rule that keeps the author silent under criticism; but when that criticism challenges the author's morality, and asperses her motives, it is but fair she should be heard in her own defence.

The correspondents who have referred to "The Confessions of Cynthia" do me great injustice. Whatever else may be said of the "Confessions" it is most certainly untrue that they cast "a false and vicious glamour over a bad mode of life." My aim throughout has been to show that a woman with beauty and talent, with friends in high places, with all the advantages that wealth can bestow, but a woman of no good aims, comes in the end to ruin.

Is this a decadent or an immoral purpose? If so, Thackeray, the great middle-class satirist—who wrote, be it noted, of the upper classes, was decadent and immoral also. Writing of Becky Sharp he says, "All her lies and her schemes, all her selfishness and her wiles, all her wit and her genius, had come to this bankruptcy." It is with great diffidence that I dare to mention Thackeray when writing of my own work; but this I may say, whether the adventuress I portray is a "high" or "low" model, she is taken straight from life. I have studied her at first hand and the career that I am outlining is, as you know, sir, one straight from life. As such I claim it has a special value.

The mistake my critics make is one of great importance. They imagine that a portrayal of vice is immoral, in that it excites sympathy with the vicious. That is not so. The art and aim of the fictionist is to-day the same as in the days of Shakespeare. "To hold the mirror up to nature, to show vice its own image, the very form and body of the age."

If it is true that the "smart set" count for so much to-day, surely the sooner they are known for what they are the better. And as one who has had the entrée to that circle, I have used my humble powers of narrative to show them in their true colours. Yours, etc.,

THE AUTHOR OF "THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA."

Digitized by Google

Out of Great Tribulation.

By Henry Farmer.

"Seaton Revelle, consider yourself under arrest."

"To the Chief of the Criminal Investigation Department, Scotland Yard."

A greyness stole across Revelle's face, as he still stared down at the words; a greyness that seemed reflected on Benny's features now.

"And what, Benny, are your plans for the future?"

With the words, Revelle shifted the blotting paper. The rest of what was written was visible now.

Benny sprang to his feet, hurried across to the table.

"Excuse me, Marquis!" he stammered, his face the colour of ash, "but that—that letter's private and confidential—to a friend of mine!"

He tried to snatch away the letter; but Revelle was too quick. With one hand he pushed him back; the other hand he spread out upon the letter itself.

"Tell me, Benny," he said in a low, strained voice, "since when has the Chief of the Criminal Investigation Department, Scotland Yard, been a friend of yours?"

Benny took a backward step and clutched at his collar.

Revelle cast a quick glance down at the letter.

"I see," he went on, his eyes riveted now on the other's face, "that I am mentioned in your letter—'Seaton Revelle, alias the Marquis, planned the robbery!'"

Outside the two men were watching the window.

"Winton," whispered Crump, staring at the two shadows that were now visible on the blind, "this is very tantalising, is it not? So near, and yet so far! If I might jump at conclusions from the attitudes of those shadows, the conversation is of a very serious if not strained nature. The smaller shadow's attitude betrays fear and surprise; the taller one's attitude is to me menacing. It looks to me like a row, and a serious row!"

Within the room, a moment's silence had followed Revelle's words. Benny's teeth were chattering. His right hand stole from his throat to one of his coat pockets, where a revolver nestled.

Revelle realised the meaning of the movement.

"You hound!" he hissed. "You mean to sell me!"

Only an old woman in the house, and she—had not Benny said so?—was as deaf as a post.

It was the instinct of self-defence that had made Benny feel for his revolver. Those words, "The man who sells me will be signing his death-warrant at the same time!" were ringing in his ears.

"Stay where you are, Marquis, or by——"

The revolver was out of his pocket, but before he could bring it up level Revelle had leapt, had closed with him, one hand round his throat, the other gripping his revolver-wrist. Then, tightening his clutch round his throat, Revelle forced Benny backwards on to the table. Physically Benny was no match for him. He could only writhe in noiseless impotence, his face darkening, his eyes glaring up with a frightful expression of horror in their depths.

Then Revelle wrenched the revolver from him.

"Sell me, would you?" he hissed. The working of his livid face told that the barriers of self-control were broken down.

It had all happened in far less time than it has taken to describe.

"It does very much look like a row, Winton! Great Heaven!"

As Crump was whispering the words the two shadows seemed to become one. The double shadow swayed for a moment, then bent over the table. The next second the one shadow became two again. A shadow arm, the hand gripping something, rose and fell twice with a terrible rapidity. Then the shadow tragedy ceased. The light in the room had been extinguished.

Crump's brain had worked at lightning speed. If not murder, frightful mischief had been done. It would be impossible to gain access to the house without raising the alarm, either by knocking on the door or ringing, or breaking into the room through the window.

"Winton, get round to the back entrance!" whispered the little man. "Quick, leave the front door to me!"

Crump unbuttoned his coat. A police whistle was slung round his neck. What had happened meant a complete alteration of his plans. Winton had hurried off!

Click!

Crump glided swiftly through the garden-gate. The front door was being silently opened. A dark figure noiselessly and hurriedly issued.

Crump straightened up and barred the way.

"Seaton Revelle, alias James Balder, alias Signor Balderini, consider yourself under arrest!"

The figure reeled back. Crump's rather long-winded speech had been intentional. It had had the effect of a blow.

The next moment, the police-whistle jammed between his teeth, he was blowing a screaming note! And, as he blew, he flung himself upon Revelle.

The staggering words, the shrill scream of the whistle, had momentarily paralysed Revelle. He had left Benny in the dark room within, lying on the floor, his skull battered in with the butt of his own revolver. He had fancied himself rid of the man who would have sold him; fancied that there would be time to realise money on the stolen jewels, and get clear of the country before suspicion would fall upon him.

But the paralysis that fettered him was only momentary.

He grappled with Crump, and a second later was fighting like a desperate tiger, fighting to save his neck from the rope. He must get away, if it meant killing another man—the man who had twined his arms round him, who, though he battered down murderous blows on his down-bent head, was holding on with the grimness of death!

Revelle, in the prime of his life! Crump, who would never see sixty again! Yet the little grey-headed man had a lion's heart, and for all the blood streaming down and blinding him, he held on with a grip of steel!

Voices, footsteps were sounding out in the distance. Lights flashed from houses; windows were flung up.

Yet Revelle could not break away from the old man's grip. He tore, bit, and tripped in his horrible frenzy of desperation. It meant the rope, the hangman's rope for him!

He had smashed Crump down on to his knees; twice he drove his clenched fist into his face; but the iron grip of the old man's arms still held him!

Digitized by Google

God bless you, Crump, for that grip! You have conquered, and your task is well-nigh done!

A rush of men, some helmeted. A babel of voices that swallows up the sharp snap of the handcuffs. Only then Crump relaxes his grip, and reels back, and is caught in a policeman's arms unconscious!

They took him handcuffed to the nearest police-station, Seaton Revelle, alias the Marquis, alias Signor Balderini, murderer, thief, and coward!

They bore Crump into the house. Doctors were sent for. In the room on the ground floor they found Benny Beard lying on the ground, his skull battered, but still breathing! Whilst one doctor attended to him, another bandaged up Crump's wounded head, and administered restoratives. The little man was scarcely recognisable; but it was not long before he recovered consciousness.

"Where's Winton?" he murmured.

The inspector stepped to his side.

"Revelle safely in custody?"

"Yes. But you——"

"Never mind me, Winton! The Normanhurst jewels will be found in the strong-room at the Hotel Royal. You had better get out a warrant for the arrest of Masters!"

The little man had spoken with difficulty, but the next moment he raised himself into a sitting position.

"And Faversham?"

"He's alive," whispered the inspector, "but the doctor says he's under sentence of death!"

Crump staggered to his feet, and stood for a moment, swaying like a drunkard.

"Winton, I should—should be obliged to you for the assistance of an arm. Things have gone altogether differently from what I expected. Thank you, Winton! Let us go to the dying man!"

They had carried Benny upstairs and laid him on a bed. They were moistening his lips with brandy when Crump was assisted into the room. Presently his eyelids flickered, then opened.

"Have you got him—the Marquis?" he breathed out faintly.

Crump and Inspector Winton were beside the bed now.

"Yes!" answered the little man.

Then he bent down over the bed.

"Benny," he whispered gently, "play the man, and make a clean breast of it—for the sake of an innocent man and the woman who loves him!"

"Yes, yes!" he whispered almost inaudibly. "Quick—for God's sake—write down what I'm going to say. I'm—going fast; but I can't die—with that on my soul! Brandy."

More brandy, and the dying man's vitality temporarily flickered up.

"I meant to have made—a—clean breast of it. I had written it down, but the Marquis will have destroyed it. Masters got rid of the stuff for us; but you'll find three of the diamonds in my watch-case. Oh, my God! Those dark eyes of hers! I knew that you'd never win your bet, Marquis!"

His mind was wandering; but, presently, consciousness again returned. In a hoarse whisper, sometimes scarcely audible, and speaking so slowly that it was possible to write down every word, he breathed out his confession. Nothing was left untold.

"I can face my God with an easier conscience now," he murmured, as with a shaking hand he scrawled a dying man's signature across the paper, "if I hadn't been a coward, I should have owned up long before. I—I should have liked to—have seen her. I—I should have liked to have looked into her eyes—and seen forgiveness there. Ask her—Esther—to forgive me my share!"

When next he spoke, he was wandering in his mind, imagining he was at Warham, taking part in the village concert, and once he broke out into song—"Oh, when I was single, oh, then." Then they gathered from his babblings that he fancied that he was standing before a judge, in the prisoner's dock, pleading for mercy.

Where Electricity Failed.

A young lady named Lucy Ann Weasenham, living in Third Terrace, Hope Street, Grimsby, was ordered by a doctor to have slight electric shocks daily with a view to cure her of anæmia, weakness, and St. Vitus's Dance. The treatment failed to cure, but Chas. Forde's Bile Beans, which were then tried, succeeded. To a Grimsby Gazette reporter Miss Weasenham said:—Anæmia so reduced me and robbed me of strength that I could not lift a cup! St. Vitus's Dance followed, and I was in a shocking plight. It was all due to excessive weakness, and when the electric treatment failed we turned, as a last hope, to Chas. Forde's Bile Beans. A course of this wonderful vegetable preparation brought renewed life to me. The anæmia left me, and as my nerves were strengthened the convulsive movement of my limbs ceased. My appetite improved, my strength returned, and in a few months I was once more restored to health." Bile Beans are a certain cure for anæmia, debility, indigestion, "summer-end fag," loss of appetite, all female ailments, constipation, piles, and headache. Of all chemists at one shilling and three-halfpence or two and nine, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119, London Wall, E.C., upon receipt of prices. Avoid all imitations.

"ALKAN"

CURES IN ONE MINUTE

by inhalation, HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, FACIAL NEURALGIA, NEURALGIA OF THE EAR.

PRICES 2/9 AND 4/6 PER BOTTLE.

Of all Chemists and Stores, or of the Proprietors,

The "ALKAN" Ltd.,

General Depot, 150 STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 455.)

PAPER PATTERN of this

GIRL'S SKIRT

(Age 12 to 14.)

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

"Guilty, your Lordship! Guilty!" he whispered. "But have mercy, have mercy!"

And with these pleading words still clinging to his lips, Herbert Giles, alias the Tinker, alias Benny Beard, alias Mr. Faversham, crossed the threshold of Eternity.

For some little time a solemn silence reigned in the chamber of death. Then one of the doctors approached Crump.

"You ought to get to bed!" he whispered. "You are not in a fit state to be about!"

The little man, his head and face bandaged, was supporting himself again on Winton's arm. One eye alone was visible. He shook his head.

"There is still work to be done! Winton, you will see to matters here, I know. Railton should be arrested at once. Would one of you be good enough to hail me a cab!"

The doctor remonstrated with him; but the little man only shook his head, and remarked with a shadowy smile that he was remarkably tough for an old fellow, and that the gruelling he had received, severe though it was, would certainly not deter him from doing what was a sacred duty.

Having assisted him into a cab, Winton asked the little man where he wished to be driven to.

"The Hotel Royal!"

The cab rattled away.

"At last," said Crump to himself, "the end is in sight!"

JOY DOES NOT KILL.

It was late when Crump reached the Hotel Royal, and the uniformed porter stared hard at the strange, bandaged, dishevelled little man who ascended the steps none too steadily.

"Now, then," he said roughly, "you've made a mistake. This is an hotel, not hospital. And you—at your time of life! You ought to know better!"

"Young man, curb that tongue of yours. I'm fully aware that this is an hotel, and I am going in. Nor am I intoxicated. Appearances are sometimes deceitful."

"Here, don't lecture me! You don't go inside until you tell me your business!"

"I wish to see Mr. Mansfield. Be good enough to see that this card is delivered to him at once!"

The porter huffily took the card. A few moments later John Mansfield himself hurried into the entrance hall. Crump rose with some difficulty from the chair in which he had installed himself.

"Penworthy—Crump!" gasped the banker. "Great Heavens! But what has happened?"

"Good news, Mr. Mansfield!" cried the little man, his one visible eye twinkling like a star. "Good news! Before a week is out, Alec Scarsdale will be a free man!"

"Thank God!"

And the banker was violently wringing one of Crump's hands, the tears standing out in his eyes.

"But you? What's happened? You're injured?"

"Never mind me! Miss Mansfield!"

"Come!" cried the banker.

"Yes! But would you mind if I took your arm? I am—I am suffering from slight giddiness."

Esther had not retired to bed, but sat alone in the private sitting-room that her father had engaged. She was reading through again the pencilled note that she had received earlier in the evening, the note that Crump, for all the strain and anxiety upon him, had found time to send her. Her eyes were upon the words, "The end is looking very much nearer now. Courage, my dear young lady," when the door opened.

Her father entered. The look on his face made her spring to her feet with a low cry! She had read something in his eyes.

"Father?"

She only saw him, was not conscious of the little figure in the background, very much bandaged and leaning for support against the doorway. Crump's one visible eye was dim now.

"Father?"

"Yes," choked out the banker, and stretched out his arms.

A moment later he had folded his child in his arms.

A woman's cry of joy; a man's choking sob; then a silence.

Crump still stood on the threshold, his one eye shedding tears; then he quietly stole away.

"This is no place for me!" he whispered to himself.

He had reached the end of the corridor, when he staggered very badly indeed, and when, a few moments later, John Mansfield, missing the little man to whom everything was owed, hurried out in search of him, he found Crump lying in the corridor unconscious!

* * * * *

Convict 35 looked up wearily as his cell door was flung open. They had sent him back from the prison infirmary as fit again for punishment diet and punishment labour.

His fetters clanked as he rose mechanically to his feet, and stood to attention. His grey eyes had lost their lustre now. There was a pathetic bend about his head, with its grey hairs. Nothing surprised him now. He merely stared dazedly at the little group of men, headed by the governor of the gaol, who had entered. Perhaps they had come to tell him that he was about to be transferred to some other prison; but nothing mattered now.

He was vaguely conscious of the fact that the governor held some papers in his hand.

"Alec Scarsdale," he said, and Scarsdale was vaguely surprised at being addressed, not by his number, but by his name, "Alec Scarsdale, I have good news for you!"

A shadowy, weary smile played round the corners of Convict 35's mouth.

"Owing to certain revelations, it has been proved that you are innocent of the charge on which you have been imprisoned, and I have the pleasure to inform you that His Majesty has been graciously pleased to grant you a free pardon!"

Free pardon, forsooth, for a man who was innocent, who had done nothing, who had suffered the tortures of the wicked—but let it pass! These things, in time, will pass away!

A shriek, a wild half-laugh rang out, and Convict 35 fell to the ground in a dead faint.

But joy does not kill!

(The conclusion of this story appears in next Tuesday's issue. The first instalment of our powerful new serial "A FOE IN THE FAMILY," also appears next week. You must not miss it.)

Etiquette for Men.

A Book of Modern Manners and Customs.

By F. V. HOWARD.

Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

This volume gives in a simple style, full and accurate directions for the due observance of modern etiquette for men. Some of the twenty-one chapters are:

Chap. II.—A DISSERTATION ON DRESS.
" III.—ETIQUETTE FOR THE STREET.
" VI.—EVENING "AT HOMES" AND RECEPTIONS.
" VIII.—THE ART OF DINING.
" IX.—PUBLIC DINNERS.
" XI.—AT A THEATRE.
" XII.—ON RIDING AND DRIVING.
" XIII.—BICYCLING.
" XIV.—BALLS AND DANCES.
" XV.—ON BECOMING ENGAGED.
" XVI.—HOW TO GET MARRIED.
" XIX.—YACHTING.
" XXI.—MOURNING.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Etiquette for Men," for which I inclose One Shilling and Twopence.

Name .....

Address .....

Digitized by Google

Discovery of a Rational Treatment for Deafness.

A glance through the medical literature of the last twenty years reveals to the close observer a remarkable diversity of opinion among aurists as to what constitutes the proper method of treatment for deafness and diseases of the ear. Some authorities recommend, in obstinate cases, cutting away the drumhead of the ear, other aural surgeons are emphatic in saying that the results obtained are too uncertain to justify such severe measures. Another class of medical men base the treatment of deafness almost entirely on the application of medicated vapours forced through the nose into the middle ear by way of the Eustachian tube, but it is strange to find these same aurists acknowledging, in their writings on this subject, that it is doubtful if medication applied in this way can reach the seat of the disease which causes defective hearing.

In the midst of all this doubt and uncertainty there is, fortunately, the record of the discovery of a rational method. The Drouet Treatment, of treating deafness and ear diseases, which depends upon the scientific fact that the skin possesses the property of absorbing certain drugs applied to its surface and of conveying them by means of its underlying blood vessels to the adjacent diseased parts. In this method a plaster containing the necessary medicines is applied behind the ear and the medication, being absorbed by the skin, penetrates to the middle ear and inner ear, where the curative effects are exerted. To this simple procedure is subjoined, according to the merits of each individual case, such antiseptic medication for the ear, nose, or throat as may be needed.

Like all innovations, this treatment has received the severest criticisms, but, notwithstanding such opposition, ten years' test of the method has given results so emphatically successful that the usual medical opinions on the curability of deafness have been completely overthrown. In the long list of cases which, after being pronounced incurable by aural surgeons, have been reported cured by the Drouet Treatment, there are so many instances of recovery of hearing in advanced age, after fifteen, twenty, or even thirty years of defective hearing, and in the face of the worst forms of ear disease, that the victim of deafness finds renewed hopes.

Those who wish to thoroughly understand the Drouet method of Treatment will find a full description in a Special number of the "Journal for the Deaf," the Editor of this paper having written a series of popular articles on this subject, with which are embodied the details of a large number of cured cases. With this Special number is published a supplement containing a record of upwards of forty cases of the deafness and diseases of the ear, nose, and throat cured by the Drouet Treatment during the past month. To obtain a free copy of the "Journal" and Supplement it is only necessary to address the Editor, 72, Regent's Park Road, London, N.W. With the "Journal" will also be enclosed a Report Form, which will enable anyone to obtain free advice and instructions for applying the Drouet Treatment at home.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

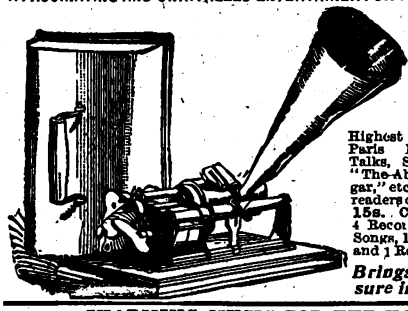
"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

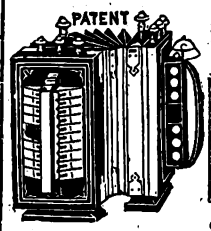


CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/6
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/6
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount.

Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1902, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.

Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back, Puts the hair right, Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFORDS PALŒLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account.—Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.—

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trowbridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find the renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

Colonel PERRY—

"My Dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and a l to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER.

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER—

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

A 4/6 full size bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

'TATCHO" is sold by all Chemist and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9 and 5/-

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

Lawrie's Difficulties.

"Lawrie" is deeply in love with a girl who is engaged to another man. This man, is, in "Lawrie's" judgment, quite unfitted to be her husband, and the whole affair is, in fact, simply an infatuation which he thinks will, in the course of time evaporate. Meanwhile, how should "Lawrie" act so as to win the girl from the probabilities of an unhappy marriage and get her to return his own affection?

* * * *

"Lawrie" must not, of course, interfere in the attachment of the girl. She herself may see qualities for admiration in the other man which would very naturally escape the jealous eye of "Lawrie." Let him be as attentive and nice to her as his position as an outsider will permit, and if in time the affair does come to an end as he suspects, he should be ready to assume the rôle of suitor on the grounds of sincere friendship, to which a girl crossed in a passionate love would probably be only too ready to turn for refuge.

❦❦❦

Wife or Friends?

"Josh" is married, and some old college friends have been recently staying at his house. In order to be agreeable with them, he has spent several nights sitting up with them playing cards, while his wife has been downstairs alone. On rejoining her after the friends have gone to bed, he has found her very disconsolate at being left alone. Do I not think it is unreasonable for her to expect him to leave his friends to entertain themselves?

* * * *

I do not think much of the manners of men who, staying in the house of a married man, do not conform with their duties to their hostess. Neither do I respect very much the wisdom of "Josh" in giving his friends first place, and his affectionate wife second. He would do well not to repeat such conduct, as I have known of cases, when a wife, exasperated by neglect on the part of her husband, has left him altogether to go and live with relatives. You know the proverb about the fury of the "woman scorned."

❦❦❦

A Case for Patience.

"G. H." has a sweetheart who continually suffers from the "blues." Often when he meets her she is silent and capricious, grumbles at the smallest thing, and gets quarrelsome and uncommunicative. "G. H." has grown rather tired of it. Do I recommend him to grow cool to her in order to bring her to proper behaviour when with him, or how should he act?

* * * *

The girl is probably more a subject for a doctor than anyone else. She is very likely in a bad state of health, and this is one of the effects on her. Besides that, perhaps you have overstepped the mark in your devotion to her, and she acts in this way simply to annoy you, knowing that you would never be harsh with her. I should take no notice of her moods, save to correct her when she shows herself to be quite unreasonable. There is no known cure for a woman's caprices.

An Outcast of Love.

"What am I to do?" writes "Ada E." "I took rather a fancy to a man some time ago, and we corresponded and sometimes met. I thought he was well to do from his manner and dress. I have since learnt that he is not on speaking terms with his family, and has no occupation or means besides a small allowance. Ought I to encourage him further, or even to continue the acquaintance, seeing that he does not appear to be going the way to work to get on in the world?"

* * * *

Certainly you should not even consider any attentions from him, save that it is understood between you that they have no serious meaning. There is no harm in your knowing this or any other young man, but you should clearly infer that you know your own mind as to the kind of man you wish to marry, and let him know that unless he has some serious plan for making his way in life, you could not even think of an engagement. I am assuming that you are not head-over-ears in love with him, from the judicial way in which you write.

❦❦❦

What is a "Good Time"?

"Ettie" some time ago met an Edinburgh man at a dance in London. They enjoyed a mild flirtation, which however was not serious. One of his last words were: "If you ever come to Edinburgh, I hope to see you and give you a good time." "Ettie" is, as a matter of fact, going on a visit to Scotland next month, and would like to know if it would be proper etiquette for her to let this gentleman know. If so, how could he "give her a good time" and yet keep within the bounds of conventionality?

* * * *

I assume "Ettie" is going to stay with friends in Scotland. When there, she might mention that she has a gentleman friend in Edinburgh. The next thing would be to ascertain whether her friends would like him to call and be introduced, in which case "Ettie" should drop him a line saying that her hostess would be very pleased to see Mr. —— to tea, say, on a certain date. What happens after this should be perfectly regular. If the gentleman should carry out his promise to "give her a good time" by securing seats for theatres, or arranging an excursion, "Ettie" could avail herself of his invitation. All must depend on the extent to which "Ettie" thinks the man is serious, and how far she values his continued acquaintance.

❦❦❦

The Interesting Friend.

"J. W. C." is very fond of a young lady, and has taken several walks with her. On some occasions when he has met her, she has had a lady friend with her who has not seemed to like the idea of her leaving to go with "J. W. C.," and has shown this in her manner. The result has been that the former young lady has at times declined to walk with "J. W. C." for fear of offending her friend. Should she consider her friend's feelings before those of my correspondent?"

* * * *

Certainly the young lady has a perfect right to consider her friend's feelings. It shows a very nice characteristic on her part that she should be so considerate towards a friend as to forego her own pleasure rather than slight her in any way. If you are engaged to the girl, and she is fond of you, naturally she will lose no opportunity of trying to get with you alone. If she does not take the proper steps to do so, she cannot be particularly fond of you. It is her affair as to whether or not she neglects her girl friend for you. There is no course for you to take except to assume that if she returns your love she will not allow anyone to stand in the way, and therefore to leave the question of disposing of her friend to her own devices.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

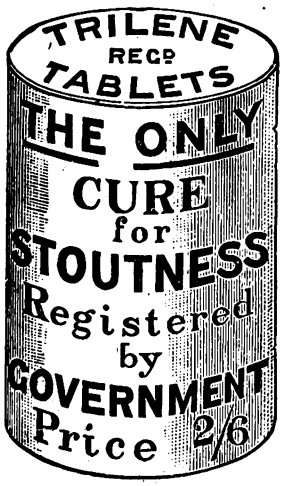
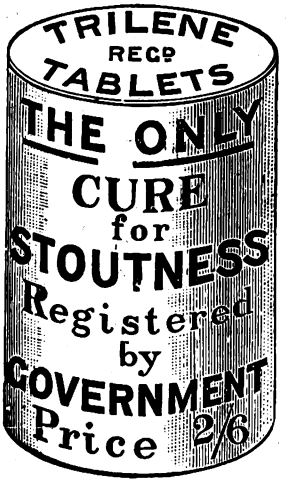
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Bisehoim Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Listorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18.b. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier,"

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a wonderful of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 28. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Miss JANE CARTER, of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Cures in Ten Minutes
Never Fails!
Nothing "Like It" or "As Good"

KAPUTINE

The Safe Remedy for

HEADACHE & NEURALGIA

Supplied for use in the Field Hospitals of H.I.M. THE KING OF GREECE, the Red Cross Society in the South African War, the Anglo-Chinese Hospitals, &c., &c.

Recommended by many medical men, including Dr. Alexander, M.D., Dr. Thompson, M.D., Dr. Boyd Williams, M.D., &c., &c.

There is no similar preparation, nor anything as good.

All leading Chemists sell it at 1/-, packet of 18 doses, or for 12 stamps, from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield.

The PRINCE OF WALES says:

"WAKE UP, ENGLAND."

DON'T PURCHASE FOREIGN POLISHES.

"MATCHLESS"

METAL POLISH.

POLISH, TINS & BOXES ARE ALL MADE AT OUR OWN WORKS IN LIVERPOOL.

By PURCHASING this POLISH you are Supporting BRITISH TRADE.

Should you have any difficulty in obtaining supplies, two 6½d. Tins will be sent Post Free (with address of nearest Dealer) on receipt of 1/-

MANUFACTURERS:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

Have You Heard the Merry Music of MASTERS'

'VERACITY' ACCORDEON?

13/- Cash, or 14/6 on Monthly Payments.

SPECIFICATION.

TEN Special Double Keys, best nickel fittings, two Stops, 8-fold Double Bellows, with nickel Corner Protectors, two Bass Keys, sweet-toned Bell, Black Ebonised Case, beautifully finished. Suitable for learner or professional. Size, 10in. by 10½in. by 5in. Safely packed and despatched, post paid, in card box; price 13/- cash, or 14/6 on our monthly payment system.

HOW TO PAY.

First send 2/6, and MASTERS' Famous 14/6 ACCORDEON will be sent you on approval. IF satisfactory, you complete purchase in monthly payments of 3/- each, but our Nett-Cash-with-order price is 13/- only.

If Accordeon is not satisfactory, your money is refunded if Accordeon is returned at once

We also supply:

THE	UP-TO-DATE ACCORDEON		10/6
"	FAVOURITE "		12/6
"	KITCHENER (in wood case)		18/-
"	VERACITY (for Professionals)		25/-

Any Accordeon sent on approval on receipt of 4/6, balance to be paid in monthly payments of 5/- each.

Catalogue of Watches, Accordeons, &c., POST FREE.

J. N. MASTERS Ltd., 157 HIGH ST., RYE, SUSSEX.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Ladies Say

Two dozen No. 1, at 1/-.
One dozen No. 2, at 1/-.
One dozen No. 3 at 1/6.
POST FREE.

May be obtained from all Underclothing Houses and Chemists

"The MENE" SANITARY TOWELS

Are Superior to all makes for Cleanliness, Comfort and Economy.

A FREE SAMPLE

To any lady naming this paper to

MISS HAYNES,

55 FANN STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Digitized by Google

"A FOE IN THE FAMILY," OUR SPLENDID NEW SERIAL, STARTS TO-DAY.

SHORT STORIES.

No. 719.] Week ending October 11th, 1902. [One Penny.

She did not see that poison was poured into Lord Ilden's flask.

Digitized by Google

(An Incident from our Next Serial. See Inside.)

Cures in Ten Minutes
Never Fails!
Nothing "Like It" or "As Good"

KAPUTINE

The Safe Remedy for

HEADACHE & NEURALGIA

Supplied for use in the Field Hospitals of H.I.M. The King of Greece, the Red Cross Society in the South African War, the Anglo-Chinese Hospitals, &c., &c.

Recommended by many medical men, including Dr. Alexander, M.D., Dr. Thompson, M.D., Dr. Boyd Williams, M.D., &c., &c.

There is no similar preparation, nor anything as good.

All leading Chemists sell it at 1/-, packet of 18 doses, or for 12 stamps, from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES'

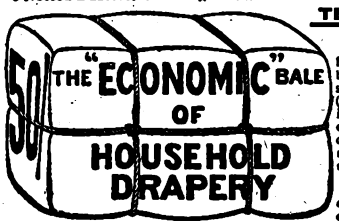
Shakespeare

The "ECONOMIC" BALE

OF HOUSEHOLD DRAPERY

CONTAINING:

Large-size Alhambra Quilt, (red and white or blue and white), Pair Full-size Blankets (white whipped edges), Pair very Best Quality Twill Sheets, Pair Pillow Cases, Bolster Case, 3 Embroidered Toilet Mats, Embroidered Table Cover 30 by 30, 2 Turkish Towels, Best Quality Glass Cloth, Finest White Table Cloth (full size), Woven Turkey Table Cloth, Pair Special Design Lace Curtains, 6 Netted Dusters, Scouring Cloth.



TERMS OF PURCHASE

Send only 5/- the bale will then be sent to your address (carriage paid), and, if you are satisfied, complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of 5/- each.

You are under no obligation to purchase. If the Goods fail to come up to your expectations, return them, and your deposit will be refunded in full.

Please send a Post Card for our No. 2 Catalogue of Drapery, ... Costumes, &c., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

GREAT SALE. CYCLES HALF PRICE.

Busy men want sound reliable mounts. Symonds Cycles are best and cheapest, fully guaranteed, rider delighted with them. Your money back if not as represented. Our cycles are built on honour. Catalogue Free. Address: SYMONDS LONDON STORES, 124-128 City Road, London. E.C.

SEND A POSTCARD.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval a4 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

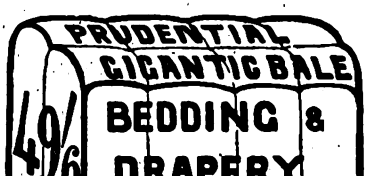
WE TRUST YOU—
NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE, Delamere Crescent, London, W.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.



THE BIGGEST BARGAIN EVER OFFERED.—This Bale contains Pair Full-size heavy Witney Blankets, 1 Quilt, red and white, blue and white, White Honeycomb, Marcella or Red Twill, your choice of these; Pair full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 5 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 6 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths. 28 articles for 49s. 6d. How to pay—Send 4s. 6d. only, we send the Bale, carriage paid, for your approval; the balance can be paid 5s. monthly. If you prefer to pay balance on receipt of goods send only 40s., saving 5s. cash discount.—Write for list of our bargains.

PRUDENTIAL SUPPLY STORES, 150 & 152 Seven Sisters Rd., Holloway, N.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor 66 Pinsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

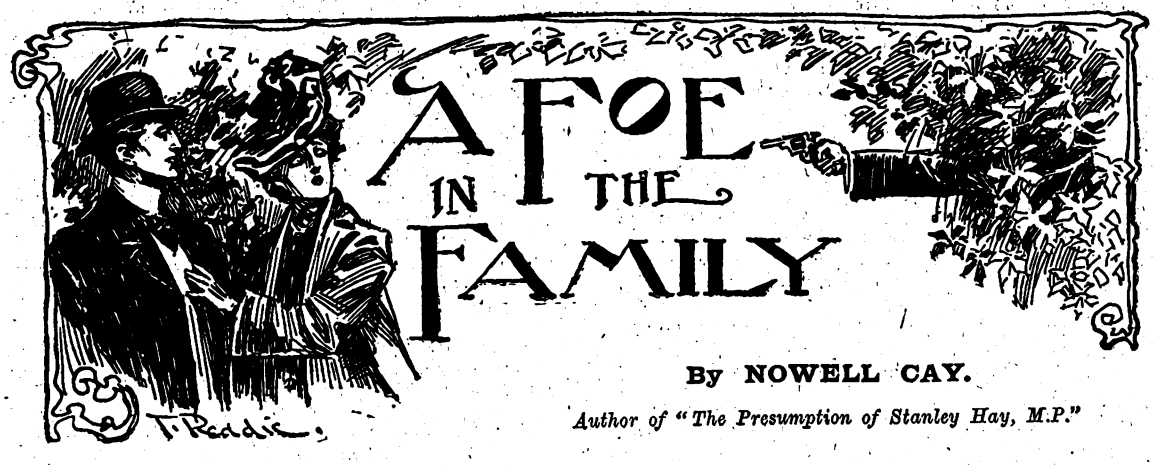
Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Short Stories.

No. 719. For the Week Ending October 11th, 1902. One Penny.

BELOW IS THE FIRST INSTALMENT OF OUR SPLENDID NEW SERIAL.

SEE THE NEW COMPETITION ON PAGE 461.



By NOWELL CAY.

Author of "The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P."

CHAPTER I.

The Lady of the Bank Notes.

"You have lost something?" said Lord Ilden, and at the softly-spoken inquiry a pair of violet eyes looked up in startled surprise. Their owner had been wandering along the narrow woodland path with her gaze downcast and her attention so completely absorbed by her search that she had not even noticed the approach of a stranger.

Lord Ilden, coming home in the dusk with his gun on his shoulder, had enjoyed ample opportunity of admiring the gracefulness of the approaching figure. But in spite of his admiration the face turned up to his, surprised him by its soft, delicate beauty, and, although the ladies of his acquaintance were wont to complain that he was the least impressionable of young men, he coloured slightly as the violet eyes met his.

"Perhaps I can help you," he added, "if you will tell me what it is."

She answered without shyness, although her face was a shy one. It seemed to him that her anxiety left no room in her mind for any other emotion.

"I have lost two five-pound notes. I was careless enough to put them in the pocket of my dress, and I am afraid that I must have drawn them out with my handkerchief."

"When did you notice your loss?" he asked.

"About half-an-hour ago just at the end of the path. I have been searching here ever since." Her prettily modulated voice trembled slightly, and Lord Ilden sighed. He was not fond of the society of women, even when they were very young and very pretty, as this forlorn maiden was, and he felt that he had committed himself. Her evident acceptance of his help made it necessary that he should search up and down the coppice with her until her property was found.

"You think that you lost the notes on this path, then?" he asked.

"Yes; I am sure that I did not touch my pocket till I got here, and I had been walking up and down the path for some time when I missed them."

It occurred to him that this was rather a curious proceeding; but he was not an inquisitive man, and the only duty before him was to find her lost property.

"And when did you last notice the bank-notes safe in your pocket?"

"When I left the Rectory. I have been governess to Mrs. Haydon's children, and the ten pounds was my salary for half a year."

"Indeed!" said Ilden, wondering that anybody should work half a year for such a small sum. "Then, of course, it would not do for you to lose the money. Are you sure that you did not drop it in the road?"

"No; I have been back once to the house. If I lost the notes on the highway somebody must have picked them up. But I think they must be here."

Once more her voice trembled.

"If so, they are safe till to-morrow," said Ilden. "It is almost too dark to see now. Would it not be better to resume your search in the morning?"

"I am going away very early. I must find my money this evening."

Ilden sighed resignedly.

"Then we must make the best use of what little light there is. I will walk this way, if you will walk that. How were the notes folded?"

He started towards the road with a full description, so far as she could give it, and in less than ten minutes rejoined her at the point where they had parted, holding something between his fingers.

"I thought that I should manage to find them if they were in the coppice," he said, handing her two crumpled-up bank notes, and her face flushed with radiant relief.

"How shall I ever thank you? It was all the money that I have in the world," she cried impulsively, as she unfolded the crisp sheets.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Ilden watched her uneasily, glad that the gathering darkness made her scrutiny a merely formal one.

"You must be more careful with your property in future," he said, perfunctorily, and she answered with a pretty little laugh of relief:

"You may be quite sure that I shall. I do not know what I should have done but for your kindness. I thought I had searched the path completely. Where did you find the notes?"

"Oh, quite close to the road," he said, quickly. "Good evening."

The girl held out her hand rather diffidently.

"I should like to know who it is that I am thanking. I shall never forget how much I owe to your kindness."

Ilden glanced at the face, radiant now with gratitude, and felt more than ever uneasy.

"I would rather not tell you, if you don't mind. If you should ever guess the reason, please oblige me by giving my refusal its full significance."

He had accompanied her to the end of the path where it joined the road by way of a kissing-gate, and bid her "good-bye" there. He seemed anxious to cut short her renewed thanks and get away.

But when her graceful figure had disappeared round a curve of the road, he was in no haste to resume his interrupted journey to the house. Instead he began searching the path again, more earnestly than before, stopping first to discover in which direction the wind was blowing, and entering the coppice on the leeward side of the path.

"If she found it out, it would be the best way out of the difficulty," he said to himself.

Among the young firs of the coppice it was too dark for any search to have much chance of success, but Ilden was a believer in his own luck, and a certain cynical doubt in his own mind made him unwilling to postpone the search till morning.

It was not until the rapidly-increasing gloom made his obstinacy ridiculous that he ceased to peer among the fallen pine needles, and he was turning to regain the path when the sight of something white at his feet made him stoop with the idea that success had attended his efforts just at the moment when he was admitting himself beaten.

He was loth to relinquish the idea when the feel of the ball of paper he had picked up suggested disappointment, and he put down his gun to strike a vesta and examine it more closely.

Yes, it was only a torn envelope which somebody had crushed into a ball and thrown away among the firs as they passed through the coppice, and the young man was about to toss it back when he was struck by a coincidence. The name and address upon it were his own.

He wondered how it could have come there when he certainly had no recollection of having thrown it away.

A second examination made him realise that he had never even received it. The writing, a prettily-formed woman's hand, was unfamiliar to him. The postmark showed that it had been posted at Lallerton, a place of which he had never heard.

And yet there was the address written plainly enough: "Lord Ilden, care of Hon. Jasper Ilden, Pennybrook Hall, Yorkshire," and the date on the postmark showed that it had been dispatched only three days ago.

Ilden knitted his brows in perplexity.

"I wonder if the inclosure is here among the firs too," he said to himself, but it was plainly too dark now to think of searching on such a slender chance, and he was putting the mysterious envelope carefully away in his pocket and deciding on a twofold search in the morning, when a sound made him stop abruptly, listening, and peering into the obscurity around him. It seemed to him as if he had heard a stealthy movement among the trees, and the remembrance of two recent incidents that might easily have proved tragic ones, made his attention instantly alert.

But in this case it seemed as if he had allowed fancy to play tricks with his imagination, for tensely as he listened he could hear no repetition of the sound. The coppice in its veil of darkness was as silent as death.

"It was nothing," said Ilden to himself, and he put a cigarette between his lips and struck a vesta to light it, preparatory to shouldering his gun again, and resuming his interrupted tramp to the house beyond the coppice.

But the next moment he had blown out the match hurriedly. For, as if some hidden foe had waited for its light to show his exact position, a bullet had come whizzing past his head to bury itself in the tree behind.

Ilden dropped promptly on one knee, and reaching out for his gun got it ready to fire back if the shot were repeated. The attack had been so unexpected that he had only the vaguest idea of the direction from which it had come, and to fire at random would only be to discover his own position to the hidden enemy.

His face, as he waited, expressed no surprise, only a keen intentness. One would have thought, indeed, from the quickness with which he had accepted the position that the attack on his life had been expected. If it had succeeded, his unseen assailant, whoever it might be, would no doubt have pleaded an accident. A man may fire at a stray bird in a coppice without imagining that a peer of the realm is wandering among the trees to receive the bullet from his gun.

Ilden could easily imagine the excuse, but he was determined that if a mistake was to be made it should be his. His fingers twitched to pull the trigger, and when five minutes had gone by without a sound or movement, he struck another match with his left hand against a tree, and held it at arm's length above him.

But the challenge was not accepted. Either his assailant had gone or feared to fire again after putting him on his guard, and after waiting another five minutes Ilden rose and stretched himself.

As he did so the kissing-gate at the end of the path clicked. Somebody was entering it from the road, and the young man stood to await their arrival. He was far from being a nervous man, but it seemed to him that it would be just as well to have a companion through the coppice.

The footsteps were approaching hastily, and he was able to distinguish now the figure of a lady approaching. He was scarcely surprised to find it to be the lady of the lost bank-notes. From the moment of leaving her he had been haunted by an uneasy fear that she might come back.

"Oh, I am so glad to find you," she exclaimed impulsively, as she recognised his tall figure in the gloom, "I was afraid that you had gone."

Ilden glanced uneasily over his shoulder.

"Let us get out on the road, and you shall tell me why you are so flatteringly eager to see me."

"I have brought you back your bank-notes."

"Mine?" he said, uneasily.

"Yes, you gave them to me. It was very, very kind of you, but——"

"What makes you think that I should have been so very deceitful?" he interrupted hopelessly, and smiled grimly to himself when he found all chance of subterfuge at an end.

"Because mine were never lost," said the governess. "I found them in my room when I got back to the Rectory, although I felt so sure that I had put them in my pocket."

Digitized by Google

Ilden laughed, although he was feeling very uncomfortable at the exposure of his artifice.

"Then I am afraid that I cannot attempt to defend myself. But—well, the money seemed so important to you, and it made no difference to me. I happened to have the two notes in my pocket—a tempting coincidence, and, besides, I thought that I should very probably find yours in the morning."

"You are the kindest man that I have ever known," she said, with her heart in her voice, "and you would not tell me your name for fear that I should find out the notes were not mine and return them. I may know it now?"

"If you wish. I am Lord Ilden."

They had reached the gate now, but this time the young man did not turn. The coppice had become dangerous, and he had already determined to take the longer way by the road.

"Lord Ilden," she repeated, and the note of interest made him ask a question.

"You have heard my name before?"

"Yes, my brother used to speak of you a good deal. You were his hero at Rugby. Perhaps you remember Gerald Courthorpe?"

"Poor Courthorpe? Of course I do, and I was very much cut up when I heard of his death. And you are really his sister?"

His languid voice had suddenly become animated. He had been looking forward with resignation to the prospect of bearing her company as far as the Rectory and listening to her disturbing thanks all the way. Now the journey became all too short in his eyes, for he had been fond of Courthorpe, and the fact of his sister being compelled to accept a position as governess, and feel the loss of ten pounds as a tragedy, was dramatic enough to rouse all his interest. Courthorpe, when he knew him, had passed as the son of a very wealthy man, and he was eager, if he could, to ask an explanation of the change.

But Miss Courthorpe was wasting time by talking about himself.

"Your kindness to-night is just what I should have expected from you after all that Gerald told me about you," she said. "All his recollections were of your generosity; a generosity of which he said that you always seemed half ashamed. I remember how impressed I was as a little girl by the story of your expulsion from Rugby. You knew that the fault was another boy's—your cousin's—who had deliberately schemed to throw the blame on you; and yet you would not tell. Gerald and I thought it was noble."

"And I owed it to your brother that the truth was found out, and that I was recalled, while my cousin Percival got his deserts. He was a capital friend, your poor brother; and it is very interesting to meet his sister. Let me see, your name is Florence, is it not? But you said that you were staying at the Rectory here. I hope you have not lost your father as well as your brother?"

He had noticed for the first time that she was wearing mourning, which at this date could not be for her brother.

"He died nine months ago," she said. "I thought you would have seen it in the papers. He lost all his money, and the shock killed him."

"I am very sorry," said Ilden, very sincerely. "I have been abroad and heard nothing. How very sad. You are quite alone in the world, are you not?"

"Yes. Mrs. Haydon, who knew my mother many years ago, very kindly gave me the position of governess; but——" She hesitated. "I am leaving her and going to a fresh situation to-morrow."

Ilden winced at the word "situation." It seemed to him an outrageous one for the lips of a lady whose brother had been his friend. It seemed more outrageous still that he, with so much more money than he wanted, could do nothing to make the trumpery twenty pounds a year for which she worked ridiculous and unneccessary. But what could he do? Plainly nothing, and he remained silent, while Florence ran on, talking with a matter-of-fact simplicity which seemed to him heroic, about the difficulty she had encountered in finding a situation at all.

He was racking his brains to think how he could help her, and had arrived at no solution of the problem when they approached the Rectory gate to find a pompous and fiery-faced little lady on the look out there. Her sharp voice, which was none the less acid when she saw the governess accompanied by a masculine escort, sounded shrilly before they reached her, announcing the lateness of the hour in indignant tones, and the girl bid Ilden good-bye hurriedly to join her. He could hear her employer's voice raised in querulous complaint as they disappeared up the garden path together, and he went on his way feeling more than ever concerned for her.

It was not until he was entering the dark drive which led to Pennybrook Hall that he remembered the attempt which had been made on his life and allowed his thoughts to return to his own affairs which the attempt had made engrossing.

"That makes the third," he said to himself. "The game becomes exciting."

CHAPTER II.

"Three Attempts have been Made on my Life."

Pennybrook Hall where Lord Ilden was staying, was the much mortgaged and encumbered residence of his father's step-brother, the Honourable Jasper Ilden, and was at present the scene of a family reunion. After the death of his father, Ilden had travelled abroad for a couple of years. Now on his return, a round of visits had ended in his stay at his uncle's, where he found himself surrounded by his relatives. For the house party included his other paternal uncle, the Honourable Rupert, with his family. Not that Ilden found much pleasure in their society. His host was a good-natured dipsomaniac, who seemed intent on drinking himself to death as rapidly as possible, and his wife whom he had taken off the stage was a vulgar and violent-tempered woman, who had not the grace to conceal her jealousy of her guest. She seemed to him unable to lose sight of the fact that but for his existence she would herself be Lady Ilden of Ilden Castle, and she discoursed openly on the injustice of the laws of inheritance which passed on a man's property and title to his son instead of his brother.

Rupert, the younger of his father's half-brothers, was a taciturn and reserved man who always seemed to his nephew a little "uncanny." His manner indeed suggested that strain of insanity which had discovered itself in his grandfather's second wife, the mother of Jasper and Rupert, but not, he was glad to think, of his own father. Of the Honourable Rupert's two sons, the eldest was the "Cousin Percival" whose unscrupulousness and cunning had gone so near to ruining Ilden's career at Rugby. A man of Lord Ilden's own age, and bearing no small resemblance to him, Percival Ilden had shown from his boyhood an over-ruling jealousy and dislike of the cousin who possessed all that his own ambition craved. His brother Grant being five years younger had never been Ilden's contemporary at college, and was comparatively a stranger to him. His cousin's only objection to him was that he wore his hair long and wrote poetry.

Between them came a sister who had persistently made love to her cousin, but during his absence abroad had prudently accepted the offer of a baronet. She and her husband, Sir Charles Barton, were included in the houseparty, and Lady Barton had already told her cousin in confidence that her marriage was a mistake, and that her husband was a bear. The young man had shown himself very sympathetic, and Jane Barton's friendliness did not lessen his distaste for the society of his father's relatives.

Digitized by Google

Of his mother's relatives, on the contrary, he was very fond, and his stay at Pennybrook Hall would have been less bearable than it was but for the presence among the guests of his maternal aunt Lady Mary Hay and her daughter Catherine. Catherine and he had always been the best of friends, and her friendship had always been the more pleasing to him because, unlike Lady Barton, his Cousin Catherine had always treated him like a brother.

They were all seated with the rest of the guests round the long dining-table when Lord Ilden entered a few minutes late for dinner, and he glanced round at the faces of his father's relatives with a keen interest. Neither of his uncles gave any sign that they noticed his entrance, but it seemed to him that his cousin Percival had been watching the door for him, and noticed his arrival with some emotion either of annoyance or relief.

"This is the first time that I have ever known you unpunctual," he said across the table as Ilden took his seat.

"Yes, I have had an adventure," said his cousin, watching his face closely.

"Indeed? Nothing tragic, I hope?"

Ilden laughed easily.

"Of course not. What makes you think that anything tragic could happen at Pennybrook?" he said, and Percival bit his lip.

"An adventure generally suggests danger to one's life or one's heart, and everybody agrees that your heart is quite invulnerable. But tell us the adventure."

"It took place in the fir coppice," said Ilden, still watching him, "and concerns a damsel in distress and a mysterious discovery, but I don't think that I will tell it."

"That is too bad," put in Catherine Hay, "after raising our curiosity."

His quiet smile promised that her curiosity should be satisfied later, but he had no intention of telling any of the story at table.

His hostess had pricked up her ears at the mention of a young lady in connection with her nephew's unusual want of punctuality. The fear of his marrying was an abiding one with her, which she had not the tact to conceal.

"If George is wise he will fight shy of damsels in distress," she said, "they always turn out designing cats. Is not that so, Jasper?"

Her husband, thus appealed to, gulped down a glass of port.

"Never knew a woman that wasn't."

Jane Barton took up the cudgels on behalf her sex, and so the conversation drifted.

Ilden took no interest in it until Mrs. Jasper made an announcement.

"This is Percival's last meal with us. He has discovered that he must leave us to-night."

"A rather sudden decision, is it not?" he asked, and his cousin seemed to resent the question.

"I told Uncle Jasper more than a week ago that I should probably be leaving to-night," he said shortly.

His uncle did not remember it, and Ilden became thoughtful.

He would have very much liked to know the reason of his cousin's abrupt departure, but he asked no question.

The thoughtfulness had not left his face when, after dinner, he left the table early and made his way to Catherine Hay's side in the drawing-room.

"I want your advice, Cathie, if you can give me ten minutes all to myself."

"Certainly. Is it about the damsel in distress?"

"No. She must wait. It is about myself."

"Which may be the same thing. Shall we walk in the garden? It is quite warm."

Ilden hesitated.

"No, I don't think I will risk the garden to-night. Come into the library."

"That sounds very serious," she said with a laugh, and Ilden answered half humourously:

"Oh, it is serious, as you will find out when we have our talk. Prepare your mind for something very startling."

They were crossing the room as he spoke and at the door met Grant Ilden who had followed his cousin from the table only a moment behind. The poet's handsome, byronic face had darkened into a frown as he stood by for them to pass.

"I am afraid that my dear cousin Grant is not fond of me," said Ilden, lightly, "The looks he gives me are not friendly ones."

Catherine only smiled. Her face was a plain one butit was very pleasing, and when she smiled she looked almost pretty.

Ilden noticed the fact as something new. It had not occurred to him before to think of his cousin's looks. To-night he was half-consciously summing up her physical attractions. They were certainly not so great as those of many girls he had met—of Florence Courthorpe, for example, but for all that she was certainly the nicest girl he had ever known intimately.

"Do you consider me a fanciful or imaginative man at all, Cathie?" he asked when they were in the library, and his cousin shook her head.

"Not in the least, George. If you have a fault it is that you are too sensible and matter-of-fact."

"No, I do not think that I am morbidly imaginative, and if I am not—well, somebody is having a very good try to make Uncle Jasper the seventh Baron Ilden."

Catherine opened her eyes.

"What do you mean, George?"

"That three deliberate attempts have been made on my life during the last month. It sounds as though I were joking, doesn't it? Somehow one can never imagine such a thing as possible outside a novel. But the thing is getting very plain, and, after all, I suppose the idea would never get into the novels if it did not occur now and then in real life. It sounds so ridiculous that I have not breathed a word to a soul of what I think; but I should like to know what you make of it. If you'll sit down, I'll tell you exactly what happened."

"It certainly seems incredible!" cried the girl, her sympathetic face as grave and impressed as he could wish. "Who could possibly wish for your death?"

"That is one of the points which I want to discuss with you when I have told you the facts," said Ilden, who was always methodical. "At the beginning of the month I happened to be at Ilden for a few days, preparatory to my visit to Kirby. One day I was riding out alone there, when, in one of the lanes, my horse was frightened by the report of a gun behind the hedge. I was riding with a loose rein, and was lighting a cigarette at the moment, and I was nearly thrown; but it did not occur to me that I had been fired at. I noticed no bullet, and I put it down to the act of some idiot who was frightening birds in the fields. My horse had bolted, and, when I got him under control, I did not think of going back. I should have thought nothing more about it, but for what happened afterwards You know that at Kirby one of the keepers was shot in the arm when we were all out potting at the birds."

"Yes, and nobody could decide whose fault it was. You do not mean to say——"

"That it was not the fault of any of the shooting party, and that the shot was meant for me. Marston, the keeper, and I were at the back behind everybody, and the shot came from behind us. And what is more, if it had not found a billet in Marston's forearm it would have had a very good chance of my heart. He had just stretched out his arm to hand me some cartridges, and the fact probably saved my life. But I did not realise that it was a deliberate attempt till afterwards, and I have not suggested it to anybody till now. I imagined that some of the fellows might be straggling behind in the next field. It was after the bullet had been extracted and they found it was of a different pattern from any we were using that the thing became mysterious. At Kirby they have decided that it was fired by some hidden poacher who owed Marston a grudge, and I left the matter undecided in my own mind until this evening. As I was coming home through the fir coppice in the dusk, a shot was fired deliberately at me and missed me by about three inches. Luckily the fellow, whoever he may be, seems a poor shot. I should just like three shots at him under the same conditions. I do not think that he would trouble me again. But if he goes on practising at this rate he will be getting a bull's-eye before long."

Digitized by Google

His light tone did nothing to lessen her consternation. Her plain little face had turned quite white.

"It is terrible," she cried. "And you have never seen who your foe is?"

"No, that is the nuisance. Each time I have been quite unprepared, and to-night is the first time that I have ever realised that the shot was meant for me at the moment, or thought of looking for the gentleman who fired it. And to-night I had no great chance. You see the fellow had an idea of my position and I had none of his, so I could not go searching around without giving him odds."

"And you cannot guess who it is? You cannot have injured anybody?"

"No, I can't remember that I have ever injured anybody."

"Not even unintentionally while you were abroad, some Corsican or Spaniard, or Hindoo? They are always said to be so vindictive."

Ilden laughed.

"You are thinking of the tales you have read. I ought according to them to have robbed a Hindoo temple, or paid an innocent compliment to a jealous Spaniard's wife. But I am afraid that I have not done a single romantic thing during my travels. No, seriously, I feel quite sure that it cannot be revenge for anything I have done. My conscience is quite clear."

"Then why should anyone possibly want to kill you? What motive can anybody have?"

Ilden's eyes met hers suggestively.

"What do you think?"

"I can't think. How could anybody benefit by your death—except——"

She stopped, staring at him with horror-struck eyes. "You do not think——"

Ilden shrugged his shoulders.

"One has to find some motive. Of course I should not mention my suspicion to anybody else. But I know you can be trusted Cathie to keep it to yourself, and I want to talk it over with an unprejudiced person like yourself. And to speak quite openly, I cannot see any possible motive for these attempts except the inheritance."

"You mean that your death would give your uncle Jasper a title, and relieve him from all his money difficulties."

"That is certainly true, but I do not think uncle Jasper has anything to do with it himself. He would not take the trouble. But, unfortunately, Uncle Jasper is far from being the only person who would benefit by my disappearance from the scene. Somebody told me jocularly at Kirby that all the Jews would be glad to see my name in the obituary column."

"The Jews?"

"The money-lenders. They have not much chance of getting back all they have advanced to Uncle Jasper unless he comes into the estate. As a little chap I was very delicate, and all my brothers died in their infancy. So his expectations were worth something. I have defrauded his creditors by growing up strong and healthy."

"And you think that they would try to take your life?" she asked anxiously, and Ilden shrugged his shoulders again.

"Who knows? They are supposed to do anything for money, and they are taking very little risk. And at the rate he is going on our host is likely to kill himself in less than a year, so one can understand their being impatient. Well?"

Catherine had uttered an exclamation.

"I was thinking of something I overheard a few nights ago," she said hesitatingly. "There can be no harm in repeating it when your life is in so much danger. I was passing Mr. Jasper's room and heard his wife evidently in a temper. She does not care who hears her when she is angry, and I could not avoid catching these words as I passed: 'You don't care. But I do, for if you die before him I shall be plain Mrs. Ilden all my life.' I imagined at the time that she was remonstrating with him on the way in which he lives, and the indifference he shows to his health."

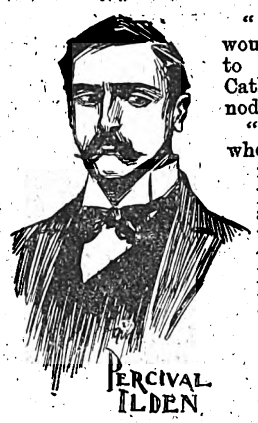
"As she probably was, I scarcely think that even Mrs. Jasper would plot against my life at the top of her voice, although she is not noted for her prudence. Still, it shows that she is another person who has calculated the benefits which would accrue from my death. Let us tot them up before we consider which of them is likely to let the wish affect their affection. We have Uncle Jasper, his wife, and creditors, the last an indefinite army. Then, of course, Uncle Rupert could look forward very confidently to succeeding his brother before long if I were out of the way, and both Percival and Grant would benefit by the change."

"Not Grant," she objected, quickly.

"He would have an increased allowance and be 'the Honourable.' I do not know whether he has any desire for the distinction, but Jane tells me that he is always grumbling about his position, and the fact that he can never afford to marry."

"You have dropped something?" inquired Lord Ilden. "Yes, I have lost two five-pound notes," she answered, in a tone of suppressed anxiety.

Digitized by Google



"But I am quite sure that he would not think of injuring anybody to improve his position," said Catherine warmly, and her cousin nodded.

"I do not suppose that he would, when he would benefit his brother more than himself. It is not a pleasant thing to imagine that any of one's relatives are contemplating murder, but one has to put sentiment on one side and look facts in the face. And the worst of it is that, to tell the brutal truth, one could believe it of any of them. Uncle Jasper would not exert himself to win a crown, but he has allowed himself to sink into such a state that anybody could influence him. His wife has done very little to inspire me with a high opinion of her scrupulousness. Uncle Rupert might do anything for all that I know. I do not understand him, and I can never make out whether he does not care a toss for anything, or feels very deeply and keeps all his emotions to himself. At any rate, I have never known him show a single human one. Then Percival—well, I won't talk about Percival because he has done so much to prejudice me against him. You see that without the money-lenders there are plenty of people to suspect, and while I am investigating I stand a very good chance of being shot, probably by somebody that I have never thought of."

"You ought to leave England," said Catherine, impressed. "It is impossible for you to guard yourself here, when you are so completely in the dark as to your enemy."

Ilden laughed with a touch of bitterness.

"I might be inclined to do so if I had the slightest idea when they would allow me to come back. I don't want to spend my life abroad."

"Of course not. You will want to marry and settle down."

"I have not been conscious of any particular desire to marry until to-night," said Ilden, and Catherine's eyes brightened. There had been some vague talk about a "damsel in distress," forgotten till now in the tragic interest of what her cousin had told her.

"And to-night you met somebody whom you can imagine yourself wishing to marry?" she asked.

Ilden smiled.

"No, I have never met the lady for whom I can imagine myself caring more than I care for you, Cousin Cathie."

"Then why did you think of marrying?"

"Because it would be the best check I could give to the intrigue against me. It must be a matter of the inheritance, and the man, whoever it is, who is trying to kill me, must be excited by the thought that it is only a single life—or at the most, my life and that of two elderly gentlemen—which stands between him and his ambition. If I provide myself with an heir the whole case is altered. The most resolute of villains—and this one acts like a timid coward—would not care to undertake the murder of myself and a family. With every son I have I make my own life of less importance to them."

"I see," she said thoughtfully. "You would checkmate them without even finding out who it is that threatens your life. But—whom can you marry?"

Ilden rose and extended his hands.

"Yourself, of course, dear cousin, if you will do me the honour of accepting me."

Catherine laughed, reddening slightly.

"Do not joke, George. The position is far too serious."

"And I am as serious as the position. I know that it is rather impertinent of me to ask anybody to be my wife, when they have such a good chance of being widowed before the wedding day or, under certain circumstances, of finding even their own life in danger, but I know you would do a good deal to help me."

"I would do anything—except marry you."

"And why not that?" he said, his tone made more earnest by the decisiveness of hers. "We have always been very fond of one another, Cathie."

"Fond of one another? Yes. But you know that you are not in love with me, George—any more than I am with you."

"And you are not fond enough of me to take the risk?"

"The risk is the only thing that could make me think of marrying you. To help you out of your precarious position I believe I would have been your wife, George, if it was only that we weren't exactly in love with each other. But it is not the only thing. So you must think of somebody else."

Ilden was both surprised and piqued, although he was very properly ashamed to have to admit the fact to himself.

Although it had been an understood thing that his cousin and he were only "good friends," he had expected her to be quite ready to change the relationship to something more intimate, and he paid now for his egotism in chagrin.

"No, thanks," he said rather stiffly. "there is no other woman that I should think of asking to be my wife."

Catherine looked concerned.

"You are not in love with me, are you, George?" she asked anxiously.

"More so than with anybody else."

"Oh! that is nothing. I declare that you made me quite frightened. And if you can't checkmate your enemy by marrying, let us think what else you ought to do."

"I am afraid that you cannot help me in any other way. If I had known I should not have bothered you with the business. It will only make you anxious."

To his surprise, she put her arms round his neck and kissed him.

"Don't be angry, George dear. I am really very sorry, but I can't help it. And you must not say that you are sorry you treated me like a friend. Because we are friends, and always shall be, and I for one shan't have a moment's peace until we find out who your enemy is. If you can think of any way in which I can help you to find out, you will let me know, won't you."

He promised, feeling ashamed of his momentary ill-temper, and, leaving her, strolled back to the drawing-room.

Mrs. Jasper met him with the announcement that Percival had been looking for him to bid him "good-bye," and had been obliged to start without doing so to catch his train.

"Who drove him?" asked Ilden, nervously kicking his heel, and before he went to bed that night he walked round to the stables for a chat with the groom who had seen Percival Ilden off.

He felt more at ease in his mind when he was convinced that his cousin had really been seen to depart in the express.

"I think I shall be safe enough here for the present," he said to himself.

CHAPTER III.

The Poison in the Flask.

It was not till he woke in the morning that Ilden remembered again the envelope addressed to himself which he had picked up in the fir coppice, and, as soon as he had dressed, he went in search of the butler.

"Who opens the post-bag in the morning, Wardle?" he asked, and, as he expected, found that the old man reserved the duty for himself.

Digitized by Google

"And does nobody see the letters before you do?" asked Ilden.

"Not as a rule, my lord."

"And when is the rule broken?" asked the young man.

"Well, while Mr. Percival has been here, he has been impatient to get his letters, and has generally looked through the bag for them before I sorted them out, my lord."

Ilden pulled out his envelope.

"I suppose you cannot remember what day it was that I received this?"

The butler examined it thoughtfully.

"No, my lord. I do not remember seeing it at all."

It was all that Ilden wanted to know from him, and he put on his cap for a stroll in the fir coppice before breakfast. It was scarcely to be expected that the inclosure had been thrown away in the same place as the envelope; but George was inclined, as usual, to rely on his luck, and he was curious to examine the scene of his adventure in the daylight.

"Now, if this were only in a tale," he said to himself, as he approached the spot where the shot had been fired, "the fellow would have left some trace behind him by which I could identify him."

But, as usual, actual fact showed itself less kind to detective enterprise than in the story books, and his search produced no more trace of his unknown assailant than of the stolen letter.

The bullet alone remained as evidence of the evening's adventure imbedded in the bark of the tree where it had buried itself. He found it after a considerable amount of searching, and cut it out with his pocket knife to compare at some time or other with another bullet preserved by his friends at Kirby.

He returned to breakfast, wondering whether the stolen letter could have any connection with the plot against his life. If so, it was probable that he had an unknown friend at Lallerton, wherever that might be, who had wished to warn him, and it was significant that, so far as appearances went, it was Percival Ilden who had found it worth while to intercept the warning. It might be as well to spend a few days at Lallerton and give his unknown lady correspondent a chance of giving him her warning by word of mouth.

He was concocting an excuse for leaving Pennybrook a little earlier than he had intended when he reached the Hall, to find his man, Jardine, looking out for him anxiously.

"Something rather strange has happened, my lord, which I thought I ought to let you know at once," he said, and produced from his pocket a glass-cloth burnt and stained as if by some corrosive acid.

"What is that?" said Ilden.

"That is what I can't make out, my lord. But it seems to me very queer, and I thought that you would like to see it. Last night you told me to wash out your pocket-flask and I did it the first thing this morning. There was certainly nothing in it then, and I am quite sure that I washed it out thoroughly. When I had polished it up, I left it standing upside down for any water I might have left in to drain out, and it remained there for some time while I took up your coffee. I did not go back for it until you had left the house, my lord, and then I found it standing the right way up.

"I wondered who had touched it, and shook it out, over this cloth, as it happened, to see whether any drain of water had been left in it, and out came this coloured stuff, my lord. I thought it must be a stupid joke on the part of some of the servants, as one of the maids was reading in the room all the time I was away—although I don't know who would dare to take such a liberty, when they can see whose flask it is—but when I saw that it had eaten a hole into the cloth, I did not know what to think, my lord. If I had not happened to shake it out again before filling it up, you might have been poisoned."

"That is very probable," said Ilden, examining the cloth, "and perhaps I owe my life to your carefulness, Jardine. Where did this happen? In the butler's pantry?"

"In the kitchen, my lord. I stood the flask near the window."

"Was the window open?"

"Yes, my lord. My own idea was that it was done by somebody outside, but the kitchen wasn't left empty at all, I find, while I was away."

"And you are quite sure that the flask was quite clear when you left it?"

"Quite sure, my lord."

Ilden looked thoughtful.

"Either I owe my dear Cousin Percival an apology for my thoughts or he has left an ally behind him at Pennybrook," he said to himself.

"You have not talked about this, I suppose, Jardine?" he asked aloud, and was prepared to find that his valet had shown his usual discretion. He had questioned the servants to ascertain, so far as their assertions went, that not one had touched the flask, but none of them knew what had occurred to make him ask the question.

His master nodded approvingly.

"And have you washed out the flask again?"

"Yes, my lord, I am sorry to say that I cleaned it completely again before I noticed that the cloth was burnt or imagined it anything more than a stupid practical joke."

"That is a pity," said Ilden. "A chemist might have told us what it contained, but perhaps he will be able to judge from the cloth. I will keep that to submit to an analyst. And meanwhile you can pack up my things to catch the ten o'clock train."

"For the Castle, my lord?"

"Yes," said Ilden, although he had not the least intention of returning to Ilden Castle himself for the present.

He was far from being a nervous man, but, except in moments of impulse, he was not foolhardy, and it seemed to him that by remaining at Pennybrook, while he was so completely at sea as to the source of danger which threatened him, he would be making the odds too heavy against himself. If he knew or even suspected who his opponent was, out of the many who would gain by his death, he would have dared him by remaining where he was and trusting to his wit to protect him from any attacks; but to be dogged by an unknown foe while he was making his investigations was too disturbing. He wanted to feel at least a momentary security while he thought over the position and arranged a plan of action.

Against a revolver one may take precautions, but poison is an insidious thing, the danger of which gets on a man's nerves, and he felt no scruple in announcing his immediate departure to Mrs. Jasper, although she made a grievance of it, as he expected. Jealous as she was of the ruling Lord Ilden, it was some satisfaction to her to be able to keep him in her sight.

"I suppose there is a lady in the case," she said, with animosity in her tone, and Ilden smiled in the sphinx-like way that irritated her.

"To some slight extent," he answered, thinking of the unknown correspondent whom he was to try and find at Lallerton.

"And may we know her name?"

"Unfortunately I do not know it myself," he said, amused by her real anxiety; but the smile left his face when she answered:

"Then I think that I can give you the information you want. It is Florence Courthorpe. I hear more than you think.

Digitized by Google

you see," she went on cheerfully, as she noticed the change in his expression; "but I warn you that you will find her a designing minx. She is being sent away from the Rectory because she made a dead set at young Haydon. The impertinence of it—a girl without a penny."

Her nephew was inclined to champion the girl, but thought better of it. The fact that Mrs. Ilden had evidently heard of his meeting with her might be significant.

"I suppose that Percival saw us?" he hazarded, with assumed indifference; but the ex-actress was glad of her chance to be mysterious. It was her turn now.

"Ah! that is my secret," she said, and turned away to spread the news that Ilden was following his cousin's example and leaving them at a moment's notice.

Her husband grumbled good-naturedly, but perfunctorily. The Honourable Rupert, however, surprised his nephew by emerging from his usual taciturn reserve to emphasise his regret. He was a handsome, moody-looking man, whose face, worn by ill-health, expressed an unchanging melancholy. His expression, indeed, never seemed to show any change; but, as if to atone for the fact, his hands were always moving with a restless nervousness which suggested an actual mental disturbance under his appearance of emotionless calm.

His fingers twitched more noticeably than usual, as he took his nephew apart to express his regret at his departure.

"It has been a great pleasure to me to see you again, my boy," he said, in his timid and hesitating manner. "And to see you growing every year more like your dead mother. I don't know whether your father ever told you that we were rivals for her hand as we were rivals for so many other things in our youth."

"No, sir," said Ilden, feeling more and more surprised by this unexpected show of feeling.

"She was the only woman I ever really loved," his uncle went on, his fingers twitching, "and I see her again in you. Perhaps that is why I am fonder of you than of my own sons. But Percival does nothing but disgrace me, and Grant—well, Grant never seems like an Ilden to me with his long hair and his scribbling."

"Cousin Grant's verses are very much admired, and have gained him a considerable reputation," said Ilden, rather perfunctorily, but the poet's father only shrugged his shoulders.

"I was hoping that you would come and stay with us at Mordenhall when you finished your visit here," he said. "I hope this business of yours which is taking you away will not interfere with that."

A few minutes earlier Ilden had been very determined to avoid Mordenhall as studiously as he was going to avoid the home of his other uncle, but Rupert Ilden's unusual and unexpected confidence had touched him, and when he left him it was with a provisional promise to visit him at his home before the end of the year. It was not till they went in to breakfast, and his uncle resumed his usual air of morose taciturnity in the presence of the others, that a suspicion returned to his mind, and he asked himself whether the confidence had not been deliberately intended to win the promise.

It was a relief to talk to Catherine, although he was still feeling not a little piqued at her refusal to marry him. She had come down late to breakfast and hurried through her meal to be able to accompany him to the station.

"I shall not breathe freely until you are out of the place," she said earnestly. "I have been awake all night thinking of your danger. I am sure that you are doing right to leave here at once. You will go abroad, will you not?"

"I do not think it is necessary, and besides I can't simply remain out of the way without doing something to discover who my enemy is. Just at present I shall lie low in some little country place where I know nobody. If anyone of my acquaintances follows, it will give me prima facie evidence against him. If a stranger appears I shall at least be on my guard against him. Here at the Hall there is no chance of telling foes from friends."

"But you will let me know where you are, George," she urged. "I shall be in constant suspense about you, and if I don't hear, shall imagine the worst."

"Then I will drop you a line when I settle anywhere. The first thing at present is to cover my tracks."

He broke into a little laugh as he spoke.

"How ridiculous it all sounds somehow."

"Ridiculous? It is terrible."

"I wish I could think it so. I might enjoy the excitement of this hide-and-seek business then. But somehow I can't help believing that somebody is having a try at my life, and yet directly I think of acting on the suspicion, I feel as though I were pretending to play melodrama."

"But you cannot think too seriously of your danger or take too great precautions after what has passed," she cried, rendered more anxious than ever by his indifference, "although I do not think that it can be one of your relatives who is threatening you. I have been thinking it over all night, and I think it must be a money-lender as you suggest."

"And if you met the money-lenders, you would be quite sure that it was not one of them," said Ilden smiling. "The truth of the matter is that it is impossible to believe nowadays that anybody you know can possibly contemplate murder. Is seems altogether out of date."

They were talking in the breakfast-room where Catherine was finishing her meal alone, and Ilden rose abruptly to walk to the folding French windows and throw them open.

Despite his genuine inability to realise the absolute seriousness of his position, his attention had been keenly on the alert since the discovery of the poison, and it seemed to him that he had heard stealthy footsteps on the gravel path outside.

He was half ashamed of his precipitancy when he found that it was only Grant.

The poet's dark, dreamy face had reddened slightly.

"I was just coming to warn you that you will be losing your train if you do not start now," he said. "I will drive down to the station with you and see you off if I may."

Ilden hesitated.

"Catherine has kindly offered to see me off."

"Well, there is plenty of room in the wagonette unless you want to talk secrets," said Grant, and Catherine answered before her cousin could do so.

"That is just what we are going to do. So you must bid George good-bye while I run and put on my hat. I had no idea it was so late."

Grant's face darkened, and as the girl left them alone together he made scarcely a pretence of friendliness.

Catherine was back in a few moments, and found the two standing in the hall uncomfortably silent.

"My relatives seem very fond of me now that I am going," said Ilden, as he took his seat beside her in the wagonette. "Uncle Rupert has been pressing me most warmly to visit Mordenhall, and Grant seems quite cross at not being permitted to see me off."

There was a touch of irony in his tone, and Catherine reddened.

"You will learn to like Grant when you know him

Digitized by Google

better," she said. "He is quite different from his brother —and sister."

"I hope so," said Ilden. "It is not nice to feel so indifferent to one's own people."

In his own mind he was wondering whether his cousin had really been about to enter the breakfast-room when he threw open the window. His appearance had been rather that of an eavesdropper taken unawares. And why had he wanted to see him off? It was certainly well, he told himself, for him to get away from Pennybrook, when he found himself looking at everybody with suspicious eyes.

As they neared the station Catherine touched his arm.

"I wonder who this man is," she whispered. "I have never seen him before, and I believe I know everybody in Pennybrook by sight now. I have determined to be on the look-out for strangers."

They were overtaking a tall, well-dressed man of about thirty, who was sauntering along the path with hands clasped behind him and eyes downcast, in the attitude of a man deep in thought.

He looked up sharply as the wagonette passed, and Catherine drew involuntarily nearer to her companion as if to shield him.

"I am sure that he recognised you," she said when they were safely past, and she drew a deep sigh of relief. "I really thought that he was going to draw out a revolver and shoot you."

Ilden laughed.

"That is the worst of telling you girls anything. You imagine so much. Of course the fellow stared when he found us both looking at him so closely. I have never seen him before."

"I am sure that he has seen you before, and I did not like the look in his eyes. Should you know him if you saw him again?"

"Certainly. His face was rather striking with its hooked features and wild-looking eyes."

"He did not look like a money-lender," said Cathie, thoughtfully.

"Nor a paid assassin," laughed Ilden. "However, you are right in paying attention to strangers. You might try and find out who he is when I am gone. Although, if I really have anything to fear from him, he is not likely to remain here. It must have been quite apparent to him that I am leaving."

"And he will follow to the station to try and find out where you are going. Do you know, George, I feel horribly nervous about him. You must not give him any chance of shooting you at the station or in the train."

Ilden laughed at her tragic tone.

"I believe he has turned back," he said.

A turn in the road had taken them out of sight of the stranger almost as soon as they passed him, and they had both been looking back expecting him to appear in sight again round the curve. It seemed as though they would look in vain.

"Unless he has taken the short cut to the station across the fields," said Catherine, with undiminished nervousness. "If he does that you will know that it is on your account, George, because he certainly was not hurrying to catch the train when we caught sight of him."

"That is true. You ought to be a detective, Cathie. With you to assist me, we could baffle our enemies. Are you sure that you won't change your mind and marry me?"

"Quite sure, thank you. The man is not in sight yet. He must certainly have turned back, or taken the short cut to the station."

Her desire to change the subject was more marked than he could have wished, and he lapsed into silence until the buildings came in sight.

Catherine uttered an exclamation.

"I was right—he is at the station."

The tall figure which they had seen on the road was just disappearing into the booking-office.

"He must have run all the way through the fields," the girl went on excitedly. "I am sure that we have found your enemy."

"If I thought that," said Ilden, doubtfully, "I should make a point of following the fellow and finding out who he is. I might get at the object of the plot then."

"There will be no need. He is sure to follow you."

"Then I will save him trouble by travelling in the same compartment."

Catherine looked frightened.

"George, you must take care of yourself. It is serious."

"And I am treating it seriously. The man cannot be so dangerous if I keep him in view."

"He may carry a revolver, and try to shoot you in the train."

Ilden tapped his pocket.

"I carry a revolver too, and if he should turn out to be the gentleman with whose shooting I am acquainted, I flatter myself that I am the better shot."

They had reached the station now, and entered the booking-office to find that the stranger had already left it.

"We shall no doubt find him on the platform," said Ilden, leading the way, but it seemed as if the unknown had been anxious to avoid observation. The platform was empty except for the railway officials. The train was standing ready to start. It was waiting indeed only for his lordship and his luggage to be taken aboard and Ilden turned to bid his cousin a hurried "good-bye."

"If I find our friend in the train," he said, "I shall give myself the pleasure of travelling with him, and he turned to walk up the platform.

There were tears in Catherine's eyes. Now that the moment of parting had come she was overcome by the thought of the danger which threatened him. Her eyes followed him as if she were seeing him for the last time, and the picture of his tall handsome figure was blurred and indistinct to her as he made his way by the side of the waiting train glancing with apparent indifference into each compartment as he passed.

Yes, the stranger who was acting so suspiciously had certainly taken his place in a third-class compartment of the train, and Ilden was stretching out his hand to open the door when the movement arrested itself.

For seated opposite to the suspect, and engaged apparently in animated conversation with him, was Florence Courthorpe, 'the lady of the bank-notes,' as he had called her to himself.

(A further long instalment of "A Foe in the Family" will appear in next Tuesday's issue.)

MISS TELLIT: "Do you know I heard to-day that Flossie Fusseigh's engagement ring is paste." Miss Gabbeigh: "Oh, how perfectly lovely and appropriate. You know her fiancé is a bill poster."

CHAPPIE: "I say, Miss Highsail, don't you think my parents made a horrible mistake in calling me Geawge?" Miss Highsail: "Dear me, yes. I think Lucy would have been much more appropriate."

MISS OLIVE: "The gentleman you just recognised is an artist, isn't he?" Miss Claire: "Yes. You divined his profession from his artistic carriage, I presume." "No, I didn't see anything of his carriage. I smelt the turpentine on his clothes."

MRS. NEBB: "I am going to an observation party this afternoon, dear." Husband: "An observation party? What sort of a party is that?" Mrs. Nebb: "Mrs. Quizzer's next door neighbour is moving, and Mrs. Quizzer has invited a few friends to watch through the windows and see what they have."

Digitized by Google

THE OLD, OLD GAME OF HEARTS.

Telling of an Engagement, a Parting, and a Reunion.

If ever a young woman was guiltily distressed and distractedly happy at the same time, that young woman was Marion Towne, when, after being engaged for four contented months to one man, she met another and fell the victim of an immediate infatuation.

She had believed herself to be honestly and unchangeably in love with Ferguson, the first man. The suddenness, the unexpectedness, of this new experience startled, shamed, and overwhelmed her. The fact that her affections could be so easily transferred was an unwelcome revelation. Marion had always insisted that a woman could love but once.

True, she and Ferguson had at the start made a compact—after the manner of would-be sensible lovers—the which provided for such a contingency as this.

"Genuine love is never arbitrary, never selfish," he had said. "Mine for you is so strong, so high, that should you chance, before our engagement terminates, to find another who more nearly fills your heart, I will give you up to him readily, ignoring my own suffering. Your happiness is my first consideration."

Marion had agreed with him that this was the highest love. In fact, she had gone so far as to promise that she would confide in him unhesitatingly should such a change in her heart occur. He had made her a similar promise.

Perhaps the reason for this wonderful unselfishness was the fact that neither one really believed such a change possible. Both felt secure in the certainty of their affinity for each other.

Consequently it was with a palpitating sense of guilt and distress that Marion awoke to the knowledge of the new attraction.

Dick Hollingsworth, the second man, was that type of masculinity which invariably captivates even the women who theoretically despise it.

Marion knew at once that Hollingsworth did not possess Ferguson's fine characteristics—that there was something unstable and unreliable about him. The very fact that he said things to her in the face of her engagement to another was proof of this.

Yet her clear reason was no safeguard against the magic of his fascinating personality.

Marion remembered her promise to Ferguson, but instead of a desire to confide in him she felt only shame and wretchedness at the thought.

It was while she wavered on the brink of a confession one day that he came to her rescue.

"You need not tell me," he interrupted her gently. "I have seen everything—I understand."

How wonderfully magnanimous he was! How tender, how brave, how noble through it all!

Marion, reflecting on it afterwards, could not but marvel. No other man would have done it.

So she was free! Free to let Hollingsworth say things in that daring way of his which had taken her heart by storm. She could meet those magnetic eyes without feeling guilt because of her heart's rushing response.

That very evening she accepted his invitation to the theatre.

Her happiness was not without its mixture of remorse. Her thoughts would revert to Ferguson. Poor boy! How he must suffer! And she—was she heartless, after all?

But no. It would have been worse still to continue the engagement when her love belonged to the other man.

Her meditations were interrupted by an almost audible murmur in her immediate vicinity. The orchestra was playing the overture and people had not yet ceased arriving.

"What a lovely girl!" "Isn't she superb?" "Exquisite."

Marion caught these whispered remarks and indulged her curiosity as much as good breeding would permit. By turning her head very slightly over her left shoulder she had an excellent view of the really beautiful young woman who was just taking a seat in the row behind. Her escort, settling himself beside her, glanced fully into Marion's face.

After the first startled look of unbelief, the girl withdrew her eyes, turned her face towards the stage and stared unseeingly at the rising curtain.

She scarcely knew when or how the first act began. Everything revolved dizzily. Even her thoughts turned round and round and would not steady themselves.

Howard Ferguson was the escort of that beautiful woman! This much flared before her, vividly, indisputable.

Then the rest of the riddle gradually became plain.

No wonder he had been so ready to give her her freedom. No wonder he had been kind, magnanimous, outwardly resigned!

The taste of that freedom was growing strangely bitter. Even the magnetism of Hollingsworth's wonderful eyes failed to compensate. Somehow he seemed trifling and disappointing to-night. More than once she caught him using his orbs for the benefit of fair women who sat within range of their powers. Disgusting! How could she have thought him so fascinating? He could really say little that amounted to anything. His depth was soon sounded. He could grow tiresome.

And Howard? He looked wonderfully handsome this evening. He and that woman made an unusually striking pair. Yes, there was no use denying it. How happy they both seemed!

Marion bit her lip and reflected upon the folly of human beings since time immemorial.

She had occasion to reflect still further when, a week later, Dick Hollingsworth's attentions began to wane. Another pretty face had attracted him.

Occasionally she met Ferguson alone and chatted with him in an effort to be cordial and friendly. They had agreed to remain friends, of course, in spite of changed conditions.

His engagement to the beautiful woman was beginning to be surmised by interested ones. Marion had no doubt of it. She congratulated Ferguson with the privilege of an old acquaintance.

"We are not engaged," he answered quietly; "nor have we any intention of becoming so."

"I—I thought," stammered Marion—"of course she is so very beautiful it would be only natural to imagine that——"

She paused, confused and trying to conceal her gladness at his reply.

"Some one else is beautiful, too," said Ferguson softly. After a moment's hesitation Marion ventured to meet his eyes. They were warm and sweet with the old love.

"Didn't you understand, dear?" he asked. It was easy for him to explain after that.

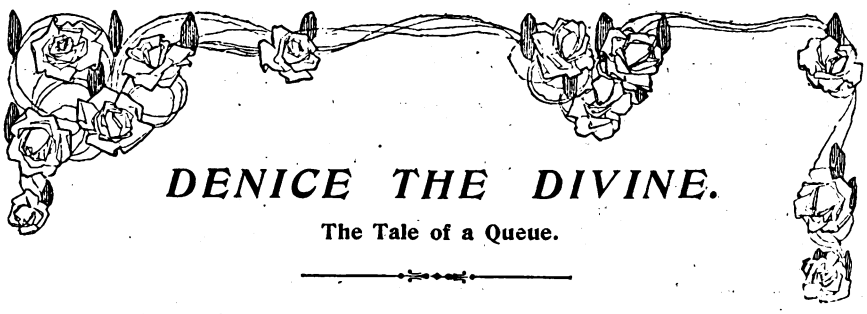
In short, they made it all up and became re-engaged.

Marion declares now that she loves him better for the experience.

"Because," she sagely remarks, "I know the difference between the genuine and the false. The counterfeit can never appeal to me again."

Angela Morgan.

Digitized by Google



DENICE THE DIVINE.

The Tale of a Queue.

"I DON'T know what we shall do if she doesn't turn up!"

"Oh, it'll be all right; there's plenty of time for a rehearsal, even if she shouldn't come till the afternoon."

"Look here, Marston — this confounded 'fit-up'—which I've been running at a loss these six months for your special benefit as 'leading-man'—is just on the point of ruining me. Denice Hope is my last chance. If she fails me, I'm done!"

"Known her long?"

"From a child; and it's because she remembers that I taught her all she knows in the way of stage-craft, that she is throwing up a first-class touring 'lead' to help me through."

"She must be a paragon, then."

"A better hearted girl never breathed."

"And rattlingly clever, too, if her 'notices' are worth anything."

"Clever!—she's a genius, man!—her Lady Teazle is a dream!—her Lady Betty Noel in 'Clancarty' a triumph!"

"Yes, but she isn't going to play 'high comedy' in our show."

"Of course not!—but being what she is, she can play anything she is cast for; and is going to play 'lead' in our melodrama till things improve with us."

"What does the Meade say about it?"

"Oh! Cora Meade quite understands that matters couldn't go on like they've been going lately; that, in fact, it was absolutely impossible that I should continue to suffer by her wretched incompetence."

"What's she going to do?"

"She's done it!—left two hours ago for London; so that you see, should Denice not arrive in time, I haven't even the second-rate article to fall back upon."

The two men—Peyton Edwards, proprietor and manager of the 'fit-up,' and Sidney Marston, his 'leading man'—were standing on the small improvised stage of the little hall, which generally did duty for a theatre in Newton-Tanfield.

The best of 'fit ups' is only a makeshift; but the enterprise engineered by manager Edwards, was, if anything, more of a makeshift than ordinary. The scenery—what there was of it—was deplorably old, and altogether unsuitable to the production, a touring melodrama of the ultra sensational sort. The properties were in the same condition as the scenery; the "company"—with the exception of Sidney Marston—of the more than usually "scratch" order; so that the provincial public were to be pardoned for not assembling in their thousands to enjoy and to applaud.

"Don't you think it a bit of a shame," said Marston presently, "to bring this clever young creature into this? (sweeping his right arm round the dingy place); and all just to bolster up a show which will never run as long as the world lasts."

"I confess you're right, Sid; but the dear girl was so ready to come, and do me this good turn, that, in spite of my conviction, I'm afraid I've deceived myself into looking at things from her point of view."

"And what is that, if I may ask?"

Both men started—they had been standing with their backs to the auditorium—and, turning round, encountered the merriest pair of eyes, set in the sweetest face, that Sidney Marston, for one, had ever seen.

"Is this the way you receive me, Daddy Edwards, after my journey half across England to see you? Why you are dumb!—and I—I am so tired——"

"My dear Denice!—forgive me!—you've improved so out of all knowledge that, as you say, I am literally struck dumb."

"Thanks, most reverend Daddy! your professional offspring dutifully appreciates the compliment."

Then the dainty little lady cast a furtively inquisitive glance at Marston. The manager intercepted it, and forthwith introduced the 'leading man' to the new-comer.

"Marston—this is Denice Hope; our only hope now, if she will not mind my making a bad joke. This, Denice, is Sidney Marston, my 'leading man,' and my friend."

"Mr. Marston—to be Daddy's friend—I have called him 'Daddy' ever since I could speak almost—is the very best recommendation to my good opinion. It may not be worth much, but such as it is, it is entirely at your service."

This was said with a mock curtesy, old-fashioned—sweeping.

As for Sidney Marston, it altogether subjugated him, and he was, from that moment Denice Hope's most devoted slave.

Poor Edwards' spirits, lately so low, were now at exhilaration point.

"Where are you stopping, child?" he said to Denice.

"At the Royal Hotel."

It was the crack inn in Newton-Tanfield; very exclusive, and very expensive.

"Ah! yes!—of course you wouldn't stop anywhere else. Well, you must go and get some lunch at once, and be back here for a rehearsal by three o'clock. I sent you the 'script' of the play, as well as your 'part,' so you'll have a fair idea of A Woman of the World by this time."

"My dear Daddy!—I've got it all at my finger's ends."

"Good!—then we'll see you to the Royal, and leave you to a couple of hours rest and refreshment."

In the street, opposite the side door, a station fly was waiting.

Signing to the driver, Denice was in the act of accepting Sidney's assistance into the carriage, when, turning her head, she saw a well-dressed young fellow; dark featured, and saturnine of expression, watching her a few paces off."

"Good gracious!" she whispered to Marston, "that man has followed me from Newcastle!—he must have come by the same train!"

"Who is he?" asked Sidney and Edwards, in the same breath.

"I don't know! He calls himself Lionel Trevelyan, but I have an idea that it is not his proper name."

The words were scarcely out of her mouth, when the man came up to the carriage door and addressed the actress.

"Miss Hope," he said, in a low voice, and raising his hat, "may I ask if you have a reply for me?"

"If you mean to your letter, sir—certainly not. What do you mean by following me about in this manner! This gentleman (indicating Edwards) is my manager, and any communication you may have to make, let it be to him. Mr. Marston, tell the driver, the Royal, please."

But the intruder would not be so easily baulked of his intention to interview Denice Hope.

"I must have your answer, here, and now!" he excitedly exclaimed, pressing up to the vehicle, and putting both hands upon it.

"Don't you see, sir," said Sidney Marston, angrily, "that the lady declines to listen to you?"

"I do not know you, sir—and my business is with Miss Hope—not with you."

"Mr. Trevelyan—I have nothing to say to you, now, or at any future time."

Digitized by Google

"Is that so?"

"You hear what the lady says," said Marston. "You are annoying her, and if you persist, I shall call a policeman."

It so happened that one of the few constables in the town strolled up at this point.

A word or two of explanation from Edwards, and Lionel Trevelyan was politely but firmly requested by the law's representative to fall back and allow the carriage to proceed.

On the way to the hotel, Denice explained that for months this man, who, both by word of mouth, when opportunity offered, and by a ceaseless succession of letters, made fierce love to her; asking her, indeed, to marry him at almost a moment's notice.

It had become a veritable persecution, and she had hoped that her present destination had been kept so secret that he would not be able to follow her.

Most young actresses have their outside admirers, but this was getting serious, inasmuch as it was getting on her nerves.

The rehearsal at three o'clock passed off without any further trouble in this direction, Sidney Marston taking upon himself, at the manager's request, to safely see Denice back to her hotel.

Neither of them saw a dark-browed, evil-expressioned man shadowing them from a safe distance.

Although Sidney Marston was undeniably smitten with the charms of the fair Denice, called in every big town on the northern circuit, "Denice, the Divine," the conversation of the actor and the actress was of the most commonplace and conventional character.

The shadower, however, evidently thought otherwise, for he spasmodically clenched his hands, and muttered unintelligibly.

Sidney parted from his companion at the hotel entrance, and turned immediately to retrace his steps.

This, in a dozen yards or so, brought him face to face with Trevelyan.

Whether it was his new-born interest in Denice that prompted him; or whether it was just an idea with him, that the stranger was taking an unwarrantable liberty in forcing his unwelcome attentions upon the actress, Marston peremptorily stayed him, and gave him a bit of his mind.

"Look here, Mr. Trevelyan—if that is your name—I don't want to threaten you; but if I catch you molesting or annoying Miss Hope in any way, I promise you it will not be good for you. Good morning."

Big and stalwart, Sidney Marston looked down upon the slighter figure of the other, and contemptuously sought to impress his meaning, by an emphatic marking time with his forefinger on the breast of Trevelyan's coat.

Beyond, a still more scorching gleam in the latter's eyes, he made no sign—did not speak a word.

His object gained, Marston passed on up the street; Trevelyan, his head turned, looking after him, the same evil expression in his eyes.

The first night of Denice Hope's appearance, though the audience was small, the enthusiasm was great. The next evening the house could have been filled three times over.

Edwards was jubilant, and saw that the end of the week would, if the good business continued, put him well upon his financial feet.

At curtain-fall on the third night Marston remained on the stage a minute or two, talking to Denice.

"There is a lovely place, about three miles out of the town, I should like to show you, if I may, to-morrow. What do you say; if it's fine, will you walk as far with me?"

She would; her ready acquiescence sending a thrill through him, as he thought and wondered whether it meant mere liking, or something of a warmer nature.

Actors, by very reason of their calling, are, as a class, given to self-consciousness; but Sidney Marston was a peculiar exception to this rule. In the three days during which he had known Denice, he could not disguise from himself that he loved her, but that she had a similar feeling for himself he did not dare to imagine. Put the matter to the test, he felt he soon must, even at the risk of an adverse result.

To his friend Edwards he said not a word; he feared discouragement in that quarter, and determined to act entirely upon his own initiative, and keep his own counsel.

As luck would have it, he was the last to leave the building that night. He was in no particular hurry, and dressed himself in leisurely fashion.

It was a very dark night, and as he stood for a moment in the doorway, the glow of his cigar lighted up his features in a weird way, suggestive of the fiend in Faust.

Half past eleven chimed from the clock in the market-place.

There was not a soul to be seen in the street; everything was silent as the grave.

Suddenly a report rang out from a doorway on the other side of the street, and Sidney Marston fell on his face on to the pavement, with a revolver bullet in his right breast.

* * * * *

Two and a half years later, a big crowd was assembled outside a certain fashionable theatre in the West End of London.

Away from the pit doors the "queue" extended, three deep, down a side street, till the head of it could scarcely see the tail.

Taken altogether, it was an orderly "queue," only one individual providing a discordant note.

This was a man who, a late comer, contrived to elude the vigilance of the police who kept the line, and to insinuate himself gradually towards the head of the string of waiting people.

Some resented the unfair action, others, women mostly, mildly protested, but ultimately gave way.

By this means, the man had got to within a dozen rows of the door, when unable to advance any further forward, he remained.

He was a dark-featured man, of middle height, spare, and restless of manner.

The stage-door of this particular house was situated at the point where the man stood; the crowd being broken to allow of the passage of the players.

The play was Romeo and Juliet, with Denice Hope, and Sidney Marston in the title rôles.

For a month after the attempt on his life, Sidney Marston lay very near to death; then, the bullet extracted, he took a turn for the better, and rapidly recovered.

Without his 'leading man,' Edwards was again helpless, and in despair disbanded his company, and threw up the sponge.

Denice Hope, however, remained in Newton-Tanfield until the crisis was past with Sidney. The result may be imagined.

One day, with the doctor, appeared a vision, who, vision-like, would not speak, but smiled at the patient, so that, when she had vanished, he declared himself to be nearly well.

It certainly helped the consummation on wonderfully, as in another six weeks he was ready for work again.

In the Era he saw that "juvenile lead" was required in the touring company in which he knew that Denice Hope was principal lady.

To write in and apply for the vacancy was the work of five minutes, and when, three days after he was requested to join at Bradford, he could have shouted for very gladness.

The rest of it is in a nutshell.

The two brought together in such tragic fashion (for both were convinced that it was Trevelyan's hand that had fired the shot) soon came to a perfect understanding, the inevitable result being, later on, one of the prettiest of theatrical weddings in Manchester Cathedral.

By leaps and bounds, the actress came to the front, bearing her mate with her, until, at the time, she was enthralling Londoners with the magic of her genius.

It was with the greatest difficulty that the police could keep the space in front of the stage-door clear.

More than once the intrusively pushing man had been officially given to understand, that if he did not keep in his place he would be removed.

For a time he was quiet. Then, a carriage drove up, out of which a gentleman handed a lady.

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY COMPETITION.

ANOTHER OPPORTUNITY FOR YOU TO WIN ONE OF THE TEN HANDSOME GRAMOPHONES OFFERED.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

The picture on this page illustrates a certain sentence in this week's instalment of our powerful new serial "A Foe in the Family." All you have to do is to read the instalment carefully, and to write under the picture the sentence which you think is illustrated by the sketch. Ten splendid Gramophones will be awarded to readers whose correct solutions are posted to us soonest after the publication of this number of Short Stories.

Sentence:	Page .....
.....	Column .....
.....	Line .....

In order that all our readers shall have an equal chance of winning these handsome prizes, we have decided to distribute the Gramophones over the British Isles thus:

Two Gramophones will be won by readers living in the London postal district whose correct solutions are posted first.

Two Gramophones will be awarded to readers living within 100 miles of London.

Two to those English readers living over 100 miles from London.

Two to Scottish readers sending in correct solutions and two to those living in Ireland.

When you have found the sentence write it down in the space below the picture, together with the number of the page, the column, and the line. Then put your name and address in the space provided, cut out this page and post it to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Mark your envelope in the top left corner with the name of your postal town, and the time of posting, thus: MANCHESTER. 2.45 p.m. Then post it at once.

Name..... Address.....

Quickly she passed through the swing doors, her companion, after a few words to the coachman, making to follow her.

Shaking himself free of those who would have held him back, the dark-featured man, his eyes alight with an insane glitter, moved out and stood in the doorway, barring the way to the actor.

"Trevelyan!" exclaimed the latter.

"Yes, coward!—Trevelyan!" almost shrieked the unfortunate man.

The words were scarcely out of his lips, when two constables seized him and bore him away; Sidney Marston, whispering to the officers that, as soon as his duty was done, he would visit the station.

At midnight he was there informed that the man had been removed to a hospital whither, early the next morning, he went.

Trevelyan was then near the end, but quite sane.

His voice was wonderfully distinct as he asked Sidney, who bent over him, to let him see the face of "Denice the Divine," just once more.

"Who am I that I should deny him?" said Sidney to himself.

A telegram dispatched to Sloane Street brought the actress to the hospital in less than an hour.

When she arrived, Trevelyan was speechless, but the light in his eyes was no longer evil, as, taking the hand she extended to him between his own two wasted ones, he kissed it reverently, smiled, as if he were quite satisfied, and fell back dead.

"Poor fellow!" said Denice to her husband as they drove home, "I suppose, in his own way, he loved me."

"I suppose so," Sidney answered her.

Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google

THE TWO PARMENTERS.

The Tale of Two Thefts.

Down the long gravel path, noting the progress of her beloved flowers, sauntered Lady Mayland, smiling as she went.

Everything was bright and fresh and genial. A refreshing summer shower had come and gone, and old Sol, already far on his way to the west, was merrily chasing away the clouds that they might not stay to veil the glory of his reflection on the gentle moon.

Lady Mayland was very happy. Every afternoon, when she heard the grandfather's clock in the hall strike six, there was a gentle flutter at her heart. For any time after six her boy might come back from town. She was foolishly fond of her two big sons—the elder a busy solicitor in London, the other separated by three thousand miles of land and three thousand miles of sea, farming fruits in the Far West.

The Cedars, although in a suburb of London, was a fine old house, standing back from the busy road. Behind were several acres of lawns and flowers and shrubberies, and an old-fashioned orchard that might have been lifted from the side of some Devonshire lane and dropped by mistake within six miles of the Metropolis.

To a little summer-house, nestling away in the further corner of the grounds, Lady Mayland turned her steps, stopping to gather a flower for her boy, and getting her white hands soaked for her pains, for on flower and leaf and stem the raindrops were still quivering like quicksilver in the evening light.

Tea was already laid in the pretty arbour, with its thatch of scented briar and honeysuckle, and the silver teapot murmured softly to itself, like an old hen, surrounded by its brood of cups and saucers.

Cyril was only ten minutes later than usual, but Lady Mayland was quite anxious by the time she heard the joyous bark of Hector as he welcomed his master home, and, after a moment, a hurried step coming up the path.

She drew the tray a little nearer, making a gentle fuss over the spoons, and a moment later a tall young man walked gaily in, swinging an evening paper. He placed his hands caressingly on her shoulder, and stooped to kiss each cheek.

"Why, mother," he said, looking down into her eyes with a loving stare, "you look unusually happy, even for you. Have some more of your chickens hatched?"

Lady Mayland laughed softly.

"Something better than that, Cyril!" she answered gaily, and then, with a touch of reproof, "do you think your mother's only delight is in her chickens?"

"Oh, it's to do with the garden, is it?" asked Cyril provokingly. "Has another chrysanthemum cutting begun to sprout?"

"What a tease you are, you naughty boy!" said Lady Mayland. "No, my news is even better than that. Charlie is coming home."

Tears of joy quivered in her eyes, but Cyril jumped up and kissed them away before they had time to overflow.

"Oh, I am so glad—the villain! It's years and years and years since we have seen him!"

"He is bringing a friend with him," Lady Mayland continued, as her son released her again. "Some man who first saved his life when he had that cruel fever, and afterwards was stricken down with it himself."

"How romantic!" remarked Cyril, devouring sardine sandwiches. "And then Charlie nursed him back to life, and they both owe one another the biggest debt in this world that mankind can incur."

"Charlie is the more deeply involved of the two," answered Lady Mayland, smiling; "it was for his sake the other man incurred his debt."

"That's so, mother mine," Cyril assented. "We must do all we can to free Charlie by devoting ourselves to his friend. I wonder what he will be like?"

Lady Mayland brought out a letter written in a big, boyish scrawl, and read it aloud in her sweet voice, dwelling fondly on some short, ungrammatical passages, so characteristic of the writer, while Cyril finished off the good things spread before him.

"So you see," she said, as she carefully refolded the letter, "they will come by the next boat. They would have arrived in England to-day, but for that tiresome business keeping Charlie in New York."

"Arthur Parmenter, what a curious name!" mused Cyril. "Don't we know someone of that name, mother?"

"No, my dear, I think not," answered his mother; and then they got up and went towards the house.

Dinner over, Cyril followed his mother at once into the drawing-room.

"By the way," he said, wheeling his chair up to his mother's and opening the old-fashioned backgammon-board, "tell me about the burglary at the Rimmels' last night."

"At the Rimmels'!" cried Lady Mayland, with a little start. "You don't mean to say that they have been robbed?"

"That's just like London!" answered Cyril, shaking the dice. "Here you are separated from your next-door neighbour by a low, oak fence, and you don't even know when they're burgled. Here have I been up in town all day, and yet I know more than you. I brought you the Globe home to show you the account, but your exciting news made me forget all about it. It was three o'clock this morning, and they took plate and jewellery altogether worth three or four thousand pounds."

"My dear Cyril, how very terrible!" Lady Mayland cried; but she did not finish her sentence, for at that moment the door opened noiselessly, and the old butler, steeped to the roots of his snowy hair in respectability, entered the room.

In his hand he held a silver tray, and on it a card and a letter.

"'Arthur Parmenter'!" she cried, looking at the card. "Heavens, can anything have happened to Charlie?"

She tore open the envelope, Cyril looking over her shoulder, but immediately her fears proved groundless. It was a letter, dictated in some typewriting office, and signed hastily with the initials "C. M."

It was to say that a New York doctor had said Arthur Parmenter must not stay in that city another day, and so had shipped him off by the City of Paris, and he didn't know whether he would arrive before his letter or afterwards. "Receive my forerunner as if he were your own son," the letter ended, "and remember I am just on the track, and that it it had not been for him I should not be alive now. He is a dear, good fellow. 'C. M.'"

"Is Mr. Parmenter here now?" Lady Mayland asked.

"Yes, mum."

"Then show him in at once, and take his things up to the spare bedroom."

Lady Mayland rose, and sailed towards the door with a motherly greeting on her trembling lips, for her son's saviour was very dear to her.

Cyril shut up the backgammon-board, and followed her into the hall.

Digitized by Google

The first greetings over, Lady Mayland immediately asked :

"And how is Charlie ? You must tell me all about him !"

Parmenter smiled.

"It's strictly against orders, and I dare not disobey," he answered. "Charlie made me vow I would not spoil his coming home by telling all the news. He's bursting with interesting information."

"And he's quite well ?" asked Lady Mayland rather anxiously.

Parmenter soon satisfied her on this point. Charlie had never looked so well all the time he had known him, as when he saw him off on the City of Paris.

And so the evening passed, all three in the highest spirits. Arthur had indeed made a most favourable impression.

"I can quite understand Charlie's love for him !" whispered Lady Mayland to Cyril as they said good-night on the landing. "He's a dear boy !"

Three days passed very happily and quietly. There was a flutter of suppressed excitement about the whole house. There was Charlie's room to be got ready, his books to be put out, and he had asked for some clothes to be ordered from his tailor.

"I'm going about in my pyjamas and the top of a dressing gown with the ends cut off for a jacket," he wrote. "I am afraid even Denmark Hill might be shocked to see me dressed like that ; but they don't mind out here."

It was Thursday, and on Monday he would arrive.

"This is the day of Lady Greenfell's ball," remarked Cyril at breakfast, as he opened his letters. "Are you going to chaperon your son, mother ?"

Lady Mayland looked round the great silver urn. "I'm getting too old for such dissipation," she replied, knowing how well he would immediately contradict her.

"That's right !" Cyril said a moment later, the inevitable assent obtained. Then, turning to Parmenter.

"Won't you come, too ? They are always glad to get men, even in London, and it would be a charge for you after a Californian hop."

Arthur Parmenter smiled. He was very handsome, and knew it. "It's against orders," he said, his eyes twinkling. "I'm afraid I mustn't. I'll stop at home and look after the house."

Cyril was obviously disappointed. "What a pity ! I'd like you to see the mater in her war-paint," he said, looking towards his mother with much pardonable pride. "She's ripping in her diamonds. You've no idea. You hear men saying, 'Hullo, who's that girl ? I don't think I know her !' And——"

"Cyril, Cyril !" said Lady Mayland, intreatingly, while the tiniest blush coloured her cheeks. "You must forgive him, Mr. Parmenter," turning to her guest. "We are very fond of one another." This with such an apologetic air that they all laughed.

Cyril had exaggerated nothing in saying that his mother looked ripping in her war-paint. At least so Arthur Parmenter thought as he handed her into her carriage. No one could help admiring those diamonds which had been in the family for years, and no one could wear such treasures with better grace than Lady Mayland.

The ball proved a great success. When about half-way through the programme, a strange gentleman, with long, black hair and a dark moustache, touched Cyril on the arm.

"Excuse my introducing myself," he said in a pleasant voice, which seemed familiar to Cyril ; "I believe you have a nephew of mine staying with you, Arthur Parmenter. I heard of his whereabouts by letter to-day. Perhaps you will say you met Colonel Falbrook."

"Certainly !" answered Cyril pleasantly. "Let me introduce you to my mother ; she is sitting over there, and can tell you more about Parmenter than I can. They are great pals."

They crossed the room together, Lady Mayland gladly making room for her friend's uncle on the sofa. There Cyril left them together.

It was not until they were driving home that Lady Mayland suddenly put her hand to her neck with a little cry.

"My diamonds, Cyril, they are gone !"

Cyril bent down on his knees and groped about on the carriage floor, but they certainly were not there.

He did what he could to comfort his mother. They were bound to be all right, and Lady Greenfell would know them at once if they were picked up in the house. Diamonds like that couldn't mysteriously disappear.

And so they arrived at the Cedars. Arthur Parmenter was waiting to let them in. He was very grieved to hear of the loss of the diamonds, but was so confident they would be recovered that Lady Mayland went upstairs comforted.

Cyril, however, was really very worried, for the necklace was an old family relic and of enormous value. Next morning, after breakfast, he took his friend's arm and strolled out into the garden discussing the lost diamonds.

"I believe even ladies sometimes stoop to that kind of theft," said Parmenter, lighting his cigar. "And if some dowager duchess has taken the stones, there will be little chance of recovering them again."

Cyril moodily assented. Then he said suddenly :

"By the way, it was a great pity you did not come last night in spite of your doctor. I met an uncle of yours, who asked to be remembered to you—Colonel Falbrook by name."

"Oh, yes," Parmenter answered, without much warmth. "I don't know much of him. I wonder how in the world he knew I was here ?"

Then he suddenly paused.

"Are you sure you have not got hold of the wrong name ?" he asked.

"Quite," Cyril answered. He laughed, but felt uneasy, but did not know why.

"Well, Uncle Falbrook is in Paris to-night. There is an extraordinary meeting of the company of which he is a director. I saw it in the evening paper. I say, what was your friend like ?"

"Poetical, long hair, dark moustache, and lisped," answered Cyril sententiously, and smiling again at the other's eagerness.

"Yes, and Uncle Falbrook is bald," answered Parmenter, a peculiar expression overcoming his face. "I tell you what—that's your burglar ! How those rascals get to know things Heaven only knows !"

There could be no doubt about it.

"Don't say anything to the mater about your suspicions," said Cyril, as they parted.

The next day being Friday, Parmenter went up to town with Cyril, both talking confidently about recovering the lost diamonds, and setting Lady Mayland's mind entirely at rest.

Lady Mayland found the day pass very slowly until her son returned, looking very tired and worried, without Parmenter and without any news of the stolen jewels.

"I lost sight of Charlie's friend in Regent Street," he said lightly, although he already had his suspicions. "He will be here by the later train." But he was not surprised to find he was mistaken.

Three days later Charlie turned up and brought with him Mr. Parmenter. But he was a very different Mr. Parmenter from the gentleman who had been entertained for a week at the Cedars.

This was the secret of the thing. Caxton, the great jewel-robber, the "detective's fiend," as he was called in the profession, on account of his astuteness, had hidden himself in Lady Mayland's garden after clearing out the Rimmel's. While hiding there he heard her ladyship reading her son's letter in the arbour, and then the bold idea of personating the invalid friend entered his ever-ready head. He had some cards printed at a cheap lithographers, and then presented himself at the front door with a type-written letter of introduction.

There was no doubt the whole thing was superlatively clever and plucky, especially the way in which he had removed all possible suspicion from himself until he was well out of reach, by robbing Lady Mayland out of her own house and under the disguise of Colonel Falbrook. But he confessed afterwards it was all he could do to get back first, and to leave and re-enter the Cedars without disturbing the servants. L. Payne.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. FRANCES NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA HAMILTON .	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.
CASELLIS	A man from Jamaica who knows Mrs. Norton's past history.

Frances Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia Hamilton: Her companion.

NEW READERS START HERE.

HAVING arrived in England from a Bruges convent to be companion to my cousin, Frances Norton, I soon discovered that my cousin was taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money were lost and won. The climax came one night when Mary Vernon staked her diamond earrings (a gift from Lord Kinross), and one of the onlookers found them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton.

A few weeks later, my cousin stole a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew, an American millionaire, at the Café Regal.

We next moved into a house in Pont Street, where Sir John Strickland proposed to Frankie, and was refused.

Later on Lord Kinross called at Pont Street for a private interview, during which Percival Hope entered the room unannounced, and made the startling statement that Mary Vernon had discovered the thief who stole her diamonds, and that in a fortnight's time he would prove that Frankie was an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends.

The next evening Lady Gaveston, Frankie's chaperon, informed her that she didn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decided at once either to marry or refuse him, she would return to Scotland. My cousin was given a fortnight's grace in which to make up her mind.

We went to the Derby, where Mrs. Curtis-Blount, instigated by jealousy, enticed me to bet heavily, by which I lost £800. Frankie also lost heavily, and to pay our debts, she prevailed upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000.

That same night, at the Duchess of Warminster's ball my cousin came face to face with Casellis, a man from Jamaica, who knew all about her past life. Percival Hope brought him in. It was a critical moment, but once again Frankie scored, for she managed to buy his silence.

The next day marked the end of the fortnight, during which Hope was to obtain proofs of Frankie's guilt. Owing, however, to Frankie's ingenuity, the indictment failed miserably. Kinross then formally asked Frankie to be his wife. They were still in conversation when Sir John Strickland arrived. He had not heard of Frankie's engagement.

Before I could stop him he had gone into the room where my cousin and Kinross were talking. At sight of them he staggered and fell. Doctors pronounced it to be a paralytic seizure.

Frankie being in a desperate strait, then got a large sum of money by worming a state secret out of Dollie Grendale, the wife of an M.P., and selling it to Pettigrew.

Frankie's next adventure was to drug an American billiard player, whose opponent she had backed heavily. When alone she was accused by Pettigrew, who swore to condemn her before the whole world. She secured his silence by managing to be found in his embrace by Lord Chesterton.

My cousin at this time met a Hungarian attaché, and fell violently in love with him. One day Lord Kinross called, and Frankie was nowhere to be found. Fearing she contemplated eloping with the attaché, Lady Gaveston determined to find her.

Digitized by Google

VON ESSLER MEETS HIS MATCH.

I did not dare to question Lady Gaveston as to where we were going, but leant back in the corner of the carriage, miserable as could be. Her ladyship sat bolt upright, her mouth shut so tight that it reminded me of a steel trap. I had not heard the directions she had given the coachman; but, as we drove up Piccadilly and neared St. James' Street, I realised that our destination was Von Essler's flat.

I shivered with apprehension as the carriage stopped, following milady up the stairs with a sinking heart. There was going to be a terrible struggle between Frankie and her chaperon; and though, for my cousin's sake, I hoped Lady Gaveston would get her own way, still I felt sorry. Suppose, after all, Frankie declined to give up the Hungarian and persisted in marrying him in defiance of Kinross, the Gaveston and conventionality? I caught my breath at the bare idea.

Her ladyship gave a sharp, short, severe knock at the door. There was quite a long interval before anyone opened it. Just as milady was about to pull the bell, however, Von Essler's valet appeared.

"His master was engaged; he was, in fact, about to start for the Continent. Any message or——"

Lady Gaveston brushed both the man and his protestations aside, and calmly walked unannounced into the dining-room. I followed close behind.

Frankie and Von Essler were finishing dinner. Hat boxes and wraps were scattered round the room, the usual impedimenta of travelling. My cousin wore a dark tweed gown, and her cloak, lined with sable, hung over a chair.

I grew pale as I noted these things—signs and portents of a journey.

"Lady Gaveston," said my cousin, rising as we entered—"and Cynthia! I am glad to see you, dear, and you, too," and she smiled at milady.

The descendant of the Scotch Covenanters, however, was not to be softened by sweet words or smiles. She had come to give battle, and went straight to the point. Ignoring Von Essler's outstretched hand, she motioned to the clock.

"Do you see the time?" she said. "It's a quarter to eleven."

"I did not know it was so late," said Frankie. "We must make haste, Reichardt, or we shall be late. You see, dear"—it was Lady Gaveston she addressed in this surprised fashion—"Von Essler and I are leaving for the Continent to-night. We're running away to get married. I know I ought to have told you; it's too bad to have kept you and little Cynthia in ignorance. But," she laid her hand on milady's shoulder and gazed appealingly in her eyes, "it is so hard to explain," she said. "Won't you take things for granted, Lady Gaveston? Scold me if you like, but let me go quietly and in peace."

Her ladyship remained immovable, staring her down with cold, stern eyes.

"I have arranged for you to receive a letter and inclosure from me in the morning," Frankie added. "My banker has received instructions to that effect. As for Cynthia, I thought perhaps she'd stay in Pont Street till I send for her. I—I——" She paused. There was something almost terrifying in Lady Gaveston's silence. "I don't think there's anything else to say," she went on hurriedly, "except to thank you for the kindness, and perhaps I should add, forbearance, you have shown me during the last six months."

She paused. Milady gave a peculiar rasping kind of cough. Then:

"Have you said all you wish me to hear, Frances?" she asked.

"Yes, I think so."

"Then I must trouble you to listen to me. Will you explain how it is that you, who are engaged to marry Lord Kinross in a matter of six weeks' time, how it is, I say, that you are here in this man's rooms"—she pointed contemptuously at the Hungarian—"at eleven o'clock at night?"

Von Essler sprang forward to answer her, but Frankie quickly interposed.

"I have already told you that Reichardt and I are going to get married. We prefer to have the ceremony performed quietly in Paris, and so escape the talk, the gossip, that would get about if we were married here!"

"Married!" said Milady scornfully. "How do you know he's in a position to take a wife?"

The question seemed to goad the Hungarian to fury. He turned white with rage.

"Do not listen to the croaking of this ill-omened woman!" he said crossing over to my cousin. "She cannot stop you, beloved, you are mine, you are pledged to come with me, and you are coming. Why remain to hear her insults and her gibes? Come"—he threw open the door—"let us leave her in possession of the field. We must hurry, you and I, or we shall be too late."

He spoke rapidly, but his voice was unsteady. He glanced vindictively yet apprehensively at Lady Gaveston. He seemed half fearful of what she might be going to say.

"Come!" he placed his arm protectingly about my cousin's shoulders, and moved her through the door.

"Reichardt!" said Frankie appealingly. Then: "Well, if it must be, I will go!" She kissed her hand to me, linking her arm in his. Together they crossed the threshold, a moment later and the door would have closed—closed behind them—when Lady Gaveston lifted her voice in recall.

"Go but a step further," she said, "and I will summon those that will enforce your return. Aye," as Reichardt faced her with a sneer, "I mean it—the ill-omened woman has still some influence in high places. The widow of Travers Gaveston is not lightly to be set aside. Listen to me here, or," she pointed an accusing finger, "I go now this minute to the Austrian Embassy. They will hear with patience what I shall have to tell them."

Von Essler hesitated. He grew even paler, and caught his underlip between his strong white teeth.

"We had better hear her, dearest," he said, "or she may make a scene. Lady Gaveston," he turned abruptly, "I will listen to you for five minutes, at the end of that time——" he shrugged significantly, and took out his watch. "Time presses, I must ask you to make haste."

Milady turned to Frankie.

"You prefer to go away with this stranger rather than remain and be respectably married to an English gentleman?"

Frankie nodded.

"Yes," she said softly, "it sounds foolish for me to say so, Lady Gaveston, but I'm ready to give up everything for Reichardt."

"Has he told you that marriage with you would necessitate his giving up his career in the diplomatic service, your rank not being equal to his?"

"Yes," Frankie sighed; "but he won't mind that!" and she smiled radiantly.

"Has he told you," milady asked again, "that his father will not only disinherit him if he marries you, but cut off his allowance?"

"I gathered as much," Frankie said softly.

"Has he told you," the relentless questioner went on, "he is entirely dependent on that allowance, and that without it he will be penniless?"

Frankie darted an eager look at Von Essler.

"You should have told me, dear," she said. "I did not know you were giving up so much as that. But," she turned to milady, "Reichart has friends and influence; he will soon get an appointment. And I——" She paused, a touch dismayed.

"And you imagine, I suppose," her ladyship sneered, "that you are the sort of woman who could patiently endure poverty, provided it was seasoned with love! You, whose extravagant whims are a bye-word even among your thriftless companions. You have lost your senses, Frances!"

"Not quite, Lady Gaveston. What I have in the bank, together with my jewels, comes to about £10,000. Reichardt has nearly as much. We can make a tolerable show on £20,000 for a year if we live abroad. At the end of that time"—she smiled and threw out her hands—"Von Essler's father will have relented, or a beneficent government will have found Reichardt a lucrative position. For the present I can only see a year ahead—a year!" She turned to Reichardt with a look of trust, of confidence, of love such as I had never before seen on Frankie's face.

Digitized by Google

TURN TO THE FIRST PAGE FOR OUR NEW SERIAL, "A FOE IN THE FAMILY."

"And now, I think," she went on gently, "the five minutes must be up. You have seen for yourself that Reichardt has not deceived me, he has told me exactly how matters will stand between him and his family if he marries me. But he is content to take the risk, and I——"

"You will never be Von Essler's wife, Frances," said her Ladyship firmly, "never."

"Why?" My cousin looked startled and came close to Lady Gaveston.

Milady paused.

"You're a vain and worldly, and I fear a godless woman, Frances," she said at last. "I make no doubt the Lord will chasten you in his own good time. But I'm loth to forestall Providence, therefore I would refrain from answering your question."

"But you must answer it. No," as Reichardt strove to interfere, "there's something behind all this, something I will, I must understand. What do you mean? Answer me? I will be told."

Lady Gaveston's grim face softened, and her figure, rigid and upright, relaxed.

"My dear," she said—it was the only time she ever called my cousin "dear"—"I am sorry for you. But if you will know I cannot refuse to answer. You cannot marry Von Essler because he already has a wife!"

Frankie put out her hands and clutched the table; her face lost all its colour, it seemed to turn quite grey."

"No," she said, "not that. Reichardt——"

"Do you suppose," Lady Gaveston went on coldly, contemptuously, "that a man like Von Essler would give up place, position, wealth, the obligations that society imposes on a man like him, for the sake of what you're pleased to term 'love'? You were not a child, Frances, to believe such nonsense."

"But this is true. Reichardt, tell her it's true. Say you are not married, that it's a mistake, that you have no wife, Reichardt!"

He came at her call, soothing her by word and gesture. But when he put his arms about her, to draw her trembling to his side, my cousin put him from her.

"No," she said, "no. Not till you've told me if what Lady Gaveston said is true. Have you a wife?"

Von Essler flushed. "I have," he said between his teeth.

"When did you marry her?"

The Hungarian hesitated. "Is it needful to go into further details?" he said quietly, almost humbly.

"I insist on knowing," was the answer. "When did you marry her?"

"Some two years back. She is very wealthy, the match was arranged by our respective families. Neither of us had much voice in the matter. But you—I love you passionately, adoringly."

For a moment my cousin stood irresolute. Then as the meaning of all that he had said came home to her, as she realised the baseness, the selfishness of the man for whom she had been ready to sacrifice so much, she started forward and tightly clasped him by the arms.

"Before Heaven," she said hoarsely, "you have no conscience; you're hard, hard, callous, and cruel. You vowed you loved me. You left me no peace, no rest, until I'd sworn to throw over home, friends, the man I'd promised to marry, for your sake. And all the time you were playing a part. You, who vowed I should never regret the step you persuaded me to take. You, who vowed you would love me for ever—for ever. My God"—she threw out her hands in an agony of suffering. "To think I should have believed so base, so mean a thing as you. To think I should have sorrowed I was not more worthy of your love. To think I should have been so blind, so infatuated as not to realise what you were. Love! You don't know the meaning of the word. Self, self, and self again is all you think of, is all you understand. Oh, I am punished indeed for having put aside my worldly wisdom. Think of it, I"—she gave a scornful, bitter laugh—"I to imagine the world well lost for love! What have I to do with love?" Her face changed, she fell back, and for a moment there was silence in the room, silence save for her quick, distressful breathing.

Leaning against the sideboard, her face ashen, her lips white, she stared before her with eyes wide with a helpless, a hopeless despair.

Von Essler, thinking the storm was over, and that the calm that had ensued signified peace, perhaps forgiveness, came towards my cousin.

"Dearest," he said softly, "my love for you is my excuse." He touched her lightly on the arm, and gazed at her beseechingly.

The touch of his fingers seemed to rouse her. With a swift and sudden gesture she leant towards the table, reaching past him. I saw the blade of a knife flash through the air, then without cry or call she threw herself upon him and plunged the weapon in his side.

"She's killed me," he cried in a hoarse, strangled voice, and, with a crash, fell back across the table—horribly still.

I can see the scene before me now. The room blazing with light, furnished with the luxury that wealth and taste command, the table spread with glittering plate, rich wines and hot-house fruits—and in the midst of all the luxury, the wealth, that figure silent, still, thrown back upon the table. The Venetian glass lay shivered in fragments upon the floor, the snowy napery was stained, stained with a thin stream of crimson blood which trickled from his side, dripping with a horrible monotony on the carpet at his feet.

I could not bear the sight, terror seized hold of me.

"Help, help!" I screamed; I fell upon my knees paralysed with fear.

I heard Lady Gaveston lock the door, and was dimly conscious that she had thrust Frankie into an adjoining room. Then I felt a dash of water thrown briskly in my face.

"Get up," said milady brusquely, "unless you want to ruin Frances. Get up and help me move Von Essler. Don't pay any attention to that"—the valet was knocking furiously at the door. "Do as I tell you, but remember you must be quiet; no tears or anything of that sort." Swiftly she drew the lounge up to the table, and with silent, sinewy strength—and some slight assistance from me—placed Reichardt upon it.

Then she unlocked the door and called the valet.

"Your master has hurt himself," she said laconically. "Go for a doctor, the nearest. Then take a cab to the Austrian Embassy with this note," and she hastily scribbled a few lines on her card.

The valet, with a terrified glance at his master, seemed about to expostulate. Milady, however, gave him no time to question. "Do as I tell you at once," she said. "If you chatter about what you see here"—she motioned to the lounge—"you will lose your place. I will see to that. Go!" And fearful of her wrath the man departed.

It seemed an age before the doctor, a quiet, self-possessed man, whose very presence inspired confidence, made his appearance. Close on his heels came an emissary from the Embassy. He was, I have reason to believe, a person of considerable importance. He waited gravely till the doctor, his examination completed, gave his verdict.

"The wound is deep, but it is not likely to prove fatal." The man of science rapidly dressed and bound up the wound as he spoke.

Lady Gaveston nodded approval.

"I suggest the patient is removed at once to a private ward in a hospital," she said. "This gentleman, when I have spoken to him, will, I am sure, agree with me," and her ladyship beckoned the Emissary to follow her. Together they went out.

Digitized by Google

No sooner had they gone than the door of the inner room in which Frankie was concealed commenced to open inch by inch.

The doctor saw it move, and walked towards it.

In a moment I had flung myself before him. Whatever happened, he must not know who was concealed there. Somehow or other I felt convinced Lady Gaveston would arrange things so as to avoid a scandal about Frankie. The Austrian person, I was sure, would second her endeavours, so would Von Essler. But if this man, this meddling doctor, caught sight of my cousin, it would be far more difficult to hush the matter up.

"You can't go in," I gasped, and set my back against the door.

"Nonsense," he said, lightly brushing me aside, "nonsense!"

If only Frankie would lock the door! If she kept her presence of mind all would yet be well.

Alas! there was no key in the lock! The doctor turned the handle, opened the door—my cousin swept into the room.

"Is your patient better?" she said calmly, for all the world as though the situation was an ordinary, everyday sort of affair.

"About the same," returned the doctor, in as composed a fashion. "He will not recover consciousness just yet." As he spoke his quick eyes ran over her tall figure, noted the tweed travelling dress, spied out the crimson stain upon her skirt—I doubt not he drew his own conclusions from them all.

Then—"Mrs. Norton, I think?" he said pointedly.

Before Frankie had time to answer Lady Gaveston and the Austrian attaché reappeared.

"I've telephoned to the Charing Cross Hospital," said the latter. "They are willing to receive my friend at once. Will it injure him to be taken in a carriage, or shall we have an ambulance?"

"A carriage will do," said the doctor dubiously.

"Then, with your permission, we will remove him immediately. There are four of us—you, myself, and the two servants. We can easily carry him downstairs."

The doctor nodded and bent over his patient. Lady Gaveston, taking advantage of his preoccupation, passed unnoticed into the inner room, Frankie and I behind her.

For the next fifteen minutes we listened with painful, strained attention to what was happening at the other side of the door. Once Reichardt moaned, and Frankie winced at the sound. For the most part, however, only the doctor's softly spoken directions, and the measured tread of the men as they carried Von Essler down the stairs, came to our ears.

When the door of the flat finally closed behind them, milady gave a sigh of relief and returned to the dining-room.

"Thank God!" she said reverently, "that things are no worse! Frances, take this." She poured out some brandy and handed it to my cousin, who obediently drank it up. Her ladyship forced a similar dose on me, and then, grave and dignified as ever, ushered us down the stairs, out into the street, where our carriage was still waiting.

"Home," she said laconically to the coachman. Our adventures for that night were over.

The next day and the day after Frankie remained in her room. She only saw Lady Gaveston. I learnt from the latter, however, that my cousin was fairly well. As for Von Essler, not a hint had got abroad concerning the events of that dreadful night. It was currently reported that he had gone to Paris for a change. No one, not even the smartest of smart society papers, knew that he was lying in hospital, much less that he had been wounded, and by whom.

Lady Gaveston interviewed Lord Kinross, and convinced that gentleman that Frankie's indisposition would not allow her to receive him.

"She wants a change, Lady Gaveston," he said anxiously. "She'll be better once she's out of London. We were to go to Cowes on Saturday, you know, and to-day is Thursday. Will she be able to travel by then?"

"I think so. I return to Scotland to-morrow, Lord Kinross."

"Are you not going to Cowes with Frankie?"

"No, my arrangements will not permit of it."

"At any rate, I may hope to see you at our wedding?"

"Thank you, I fear not. But if I can arrange it I will come."

"You've been very good to Frankie, Lady Gaveston. I have much to thank you for."

He spoke earnestly, and with evident sincerity. I wondered if by any chance he could have heard a rumour as to what had happened at Von Essler's.

"I've done my duty, no more," said milady. Then, as if urged by a sudden thought, "I hope you will find happiness in your marriage," she said slowly, "and that Frankie will make you a good wife."

"I'm sure of that," he answered.

Milady made a salutation and gracefully retired; not, however, without a faint sniff, significant that whatever Kinross felt about the future she still had her doubts.

The next day, clad in the same homespun skirt and identical deer-stalker hat in which she had made her first appearance at Pont Street, Lady Gaveston departed.

She had a long talk with Frankie before she left. I fancy she gave my cousin good advice for her future while strongly reprobating her past. What was more to the point, she helped my cousin to disentangle her accounts, and I believe reduced the chaos of unpaid bills to something like order.

"Frances will go to Kinross with a fairly clean sheet if she does as I tell her," her ladyship remarked.

Frankie accompanied her ladyship downstairs, and put her carefully into a cab—she had insisted on chartering a growler. For a moment they stood together on the pavement, the beautiful young woman and the dour Scotch widow.

"Good-bye, and thank you," said my cousin.

Lady Gaveston wrung her hand.

"I would hope for your happiness, Frances," she said, "but the Lord has a long memory!"

And then the cab drove off, and we knew the "testifier" no more.

"That's over," said Frankie, "and thank goodness for it." Slipping her arm round my waist, she took me upstairs.

Not a word did she say of Von Essler, nor indeed did she mention any of the events of the past six months. Her talk was all of the future.

"I'm going to make Hartland a real good wife," she said. "It isn't difficult to be good on thousands a year. I've sold my goods and chattels for just on three thousand pounds. "Moreover, I'm going to settle my debts—as many as I can. I shall have very little left. Two or three hundred, no more. Still, Clairette will let me have my trousseau on credit. Imagine, Cynthia, this time to-morrow we shall have left Pont Street, never to return."

We had a nice dinner together, and Kinross sent a beautiful basket of lilies with a loving message. Frankie announced her intention of going first thing in the morning to pay her bills.

"And then," she said, "another page in my life will have ended. I declare I will drink to forgetfulness," she said, and poured out a glass of champagne. Still smiling, she rose to her feet. "Here's to forgetting Sir John, Toby, Pettigrew, Reichardt"—even as the toast was on her lips there came a ring at the front door. My cousin waited, glass in hand, until the servant entered.

"Dr. Musgrave," he announced, "to see you on important business." Musgrave was the man who had attended Von Essler!

My cousin set down her glass and gave a little shudder.

The page was not ended yet! From the past there stretched a threatening hand. A hand that threatened ruin.

Dr. Musgrave had got Frankie firmly in his toils—and she knew it.

(Another adventure is recorded next week.)

Digitized by Google

THE TALE OF A CLOCK.

Chubb's clock got out of order recently, and began to strike wrong.

That was the cause of the fearful excitement at his house a short time since.

They were all in bed sound asleep at midnight, when the clock suddenly struck five.

The new servant girl, happening to wake just as it began, heard it and bounced out of bed under the impression that morning had come; and, as it is as dark at 5 a.m. in winter as it is at midnight, she did not perceive her mistake, but went down into the kitchen and began to get breakfast.

While she was bustling about in a pretty lively manner Chubb happened to wake, and he heard the noise.

He opened his door cautiously and crept softly to the head of the stairs to listen.

He could distinctly hear someone moving about the room, and apparently packing up the china.

Accordingly he went back to his room and woke Mrs. Chubb, and gave her orders to blow a police whistle out of the front window the moment she heard his gun go off.

Then Chubb seized an old fowling-piece which hung on the wall, and, going down to the dining-room door, where the burglars were at work, he loaded the gun, aimed it, pushed the door open with the muzzle, and fired.

Mrs. Chubb instantly blew the whistle both loud and shrill, and, before Chubb could pick up the fainting girl, the front door was burst open by two policemen, who came into the dining-room.

Seeing Chubb with a gun, and an insensible woman on the floor, they imagined that murder had been committed, and one of them trotted Chubb off to the police-station, while the other remained to investigate things.

Just then the clock struck six.

An explanation ensued from the girl, who fortunately was more frightened than hurt, and the policemen left to bring Chubb home.

He arrived at about three o'clock in the morning, just as the clock was striking eight.

When the situation was unfolded to him, his first action was to jam the butt of his gun through that clock, whereupon it immediately struck two hundred and forty-three, and then Chubb pitched the remains into the dust-hole.

Mr. Chubb has a new clock now, and things are working better.

T. L

Hetty: "Looking over the dictionary again! Evidently you find it intensely interesting." Bertha: "No, not interesting, but amusing. It spells words so differently from the way I spell them, you know."

First Young Lady: "Do you always buy two kinds of paper?" Second Young Lady: "Always. You see, when I write to Charlie I use red paper; that means love. When I answer Jim's letters I use blue paper, which means 'faithful unto death.' See?"

Mrs. Tasker: "Mrs. Subbubs is too mean for anything." Tasker: "Why do you say so?" "I hinted and hinted for a month that she should let us have her baby chair, which her boy has outgrown, and she didn't notice; but as soon as I went and bought one, she said: 'Why, you might have had mine.'"

Pretty Servant-girl (who has been taken half a mile beyond her destination): "It's really too bad; I told you when I first got in where I wished to be set down." 'Bus Conductor: "Well, miss, I let you get out as soon as ever I could find it in my 'art to part with you."

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

October 7. — Those whose birthdays fall to-day will have an unsettled year. Not a time to speculate. Will be inclined to voyage.

Girls will need some caution in love affairs; attentions from married men.

The day is good for dealing with military men, but have a care against being deceived, and avoid promising things.

A child born to-day will be unsettled, and if born near noon it will go abroad. Will be active and daring.

October 8.—An unfortunate birthday; trouble in business and home affairs. Better for clerks and those who live by salary.

Girls will meet with anxiety in love matters, and quarrels may break off any engagement, or third parties interfere.

The day is not good for marriage, travel, or entering new premises. Guard against mishap.

A child born here will be careless, lack energy and enterprise. Will be cunning and headstrong.

October 9.—Much anxiety in business and general affairs. Those in employ will be in danger of losing it.

Girls born near six and ten p.m. will be perplexed over love affairs.

The day is not good for asking favours, commencing new undertakings, but rather good for buying and selling.

A child born to-day will be subject to many crosses in life, will be inventive, and generous, but the health will not be good.

October 10.—Business and health will require some extra care during the next twelve months. A heavy, dragging time generally.

Young girls will meet with disappointment in love matters; engagements may be broken.

An evil day for most things; go quietly and let others make the first move.

A child born here will be moody and over cautious. If a girl, unhappiness in marriage.

October 11.—A prosperous year for business and domestic affairs. Some bother over letters and young people.

Girls will have attentions, and become engaged, or marry.

The day is good for pleasure seeking, marriage, visiting, buying and selling. Be careful over signing papers.

A child born to-day will be fortunate in life; the mind will be frank, cheerful, and artistic. Will be fond of things uncommon.

October 12.—Not a very fortunate time; unsettled, and some danger of law. Keep control of passion and speech.

Girls will quarrel, and much worry arise in love affairs. Place little confidence in opposite sex.

A child born here will be successful, but obstinate and rash. Will be subject to accidents; mischief through false friends.

October 13.—Business and domestic matters go well; some care with health should be observed.

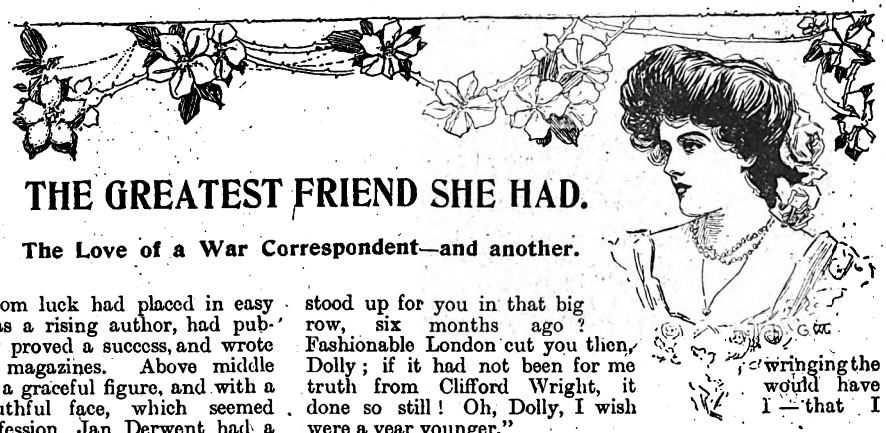
A good year for girls to marry; seek introductions, and mix with friends.

The day is good for marriage, letter-writing, buying and selling, dealing with shipping agents, and professional men.

A child born here will be lucky in most things. The disposition will be affectionate, generous, and active.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google



THE GREATEST FRIEND SHE HAD.

The Love of a War Correspondent—and another.

Doris Beversley led the way to the verandah, seating herself nervously beside her partner on a divan.

From within the house came the faint, alluring strains of the Blue Danube waltz. Without, the faint summer breeze soughed gently through the trees, tenderly stirring the soft, wavy hair of the girl, who sat silent, staring ahead with unseeing eyes. Her partner, Jan Derwent, was a journalist whom luck had placed in easy circumstances. In fact, he was a rising author, had published a book which fortunately proved a success, and wrote for the majority of the leading magazines. Above middle height, dark, the possessor of a graceful figure, and with a mild freshness about his youthful face, which seemed peculiarly unsuited to his profession, Jan Derwent had a year previously caught the fickle fancy of Doris Beversley, who straightway commenced an ardent flirtation.

Eminently a flirt Jan Derwent had ably seconded her endeavours to weave a love romance, and all went well for a year. Then Doris Beversley cooled off, leaving the young journalist to realise to his chagrin, that what he had deemed mere flirting was in reality the outcome of love.

For once in his life he felt that further existence was not necessary to him. Maturer reflection, however, conceived the desire to be revenged on Captain Anstruther, who has supplanted him in Doris Beversley's affections, till this too was lost to thought in a wild longing to regain the ephemeral love which he had lost.

"Jan."

Doris Beversley was the first to break the tense silence which reigned.

"Yes, Dolly."

"I'm awfully sorry that you should be so down in the dumps about me!" she said tremulously, holding her fan in a tense yet nervous grip which bade fair to snap its slender supports. "I—I'm not worth it."

"I down in the dumps?" replied Derwent, with well simulated levity. "My dear Doris, our flirtation has come to an end, so I am getting up a new one with Minnie Raynor. That's all. It is not as if I had really been in love with you."

A dull flush mounted to Doriss temples, as her eyes fell before his glance. She did not notice the pallor of his face, grown strangely drawn within the last few moments.

"Nice girl Minnie Raynor!" he murmured reflectively.

"Do you like her?"

She felt piqued at his apparent unconcern.

"Rather! She is the nicest girl I have ever met."

"Thank you, Jan!"

"Oh, of course I except you, Dolly, present company is always excepted.

"Our—our flirtation was very pleasant whilst it lasted, was it not, Jan?" She raised her violet eyes to his in the soft glow of the Chinese lanterns; she appeared supremely happy.

"Yes—too pleasant!" he answered, with a sigh. "It was too pleasant for my peace of mind."

She toyed with her fan thoughtfully for a few moments, then said wistfully:

"I am sorry that our little romance is over."

"It is your fault, Dolly, that such is the case," he said, bitterly. "A year ago to-day we entered into a secret engagement. You were then twenty. How I loved you at twenty, Dolly! How I——"

"Hate me at twenty-one, I suppose." The violet eyes hardened momentarily.

"One can never hate where one has once loved," replied Jan tensely. "I love you, Dolly—God help me, I always shall—but that does not prevent me saying that you have been cruel—wantonly cruel to me!"

"I never thought that you cared for me."

"If I had not cared for you, do you think I should have stood up for you in that big row, six months ago? Fashionable London cut you then, Dolly; if it had not been for me wringing the truth from Clifford Wright, it would have done so still! Oh, Dolly, I wish I—that I were a year younger."

"Why, Jan?"

"That I might once again live over the happy time of our—our flirtation," he answered, slowly.

"So do I!" The answer came unexpectedly.

"Anstruther might object to the arrangement."

"I fail to see what Captain Anstruther has to say to any arrangement which I may choose to make," replied Doris, coldly. "I am not in love with him."

"No?" Derwent gazed at her wonderingly.

"I am in love with no one—at least whom I could marry."

"No more am I—now!" answered Derwent, sadly.

"Besides, he has no money!" continued Doris, reflectively.

"If Anstruther had money—would you marry him?" The question was posed tentatively.

"I might!" She shrugged her shoulders, then laying her slim white hand on his arm, said gently: "Don't be cross, Jan. After all, dear, you are a mere boy and he—well, he is a man."

Jan Derwent coloured.

"He is thirty," he muttered, "I am only twenty-two! I suppose age does make a difference with a girl?"

She shrugged her shoulders.

"Oh, I don't know!" she said, half petulantly. "But enough of reminiscences! Tell me about yourself. What are you doing now?"

"For the moment magazine scrawling," he answered, dully. "Next week, however, I leave for the Indian frontier as War Correspondent for the Daily Wire.

The smile died from her lips as the lovely features grew set.

"War correspondents get shot sometimes, do they not, Jan?"

"Sometimes!" He laughed lightly. "There is but little chance of that happening to me though."

"I wish that I were a man—I would come with you."

"Would you?" He smiled. "I am afraid the life would be too rough a one for you."

Her reply was stifled by the coming of Captain Anstruther on to the verandah.

"Your dance, is it not, Miss Beversley?"

"I think it is! You will come and see me before you go, won't you, Jan?"

"I will not fail." Derwent rose and bowed, as Doris slipped her arm through that of Anstruther.

Six days elapsed before Doris saw Jan Derwent again.

"I'm off in two days' time, Dolly," he said, by way of greeting, as he was ushered into her presence. "When you read the news in the Daily Wire, think of me, won't you? I hear Anstruther is ordered out. If he does anything noteworthy, the 'boy,'" he smiled wistfully, "will puff the 'man' up, for your sake."

Slie squeezed his hand gratefully.

"I don't know why you should be so good to me," she said slowly.

"Am I not your friend?"

"I have been a very poor one to you. Jan, must you go?"

Digitized by Google

"Rather!" He laughed lightly. "My dear Dolly, there is a fellow named Harrison up at the office who is simply dying for me to throw up my position so that he can jump into my shoes."

"Can you forgive my horridness?"

"You have not been horrid, Dolly dear," said he, gently. "It is I who have been foolish! You never loved me. I—I mistook friendship for a deeper sentiment."

"I—I don't think that I love anyone, Jan; but I do like you!"

"As a friend, eh, Dolly? You won't refuse to be my friend?"

"To be your friend? No, of course I should not, Jan. People told me that you were playing with my love. I almost begin to think that you really did care for me."

"Perhaps in a little while I may be able to prove to you the extent of my love," he said moodily. "Good-bye, Doll."

The hand he placed on hers was icy cold. The touch chilled her.

"What made you become a war correspondent?" she asked.

He blushed awkwardly.

"Well, Jan—why?"

"So that I might be able to forget that such a person as Doris Beversley ever existed!" he said, after a pause.

She hesitated a moment, but did not withdraw her hand.

"Jan"—her voice faltered—"does your sister know the reason?"

"No; I am alone in the world, so to speak. A unit anent the fate of which none would trouble. If I died in India there is not a soul to care."

"I should, Jan," she replied gently. "Do you not believe me?"

"Would you? You are kind!" He paused, then said: "Good-bye, dear."

"Jan!" A wave of colour suffused her face.

"What, dear?"

"You said that a man named Harrison would only be too pleased to jump into your shoes if——"

"Captain Anstruther!"

The servant's voice froze the words which surged to her lips before she had time to utter them. Grasping his hand, she whispered—

"Good-bye, dear. Come to-morrow, I have something which I must tell you before you go! Don't fail to come, Jan!"

The next moment Anstruther was ushered into the room, and as Doris turned to greet him with smarting eyes and a dry, strained feeling in her throat, Derwent passed out of her sight into the street to hail a hansom.

"For me there must be no to-morrow!" he muttered hoarsely to himself as he sank back in the cab. "I'm not iron, and I would sooner die than go through what I did to-day. It would unman me! I will write instead."

Thus it came about that Doris waited in vain for the advent of Jan, to make the confession he would have given his right hand to have heard.

* * * * *

Six weeks elapsed before war news, "By our special correspondent," appeared in the Daily Wire, which Dolly read with almost feverish anxiety and avidity.

Meanwhile out in India a fierce fight was raging on the frontier. The Afridis had surprised a reconnoitring party.

By a strange coincidence Captain Anstruther and Jan Derwent were members of that ill-fated little band, which, despite a heroic resistance, were routed by the fierce tribesmen.

The rout was followed by flight, Captain Anstruther and Derwent bringing up the rear.

The gallant little band, but fourteen all told, tore along the narrow gorge, a hundred semi-maddened Afridis thundering in pursuit, flinging their spears at the retreating soldiers as they ran.

One of the flying weapons struck Captain Anstruther as they neared a bend where the gorge was narrowest. Luckily it was a spent one, yet it ripped his shoulder, making him reel as he staggered forward, with ever slackening speed.

"By gad, I think that I am done this journey, Derwent!" gasped Anstruther. "The pace is killing, I can't hold out at this speed."

"Then make what haste you can," retorted Derwent, his face hardening.

"Run on, I'll keep these beggars at bay."

"Rot, man!"

"Paddle on," interrupted Derwent, peremptorily. "It's for Dolly's sake. She loves you. She told me so. So long!"

He held out his hand, which the other gripped.

"I can never marry her," cried Anstruther. "I'm stony broke."

"You'll find that all right when you get to England. So long."

"But man, you love her as much as I do!"

"That's a lie!" cried Derwent hoarsely. "I hate her—run, man!"

He gave Anstruther a shove.

"I'll bring up the reserves if they are not already on the road," cried the Captain, a consciousness of his cowardice creeping over him. "The place is narrow; keep them at bay, and I'll rescue you. Any message to her, in case I arrive too late?"

"Yes," replied Derwent, briefly. "Give her my love—my dearest love, old man, and tell her—the 'boy' died game! Run, man, for God's sake, run! Here they come."

Then, alone with a revolver in one hand and his sword in the other, he awaited the rush of the shrieking tribesmen.

Two days later Doris Beversley started from her chair with a cry of horror. It was some time before she could fully realise that the Special Correspondent of the Daily Wire, whom the paper had lauded to the skies, and dubbed hero in an obituary notice, and Jan Derwent were one and the same. When the awful significance of the words burnt their way into her fevered brain, a dull moan burst from between her half parted lips.

"Dead!" she cried, dully. "Oh, it must be some hideous mistake. Charlie cannot have left Jan to die in order that he might cover his own retreat. It can't be! It can't be. Yet there is no mistake! The pitiful coward to leave him to his fate!" she exclaimed wildly, crunching the paper passionately between her trembling fingers, "the pitiful coward!"

For a few moments she stood silent, her hands pressed to her throbbing temples, till pent up Nature asserting itself, she sank on to a sofa, and burying her face in its cushions sobbed as if her heart would break.

"Dead, dead!" she sobbed. "If he had only come before he sailed; and he died thinking I loved another man, when it was only him—him, I loved! Oh, God! how cruel—how cruel it all is, when I loved him so."

Two months elapsed, then a letter came from Jan Derwent's solicitors, inclosing another in his handwriting, addressed to—

MISS DORIS BEVERSLEY.

To be forwarded in the event of my decease.

She stared at the superscription, glanced mechanically at the solicitor's letter, surprise stamped on every feature; then tearing open Derwent's letter, read as follows—

> DEAREST DOLLY,—As my solicitors have informed you, I nominate you my heir. As you know, I had but one relation in the world—my sister. She has married well, and needs for nothing; besides, we quarrelled six years ago. On what subject does not much signify; let it suffice that we quarrelled, so you need have no compunction in accepting the bequest. As you know, I am not a rich man, still my four hundred and fifty pounds per annum may aid you to marry Anstruther. There is besides about sixty pounds owing to me from the magazines, as well as my little account from the Daily Wire.—Your affectionate friend, JAN DERWENT.

She stared with parched eyes at the missive, then a great sob shook her frame as she almost reverently kissed the signature

The solicitor's letter was brief and to the point.

MADAM,—We have the honour to inform you that you are the sole legatee of the estate of our late client, Mr. Jan Derwent. We should be pleased if you would favour us with a call at an early date, to arrange for the disposal of same.—Faithfully yours,

GREY, RAINHAM, GREY, AND SON.

"I only thought that such natures existed in novels," she whispered, her lips quivering ominously. "I have made a mistake, Jan, a mistake that will ruin my whole life. All women make one in their lives, so I am not unique. I, however, have lost a lover to be proud of. I have lost my best and truest friend."

Her reverie was cut short by the ushering in of Captain Anstruther. Doris Beversley's greeting was not extraordinarily effusive.

"I am the bearer of a message to you," he said, after a pause.

"From Jan?" the question was asked haltingly.

"Yes; he sent you his love, and told me to tell you that the 'boy' died game'!"

"To save a man who ran away!" she answered wearily.

Captain Anstruther flushed hotly beneath his tan.

"He insisted on it, dear."

"You ran away and left him to die!" she repeated. Her voice quavered ominously.

"And I was wounded, Dolly, badly!"

"But you ran away! You should have had the Victoria Cross for your bravery," she harped mercilessly. The indignant flash of her eyes was dimmed by the tears which trembled on her lashes.

"He made me!" replied Captain Anstruther hotly. "Besides I went for a rescue party. Met them coming to rescue me, in fact. I took the men to his rescue at the double! I was only five minutes absent from his side, but that five minutes proved to be too long."

A sob was her only answer.

He drew her closely to him and kissed her.

"Derwent said that you loved me!" he said tenderly. "To this——"

She wrenched herself free from his retaining clasp.

"Love you?" she cried, with quivering lips. "I hate you! Despise you! How dare you come here with a tale of your own cowardice on your lips and almost in the same breath tell me of your love! I might have cared for you if—if—. Oh, I think I must be going mad when I reflect of what might have been and what now is." The tears were falling fast now. "If only—I had a memento—of him." She was coherent at last, and understandable to the amazed Captain Anstruther.

"I thought that you might like one perhaps," he said, a deep, gnawing anguish at his heart. "Therefore I brought you something which the poor lad treasured, and which I thought you might care for too!"

"Yes—it—is?" she whispered tremulously, biting her nether lip to stay the tears which trembled on her lashes, from falling.

Captain Anstruther took a little lace bedecked square of cambric from his breast, and gave it to her, saying simply as he did so—

"He was holding that tightly when we found him."

She recognised it as a handkerchief which he had stolen from her in their "flirtation" days. It was crumpled and torn now, with the embroidered lettering of her name sullied by a dark, sinister stain.

"You are right," she answered tremblingly. "I shall indeed treasure it as being my most precious possession. The monument of a true man's honest love. Captain Anstruther, do you mind—leaving me, I—I——"

"Good-bye, then, Dolly." He said sadly, as, not noticing her outstretched hand, he walked slowly to the door. "Good-bye. I understand, for I never had any luck—in all my life."

The door closed behind him, and as his footsteps died away on the landing, Doris Beversley raised the torn and smoke-begrimed cambric to her lips and kissed the sinister stain.

H. Morton Baird.

Your Editor Chats.

It is not to be wondered at that since the publication of Cynthia's experiences in Short Stories I have been inundated with letters from girls and women who are anxious to follow in this young woman's footsteps.

I never let a chance go by of securing good things for my readers, and I have therefore not only personally interviewed at least a dozen of my correspondents on the subject of the confessions they are willing to make, but have actually read no fewer than eight series of articles written by them.

As may be expected, practically all of the would-be contributors to Short Stories have very little of interest to say. What seemed to them most wonderful experiences and most startling adventures were really quite ordinary every-day occurrences, and proved very tame reading indeed. Two of the girls I found to be professional journalists who were willing to write a series of confessions out of their own imaginations! As I explained to them, the articles may have read very well, but the fact of them being fiction would brand them as absurd, and would kill all interest in them.

Only one lady really interested me. She was very cautious in the way she approached me, concealing her real name and address, until she had satisfied herself that I was willing to continue negotiations with her.

And her caution is not to be wondered at. She is very well-known, not only in London Society, but in Society circles abroad. Unhappily, her reputation, so far as money matters is concerned, is not above reproach. Although she has never actually committed a crime, she has accepted money from people for carrying out work she alone could do—work which necessitated a certain amount of underhand business.

She was on four occasions paid money by ambitious parents to get their daughters married to a title. In each of three cases she succeeded within six months, but in the fourth and last case the young girl whom she chaperoned was as wilful as she was lovely. Having conceived an affection for a poor, untitled young man, for many months she absolutely refused to listen to anyone else.

She was quite ignorant of the fact that her parents had promised a big sum to her chaperon if she "went off" well, and the latter was forbidden to tell her.

Whether the chaperon ultimately succeeded in securing for her charge a good "catch" will be told in her experiences. They travelled in good society all over Europe—visiting Paris, Nice, Monte Carlo, Rome, and every centre of gaiety on the Continent. At each place the lovely heiress was besieged by counts, dukes, and barons, and her adventures with some of them are dramatic.

The writer of these articles is now living in poor circumstances in Chelsea, and only the fact that money had to be got somehow has led her to place her experiences on paper.

I have carefully read them, and have cross-examined the writer on certain points. She has produced letters for my private perusal, and cuttings from French and Italian local papers, giving her name and that of her charge as guests at the various hotels at which they stopped.

In a fortnight these articles will begin.

Next week I will tell you more about them.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Quite Simple.

He: "This sea bathing makes one's hair an awful job to dry, even for a man. I wonder what on earth your friend here, Miss Longtresses, does with hers?" She: "Oh, leaves it in the machine."

The Tale of a Kiss.

They sat within the parlour dim, and fretfully she said to him: "I wish, dear John, that you'd behave; if not, I wish that you would shave."

Sweet Seventeen.

"I don't believe in the custom of giving engagement rings, do you?" "No; I would a good deal rather have the money spent in sweets and theatre tickets. You can't be expected to give them back, you know."

Things are Altered.

Wife (drearily): "Ah, me! the days of chivalry are past." Husband: "What's the matter now?" Wife: "Sir Walter Raleigh laid his cloak on the ground for Queen Elizabeth to walk over, but you get cross simply because poor, dear mother sat down on your hat."

Killing Two Birds with One Stone.

Robinson: "Just send me up a dozen of oysters, Scaley, will you? Mrs. Robinson's not very well, and the doctor's ordered her oysters. Mind you pick out fine ones. You see, she can't swallow more than a couple at the outside, and I'm obliged to eat the rest myself."

Her Version of it.

Doctor: "I would advise you, dear madam, to take frequent baths, plenty of fresh air, and dress in cool gowns." Husband (an hour later): "What did the doctor say?" Wife: "He said I ought to go to a South Coast watering-place, and afterwards to North Wales, and get some new light gowns at once."

Real Romance.

Young Author: "Would you call my novel realism or romance?" Friend: "What does the heroine say when she accepts the hero?" Young Author: "Oh, she says, 'Yes, dear George, we will tread life's path together, one in heart and purpose, bearing each other's burdens, sharing each other's grief, doubling each——'" Friend: "Oh, that's romance of the first water. A real girl would no more think of making a speech on such an occasion than of singing a song, or dancing the Highland fling."

What Her Heart Said.

Miss Mabella St. Percy: "Mamma, dearest, I have something to tell you." Mamma (anxiously): "Yes, darling?" "Yes, mamma. Mr. Moneybags proposed to me last night." "And what did my little girl say?" "I didn't give him a definite answer, mamma. I wanted to talk to you about it first." "And what does your heart say, dear?" "Oh, mamma, it says—it says—— Oh, mamma, is it really true that Mr. Moneybags will have £10,000 a year at his father's death?" "Quite true, my child, and—and—the old gentleman is very feeble. And now, what does my dear child's heart say?" "Oh, mamma, it says—'yes'!" "My own dear child! I have always wanted to see you married to the man of your choice, to the man you loved and honoured. Bless you, my darling, and may you be as happy as you deserve."

Had Finished Growing.

He: "Do you think you could grow to love me?" She: "I'm afraid not. You see, I've done growing."

A Much Blessed Hash.

Mrs. Jackson (at dinner): "Richard, will you ask a blessing?" Richard (examining hash): "We've blessed everything here before, dear."

Firmly Declined.

Cholly: "And now that you've finished school, Miss Daisy, I suppose you can conjugate love in several languages?" Miss Daisy: "No, but I can decline 'you' in English."

A Great Mistake.

Her mother said the little creature lived on love, but one month after marriage, when the grocery bill came in, he saw that he had made the greatest mistake of his life by not ascertaining what that particular love was for.

Baby Couldn't Tell.

Dr. Mansfield: "My dear Mrs. Jenkins, how could you bring that young baby out on such a cold day—with a strong east wind blowing?" Mrs. Jenkins: "Ah, doctor, you will have your little joke. How can a child of this one's age possibly know what wind it is?"

Not what He Expected.

"Why am I like a pin?" asked Mr. Jones triumphantly of his wife. He expected she was going to say, "Because you are so sharp," and he was simply paralysed when she responded: "Because if you should get lost it wouldn't be worth while to spend time looking for you."

Warned in Time.

"Is this the place," she asked, as she wandered down on the barren sands, "where a young lady—a beautiful young lady—fell in the water last season and was rescued by a gallant young man, whom she afterwards married?" He looked at her carefully, estimated her at a square forty-seven, with false teeth, and said emphatically: "Yes, ma'am, but I don't know how to swim."

Why He Left it There.

Johnnie had been out in the yard playing with his ball, and suddenly came in and sat down to read. His father looked up, and seeing that Johnnie had his Sunday-school book in his hand, thought it time to question him. "What did you do with the ball?" "It went over the wall into Mr. Brown's yard:" "Did you go after it?" "No, pa." "Why not?" "Because it went through the window."

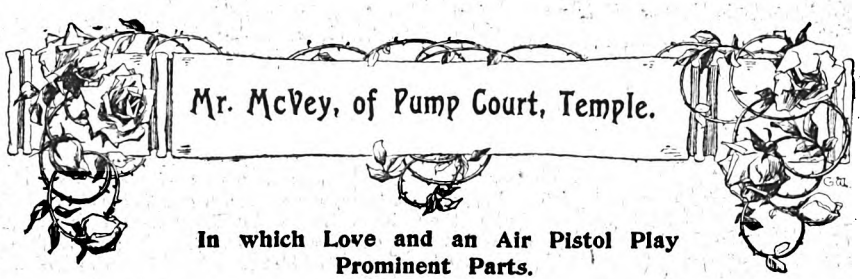
Infant Fishes.

To a third party it is sometimes surprising how much pride a large man can take in catching a small fish. Two or three young men were exhibiting, with great satisfaction, the results of a day's fishing, whereupon a young woman remarked, very demurely: "Fish go in schools, do they not?" "I believe they do; but why do you ask?" "Oh, nothing, only I was just thinking that you must have broken up an infant class."

Rather a Jar.

"George," said the beautiful girl as she nestled close to him, "the last time you called you proposed." "I did, sweet one." "And I accepted you." "You did, love." "I presume, George," she went on in her most fascinating manner, "that you look upon me as merely a foolish, thoughtless girl, but—but——" "How can you think so, pet?" he interrupted. "But," she went on in a more business-like way, "I have something of the business instinct of the new woman in me, and—and—I shall have to ask you to repeat the proposal again to-night. The last time you called it was Sunday, and contracts made on that day, I learn, are not legally binding."

Digitized by Google



Mr. McVey, of Pump Court, Temple.

In which Love and an Air Pistol Play Prominent Parts.

"So you want to marry my girl, Leyland? I'm sorry, but it is out of the question."

"Mr. McVey!"

"Oh, yes, I know. Of course Marcia loves you; you love her to distraction, and both of you will break your hearts if I withhold my consent. My dear Leyland! hearts are not so easily broken; while as for the love, she, at any rate, would be heart-whole in a month if she didn't see you."

"If you think this," said Alec Leyland hotly, "why, Mr. McVey, did you tacitly encourage my affection for your daughter? You must have seen how matters stood between us; why did you not say before that you would not allow her to marry me?"

"What is your present financial position, and—what are your prospects?" asked John McVey, utterly ignoring the other's question.

"I am not rich, I——"

"That is just it—you are not rich; and Marcia must marry a rich man."

"You would sell your daughter, sir?"

"Certainly not. But you will excuse me, Mr. Leyland, my family affairs are not a subject for discussion with strangers."

"Then all I have to say about it is!" burst out the young fellow with uncontrollable indignation, "that your daughter's happiness is as nothing to you, and that you would brutally give her into the keeping of a man whose only recommendation is, that he has money enough to buy her!"

"That is my business, sir! Yours, I venture to suggest, has nothing in common with those living in my house. I have no more to say. Good night!"

When Alec Leyland had gone down to Richmond that afternoon, it was with the one object of getting John McVey's consent to Marcia's engagement to himself. That the barrister would allow financial considerations to influence his determination, was the very last thought Alec had in his mind. Certainly, McVey had not much practice, his chambers in Pump Court being frequented principally by well-dressed young fellows from the West End, to whom money, not law, seemed the one thing needful; but his domestic establishment and expenditure certainly indicated a more than ordinarily big income.

Then John McVey had displayed no mercenary qualities; rather had he appeared, especially to Alec Leyland, genial and friendly to a degree. The whole thing was a puzzle, which, added to disappointment, and concern for Marcia's future, served to render Alec's exit from the "shanty" peculiarly troublous.

Half way down the lane leading from Mr. McVey's house there was a door in the wall leading into the kitchen garden. This was ajar and as Leyland passed it on his way from the house it opened and a young servant gave him a note.

Hastily glancing at it he just said to the girl "All right!" and hurried away in the direction of the station.

The note ran:

"Dear,—From my own sitting-room I overheard everything. Wait on up platform; I must see you before you leave for town. Shall not be a quarter of an hour after you. Now, more than ever your own, Marcia."

She did not keep him waiting more than ten minutes, and in a quiet corner of the waiting-room the two sat down to discuss the situation.

"No, dear!" she said, in reply to a remark of his. "I intend only to consider ourselves in this matter. I know this man my father has in mind, and I hate him! I hate him!"

"Darling," said Alec, "there is a way out of the difficulty, but only extremity would justify me in proposing it to you."

"Alec, did you but know Sir Roland Sandys, as I know him, there could not possibly be a situation of greater extremity than this."

"Sir Roland Sandys! Why he is a thriftless, almost bankrupt man about town. He is not a rich man!"

"Not just now, perhaps; but my father knows that he will shortly inherit an enormous property on the death of old Lady Sandys, his mother; and as that event is hourly expected, you can see that the danger is very real."

"Tell me, dear, what you would have me do?"

"Nothing, Alec, until I have seen my father! I will write you the result to-night; and then you can go to him to his chambers, and tell him that his daughter's heart is yours; that you have my promise to be your wife, as soon as you can make me so; and that you know, that rather than be disposed of to Sir Roland Sandys—for a consideration, I would wish to remain a single woman to the end of the chapter!"

* * * * *

The house in Pump Court in which were Mr. VcVey's chambers, was, if possible, darker and more dingy than the majority of houses in that historic place.

The outer door stood open, and Alec Leyland entering, saw a door on which "clerks" was painted.

This room was evidently empty, as no one answered to repeated knockings.

Another door in the entrance passage had "J. McVey, Private," upon it. Here also there was no response to a vigorous summons.

After a moment's pause the visitor turned the handle and went in.

In an armchair by the open window, which looked out upon the backs of other and more ancient buildings, sat John McVey, apparently asleep.

A newspaper was upon his knees, and his head, leaning against the side of the chair, was bent forward.

"Mr. McVey," said Alec, slightly raising his voice.

But the sleeper did not awake.

Alec then made a step or two forward, looking more closely at the man in the arm-chair.

Taking hold of his shoulders to shake and rouse him, the horror-stricken young man saw that a thin stream of blood was slowly trickling from a wound in that side of the head nearest to the window.

John McVey was dead.

His head and hands were still warm, showing that the crime, if crime it were, must have been recently committed.

There were no signs of a struggle, but lying on the rug beside the chair was a small but powerful air-pistol.

Alec then heard a step in the outer passage, and, turning round, saw a boyish-looking young fellow, whom he at once judged to be the dead man's clerk, standing in the doorway.

"You had better fetch a policeman," said Alec.

The young fellow who seemed bewildered, without a word and bareheaded, rushed down the creaky old stairway, and across the court out into the Strand.

In ten minutes he returned with a constable and a detective.

Alec Leyland gave his version of the story to the law's representatives, who, after mechanically examining the room, intimated to him that he would have to accompany them to the police-station.

Digitized by Google

Then, for the first time, the danger of his position forced itself upon the young man.

He knew that a terrible mistake might easily be made, and that he had absolutely no evidence of innocence, should he be charged with the crime.

As he feared, so it happened. He spent that night in the station cells, charged, on suspicion, with the murder of Mr. McVey.

* * * * *

The magistrate, before whom Alec Leyland was brought on the following morning, was obliged to confess that the police evidence was far from being convincing, although he felt bound to admit that it was in a measure circumstantially suspicious.

The accused had entered the barrister's office, no one, except the dead man, being there, and had been found by the clerk, standing by the body, a discharged air-pistol lying on the ground beside Mr. McVey.

That it was a case of suicide was out of the question, as the barrister could not have held his newspaper in one hand, while he shot himself with the other.

Again, the crime could not have been committed by the clerk, inasmuch as he had been out to the bank; and as a letter was found on his desk, with a pencilled slip in deceased's handwriting. "Deliver this letter when you return. No answer."

The note was addressed to A. Leyland, Esq., and was to the following effect:

"Sir,—After the violent language you used towards me last night, you will be surprised, perhaps, at my writing to you now. My object is merely to confirm what I said at that interview, and to so far explain my position, as to tell you that I am not only not a rich man, but a poor one. Any letters addressed by you to my daughter, or to me, will be returned unopened. Yours faithfully,

"John McVey."

This was practically all the incriminating evidence, but the magistrate, while retaining his own opinion, felt bound to commit upon it. Arraigned at the Old Bailey upon the capital charge, Alec Leyland was acquitted after a brief trial.

A loving note from Marcia reached him almost before the formalities, usual upon acquittal, were completed.

She assured him of her undying affection, and bade him communicate with her without delay.

He replied that he would never cease to love her, but that for her sake he would not seek to gratify it by pressing it upon her. He was going abroad, he said, and prayed that the happiness she so deserved might be hers.

The answer to this, from a little village on the South coast was simply this:

"Dear,—Come to me.—Yours now and ever, Marcia."

He could not refuse her, and the next day travelled down to Ryethorpe.

* * * * *

A lady and a gentleman, both young, and both intensely absorbed, the one with the other, were walking along the front at Brighton (where they had been living for a year or more) in the direction of Kemp Town.

"Alec!" said the lady in a low tone. "Did you notice that man who passed us just now?"

"That seedy-looking chap, with the heavy moustache? Yes, I half thought I recognised him; but I suppose I was mistaken."

"I don't think you were," said Marcia Leyland. "It was Sir Roland Sandys."

"Great Heavens! That out-at-elbows creature, Sir Roland Sandys. Impossible!"

"It was he, I am sure, dear. And, look, Alec! He is waiting there by the corner of that building as if he wanted to speak to either you or me."

"I think it had better be me then. You go back, my darling, and I will follow you in half-an-hour."

He watched his wife on her way back to their lodgings, and then went to meet the man, who evidently had sought him out for some purpose of his own.

"Mr. Leyland?"

"Yes, that is my name, and yours, I take it, is Sandys—Sir Roland Sandys?"

"You recognise me then?"

"It was my wife who recognised you, though I had an indefinite idea that I ought to know you."

"Well, Mr. Leyland, where can we talk undisturbed for a while? I have something to say which I think will do much towards easing both your wife's mind—and your own."

They were at that moment passing a certain old-fashioned hotel, into which Alec led his companion.

A private room was soon secured, and Alec, though wondering at the strangeness of the whole affair, prepared himself to listen. It was certainly a most extraordinary story the baronet had to tell. Briefly, it amounted to this:

Sandys, it seemed, at the time when Mr. McVey met his death, shared some chambers in the block of buildings immediately backing on to the South side of Pump Court, with a friend, one Roger Haik.

This Haik was a man always in monetary straits, and deep in the books of the money-lenders.

John McVey, barrister ostensibly, but really usurer, had, in the course of Roger Haik's short career, contributed to suck the latter completely dry; so that with the wild revengefulness of a desperate man, Haik threatened more than once, in Sandys' presence, to "kill the old Shylock."

Sandys not really believing the threat to have any actual meaning, took no notice of it.

On the day of John McVey's death, however, he returned from the West End to find Roger Haik leaning on the window-sill, and looking steadily down at McVey's open window, through which might be seen the figure of the barrister, sitting in his arm-chair.

Sandys might not have thought so much of it but for the presence, in Haik's right hand, of a small air-pistol, purchased, as he knew, a day or so before by the latter.

In a moment the whole thing was clear to him. Not stopping to exchange a word with the man whom he knew to be a murderer, he plucked the weapon out of the other's hand, and rushed round into Pump Court.

McVey's outer door was open. The baronet made no ceremony, but passing rapidly into the private room, saw his fears confirmed, and laid down the pistol on the floor by the chair side, hoping that the barrister's well-known financial difficulties would procure a verdict of suicide. Then, going as he came, he closed the door behind him, and returned to his own chambers.

That night he and Roger Haik, collecting all their available resources, got away to France.

There, three weeks before this Brighton meeting, Haik had succumbed to a knife wound incurred in a street brawl in Paris.

Before he died he so far repented having been the direct means of imperilling Alec Leyland's life, that he begged his old boon-companion, Sandys, to communicate the facts to either John McVey's daughter or to her husband.

Seriously implicated, as an accessory after the fact, Sandys expressed his intention to leave again for parts unknown, begging only that public acknowledgment of Roger Haik's guilt might be delayed until he, Sandys, was beyond seas. He also explained that he had found Leyland and his wife to be in Brighton, through the servants at the "Shanty" which still remained Marcia's property.

* * * * *

"So you see, dear," said Alec, with a smile. "I was innocent after all."

"As if I did not know it," Marcia replied, both hands clasped round one of his arms.

"But, Alec, is there need to publish this poor dead creature's confession? It will be quite enough for us to be assured; let the world be satisfied with your acquittal."

"Ever and always the angel of mercy, Marcia! I am content if you are; for I know that your love, dearest, was my true and best justification."

E. Ralph.

Digitized by Google

THE BLUE SKIRT.

Jessie Gale was ambitious, immoderately so.

Jack Gale was ambitious, too, but temperately so.

It was because of the varying degrees of their ambition that this story came about.

Jessie could sing. Jack could not. He could only listen with a rare appreciation and adore this particular singer beyond all bounds of her deserts. For Jack was as gifted in the rare art of loving truly as Jessie was in the art of singing. Rather more, I should say.

All this had much to do with the blue skirt, for it was these phsychologic conditions that brought about the incident of the blue skirt.

Jack had always extravagantly admired the gown of which the blue skirt was a component part. He had told her so often, but Jessie had answered rather fretfully that it was "such a simple little affair." Pale blue chambray, made with a blouse effect and trimmed with ruffles edged with narrow torchon. So a woman would have described it, but to sturdy, honest, loving Jack it was a blue cloud flecked with white, from which the black eyes and curling black hair, the red lips and creamy skin of his wife gleamed forth brilliantly.

Jack never forgot the day she tossed it aside.

"I'll never wear that old thing again," she said. "I do hate to wear things when they've grown shabby."

There was a little tremor of sensitiveness in Jack's face as the words struck cruelly upon his ear, but he made a manful effort to conquer it. His income was small, but he was doing his best to increase it, and the increase was sure to come if it was a bit slow. He had told Jessie so often and had explained that there was some disposition to keep the young engineers down.

"The older fellows naturally want to keep the best positions," he said. "Try to be patient, Jessie. I am doing my best, dear."

And Jessie was silent. She had the introspective nature that matches heavy-lidded eyes, habitually cast down. And the habits of silence and introspection were growing.

It was on the evening of the day that Jessie said she had thrown away "the old blue dress" that the great change came.

Jessie heard that a theatrical manager was reorganising a company for a season of comic opera. A neighbour had told her he needed girls for the company—"girls with looks, and with voices if possible, but looks anyway." And Jessie had gone to town and been engaged and had come back and told Jack.

She was a little frightened by his strange silence.

"I did it to help you along—because the money will help us both," she said in defence. Then she burst out into a storm against the manner of their life.

"I hate the solitude here," she said. "Sometimes I feel afraid of the hills. It seems as though they will fall over me and crush me. And the silence here is awful. I want to hear human voices. I want to hear people laugh and sing. I want colour and movement and sound instead of these walls of green making a living tomb for us."

Jack had talked with her very gently and she had answered every argument with bitter protest. He answered her sadly then.

"You are young, dear. I might have known that love would not fill your life now. When you are as old as I am you will know that it is all that really matters, besides working and doing one's duty. I will give my consent to your going, for all I live for is to make you happy."

And Jessie went on her way, singing a small part in a pretty, uncultivated voice. She dressed with half a dozen other girls who smoked and used slang, and in the guise of friendliness "made her up" to distort the beauty of her dark, brooding face. She learnt the disciplinary value of the stage, and she learnt the real hideousness of selfishness. But she told Jack none of this.

One season passed—two—she was soon to begin her third. She was getting on, but slowly. One evening she was moved by one of those impulses that seem to come from without rather than within to run home and pay Jack a visit. The rehearsals were over. There was no reason why she should not go home for a week. She would surprise him.

She drove out from town in the early morning. The mist veils were rising from the hill tops, melted by the burning kisses of the sun. The evergreen forests on the hill sides were so cool, the great walls of earth so restful. She wondered why she was not afraid they would topple upon her now. Was it that she was beginning to yearn for what they typified—strength and fidelity, the greatest and best things in life?

The little house had been done up she noticed as she drove up, and Jack had coaxed the rose vines quite to the roof by now.

The door was open. There was no fear of tramps in that region, and she peered right into the house. She crossed the threshold softly. Some one was stirring within but he was too absorbed to note her soft footfalls.

Her old blue skirt hung upon the wall, and her husband, looking older and sadder, but still with that vast strength of patience in his face, stood looking at it.

She wrote the rest to her one friend in the company.

"I walked over quietly and stood beside him. He was still so busy looking at that foolish skirt that he didn't know I was there. But after awhile he turned towards me, and when he saw me the look that came into his eyes made me cry.

"Well, I've resigned. When I saw poor old Jack worshipping that blue skirt of mine that I had thrown away as worthless, I made up my mind that there are only a few things that are really worth living for, and stage life isn't one of them, and the companionship of a staunch, splendid soul like Jack is. And so I've left and I'm going to wait and work with Jack for the better days that I know are coming.

"He is getting on in his profession and the—did I call them better—the other days are nearer. But I wonder if they will be better, the days when Jack and I are rich, and so many people will know us and make demands upon our time, and so separate us after a manner? We were both wondering to-day, but we are going to enjoy the time before that, and meanwhile that old blue skirt still hangs upon the wall. Jack insists upon it. He calls it his 'restorer.'"

Ida Patterson.

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY.

Out of Great Tribulation.

By Henry Farmer.

Murder Will Out!

But before the news of his freedom reached Alec Scarsdale, much had happened. The daily papers had furnished forth much sensational reading. In the train, on the top of the 'bus, at the street corner, one was pretty nearly certain to hear the names of Revelle, Crump, and Scarsdale, and perhaps the name that was most frequently mentioned was Crump's.

It was no fault of the little man's that he was thus brought into prominence; but he was undoubtedly the hero of the hour. Sensationalism seemed to have attained its climax when it was made known that Seaton Revelle of The Firs, Warham, a member of several exclusive clubs, and well-known in society, had been arrested; but a yet greater sensation was in store for the British public.

Those present in the police-court when Revelle, livid-faced and looking an old man, appeared before the magistrate, would not forget what happened for many a day. A cheer was suppressed when Crump's name was called out, and a little man, very much bandaged and with only one eye visible, stepped into the witness-box. Crump's successes, in the days of his active service, had in great measure been assisted by the fact that he had kept his personality in the background whenever possible. He had been a name rather than a person.

So this little, grey-headed man was the famous Crump! Those in court saw the livid-faced prisoner lean forward over the edge of the dock, and glare, as though his eyes were playing him false, at the little man in the box.

"Penworthy!" he hissed, half-aloud.

For all his bandages Seaton Revelle had recognised in Crump the landscape gardener and horticultural specialist.

Then the Crown Prosecutor called upon Mr. Crump to tell his story in his own way.

The court listened to him in breathless silence as he gave his evidence, with that modesty so characteristic of him. His evidence commenced with Alec Scarsdale's trial at the Old Bailey, and ended with the arrest of Seaton Revelle.

Then came the great sensation.

Crump had ceased speaking. Again a cheer was suppressed. The little man had won every heart in court. He had unmasked a scoundrel; but he had done more than that. He had proved the innocence of a terribly wronged man.

The spectators watched him, expecting him to leave the box; but he did not stir. The Crown Prosecutor was on his feet again.

"Your Worship," he said, addressing the magistrate, "the principal charge at present against the prisoner in the dock is one of manslaughter. I'm going to ask for an adjournment, after Mr. Crump has given certain evidence, in order that the indictment may be altered, and the prisoner charged with the more terrible crime of murder!"

There was a moment of deathlike silence.

Revelle clutched the dock with both his hands as if to save himself from falling. He had yet hoped to save his neck. Benny Beard had drawn a revolver on him. He had struck him down in self-defence. It had been manslaughter, the counsel for the defence had pleaded, not wilful murder. But now?

The Crown Prosecutor was speaking again.

"A foul murder in no way connected with crimes with which he is now charged, the murder of Alice Balder, known also as Alice Vance and Alice Vince, the prisoner's late wife!"

It was as if a bomb had fallen in the court.

Revelle had reeled back. The constables on either side of him were supporting him now. His bloodless lips were flecked with foam. He was past acting now!

"Now, Mr. Crump," said the Crown Prosecutor, "if you will proceed with your evidence."

Crump beckoned to some constables. Three of them advanced, each bearing a bag of sand ballast.

Then the little man opened the hand-bag that he had with him, and took out a pencilled map, and some fragments of dark, serge-like looking material, and a letter, and a rolled-up scroll that proved to be a small picture poster representing Signor Balderini in the act of making a parachute descent, and a copy of a marriage certificate testifying to a marriage between James Balder and Alice Vince.

"Your Worship," he said, "before giving my evidence I should like to state that there is a witness in court prepared to identify the prisoner as James Balder, alias Signor Balderini, the parachutist, and there is another witness who is not at this moment present in court, owing to certain formalities—he is undergoing a brief spell of imprisonment—one Rumbey, a vagrant, who was in Rushford wood on the night that Alice Vance met her death; but he will be forthcoming later. In the meantime I venture to presume that I am in a position to make out a prima facie case that will justify an adjournment and a fresh indictment."

Then the little man gave his evidence, stating how his suspicions had been aroused by the position of the poor woman's body in the water, a position that could be only explained by the fact that she must have been dropped into the water; then followed the evidence of the sand-bags, the broken gorse, the fragment of dress, the second fragment found clinging to the fluke of the anchor; then the map with its crosses, and pencilled notes and compass points, was handed up to the magistrate.

And the excited audience whispered among themselves that the homely little man had put a rope round the neck of the death-hued scoundrel who stood in the dock, supported on every side.

But it was so; Rumbey, the vagrant proved the last conclusive link in the evidence when taken in conjunction with Crump's.

He had been in the wood that night of the balloon ascent. He had curled himself up in a hollow tree near the bank when something, seeming to come from the clouds, something dark, fell with a plunge into the water.

The vagrant, knowing of the balloon ascent, had imagined at first that it must have been a bag of ballast. He had wandered away before the discovery of the body, and a bout of drunkenness had followed. Only when he heard of the woman's death had his vague suspicions been aroused, and then perhaps, but for Tom Jackson, he would never have come forward.

After the adjournment of the court, a great crowd waited outside; but the little man for whom they waited, whom in their enthusiasm they would have borne away shoulder high, had contrived to effect an escape by a side-exit, and, crouching back in a cab—his expression, what there was visible of it, rather suggestive of a criminal flying from justice—was on his way to the Hotel Royal.

Digitized by Google

At Last!

How the light sparkled from her dark eyes, how the colour ebbed and flowed on Esther's cheeks as she stood alone in the drawing-room of The Woodlands waiting.

"He is coming, he is coming!"

The birds outside seemed to be singing the words; the very clock—the seconds seemed hours!—was ticking out the words, though the hands must be standing still.

Her fevered, pulsing heart throbbed out the same joyous refrain.

He was coming, he was coming. Her love, her life.

She had never doubted him, never wavered; through the blackness of those awful days, her love, her faith in him, had been the rock to which she had clung, and from which all the storm, all the tempest had not torn her!

She hears the rattle of wheels, the slamming of doors, voices in the hall, her father's voice, the voice of the little man who has been a second father to her; then another voice—his voice!

She is white as death now, white with a great joy, an inexpressible anticipation.

A dimness veils her eyes. She hears the door open, sees something shadowy move towards her; but she feels the strong, trembling arms that encircle her; the mad throbbing of the heart pressed close to hers; the burning lips that shower kisses upon her; and she hears him whisper:

"Oh, God! I thank thee!"

And as the blinding tears—the dew of joy and love—flow down her cheeks, she also whispers:

"Oh, God! I thank thee!"

And love will blot out the memories of the injustice, the cell, and the agony; and love will fill those two hearts again with light and sunshine, soothing and healing and pervading their lives as the sweet perfume of fragrant flowers.

They have passed from out the darkness of their great tribulation. The sky is cloudless now!

They lose all count of time. The greyness of dusk steals into the room. He is only conscious of her presence; she of his.

They do not see the two figures dimly outlined on the threshold of the room—two old men, one, a little man, whose face is no longer bandaged.

"Come!" whispers Crump, in a very shaky voice. "We have seen enough, Mr. Mansfield. This is no place for either of us."

When they have passed away, the little man holds out his hand.

The father wrings it. There are tears in both men's eyes.

"At last!" chokes out Crump. "Thank God!"

* * * * *

The scene has changed!

"Guilty!"

He is standing in the felon's dock, Seaton Revelle, in the very dock in which, not two years back, Alec Scarsdale was standing.

The Judge dons the black cap.

The awful words of doom are spoken.

In all that crowded court, not one look of pity! There is a scream. Revelle, frothing at the mouth, falls to the ground in a fit.

Even in the cell he tries to escape the sentence passed upon him; but the warders are too watchful, and one grey, grim morning, to the gloomy tolling of the prison bell, a half-fainting, livid wretch, supported on either side, is led out to the scaffold.

CONSTIPATION

Mrs. M. Ellis, of Frith Grange Farm, Mill Hill, N.W., writes: "I am glad to be able to inform you of the great benefit derived from a course of your Bile Beans for Biliousness. I have suffered from constipation for years, and months of sleepless nights, with pains in the hands and arms, and swollen joints, with great pain after eating, always feeling dull and heavy, and having tried a number of other remedies to no purpose. I am pleased to say that after taking three small boxes of Bile Beans I enjoy my food, sleep well, and the swelling of joints has disappeared."

Bile Beans cure constipation, indigestion, colds, influenza, liver chill, anæmia, and all female ailments. Of all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, London, E.C., for 1/1½ and 2/9 per box.

SAMPLE BOX FREE. The proprietors have so much faith in the efficacy of Bile Beans that they will forward a sample box free, and a book on liver and digestive ailments, if you send your name and address, and a penny stamp (to cover return postage) along with accompanying coupon, to the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co.'s Central Distributing Depot, Greek Street, Leeds.

Free Sample Coupon. Short Stories, Oct. 11, '02.

Bile Beans

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

When the black flag flutters out, the crowd outside Newgate knows that James Balder, alias Seaton Revelle, alias the Marquis, thief, murderer, and coward, has paid the penalty of his crimes.

* * * * *

They sent Tomlinson, alias Railton, to penal servitude for five years, on the strength of certain evidence produced by Crump in the shape of designs of Lord Normanhurst's place, The Towers. And Mr. Lewis Masters, turf accountant and receiver of stolen goods, thanks also to Crump, received a similar sentence.

The little man's hope that he would "bag" the lot of them was realised.

An End, and a Beginning.

"Lor', Mr. Penworthy," ejaculated Mrs. Cobb, "I've never seen you look so smart before in my life! Mr. Penworthy you are to me, Mr. Crump, and Mr. Penworthy you will always be. 'Pon my word, you look a perfect picture!"

The little man, his kindly face one big smile, was arrayed in a frock coat, shepherd's plaid trousers, and patent leather boots.

A mighty buttonhole adorned the lappel of his coat. He was struggling into a lavender kid glove.

"Mrs. Cobb," he chuckled, "I am glad that you think the clothes are effective. I am not a dressy person; but to-day—and he chuckled again, and the little eyes twinkled like stars—"but to-day is a great and joyous day! Mrs. Cobb, shake hands!"

And as he was shaking the old lady's hand, the distant jangling of joyous bells fell upon their ears.

"Do you hear them, Mrs. Cobb? Wedding bells, wedding bells! Come, Mrs. Cobb, where's Pollie? We must be getting to the church!"

It was Esther Mansfield's and Alec Scarsdale's wedding-day! They had begged Crump to stay at the Woodlands; but the little man had insisted that he would be in the way, and that at Woodbine Cottage he would be very close.

"Ah, here's Pollie!"

And a few moments later, Mr. Crump, Pollie on one arm, and Mrs. Cobb on the other, was making his way down to the church. And what a crowd there was! All Warham was there, and many more beside.

"There he is, bless him!" said Tom Jackson, nudging Fred Wilton's arm as the little man entered the church.

Then presently all eyes were turned on the man who had appeared at the altar rails, a young man with grey hair—Alec Scarsdale, the one-time convict 35. And men and women were conscious of a strange thrill. The well-groomed young gentleman, the best man, was Gerald Phipps.

Then the organ was pealing out.

Esther, on her father's arm, was passing down the aisle.

"But you mustn't!" whispered Pollie to the little man beside her. "You mustn't cry, Mr. Penworthy!"

For the famous detective, the one-time terror of the criminal fraternity, the man who had fought the notorious Smasher on the housetops, who had clung on to James Balder with a grip of steel, was crying like a child.

And when it was all over, and the bride and bridegroom had passed into the vestry, Mr. Crump would have crept quietly from the church; but it was not to be. He was seized upon by Gerald Phipps, and carried off into the vestry.

And after that, Crump himself was only absolutely certain about one thing that happened—it was so bewildering, owing to the fact that everybody seemed to be wringing his hands at one and the same time, and thanking him, and blessing him—but of this he was and is absolutely certain, that the bride put her arms round his neck, and not only kissed him, but hugged him!

They took the horses from the carriage, and dragged Alec Scarsdale and his bride, cheering all the way, to the Woodlands.

And this time Crump did not escape.

They bore him shoulder-high, cheering all the way, to the Woodlands!

And here—Mr. Crump is absolutely certain of this—he was again kissed by the bride, and his hand ached for days afterwards from the bridegroom's grip!

At the reception he was called upon to make a speech. He himself has no recollection of what he said; but, according to those present, it was a speech which one felt the better for having heard.

* * * * *

Twilight!

The rice has been thrown; bride and bridegroom are gone. Two grey-haired men are standing in the grounds of the Woodlands.

"God bless you, Crump!" says John Mansfield.

"Let us thank God for this day!" whispers the little man reverently.

He is silent for a few moments. The afterglow illumines the sky, and his kindly, gentle face.

"A very happy ending," he whispers presently; "no, not an ending, but a beginning, the beginning of a new life!"

THE END.

[And so the curtain falls on this drama. I hope you have enjoyed it. I hope still more that you will enjoy the new serial story, "A Foe in the Family," which starts on the front page of Short Stories this week. At any rate, you will read the first instalment, won't you? It will not take you long, and you can judge then whether you will continue it or not. I have no doubt as to what your decision will be. —Ed.]

THE LOVER'S GUIDE TO COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE.

By G. R. M. DEVEREUX.

A volume containing sensible advice to all lovers, from the first dawn of love, leading through the various stages, up to marriage.

Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

Some of the Twenty Chapters are:—

CHAPTER I.—Child Courtship—The Boy Lover—Courtship in the Teens, etc.

CHAPTER II.—The General Lover—Safety in Numbers—Difficulty of Selection, etc.

CHAPTER III.—Different Types of Lovers, etc.

CHAPTER V.—The Lover Feeling his Way—Breaking the Ice—First Realisation of Love—The Danger of Overpraise, etc.

CHAPTER VII.—The Lover on His Trial—Some Things to Avoid, etc.

CHAPTER VIII.—Letters between Unengaged Lovers—The Man who is afraid to Speak—A Platonic Friend, etc.

CHAPTER X.—Acceptance and Rejection—The Obligations of an Engaged Man, etc.

CHAPTER XII.—His Gifts—Visits and other Attentions—Courting or Shunning Publicity, etc.

CHAPTER XIII.—Lovers' Quarrels—The First Tiff—Taking Offence, etc.

CHAPTER XIV.—The Lover who is Eager to Marry—The Lover who Works to Make a Home—The Man who Seeks one Ready-made, etc.

CHAPTER XVI.—How to Treat Former Love Affairs—Confidences—Mutual Trust—Curiosity, etc.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "The Lover's Guide," for which I inclose One Shilling and Twopence.

Name .....

Address .....

Digitized by Google

ASTHMA

WHY ? ? is it generally thought that there is no cure for

ASTHMA, CHRONIC BRONCHITIS, SHORTNESS OF BREATH, EMPHYSEMA, BLOOD-SPITTING, HAY FEVER, and other Lung Complaints!

BECAUSE ! ! the usual treatments only confine themselves to combating single symptoms instead of attacking the root of the disease.

BE SURE THERE IS ONE

ABSOLUTE LASTING CURE.

Sufferers will receive post free,

FREE OF CHARGE,

particulars of the famous WEIDHAAS HOME TREATMENT when applying to THE PAUL WEIDHAAS HYGIENIC INSTITUTE, 16 T.A. Buckingham Rd., Brighton.

Mr. Weidhaas has tried the Treatment on himself, after having been given up as incurable, and cured himself, and had then practised it for over 19 years in many thousands of special cases. Many having suffered for over 40 years have been cured by his Treatment (in some instances even at the age of 70 or 80 years), after having been GIVEN UP AS INCURABLE.

No interference with daily occupation Send description of complaint, and mention if you suffer from COLD FEET. Read the following Testimonials, two out of thousands received:

SERIOUS LUNG COMPLAINT developing into Asthma, and complicated by BLOOD-SPITTING of 16 years' standing in the case of a young man of 18, CURED. The symptoms given indicated that the disease was on the point of turning into Consumption.

"It is with feelings of the deepest gratitude I testify to the marvellous effect your treatment had on my son. When he was two years old (he is now 18), he had congestion of the lungs, and after that whenever he caught cold he had wheezing and shortness of breath. As he grew older he got worse, and about six years ago I took him to a doctor, who said it was Asthma, and there was no cure for it. We tried all kinds of remedies, but nothing did him any good. The attacks got more frequent till he used to have them regularly once a fortnight. They were very bad. He could not lay down in bed, and his cough was very bad, with spitting of blood. Then we resolved to try your Cure, and I am sure we have every reason to be thankful we did, for now he is strong and healthy, can sleep and eat well, or walk any distance without fatigue. I shall be very pleased to answer any inquiries about the Cure, and shall do my utmost to induce anyone suffering from such a dreadful complaint to try your Cure, for I am sure it is within the reach of everyone."

Mrs.———, 18071 B.

(Full address on application.)

BRONCHIAL ASTHMA, after being treated by Four Doctors without getting relief, and accompanied by DISTRESSING COUGH, PERSISTENT INDIGESTION, LOSS OF APPETITE and all the usual symptoms of Failing Health, Cured.

When applying for the treatment, the patient complained of all the symptoms above mentioned. After a full course of treatment the lady wrote:—

"I do not know how to express my thanks to you for the great benefit I have received from your wonderful cure. Before I came under your treatment, nearly every fortnight I was prostrate with severe attacks of asthma, and did not know what a good night's rest was. I have been under four doctors, but got no relief, and had given up all hope of ever getting well again until my husband saw your advertisement and persuaded me to give it a trial. Am thankful to say I am now in excellent health, and I thank God I was brought under your treatment and shall be most pleased to recommend anyone to you suffering the same."

Mrs.———, 12923, VIII.

(Full address on application.)

The Director is prepared to pay to any Charitable Institution if the above are not genuine extracts from the patients' own letters. The originals may be seen at the Paul Weidhaas Hygienic Institute by any bona-fide enquirers.

£1,000

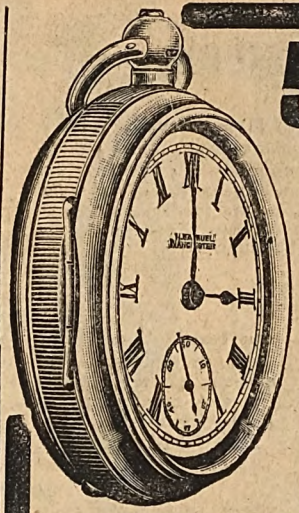
CURABLE



5/- ONLY

Sent to-day, will bring you by return of post

H. SAMUEL'S Famous

'ACME'

SILVER LEVER.

Test it for a week. If satisfied remit balance 20/-.

Solid Silver Cases, fine jewelled movement, dust proof cap, and the latest patented improvements. Price 25/-.

Full amount returned if dissatisfied.

WRITTEN WARRANTY FOR 7 YEARS.

A SILVER ALBERT FREE!

To all sending full amount, 25/-, with order.

Send a Post-card Now for the

FREE BARGAIN GUIDE,

260 Pages, 3,000 Engravings of Watches, Clocks, Rings, Cutlery, &c.

Free by Return Mail.

H. SAMUEL, Dept. 20, Market Street, MANCHESTER.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back, Puts the hair right, Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALŒLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account.—Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.—

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trowbridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find the renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

Colonel PERRY—

"My Dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER.

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER—

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

A 4/6 full size bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemist and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9 and 5/-

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, of points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

Cold Beauty.

"Ezra" is in love with a very beautiful girl. But whenever he makes any advances he finds she treats him as rather a bore, though all the time she has professed to return his affection. Is it a trait of very pretty girls to expect all the love-making to be done by the other side, or do I interpret the reason to be that "Ezra" is being deceived by her?

* * * * *

Judge the girl's conduct with others, particularly men, If you find she makes herself peculiarly attractive all round, rest assured that she is probably a flirt who likes you as long as you afford her sufficient sport. After this, it is usual for pretty flirts to allow the man to go where he pleases. On the other hand, if she appears to be generally cold towards others, and reserve is one of her characteristics, continue your campaign, resting assured that you are as favourably regarded as anyone else, and that the odds are in favour of her being really fond of you.

Fair, Fat, and—Sixteen!

"Could you tell me of a cure for fatness?" writes "K. L. L. L." "I am thirty-six inches across the chest, forty round the hips, five feet one inch tall, and am only sixteen years old. I do a great deal of cycling, and have everything I require. As my friends constantly jeer at me for my size, I should be obliged if you could give me a cure."

* * * * *

I observe that "K. L. L. L." has everything he (or she) wants. Perhaps this accounts for his (or her) abnormal size—a too luxurious and adequate diet. Let "K. L. L. L." consistently eat less, avoid all sweetening substances, such as sugar in tea or coffee, confectionery, jam, and the like, also take butter in great moderation, and also be sparing towards such a vegetable as the potato. By the elimination of such things from the diet one can at any rate guard against putting on weight. "K. L. L. L." should continue cycling, and should also go in for walking and active pastimes generally. If such a course does not reduce the annoying bulkiness, "K. L. L. L." had really better see a doctor, for at sixteen certainly such dimensions are not normal.

There Are Worse Things than Ignorance.

"Nancy" is in love with a gentleman who seems to care nothing at all about her. He is a scholar, and in speaking to him, "Nancy" always is conscious of her ignorance. Can I tell her some way to make herself pleasing to him?

* * * * *

If you know that you are inferior to the man in knowledge, by all means avoid trying to appear his equal. There is nothing he would sooner see through than an affectation of knowledge. Just be as natural and agreeable as you can. He will probably like you all the more for your lack of intellectual gifts. Clever men usually seek their sweethearts among any but clever women.

"Eric's" Trouble Settled.

I am very glad to hear from correspondents as to the results of their following any advice I am able to give them in regard to their love affairs. It is a great pleasure for me to hear that my recent advice to "Eric's" sweetheart, who hesitated to marry because of a disablement, has prevailed with her, and that the young couple will soon be united without hindrance.

"Veilchen's" Mysterious Admirer.

"Veilchen."—Thank you for your sympathy in my accident. Do you not think it would be better to try and forget all about the man whose attitude suggests that he has feelings towards you, but who, apparently, has not the courage or resource to try and become acquainted with you? I know it would be very difficult, seeing that you evidently return in some measure his feelings; but, as you say, there might be great disappointment in store for you if you actually got to know him, and the fact that he is much beneath you in social position would much complicate matters. Write to me fully, giving me a description of the man's appearance, probable occupation, and the nature of his conduct when he has seen you; also where you encounter him, and I will try and assist you by some practical suggestion. At present, of course, it is only possible to give you general advice.

Those Changeable Girls.

I have had two letters from correspondents whose troubles seem to be identical, and invite the same solution. Both have been acquainted with girls, whom they had reason to believe were fond of them. Recently, however, they have altered their behaviour for no clear reason. In the case of "Perplexed," the girl now fails to recognise him, and when he taxed her with the fact she replied evasively. He adds that she was at the seaside about two weeks ago. My other correspondent "G. F. C.," complains of almost identical treatment.

* * * *

Now, there appears to be one very probable solution of the matter. In the case of "Perplexed," evidently the girl has decided, perhaps as the result of her seaside visit, that she is no longer fond of him. Probably she met someone else on her holiday who has stolen her heart. "Perplexed" should return her treatment of him in her own coin, and not show himself in any way disturbed by her conduct. If men treated in this way showed a little more pride they would not find women so ready to throw them over at fancy. It is because they show so little power of retaliation that many girls trifle with their affections in this manner. Both "Perplexed" and "G. F. C." should take an independent line. If the girls do not want their society, they should not thrust it on them. No man should make himself a nuisance to any girl. It is neither kind to her nor dignified for himself.

That Over-Rated Question.

"Agnes" wears an engagement ring placed on her finger by "Thomas," and is constantly with him on terms of the greatest intimacy. It has however, just dawned upon her that he has never proposed to her. Can a girl be engaged to a man who has never actually "popped the question"?

* * * *

"Popping the question," "Agnes," is a process to which those who have never been in love attach too much importance. Young people who have taken a fancy to each other from the first, and whose meetings have been those of lovers almost at the outset, scarcely think it necessary to make any formal proposal of marriage. It is taken for granted that at the earliest opportunity the ceremony will take place. No doubt this is how the matter stands between you and your sweetheart. You know you are to be married, just as you know you will get up to-morrow morning. Why then bother about that formal question, which, after all, is only held in such esteem by people not in love?

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

OUR CATALOGUE

A BUYER'S GUIDE

Tells you

HOW and WHAT to Buy.

Absolute satisfaction or your money refunded; that's our way.

Reliable goods which never fail to please. Goods that everybody wants, at irresistible prices, either for Cash or Deferred Payments made easy enough to suit the lightest purse.

Jewellery, Watches, Clocks, Electro-plate, Musical Instruments, Organettes, Phonographs, and a thousand and one domestic "Wants," all fully described in this wonderful book.

DRAPER'S CATALOGUE SENT FREE.

J. M. Draper, Dept. 366, Northern Emporium,
Higher Audley St., BLACKBURN.

DELIVERED FREE

PHONOGRAPHS FREE

A Practical Up-to-date Sound Reproducing Instrument, which will take any Standard Record and bring forth the Words, Music or other Sounds in a Perfect Manner.

AN ABSOLUTELY FREE GIFT

This is a Genuine Offer. It comes to you from the well-known establishment of Symonds' London Stores. We are the largest Phonograph suppliers directly to the public of any firm in the United Kingdom. When we make a promise we keep it. We now tell you that we mean to give away a limited number of the celebrated Symonds' Premier Phonographs. You can verify our assertion by answering this advertisement. But do not wait and be too late.

THE REASON FOR OUR FREE OFFER

We have set aside a quantity of our Symonds' Premier Phonographs to be distributed for advertising purposes. We offer to give you one of these Phonographs provided that whenever friends ask where you obtained it you will mention that it came from Symonds' London Stores, and also provided that you keep at least half-a-dozen of our Records according to the Award which we will send you (playing selections of band music, songs, &c.), so that your friends may know their quality. You will not be required to pay a penny for the complete Phonograph. We will send the Phonograph, carefully packed, and by the directions you can learn to operate it quickly and easily. We can supply comic songs, sentimental songs, religious selections, or band music. What kind do you prefer? Our catalogue will help your choice.

Bear in mind you are not to send us any money for the Phonograph, but merely write a letter, mentioning having seen this offer in this paper. Give us your full address, being particular to also mention the nearest railway station. Enclose stamp.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

HYPNOTISM

BE A HYPNOTIST AND MAKE FUN AND MONEY.

It takes but a few hours to learn, the study is both easy and fascinating. Hypnotism is an endless source of fun and wonder. If you know how to hypnotise you can perform the most marvellous feats imaginable. You can do a thousand amazing things that other people cannot do. You can surprise all your friends and make yourself famous. You can place anyone you wish under this strange and magic spell. You can compel them to think, act, and feel just as you wish. If you want to make money you can do it by giving entertainments, curing diseases, or teaching the art to others. These are three sure and easy ways to win a fortune. Why be poor, why work for others, when you can master this money-making profession so easily? Investigate now. You can learn at home without cost. I will send you my BIG FREE BOOK for the asking. It tells all about Hypnotism. It is the most elaborate and valuable work of the kind ever published. It contains many beautiful pictures, and explains all the mysteries and secrets of the art. Anybody can learn from it all about the Hypnotic spell, how it is operated, how it sways the will of its subjects, heals the sick, reforms the degraded, wins undying love, helps to trade or position, amuses an audience for profit, and gains for the operator himself health, wealth, and happiness. It also treats fully on Personal Magnetism, Magnetic Healing, and kindred subjects, and how to CURE YOURSELF of any pain, ache, or disease. Remember the book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. Simply write for it, and it will be sent by next post, all charges paid. Don't send any money or stamp, but send your name and address TO-DAY.

PROFESSOR WILLI MS,
Blenheim House, Oxford St., LONDON, W.

£ SUCCESS

Does it elude you? Why do not brain and industry always win? What does win success and influence? Would you like to know the scientific explanation of the subject? The law of mental currents? The study of the effect of one mind on another? The philosophy of personal magnetism? You need it.

FREE.—Send for the strange and fascinating illustrated booklet, "The Power Within." It is published and given away free by The PSYCHIC RESEARCH CO. (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Av., E.C.

Enclose 1d. stamp for return postage.

NOSE

RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (BT), Specialist: South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

GIVEN AWAY

with the AUTUMN DOUBLE NUMBER of

HOME NOTES

(No. 456).

Paper Pattern OF THIS

DRESSING JACKET.

Of all Bookstalls & Newsagents.

PRICE 2d.

Digitized by Google

Beecham's Pills for Bilious Persons

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S MUSIC FOLIO

VOLUME 20 NOW READY.

THE NEW VOLUME COMPRISES—

Three Numbers from "Faust." Michael Watson's "The Kissing Bridge." Kingsley's "Three Fishers" (Hullah's music). Five Dances and Piano Pieces. Two Coon Melodies by Gus Collins. And many other good songs—30 in all—several of which are copyright.

BEECHAM'S MUSIC FOLIO is not "cheap" in any sense of the word, except in price. It is lithographed from well-engraved plates on good paper and edited by an eminent Professor of Music, thus guaranteeing perfect accuracy. The songs have all the original pianoforte accompaniments in full. A list of the contents of each volume may be had from most Booksellers, or post free from the Proprietor.

Volume 20 and the preceding 19 Volumes can be obtained from most Newsagents, Booksellers and Music-sellers, at TWOPENCE per Volume; or will be sent post free for THREEPENCE per Volume from

The Proprietor of "BEECHAM'S PILLS," St. Helens, Lancashire.

Set of 20 Volumes post free for 4/- (Stamps or P.O.).

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 720.] Week ending October 18th, 1902. [One Penny.

"I declare an impediment. This man is a murderer!" gasped the convict in a voice quivering with emotion.

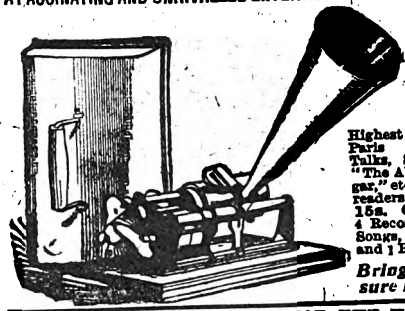
(A Thrilling Incident from the Story "That Consummate Villain" on page 106.)

Digitized by Google

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

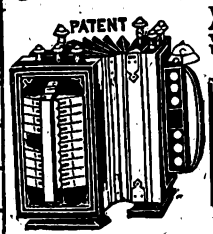


CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, " 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, " 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, " 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount. Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1902, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW. Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Watches

A SOUND ... INVESTMENT.

Lady's Sterling Silver Watch and Albert in Case for ... 30/-

APPROVAL BEFORE PURCHASE TERMS ....

METHOD: Send only 2/- with order, the Watch and Albert will then be forwarded; if satisfied, send 2/- per month until the balance is paid, (Cash Purchasers receive HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT).

The Full Amount of the deposit will be refunded if you are not satisfied.

Description. Sterling Silver Watch with horizontal movement, fitted with all Modern Improvements, and Fully Jewelled; Handsomely Finished Opal Dial, Decorated and Embellished in High-class Style; Artistically Designed Sterling Silver Cases. Warranted 5 Years.

Very Neat Two-row Sterling Silver Albert, with Bar and Drop Piece.

Send for our No. 7 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, &c., &c. Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED.

Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division Street, Sheffield.

Cures in Ten Minutes

Never Fails!

Nothing "Like It" or "As Good"

KAPUTINE

The Safe Remedy for

HEADACHE & NEURALGIA

Supplied for use in the Field Hospitals of H.I.M. THE KING OF GREECE, the Red Cross Society in the South African War, the Anglo-Chinese Hospitals, &c., &c.

Recommended by many medical men, including Dr. Alexander, M.D., Dr. Thompson, M.D., Dr. Boyd Williams, M.D., &c., &c.

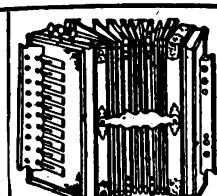
There is no similar preparation, nor anything as good.

All leading Chemists sell it at 1/-, packet of 18 doses, or for 12 stamps, from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield.

THE DAILY EXPRESS.

HALF-PENNY.



BANKRUPT STOCK.—26/- Melodeons for 9/6. Rich, full, organ-tone instrument. 13 fold, metal bound bellows, three sets reeds, four acting stops, including tremolo and diapason. Perfect order guaranteed. Only 9/6, carriage free. Money back if not satisfied. C. DAVIS, Pawnbroker, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

A Revolution in Home Dyeing.

New Style Old Style

A 4d. CAKE OF

MAYPOLE SOAP

to be had in any colour, will enable you to dye Fabrics, Garments, Laces, Blouses, Ribbons, or anything dyeable

A DURABLE, NEVER-FADING COLOUR.

Send for Free Booklet, "THE PERFECTION OF HOME DYEING," to the Maypole Co., Ltd., 17, Cumming Street, London, N.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

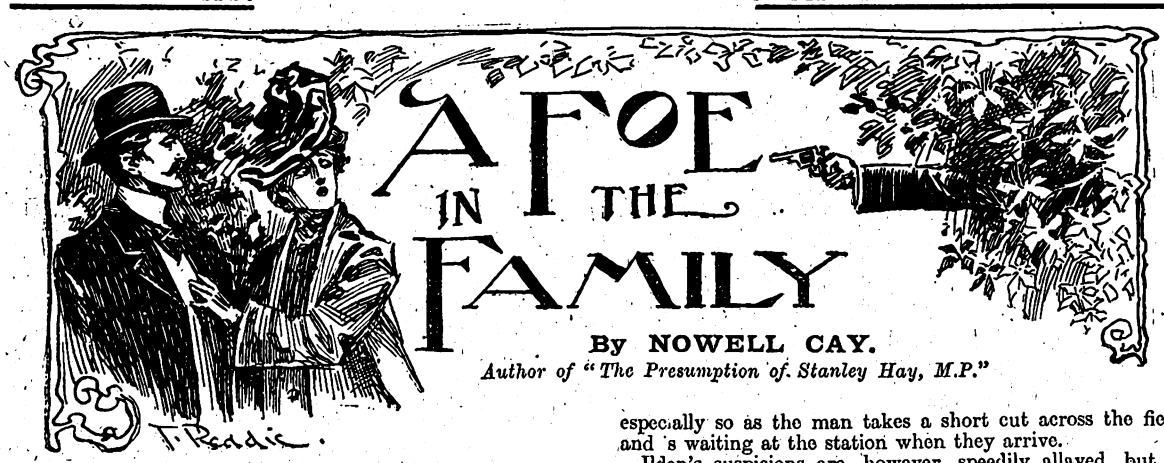
EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Short Stories.

No. 720. For the Week Ending October 18th, 1902. One Penny.

OUR SPLENDID NEW SERIAL. START TO-DAY.

DON'T MISS THE COMPETITION ON PAGE 495.



By NOWELL CAY.

Author of "The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P."

The Lady of the Bank Notes.

WHILE returning one evening to Pennybrook Hall, the residence of his uncle Jasper, Lord Ilden discovers a young girl in great distress at having lost two five pound notes, the whole of her wages for six months as a country governess. Together they search for the missing money; but as it is getting dusk, and Lord Ilden wants to get rid of his pretty companion, who turns out to be the sister of one of his old college chums, he manages to substitute two of his own notes and return them to her. She goes away overflowing with gratitude.

When she has disappeared, however, Lord Ilden continues the search. He fails to find the money, but instead discovers an envelope addressed to himself, the contents of which he has never seen. The envelope is addressed in a girl's handwriting, and is postmarked "Lallerton." Pocketing his find, Lord Ilden is lighting a cigarette, when the report of a rifle suddenly breaks the stillness of the evening, and a bullet whizzes just past him and buries itself in a tree behind.

"That," mutters Lord Ilden, "is the third attempt which has been made on my life during my stay at Pennybrook Hall."

On his return to his uncle's, he tells his cousin, Catherine Hay, of his adventure, and, feeling assured that the attempts are being made by some member of the family, many of whom would profit considerably by his death, proposes marriage to her as a means of reducing the value of his own death to his enemies. Whilst very anxious about his safety, and only too willing to help him as much as she can, Cathie, however, explains her inability to marry him.

Meanwhile Lord Ilden has discovered that it is his cousin Percival who opened the post-bag and extracted the letter addressed to himself, the envelope of which he found in the coppice.

That same evening Lord Ilden's butler discovers a large quantity of poison in his master's flask. This makes the fourth attempt.

Upon receiving the news, Lord Ilden considers it wisest to leave Pennybrook Hall at once. He is driving to the station with Cathie when they overtake a man who appears to take a great interest in them. Ilden's suspicions are instantly aroused, especially so as the man takes a short cut across the fields, and is waiting at the station when they arrive.

Ilden's suspicions are, however, speedily allayed, but his curiosity considerably excited when he discovers this gentleman in one of the carriages in the train he is about to enter in animated conversation with Florence Courthorpe, the lady of the bank notes.

(The above is a short summary of the opening chapters.)

All rights reserved.]

CHAPTER IV.
Who Would Benefit.

As Lord Ilden glanced into the railway compartment, Florence Courthorpe's eyes had met his and brightened with a shy smile of recognition. He raised his hat and passed on to where Jardine was holding open for him the door of a first-class carriage.

"You have taken tickets for Ilden Market?"

"Yes, my lord."

"That is right. Give me mine and put the small Gladstone in here with me. You will go on to the Castle with the rest of the luggage, and remain there till you hear from me. I shall not change at Rickerby, but go on with the train."

The well-trained valet's face expressed no shade of surprise at the announcement.

"Yes, my lord."

"If anybody inquires about me, they may as well imagine that I am remaining at Pennybrook. You can give any explanation you like of your own return."

"Yes, my lord. I understand."

Catherine hurried up as he disappeared.

"Is he not in the train?" she asked excitedly.

"Yes, but he is with a young lady, and I do not care to interrupt their tête-à-tête. I think that we have been exciting ourselves about him without cause, Cathie. He was no doubt waiting for her when we overtook him, and the sight of the wagonette galloping to the station, reminded him that the train was due and that she must be in advance of him."

His cousin was not willing to dismiss her suspicions so abruptly.

"Perhaps the woman is an accomplice who has been watching the station," she said, and Ilden smiled his sphinx-like smile.

Digitized by Google

"I do not think so, because she told me yesterday evening that she was leaving Pennybrook this morning."

"You know her then?"

"As a lady above suspicion," said Ilden, and as he spoke the train started, leaving his cousin, if possible, more anxious about him than ever. The case as it stood had been disturbing enough without the introduction of a woman into it.

Coming away through the booking-office she dried her eyes hastily at the sight of Grant Ilden, who was just handing his bicycle over to the charge of a porter.

A tinge of colour came into Cathie's cheeks as she saw him.

"I did not know you were so anxious to see Cousin George off," she said. "What a pity! You are just too late."

"I can survive the misfortune," he said distantly. "I at least can contemplate 'my lord's' departure without profound sorrow. Now that he is gone there will perhaps be some chance for a mere ordinary person to enjoy a little of your society."

"Not if the mere ordinary person is going to be objectionable. I cannot understand why you 'scorched' down to the station if you care so little for George."

"I thought that you might not care to return alone, but, of course, if you want to think over the secrets you have been exchanging I do not wish to interrupt you."

"Now that is considerate of you," she said with teasing irony. "But as you are here, I suppose we may as well walk together. That is, if you don't mind walking. I told the wagonette not to wait. As for the secrets Cousin George has been telling me, I want to think over them very seriously indeed. But I don't think you will interfere with my thoughts. In fact you may help them. Do you know by sight any of the men who have lent your Uncle Jasper money."

Grant's handsome, melancholy face flushed angrily.

"You are playing with me," he said. "Ilden was not talking to you about Uncle Jasper's debts, and if he was, it was not that that made you cry."

Catherine drew herself up.

"I did not know that you were trying to discover what Cousin George and I talked about."

The accusation was near enough to the truth to make him apologetic.

Cathie received his disclaimers with becoming severity.

"And now suppose that you answer my question," she said, when he had finished. "Do you know your uncle's creditors by sight?"

They had left the station behind them now, and were turning into the "short cut" across the fields, which had enabled the "unknown" to catch his train.

The poet's melancholy was disappearing under the influence of Catherine's society, and the knowledge that he had her all to himself, with Lord Ilden well out of the way.

"Uncle Jay's creditors!" he repeated. "That is rather a large order. He owes me half-a-crown."

"But the money lenders?" she said, very seriously. "The men to whom he owes large sums? Do you know any of them by sight?"

"I have met Isaacs. Percival tried to get an advance out of him on the strength of his expectations—which are worth nothing—and nearly got into trouble over it. Percy is such a reckless fool. Isaacs said that he led him to believe that he was Lord Ilden himself, and the Pater had to pay a good deal to hush it up. That is how the money goes. If Percy were content with his allowance, I might not be a pauper."

He spoke very bitterly, and Cathie, who knew that he suffered enough from his brother's complete selfishness to excuse the absence of any fraternal sympathy or championship, felt very sorry for him; but she was too intent on her investigations to say so.

"And what sort of a man is this Isaacs to look at?" she asked.

"He is the picture of a Jewish patriarch. At heart he is a skinflint, and looks like a beaming philanthropist."

"An old man?"

"He looks eighty."

Catherine lost interest in Mr. Isaacs.

"Have you noticed, in Pennybrook or anywhere," she asked, a tall, thin man, with hooked features and strange, fierce-looking, dark eyes, who walks with his hands behind his back? You recognise the description?"

Grant had started.

"Yes, if he dresses in black and wears a black slouch hat. What do you know about him?"

"Nothing except that he went off by this train. I wondered who he could be."

"And you put him down as a money-lender. That is not a bad idea," said Grant thoughtfully, "although I should not think it is Uncle Jay that he came to bother."

"Whom then?"

"Percy. I have been wondering what they had to do with each other."

Cathie turned sick. Was it possible that Percival Ilden, a man who had lived in the same house with her, and with whom she had spoken familiarly, could really be involved in a plot against his cousin's life.

"Tell me all you know about this man," she said excitedly. "Who is he, and what has he had to do with your brother?"

"Oh! I know nothing. I have only seen him once in my life—yesterday evening. Percy and I happened to be coming home from the moors together—wrangling as usual, when in one of the lanes we saw the man you have described walking along slowly before us just as you have described, with his shoulders bent and his hands behind his back.

Percy did not notice him, and I said nothing until looking up I found the fellow had suddenly disappeared from sight. 'Hello! where's that apparition gone to?' I said, for the lane is pretty straight there, and I knew there were no side paths leading out of it. But I really spoke to show Percy that I was not listening. He was 'rowing' me because I had let something out to the Pater, and what I said made him stop at once.

He seemed in an awful funk when I told him what I had seen, and what the man was like, and surprised me by wanting to turn back. I was not going to do that, and have an extra mile's tramp instead of seeing where the man in front had got to. I said so to Percy. 'You can do as you like,' he said, 'but I am going back. If you see the fellow have a good look at him, and tell me what he is like.'

I had been laughing at him for being superstitious, but I saw that it was no superstition. He thought it was some man that he was trying to avoid, and I went on alone. As I half expected, the apparition was waiting in an inlet of the hedge, where it hid him from anybody coming along. It was under the shadow of a tree, and I should have passed him without noticing that there was anybody there at all if I had not been on the look-out. The fact that he seemed deliberately trying to avoid observation made me determined to have a look at him, so I asked him for a light.

He said he had not got one, but I pretended to find one as he spoke in my own vesta case, and stopped talking to him while I lighted up. That is how I saw his face. When Percy got home and I described him he seemed jolly serious about it, and the next I heard was that he was leaving by the next train. My idea is that he went on purpose to avoid that man in the lane."

Digitized by Google

Catherine was only bewildered by what she heard. She did not know what to think. Had Percival found his life in danger, as George had done? If so, the plot against the Ilden family must be a widespread one, and the only theory by which her cousin had tried to explain it was disproved. The only person who could gain by Percival's death joined to that of Lord Ilden was Grant himself, and he was plainly above suspicion.

She surprised him by an apparently irrelevant question.

"If George, and both his uncles, and your brother and yourself all died without heirs, who would get the title and property?"

"That is rather a poser," he said with a laugh. "I have never thought. But I suppose Jane and her children, if she has any, would have a 'look in.'"

Cathie felt bewildered by the increasing field of suspicion. She found herself remembering that Lady Barton had always seemed to her a very unprincipled girl, and that her husband, the baronet, had not a pleasant face, and she pulled herself up. Surely she was letting George's line of reasoning carry her too far.

It was better to find some fresh explanation of Percival Ilden's departure. She wondered whether he was in league with the "Unknown," and had been nervous only of the connection between them being discovered.

The governess inclined her head in a graceful farewell, while her new employer glared at him with the most forbidding expression.

"Do you know where your brother has gone?" she asked, and felt confirmed in her new suspicion when she found that, unlike George, he had made no secret of his whereabouts.

"He has gone to Paris," said Grant, "because the Washington Smiths are there. I suppose we shall hear that he is engaged to the heiress, if he is lucky."

"You think that Percival is in love with her?" asked Catherine, and the poet shrugged his shoulders.

"He is in love with her money. The old American is anxious, though, to get a title for his daughter. Percy would be all right if he had a real chance of the succession. Not that he cares a toss for the girl. Of course he will have to marry money if he marries at all, but it is a thing I could not do."

"Of course not—simply for money," said Cathie, her voice very matter-of-fact. "But if you happened to care for somebody who happened to have money, there could be no reason then why you should not ask her to marry you, could there?"

"There'd be every reason in the world while I remain a pauper," he said hotly and bitterly. "Even if I had Percival's allowance it might be different, but to know that I could not even keep myself without my wife's assistance! No, I could not do it. I could never respect myself."

Cathie's gentle voice was still studiously matter-of-fact.

"Not even if she cared for you and would not marry anybody else?"

Grant glanced at her quickly with a strange light in his handsome, melancholy eyes, but found the plain, sympathetic little face particularly indifferent and unexpressive.

"Thank Heaven, I should never know that she cared for me," he said.

Catherine laughed rather nervously.

"Unless she told you. What should you do then?"

The poet sighed.

"I should beg her to forget me."

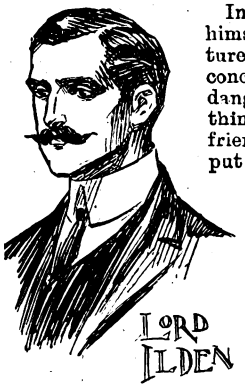
Catherine cast down her eyes.

"I think that would be rather cruel," she said, and was half relieved and half sorry when she saw her mother coming to meet her, and realised that the rather embarrassing tête-à-tête was at an end.

Mr. Ray at the Black Bull.

Meanwhile Lord Ilden was continuing his journey, feeling more than ever conscious of the ridiculously romantic nature of his flight. He had allowed his cousin's nervous suspicion of the stranger on the road to affect him to a certain extent, and make him imagine the most sinister motives for his actions. And then the fact that he knew and was travelling with Florence Courthorpe had rendered the "Unknown" abruptly an ordinary person, and made Ilden ashamed of the tether he had given to his imagination

Digitized by Google



In place of his suspicion he allowed himself to entertain some slight feature of jealousy against him. The concentration of his mind on his own danger had left him little leisure for thinking about the sister of his dead friend; he had more or less consciously put her affairs on one side to be considered when his mind was free. For the present she had obtained a situation, and he could no doubt obtain her address from the Rector of Pennybrook whenever he wished. But he had taken it as a matter of course that he must do something to help her. It seemed preposterous that Gerald Courthorpe's sister should be giving her services to middle-class people and sacrificing her independence for twenty pounds a year. If he interested his mother's sister, the Marchioness of Dalmenay, in her, something better at least than governess work might be found for her. The thought of helping a girl who had been so readily grateful had not been without its pleasurableness, but something of the pleasure had been due to the idea she had given him that help could come to her from no other source.

The possibility of her having another champion was not altogether welcome. He busied himself wondering again from a different point of view, but with scarcely less curiosity, who the stranger could be who had hurried to the station to accompany Florence Courthorpe on her journey.

It was only by an effort of will that he recalled his mind to the thought of his own adventure, and reminded himself that, leaving Florence Courthorpe's friend out of consideration, he had started with the expectation of being followed and avoiding pursuit.

The false suspicion had prevented him giving a thought to any of his other fellow passengers when he entered the train, and he set his mind on the alert to repair the omission as the train neared the little junction of Rickerby.

It was here that he would change trains if he were really returning to the Castle. If anybody were following him from Pennybrook they were likely to take some interest in the movements of his luggage and his valet. Remaining in the train he would have a good opportunity of keeping a counter watch upon them, and Ilden ensconced himself at a little distance from the window of his compartment to see without being seen as the train slackened speed and drew up at the platform.

The train for Ilden Market was already standing at the other side, ready to start. That from Pennybrook was, as usual, some minutes behind time, and there was bustle and excitement in moving the luggage from one train to the other.

Ilden kept his attention directed on his own trunks, which Jardine was seeing out of the van. For a moment or two they were almost obscured by the little crowd of passengers moving from one train to the other. Then as these took their seats and the platform was left comparatively clear, Ilden was interested to see that Florence Courthorpe's friend was leaving her. He was not travelling with her to her destination, it seemed, and for a moment this was the only thought in the mind of the man watching him. Then involuntarily he recalled Catherine's original suspicion against him, for the "Unknown" had strolled with apparent purposelessness past the pile of luggage on the platform, glancing furtively at the labelling, and, as if satisfied by the inspection, had taken his place in the train to Ilden Market. At the same moment Ilden's moved on, and he had leisure to think over the man's action, and wonder what it meant. After all he had been a little premature perhaps in thinking that his acquaintance with Miss Courthorpe cleared him entirely from suspicion. It is possible for the best people to have undesirable acquaintances, and if the man was really pursuing him he would naturally presume upon the slightest acquaintance to enter into conversation with Miss Courthorpe by way of disarming suspicion.

George smiled to himself. The incident of Miss Courthorpe's presence in the train might advantage him more than the stranger. If the latter were really pursuing him, as his action suggested, to Ilden Market, he could employ the time by ascertaining who he was.

The spirit of intrigue and adventure, which he had failed to feel very acutely so far, quickened in his mind at the thought. At the next stoppage he would change compartments, and begin investigations by questioning "the lady of the bank-notes." The inception of a plan, however slight, came as a relief. So far he had no object in his journey except to prevent his movements being traced from Pennybrook. Lallerton, he had discovered by a careful perusal of his cycling map, was a village within three miles or so of Shipton Gate, one of the stations he would have passed if he had gone with his luggage to Ilden Market. The fact had dissuaded him from going there at once. If anybody was following him from Pennybrook they would be sure to see him leave the train at Shipton Gate, and in such a little place would find it easy to trace him to his destination. He could feel no security there until he could know that he had first thrown any possible pursuer off the scent.

To-day the whim of the moment should decide where his journey ended. To-morrow he would go on to Lallerton in the hope of solving the mystery of the intercepted letter. And, meanwhile, it would be something to know that he was discovering the name of a possible foe.

When the train slackened speed again he lifted his Gladstone from the rack, preparatory to changing compartments when it stopped. But when he opened the door and stepped out on the platform, it was to find an unexpected interference with his programme.

Miss Courthorpe was stepping out of the train also. This was her destination no doubt, and he must choose between ending his own journey abruptly with her, or leaving his questions unasked for the present.

Miss Courthorpe had already recognised him again with a little start of surprise. No doubt she was imagining him in the other train on his way to Ilden Market, and George imagined that he saw a little disturbed dismay in her face as well as surprise.

He wondered whether it was due to the presence of a grimly sedate-looking matron who had been waiting on the platform and was advancing now to claim the governess.

This was, no doubt, Miss Courthorpe's new "employer," and her presence would make the interview on which he had been counting impossible.

A porter was hurrying up to take his bag, but found his services unnecessary. Ilden was returning to his compartment to continue his journey.

"Can you tell me who that lady is?' he asked with a glance at the matron.

"Yes, sir, that is Mrs. Morgan Wright, the doctor's wife," said the porter.

"And lives here, I suppose," said Ilden, taking a mental note of the name of the station, "Witterby."

"Yes, sir, at Minerva House on the other side of the village."

It was all that Ilden wanted to know. He had, no doubt, obtained the address at which he could write to Miss Courthorpe and make any inquiries he pleased about her companion of the train, and he settled himself to continue his journey.

The governess was standing by her luggage on the platform with her companion as the train moved on, and inclined her graceful head in a timid farewell, while Mrs. Morgan Wright stared at him with a forbidding air of disapproval, which quickened his pity for the girl delivered over to the tender mercies of such a severe-looking female.

Digitized by Google

The departure of the governess had left him again a little bored by his journey. There was no reason why he should continue it, and at the next station he left the train, deposited his bag in the cloak-room under the name of "Mr. Ray"—the first which suggested itself—and paid his fare from Rickerby at the gate.

He had been the only passenger to alight; but a rather spiritless determination to carry out his programme and make pursuit impossible demanded that he should place some miles between himself and the station before he looked out for an inn at which to take up his abode for the day. He started off at random, enjoying the tramp along winding country roads after the inaction of the train, and it was not till an hour's quick walking had given him a healthy appetite for lunch that he drew up at a picturesque little inn which seemed to mark the beginning of a village. Opposite the inn a tall, square house fronted the road without the reserve of a garden front. The two buildings seemed to Ilden like sentinels guarding the straggling street that lay beyond. Afterwards he would explore it. For the present lunch was the great necessity, and, entering the Black Bull through a pleasant, old-fashioned garden, he was ushered into a sweet-smelling room, looking out, as he had hoped, across the garden on the road.

Here was the peaceful spot he wanted in which to consider his position and map out a plan of action, and when his lunch had appeared and shown itself as satisfactory as the place, he settled that for one night at least the Black Bull should be his home, and he engaged a bedroom.

After lunch he lighted a cigar to think. The only plan in his mind at present, that of visiting Lallerton, was rather an apology for a plan, proclaiming his actual dearth of practical intention.

He was depending entirely upon a mere unsupported theory of what the intercepted letter had contained, and when he got there he would have to depend upon chance to render the visit of any use. And he would have to pass there under his own name. Here he had already given himself the protection of a false one.

For the present he had no doubt rendered his existence safe enough, but he could not consent to bury himself like this indefinitely, and at the end feel no safer than at the beginning. It would be different if he were married and with every year was rendering his own life of less importance to the many people interested in the succession.

Once more the idea of marriage recurred as a perfect counter-move to the intrigues which surrounded him. To marry and live in retirement with his wife for a year or two. But, even if he were willing to sacrifice his liberty for the baffling of his enemies, what lady of his acquaintance could he ask to marry him as he would have to marry, quickly, privately, and with the prospect of a long and anxious exile from England after the ceremony. He would not care to propose it to any of the girls whom his aunt, the Marchioness, had catalogued as suitable wives for him.

No, his only course was to discover, in the first place, who his enemy was, and as a first step he called for notepaper and envelopes to write to Miss Courthorpe.

But with the pen in his hand he realised that the writing of the letter was difficult. What reason could he give for addressing her at all or expressing so much curiosity about her travelling companion, let alone for asking her to address her reply to "Mr. Ray."

The writing of letters was not one of Lord Ilden's gifts, and he stared through the white curtained window for inspiration. His gaze wandered idly across the old-fashioned garden and the road to the severe-looking house opposite. There was a name carved over its doorway, and he tried idly to decipher it.

Then he started suddenly to his feet, staring at the lettering with an interest that was no longer idle, for the name carved over the doorway was "Minerva House," and he realised for the first time that the red lamp below it announced it as the home of a doctor. All unconsciously his wanderings had brought him back to Witterby, and he had settled down exactly opposite the new home of Florence Courthorpe.

"Well, it will save the trouble of writing," he said to himself with a shrug of his broad shoulders. "I am sure to meet her."

Still Another Attempt.

FLORENCE COURTHORPE sat at the open window of her bedroom and reviewed the events of the day.

It was barely ten o'clock yet, for the doctor's household retired early. Mrs. Morgan Wright had informed her of the fact in an aggressive tone which suggested an inclination on the governess's part to keep late hours, but Florence had received the announcement with relief. The afternoon and evening had seemed intolerably long to her. For already she had realised that her life at Witterby was to be as uncongenial a one as it had been at Pennybrook Rectory. Mrs. Wright was a sharp-voiced woman who had evidently been prejudiced against her by Mrs. Haydon. Here as at Pennybrook she was to be classed as a designing young woman, because the highly-objectionable son of the house there had persecuted her with unwel-

"Where is Lord Ilden?" she asked in excited tones. But the innkeeper could only stare at the fair apparition in mute astonishment.

Google

come attentions. Mrs. Wright's prejudice had clearly been increased by the presence of Lord Ilden in the train by which her governess arrived and his recognition, and she made no secret of her opinion that a governess ought not to have any acquaintances of the other sex.

"And who may that man be?" she had asked before they were out of the station, and Florence had felt her face redden, she scarcely knew why, as she gave Ilden's name and title.

"He was a great friend of my brother's at Rugby," she added as she noticed the matron's expression of mingled incredulity and disapproval.

"And has this Lord Ilden been travelling with you from Pennybrook?" asked the doctor's wife with acid suspicion.

Florence explained innocently that his lordship had travelled from Pennybrook in the same train, but that they had not met, and she flushed again with involuntary anger this time at the next question.

"I am not to understand, I hope, that the young man is following you?"

This was the woman with whom her lot was to be cast for a future of indefinite length, and her heart sank at the prospect.

The doctor she found to be a meek and silent little man who seemed to live in some fear of his wife. Her two charges, a sharp featured, impertinent little girl who took after her mother in looks, and a dull boy who took after his father, completed the family, and Florence tried in vain to look forward to teaching them with pleasure. A preliminary attempt in the afternoon had shown them both determined not to learn.

But although her new life had opened so unpromisingly, the girl was far from feeling unhappy as she sat by her open window looking out on the moonlight road, and the little inn across it, with here and there a window illuminated. Florence herself sat in a dark room, for Mrs. Wright had spoken emphatically on the subject of candles, and Florence had undressed very quickly to blow out the light before there was any danger of it suggesting extravagance in the morning.

But she knew that it was impossible to sleep. Her mind was too full of thought.

She recalled her first night at Haydon Rectory, the commencement of her life as a paid dependent. She had been received much more kindly there—it was afterwards that Sidney Haydon's infatuation rendered his mother vindictive—but even after a kind reception she had spent the night in tears. She wondered a little at her cheerfulness now. Was it that she had learnt to accept the inevitable philosophically?

"What one cannot change one can always bear," she said to herself. "One need not think about the unpleasant things."

And she did not know herself that she was able to forget the unpleasantness of her surroundings so easily because her mind was so full of a pleasanter subject. She was scarcely conscious of the completeness with which her dead brother's friend filled her thoughts.

He had always stood to her for a hero, chiefly, no doubt, because he was her brother's. Gerald Courthorpe's enthusiasm had made him a model of chivalry and of all the virtues, and her desire to see the modern Bayard had been frustrated on one score and another until her brother's death made her cease remotely to hope for it. And then at the moment when she felt most neglected and friendless, when Mrs. Haydon's unkindness and the uncertainty of the future had driven her out to her favourite walk in the coppice for a good cry, only to increase her distress by the supposed loss of her just paid salary—it was then when her surroundings seemed darkest and her need of a friend most great, that "Bayard" had appeared to lift her out of her grief with a characteristic generosity and chivalry. He had made demands on her admiration and gratitude, and the revelation of his identity had appeared to her the most romantic thing in her life—the life that held so little romance now.

No wonder that the thought of her dead brother's friend conquered her mind to the exclusion of her troubles.

They had mingled with them, and relief at leaving the Rectory had tinged itself with regret that she was losing all chance of seeing Lord Ilden again.

It had seemed quite an event to her when she saw him leaving Pennybrook in the same train as herself. He was returning no doubt to Ilden Castle, and Florence was conscious of a keen disappointment that she had not succeeded in catching another glimpse of him crossing the platform at Rickerby Junction.

The day had been indeed a succession of vague wishes and startlingly unexpected fulfilments. There had been the discovery at Witterby that Lord Ilden had not left the train at the junction after all, and then when it had carried him away and she had finally made up her mind that this glimpse of him was her last, had come the strangest and most startling coincidence of all. The tall, handsome figure which she had seen carried away by the train had appeared in the little inn exactly opposite her new home.

From the windows of the schoolroom she had seen him stroll out and return as she battled with her contumacious charges in the afternoon, and had scarcely been able to believe her eyes. After that her duties had seemed less trying, and her position less friendless. It was easy to determine that her mind should not dwell on the discomforts of her new life when it was employed so busily trying to invent explanations of a wonderful coincidence.

Nor was her excited interest in the position lessened by the knowledge that Lord Ilden's presence at the Black Bull would excite suspicion in the mind of her employer. It had been exasperating at Pennybrook Rectory to incur resentment and lose her situation because an unbearable young man had persecuted her with attentions in spite of her keen dislike for him; but Florence was vaguely conscious that to suffer for the imaginary attentions of her brother's friend would have a certain sweetness.

In an indefinite way it would seem to connect them, and there was an underlying pleasure in the thought which she did not dream of analysing to herself. Mrs. Morgan Wright's impertinent suggestion that he had followed her came back. It was ridiculous, of course, but it no longer made her angry.

And, since the coincidence was so wonderful, and any explanation of it so difficult to find, a little question did insist on asking itself faintly in her mind. When Lord Ilden had shown himself so deeply sympathetic, and so keenly touched by the change in her position, might he not have taken this, the only means, of seeing her and speaking to her again?

She believed that he had intended to speak to her at Witterby station, and would have done so but for Mrs. Wright's presence, and the frightened appeal in her own eyes. He had questioned the railway porter, and the man had jerked his thumb in the direction of her employer. Could it be that Lord Ilden was ascertaining her address?

It was all very improbable, of course; but when is improbability a check to the surmises of nineteen?

The night was a romantic one. The air—very still, after a wonderful October day—made the girl at the window, in her lightly-covered night-dress, welcome the faint breath that stole in to play on her flushed cheeks.

Outside the white road wound its way to the village like a band of silver in the moonlight. The light made beautiful the irregular red roof of the inn, with its many gables. The rest lay for the most part in intense shadow, through which the light from a window here and there shone out with a pleasant friendliness.

She was wondering whether one of the lighted windows was that of Lord Ilden's room, and, as if in answer to her wish, Ilden himself answered the question by appearing at the oblong of light beneath her and throwing up the sash to stand there enjoying the night air as she was doing.

Involuntarily Florence drew back a little, although she was quite sure that she could not be seen in the darkness. Lord Ilden was looking across now, and the girl's heart beat a little more quickly as their glances seemed to meet across the darkness, although his was an unconscious one.

Then she sighed. The figure had disappeared, and she was left anxiously waiting for an unexplained, but wholly pleasurable excitement to be repeated.

It seemed as though she would have to wait in vain, for twenty minutes went by without any sign of Ilden's reappearance. But Florence had no thought of going to bed. She felt strangely awake to-night and at the end of the twenty minutes her watch was rewarded, though not in the way she had hoped.

Something very strange was happening. The dense shadow which surrounded the lighted oblong of the window below seemed to be moving. Part of it was spreading before the light, and as the girl watched wonderingly it became the dark silhouette of a man—a man wearing a slouch hat and holding something in his hand.

He had raised his head slowly and stealthily from below the line of the window-sill as if to look into the room. Now he had risen boldly and stood surveying the interior, and as he did so a sickening sense of apprehension came to the unseen watcher, for it seemed to her that the thing he held in his hand was a revolver. The light gleamed for a moment on a bright barrel, and Florence held her breath paralysed by dread. Who the man could be she did not try to conjecture, but there could be little doubt that he intended to shoot the man in the room. Even as she looked she was expecting to hear the report and know that Lord Ilden had been treacherously murdered. The fear robbed her of all power of motion.

But the silhouetted figure was moving now. It seemed almost as though it were descending into the earth as it dropped lower and lower until only the black outline of the slouch hat was visible against the light of the open window.

The man had crouched there to wait. A quick feminine intuition showed her the position. Lord Ilden was not in the room, and the man was hiding there ready to shoot him as he entered. And at the thought the girl seemed suddenly to wake to action.

She must warn Lord Ilden before it was too late. Already she had wasted precious moments in futile watching and dread, and she threw on her dressing-gown with trembling fingers.

She was careful to make no sound as she opened the door of her room and crept down the dark and silent stairs; to be stopped would be to waste time answering questions and giving explanations, and a moment lost might mean the loss of a life.

With the same care she drew back the bolts of the hall door, and closing it behind her crept swiftly across the moonlit road.

Her heart was in her mouth now lest the waiting murderer should catch sight of her; but though the fear was there, it did not delay her footsteps for a moment.

She was panting with fear more than her running as she flew up the garden path to the inn-door within a few yards of where she had seen the man hiding, and turned the knob desperately.

The door had not been locked yet, although the inn was closed for the night, and the next moment she was inside, closing and locking the door behind her.

She breathed more freely now. Beyond her, through the dark bar extended a dimly-lighted passage. The wide-open door on the right must be that of Lord Ilden's room, and he could not enter it now without her seeing and stopping him.

She crept forward to it and looked within so far as she could without entering. The thought of the murderer outside made it a place of terror.

But she was satisfied that the room was empty and she stopped at the doorway then, a little in doubt as to what she should do next, and for the first time remembered that she presented a strange figure in her dressing-gown, her bare, slippered feet and widely-flowing hair.

Such she appeared to the worthy innkeeper who had heard the door being bolted and appeared now at the end of the passage to inquire the cause of such an inexplicable sound.

He stood surveying the apparition with widely staring eyes. Nor did Florence's anxious question serve to lessen his sense of bewilderment.

"Where is Lord Ilden?" she asked with anxious directness, and the innkeeper found his tongue with difficulty.

"There ain't no gentleman of that name in this neighbourhood, Miss."

She stared at him incredulously.

"But there is a gentleman staying here?"

"Yes, Miss, a Mr. Ray."

Ilden appeared behind him as he spoke. He had been chatting with his host and hostess in the old-fashioned raftered kitchen, and followed the former in time to hear his name. His well-controlled face expressed no surprise, and little of the admiration with which the unexpected picture inspired him.

"Oh! it is Miss Courthorpe," he said, "will you come into my room?" And he was advancing to the doorway.

But at the movement, all the girl's tragic fear came back to relieve her sudden self-consciousness, and she put out her hands excitedly to stop him.

"No, not in there. A man is waiting at the window to shoot you," she cried, and Ilden's face grew a shade more grave. His fancied security had been fallacious then.

"I am greatly indebted to you then for warning me," he said quietly. "The man is in the garden, I suppose?"

"Yes, I saw him from the window of my room."

His matter-of-fact tone had come as a great relief to her, and put her at her ease. She had been afraid of incredulity.

He turned to the wondering innkeeper.

"You might tell some of your men that this fellow is hiding in the garden. He has made four attempts on my life already, and I will give twenty pounds to anyone who secures him. You must come into the kitchen, Miss Courthorpe, and sit down while we scour the garden. You must not catch cold."

"Yes, come along in, dear," chimed in the innkeeper's wife who had followed into the passage and gathered something of the position more quickly than her husband. But Florence could only think of the danger to Ilden. Her eyes met his in terrified appeal.

"But you will not expose yourself in the garden. It is you he wishes to shoot, and he has a revolver," she cried.

"As I have," said Ilden. "If there is any risk I must take my share. But I am afraid that he will have taken alarm already."

His voice expressed impatience, and forbade her to make any further remonstrance. She was conscious suddenly that he must be thinking her in the way, and she followed the landlady into the kitchen silently. The latter was summoning some Noah and Jabez from the premises at the back with news that there was a robber in the garden, and Florence watched with white cheeks and frightened eyes as the party of four passed out through the back, the innkeeper taking an old-fashioned blunderbuss with him.

Digitized by Google

She held her breath when they were gone, expecting every moment that the sharp report of a revolver would break in on the night silence. She could give no ear to the chatter of her companion, who only ceased in her questioning for periodical visits to the door to try and see what was passing outside. Florence answered her absently in monosyllables.

It seemed to her hours before the men came back with news that they could find no trace of the assassin. The innkeeper almost doubted his existence.

"Don't you think, miss, that you must have imagined it?" he asked, and she was grateful when Ilden answered for her.

"And now that we have frightened the fellow away, I can safely see you back across the road, Miss Courthorpe," he added.

She did not wish him to accompany her. The thought of his danger still oppressed her; but he only smiled at her objections, and they crossed the road together.

"I shall leave this place early in the morning," he said, "so I shall have no opportunity of calling to thank you, as I should wish; but I will write, if I may. I have no doubt that I owe you my life. It was a curious chance, but a very fortunate one for me, which made me take up my quarters so close to you. I came here really to hide for a little while from this unknown enemy, who seems determined to take my life; but it is evident that I have not succeeded, and the quieter a place is the more dangerous it becomes when once my whereabouts are known. To-morrow I must try a fresh move."

She had a hundred questions to ask, but they were already standing before the door of the dark, solemn house, and thoughts of the danger he still ran in the darkness made her impatient for him to return.

She cut short his renewed thanks to bid him good-bye, and he waited until the door of the dark house had closed noiselessly behind her.

Then he recrossed the road, with eyes alert and his hand on the revolver in his pocket. Now, as he crossed the moonlit road and the dark strip of garden, was the moment for his enemy to fire a successful shot if he had anything of courage or enterprise.

But the fellow was evidently a nervous coward, and had been frightened completely away, for the half-expected shot did not come.

"If he had half as much nerve as he has genius for tracking a fellow and arranging his plans, I should have been in the family vault now," he said to himself as he re-entered the inn safely.

Meanwhile Florence had crept into the dark hall of Minerva House feeling involuntarily like a criminal as the oppressive silence reminded her abruptly how necessary it was that she should make no sound. Her heart beat more quickly as she realised how difficult it would be to give her suspicious employer any explanation of her adventure that would sound satisfactory and credible.

The stairs creaked as she reached them, and she crept upwards more timidly. Then her heart seemed to stop beating altogether; for at the top of the stairs had appeared a candle illuminating the severe face of Mrs. Morgan Wright, a picture of virtuous indignation framed in frills.

"And pray what explanation have you to offer of this, Miss Courthorpe?" she asked icily, and Florence knew from the tone that the explanation would never be believed.

(The unhappy consequences of Florence's night adventure will be told in next Tuesday's issue.)

THE LOVE STORY OF A COWARD.

An Act of Heroism which Brought a Wife.

From my earliest childhood I had been burdened by one great misfortune. I was born a coward. When the other small boys climbed the rafters of the old barn, ran across the beams and did their many deeds of boyish daring, I sat uncomfortably on the steps of the corn-bin and begged them tearfully to come down. I was afraid to put my nose outside the door after nightfall, cried myself ill if left alone without a light, and, even in daytime, never walked alone without constantly turning my head in fear of ghosts, and all sorts of things.

More than anything else, dogs terrified me. I would run from the smallest yelping puppy, and shuddered and turned cold if a dog so much as passed by on the other side of the street. The wise old women of the neighbourhood nodded their heads at me and told each other in whispers how my mother had been frightened almost to death by a savage dog before I was born.

When I grew to be a young man, it was no better, although I concealed my fears in some measure. It seemed as bad as could be when I was fancy free, but it became infinitely worse when I fell in love. Alice was the most daring young woman in our town and a born hero-worshipper. She was something of a naturalist and had captured with her own fair hands a collection of snakes that made me faint even to think of. She had faced an angry bull in a field, had tamed unbroken horses, ridden colts without saddle or bridle, and done so many brave things that my heart sank at rehearsing them.

My case was hopeless, of course, but I loved her only the more madly. Whenever I went near her I suffered tortures, for her pet and constant attendant was a horrible, snapping, snarling little dog.

This vicious creature had an especial spite against me. From beginning to end of my calls at Alice's home, he would growl and snap at my legs, my hands and my face. But though he sent me into agonies of terror and the cold perspiration poured from my body in a clammy shower at the end of every visit, I could not bear to give up my chance of seeing her.

It was not long before she knew my story, as everybody in the town made haste to tell it to her. I think she pitied me and regarded my cowardice as not the act of a free moral agent. At any rate, she sent the dog away.

Digitized by Google

Freed from the terror of his presence, I mustered courage to ask her the fateful question. She was very gentle with me, but she gave me no hope. Choosing her words as kindly as might be in her sweet womanliness, fearing to wound me and yet stinging the more by her very kindness, she let me know that she could never marry a man whom she did not consider a hero.

I went out from her door in the firm determination to do something heroic and win, perforce, my matchless lady. But before I had reached the gate, that miserable little cur rushed snapping and snarling at my heels, and I forgot even Alice in the vain attempt to keep from showing the fear I felt.

I lay long that night with staring eyes, trying to think of something brave that I could do. I thought of going into the army and mowing down whole companies with my single arm. It would not matter if I were killed if only Alice loved me. But the mere thought of blood turned me faint and I would jump at the sound of a fire-cracker, besides there was no particular war on just then. I turned over plan after plan, to find all alike unavailing.

At last I must have fallen asleep with my eyes wide open, and dreamt horrible dreams. I heard the roar of fire-engines and imagined that the whole world was burning up. From her burning home, Alice was stretching out her hands to me and calling for help. I rose in my dreams—did I say, before, that I am a sleep-walker—dressed, clambered from my window by means of a tree that grew beside it, and started for Alice's pretty home beside the church.

I do not know how much I saw and how much I dreamt. The streets were filled with people but I avoided them with the cunning of a dreamer. To my excited fancy every house seemed bursting with flames. Only the church stood cool and still.

I thought I saw Alice on its roof and I clambered up, holding by the lightning rod, by anything. She was not there, but seemed to be on the steeple. I struggled up it, slipping and sliding. I looked down upon Alice's dwelling wreathed in fire. The roof and upper windows were not yet touched but all the lower part was incircled by flame.

Alice was not on the steeple. She stood at a second-storey window, holding out her hands and calling to me again while the horrible red glow crept nearer and nearer. Someone had rested a long ladder against the side of the church. I lifted it with a strength that was not my own, balanced it with the mysterious power of the sleep-walker, swung it across the fiery chasm till the end reached Alice's window-sill, and ran across the tottering, sloping bridge as firmly as if it had been solid earth. By what seemed a miracle, it held till I reached the window, then fell tottering to the ground.

A puff of flame shot in after me. I seized Alice in my arms, bore her to the other window and crashed through the glass with my fists. The pain in my hands awoke me and——

The dream was true. I stood in Alice's room with the flames incircling the house. In my arms I held, not Alice, but the little, cringing white dog.

In sickening terror I looked down. The flames coloured the world blood-red. A great sea of fiery faces looked up at me. Beneath the window stood four men holding a blanket by the corners.

"Jump! Jump!" cried scores of voices. I flung down the dog. The roaring of flames filled my ears. I dared not jump. I tottered and fell.

A shock and a rebound. I had fallen unhurt upon the blanket. I do not know how I got home. Perhaps I fainted and was carried. My mind is not clear as to anything that happened until the next day, when I got a message from Alice.

I was bruised and burnt, but I must see her. With the help of a stick, I limped slowly to her temporary residence, the home of our nearest neighbour. She received me alone in the parlour. It was one of those parlours with a bright red and green carpet, protected by blue rugs. Across an ancient hair-cloth sofa was thrown a magenta slumbering robe crocheted in a wonderful pattern. Enlarged photographs, which slightly resembled each member of our neighbour's family, decorated the walls, along with pictures of the Royal Family. But, oh, what a Paradise it was with my darling in it, and how like an angel she looked in her white gown as she came forward to welcome me with a gladness that sent my heart fluttering like a bird in May.

I could not say a word. She poured forth thanks, praise and admiration, until I did not know myself. She thought I had dared to walk along the tottering ladder and enter the burning house to save her dog.

How could I tell her! How could I quench the light in her sweet eyes and banish the smile for which, coward as I was, I would have given my life many times? She thought me a hero. She was ready to be my wife.

If she could only believe it always. But she would find out. She would grow to despise me and unhappiness would embitter all her days. Better lose her now than plunge her into future misery.

I tried to speak, but I could not. How could I interrupt her when her words were so dear, so dear! At last I got to my feet.

"Alice," I said—I must have turned white, for she sprang forward as if to help me. "Alice, you are praising me for something I did not do. It was not I who climbed last night. I have a horrible fear of high places. I tremble even to climb the stairs, and I am terribly afraid of dogs. I would not go near one to save my life. It is all a mistake. I am not a hero, though Heaven only knows how I wish I were."

"But you did climb, George, and saved Muffet at the risk of your life?" she answered, bewildered. It was the first time she had ever called me by name.

"No, no," I cried, terror-stricken lest my courage should fail. "I was walking in my sleep. I should never have dared while awake. And I was dreaming that I was rescuing you. I would give the world to be the man you thought me, but I am not. I am a coward."

I staggered weakly for my hat and stick. I could not bear to look upon her face. I would remember it as I had last seen it, filled with love.

Dazed, I laid hold of the knob. My beloved came towards me. "George," she cried, in such a tone that I could not but turn back. She came straight to my side. "I think you are the bravest man I ever knew," she whispered. I dared not speak. I thought I was dreaming again and that a word would break the spell. I must have tottered and almost fallen, for she put her arms round me and led me to the sofa. Then she slipped down and knelt beside me.

Her lips were very near to mine. "Am I dreaming again?" I asked doubtfully. There was no mistake. It was surely a kiss upon my forehead. Then the queenly head went down and her face was hidden in her hands.

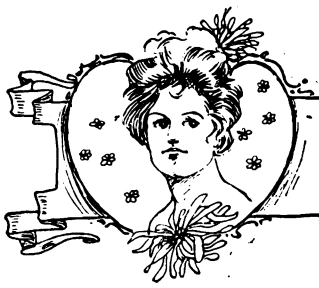
"No, no!" she cried, "you are awake—and I love you."

* * * * * *

I have a great fondness for red and green carpets, blue rugs, and magenta draperies. I would like to furnish one room in our house with them, but my wife says that we possess the essence of joy and do not need the visible symbols.

B. E. Bush.

Digitized by Google



The Story of the Week.

(See Coloured Cover.)

THAT CONSUMMATE VILLAIN.

Three Scenes in a Life.

"You will not listen to me? You will not let my love speak for itself? You refuse to marry me, though I worship the very ground your feet walk upon?"

"I am so sorry, Mr. Dallas, so dreadfully, dreadfully sorry if I hurt you, but, indeed, I cannot marry you. I do not love you."

He caught my hands in a grip that held them like a vice.

"No," he whispered, and to my strangely excited fancy his voice sounded like a hiss, "and shall I tell you why you do not love me? Shall I make it as clear to your heart as it is to mine why I have no chance—no chance with you at all?"

There was such anguish in the tone that I was smitten with compunction. I cannot bear hurting anything or anybody, much less could I bear to hurt my friend as Mr. Dallas had been.

"Shall I tell you?" he repeated.

I nodded my head, I could not speak.

"It is because my scapegrace cousin, Bertram, has wound himself into your heart!" he exclaimed fiercely. "It is because you have let him deceive you into thinking his inward man matches that beautiful face of his which I have heard fools say is like an angel's! Can you deny that Bertram——"

I tore my hands from his and drew myself up haughtily.

"You have no right to say such things to me," I cried, "even though we are old friends. How dare you insinuate that your cousin Bertram and I are more to one another than the merest——"

"Acquaintances," he sneered. "My dear Miss Merriman, am I blind, deaf, or imbecile? Bertram is clever. What am I that I should enter into the field against him?" His tones again grew terribly bitter. "As it is, he has all that I lack to commend him to a woman — looks, charm, intellect, and all; I have nothing."

There was a ring of such genuine pathos in his last words that again my heart melted towards him. How could I know, how could I ever guess that this man——

But I must tell my story straight on as it comes without looking forward into the future.

"I am sorry," I faltered once more; "one's heart is not always entirely under one's own control. I cannot love you, I cannot marry you!"

"Tell me the truth, then," he muttered, coming nearer to me, but not touching me again; "my great love for you gives me at least the right to hear truth from your lips; is it Bertram who stands in your way?"

Something compelling in his eyes forced me to answer him against my will.

"Yes," I whispered. "Why should I hide it? Why should I be ashamed? Bertram and I love one another. There is no love in my soul for any but for him."

By the dim light in the conservatory I saw the deadly pallor that overspread his face, his breathing came short and quick; no other sound was audible except that panting, hurried breath, and the drip of the fountain amongst the palms behind us, and from far away inside the house the soft notes of a waltz.

When my companion spoke again his voice was hoarse and low.

"Heaven forgive you," he said, "for throwing away my love for his. Some day you will know the truth about Bertram. Some day you will learn that his saint-like face does not hide a saint-like character. Some day you will know the gold from the dross!"

"Yours being the gold?" I cried.

"You will see!" he said significantly. "Only promise me one thing—one thing," he repeated, and his hands took mine again and wrung them hard.

"What is it?" I faltered, afraid because of the gleam in his eyes, and the stern set of his lips.

"Promise me that if you find you are mistaken in your estimate of Bertram—if you discover that, after all, I am right, you wrong, and he is truly more devil than angel, promise that then you will listen to me, the lover who loves you with a love beside which Bertram's love is as water to wine? Promise me that."

"How can I? How can I?" I said. "I love Bertram—I trust him; his is no surface goodness and no watery love. I love him! I am not ashamed——"

"But you will be ashamed"—a deadly significant ring in his tones—"mark my words, Miss Merriman. I know my cousin better than you know him. I have known him for many a long day. Mark my words, Bertram will shame you yet. When that day comes remember I shall still be your friend. Promise you will let me plead my cause again—when Bertram fails you?"

"He will never fail me," I answered proudly.

A harsh laugh rang through the conservatory. Mr. Dallas' eyes looked into mine, a mocking smile in their depths.

"You will see," he said. "I do not speak in ignorance. Keep your faith whilst you can. When it dies—remember Hubert Dallas loves you, loves you, loves you!"

His voice sank to a passionate whisper; he caught me in his arms and strained me to him for an instant, murmuring in my ear:

"Is love like mine to go for nothing? I swear you shall be mine, you shall be mine some day—by fair means or foul."

The words came through his clenched teeth, his eyes blazed into mine, his face was white with passion. "You madden me with your lovely face!"

I struggled wildly in his arms, and at last he loosed me.

"Bertram the saint will fail you—you will be mine some day," he said.

Then I covered my face with my hands and fled from the conservatory; shame and deadly anger and a deadly fear for which I could not account setting my heart beating wildly in great throbs of terror.

Why did that new, strange fear grip at my heart, and what did it mean? Escaping upstairs by a back way to avoid the crowd of dancers in the ball-room and the hall, I locked myself into my room, and panting, breathless, miserable, flung myself down upon a couch to try and think.

I saw as in a vivid picture the faces of the two men who loved me—Hubert Dallas, and his cousin Bertram Henderson—and I shuddered as I remembered the ominous words to which I had just listened.

Why, oh, why, did Mr. Dallas repeat and repeat again that Bertram was unworthy of my love? Was it a lover's jealousy that made him wish to blacken his cousin in my eyes—or was it—could it be truth? No! a thousand times no! I reflected, rising impetuously to my feet and pacing the room with restless, fevered steps.

Bertram, a double-faced ruffian as his cousin would have me believe? Bertram, anything but a noble, honourable, Christian gentleman? It was absurd, ridiculous, and I laughed aloud, recalling my lover's fair face and clear eyes, and broad, open brow, and candid smile. And yet Dallas had always been my good friend and my father's friend; kindly, gentle, chivalrous to me and mine; why should I distrust his words? My soul was torn with doubts; and the words of Hubert Dallas swung to and fro in my mind with an ominous significance that filled me with dismay.

Digitized by Google

Yet I could not stay upstairs alone, I should be missed from the gay scene below. I must return to the ball-room, or my aunt and cousin would wonder what had become of me.

Removing as well as I could the traces of emotion from my face, brushing back the hair, I stood for an instant before my glass looking silently at my own reflection.

"Is it," I whispered very low, "is it good for a woman to have so fatal a gift as beauty? Why does he say I madden him with my lovely face? I only want him as a friend. Bertram is my lover. I am glad to be beautiful for him; I want to madden no other man."

Then I smiled at the vision of myself in the long glass—glad of my loveliness for Bertram's sake; and, if the glass told me true, it was not silly vanity to dream myself beautiful. Though my face was still white after the storm I had just passed through, nothing could spoil its lovely outlines, nor the curve of my lips that Bertram said was like Cupid's bow itself; my eyes, deep and blue as sapphires, shone like twin stars; and my hair—the glory of my hair gleamed with the burnished gleam of copper under the electric light.

I wore white, a trailing satin gown, not even its whiteness could rival the shining snow of my throat and neck, on which a diamond star that was my uncle's latest gift to me glistened and sparkled.

I smiled again, and nodded at my smiling face, some of my confidence restored to me.

"Hubert Dallas is only jealous," I said softly; "he told me my face maddened him. Bertram is true and good. My faith in him will never die. Hubert Dallas is mistaken—and yet——"

Then I switched off the light and went slowly downstairs to mingle once more amongst the gay throng.

My uncle, Mr. Merriman, was a banker, a millionaire, men said, and I, his orphaned niece, lived with him and his family in their beautiful Grosvenor Square house, treated by them all as one of themselves; made a petted daughter of by uncle and aunt, cherished as a sister by my cousins, my lot, indeed, was a happy one, and only a few weeks ago the crown of my joy had come when I learnt that Bertram Henderson loved me. Bertram and his cousin Hubert Dallas were both in good positions in my uncle's bank, and were both friends of the Merriman family, and, alas, both men loved me!

But it was Bertram whom I loved. Bertram, whose beautiful face Hubert scoffingly likened to an angel's; Bertram, of whom he had spoken so ominously; whilst Hubert, I knew, was my uncle's favourite.

Over and over again uncle John had told me how he had trusted and respected Mr. Dallas; what powers he had left in his hands; how highly he thought of him.

But it was Bertram I loved, though Hubert and I were always good friends. I knew he was a good man, because uncle John was perpetually telling me so; yet he had sown seeds of doubt in my heart about Bertram, and try as I would I could not quite shake them off, the more so that Bertram never came to the ball, though I watched and longed for him till daylight crept in and dimmed the light of the electric lamps and showed us that the banks of flowers in the great rooms were faded and dead.

And the next day the blow fell.

* * * * *

"To hang by the neck till you are dead, and may God have mercy on your soul!"

The court seemed to reel and grow dark before my eyes; the crowd of upturned faces ran together into one great blur, excepting that one face that stood out upon the darkness, white, stony, horror-stricken, the face of Bertram Henderson, my lover, the prisoner in the dock!

I think I stood up; I felt that I swayed, and that a hand went out and drew me gently back into my seat, and I heard a voice—it was Hubert Dallas' voice—say:

"We will get away in a minute; try to bear it a moment more."

I don't know why, but I wanted to laugh in his face, and then I longed to weep, but no sound came; and still I saw nothing save the white, stony face of the prisoner at the bar.

Then all at once a voice broke the silence. It was Bertram's voice, so changed, so ghastly, that I wanted to cry out to him to be silent.

"As there is a God above, I swear that I am innocent!" he said, and he looked all round the court; and suddenly the mist cleared from my eyes, and I saw the upturned faces fixed upon him, and on some I saw unbelief, on some horror, on some pity.

"I swear I am innocent!" he repeated, and then the mist swam before my eyes again. I held out my hands blindly, and it seemed to me that I fell into a great abyss of outer darkness.

When I woke from that long, long swoon I was safe in my bedroom, and for just one wild moment I tried to think that what I remembered was just a ghastly nightmare, from which presently I should awake.

But my cousins stole in, and their white faces and deep mourning reminded me it was no dream but a ghastly hideous fact; uncle John was dead—murdered, they said—and Bertram Henderson, the man I loved, was the murderer.

Lying there in the darkness all the facts came back to me, and whirled in my brain till they drove me nearly mad.

It had happened the day after the ball—the ball to which Bertram had not come; that fact had been used as evidence against him.

The morning after the ball my uncle went to the bank as usual, and Bertram was there, in his place, so also was Hubert Dallas.

During the course of the morning, so the testimony went, my uncle had sent for Bertram into his private room, and detained him there for some time. Many witnesses affirmed that when Bertram returned to his place he looked white and disturbed and very unlike himself.

No other clerk had been summoned to my uncle's room that morning, and nothing was seen of uncle John at lunch time, when it was his custom to pass through the bank, giving a nod and a smile to his subordinates.

Not until the bank closed did anyone enter that private room, and then the old doorkeeper, having knocked and received no answer, went softly in, thinking his master had passed out unobserved.

But uncle John sat there, still and silent, and his dear white head bent over his desk, his hands still holding the pen in its stiff fingers, but his kindly voice was hushed for ever; his eyes were closed in the sleep that knows no waking.

He had been struck from behind, a blow aimed well at a vital part, and death, the doctors said, must have been instantaneous and probably painless.

And beside his chair, a mute witness to the crime, lay a heavy, loaded stick, bearing along its side in silver letters the words "Bertram Henderson!"

During the time that intervened between my uncle's death and the trial an amazing series of frauds were brought to light; clever forgeries, ingenious doctoring of ledgers; skilful embezzlements; and though Bertram strenuously denied any knowledge of these things, his guilt was proved, and proved up to the hilt.

At least so it seemed to me, as it must have seemed to all men; and my heart grew sick and yet more sick, seeing that the words of Hubert Dallas were coming true!

Oh! but it was a bitter blow, an agony past recording, to know that the man I had loved and honoured above all living men was, after all, a thief, a forger, a

"A Foe in the Family." Our Powerful New Serial. Begin To-day.

Digitized by Google

murderer. My heart went near to breaking, those bitter days; but Hubert was good to me, gentle and thoughtful, and tender, never obtruding himself, always at hand if I needed him, never alluding to his words of warning about Bertram, but ever watchful over me.

Hubert implored me not to go to the trial, yet I went. I could not keep away, and throughout its course my eyes never seemed to leave Bertram's face, which, even in this supreme hour of his shame and disgrace, still looked like the face of an angel, pure, strong, and beautiful.

Over and over again he asserted his innocence; declaring that when he left his uncle John's private room on the morning of the murder my uncle had been perfectly well, declaring also that he had no knowledge whatsoever of how his stick had come to be in my uncle's room at all, and of the figures and embezzlements he swore he was absolutely innocent.

But the proofs seemed so plain, so deadly plain, what could any jury do but commit him, that was what everybody said, and, as they said, the verdict was a foregone conclusion.

After that awful last day of the trial I lay ill for weeks, raging in the delirium of brain fever, and when I woke again to a knowledge of the outside world they told me that influence of a powerful sort had been brought to bear upon the authorities, that a monster petition had been signed begging for mercy for Bertram, and finally that his sentence had been commuted to that of penal servitude for life.

* * * * *

A year had passed.

I stood in my bedroom of the great house in Grosvenor Square, looking at myself in the long glass as I had looked a year ago on the night of the ball which, so it seemed to me, had been the beginning of such a sea of troubles.

I had sent away my maid half an hour before, and had begged my cousins to leave me alone for a few minutes after they had put the finishing touches to my gown; and now I stood silently contemplating my own form decked out in its bridal array.

Yes, it was my wedding-gown that gleamed white and beautiful in the summer sunshine flooding the room, my wedding gown that lay billowing round me in graceful, heavy folds, my wedding veil that covered the shining glory of my hair, on which nestled a spray of orange blossoms held by a glistening diamond star. I was dressed for my wedding, and the whole thing seemed like a dream.

"You are as lovely as the day!" the bridgeroom had said to me triumphantly the previous evening, but his words had brought no joy to my heart, no answering leap to my pulse.

And now I was dressed for my wedding, and in a little while, such a little while, Hubert Dallas and I would be husband and wife; Bertram and the past must be forgotten.

I had yielded to Hubert's wishes. The old love was dead and buried. Bertram had gone out of my life, and the man who had been a faithful friend pleaded so hard with me that I yielded at last, though I told him that I had no love to give him.

And he answered with a smile of triumph.

"I have won you; I will win your love, once you are mine! I will win your love!" and something in his tones made me shudder, I know not why.

I turned from the glass when they called me to come, and, still feeling like a person in a dream, I went downstairs and into the carriage, to be whirled away to the church.

The building was packed from end to end, and I heard murmurs of admiration as I swept up the nave on my cousin's arm, but the faces of the congregation flashed round upon me, and I shivered and clung to the arm I held; for that flash brought back to me the memory of the crowded court, a blur of faces turned towards the white, still countenance of the prisoner at the bar.

I think I tottered a little as I reached Hubert's side. He took my hand and held it closely, and his eyes watched me closely.

"Mine at last!" he whispered.

I was only dimly conscious of all that was passing round me. I vaguely noticed that my cousins stood close round me, that the clergyman had an odd stutter in his voice, that the sun poured through a stained glass window above me, and made great stains of colour on my white gown, that Hubert's close clasp of my hand hurt me. I did not take in a single syllable of what the stuttering voice of the clergyman was saying, until he paused and spoke again more gravely, more solemnly, and I woke to a consciousness of these words: "Let him now speak, or else hereafter for evermore hold his peace."

A great silence followed these words; so utter a silence it seemed and so long that a nervous tension seized me, and I longed to cry out.

And then the stuttering voice was beginning again, when suddenly a great hubbub arose far down the church. There was a scuffling of feet, a storm of angry voices, a babel of sounds that grew and spread till it became almost deafening, and the clergyman's voice fell silent, and, looking up, I saw his eyes grow wide and round with horror.

A low scream burst from my cousin, who stood behind me; the clamour in the church grew and grew, and I turned my head to see.

And what I saw made my heart stand still for a moment, then rush on, till its beating nearly suffocated me, and I clutched the altar rail to keep myself from falling.

Hubert had turned, too; he staggered where he stood, and for a moment I thought he would have fallen; his face grew white as death, and he put out his hands as though to push away a grisly phantom of his brain.

But it was no phantom who stood on the chancel steps in front of the swaying crowd, who tried in vain to pull him back; no phantom that looked at Hubert with grave, accusing eyes, and at once with the sorrowful eyes of an avenging angel.

Bertram stood there! Bertram dressed in the mud-coloured dress of a convict, the broad arrow marking every garment he wore; Bertram whose voice said slowly and distinctly so that it penetrated all over the church and hushed the hubbub:

"I declare an impediment. That man is a murderer!"

His uplifted hand pointed at Hubert, his accusing eyes looked straight and square into those of my bridegroom, which shifted and fell under that steady gaze, and I saw a look of deadly terror sweep over Hubert's face even whilst he said huskily:

"It is a lie!"

The clamour was renewed afresh. Two constables pushed their way through the crowd, the clergyman turned from the altar, and went to the convict's side, but Hubert stood like one rooted to the spot, saying mechanically over and over again, "It is a lie! It is a lie!"

One of the constable's clasped a pair of handcuffs upon Bertram's hands, but he only smiled into the man's face and suffered the indignity unresistingly.

"The truth will out," he said, as they prepared to lead him away; "and, thank God, I have stopped this infamous marriage!"

Suddenly the icy band that had been about my heart for a year seemed to snap. I sprang to his side and laid my hand upon his arm.

"You were innocent!" I whispered. "You were innocent all the time!"

"All the time," he whispered sadly. "Why did you doubt me, sweetheart?"

And the icy band round my heart melted more and more, and before the gaping crowd, heedless of comment, heedless of aught but Bertram, I flung my arms round his neck and lifted my face to his, and said out loud that everyone might hear:

"Forgive me for doubting you—forgive me for everything. I love you—only you. I have loved you all the time!"

I felt his lips touch mine, and then I saw the constables force a way through the crowd again and lead Bertram away, and on the top of the chancel steps where he had stood I fell down like a stone and fainted dead away.

It was a long time before they dared to speak to me of that interrupted wedding, so terrible had been the shock to my nerves and brain; and when I rose from my second bed of sickness, weak as a child, scarcely able to walk, and feeling I had no strength to bear any further blows, I found that I had awakened to a great and wonderful joy.

Digitized by Google

Bertram was beside me, no longer in convict dress, but Bertram looking almost his old self again, excepting for his close cropped hair, and the stamp of suffering on his face.

What a strange, incredible story he had to tell; and what a terrible time he had been through, and by what miraculous ways had the truth become known.

Needless to say that Bertram was entirely innocent of the crime for which he had so nearly suffered the extreme penalty of the law.

The real criminal—and this to me is the most terrible part of the story—was Hubert Dallas, the man who had been my friend, the man I almost married, the man who had tried to blacken Bertram's character in my eyes.

He had said he would win me by fair means or foul, and finding fair means impossible, he had passed on to the dastardly attempt which was so nearly a successful one.

The truth was told to Bertram by a fellow convict, a man dying of consumption, who had been Hubert's accomplice, and who reached Princetown a few months after Bertram went there, to suffer the penalty of some other crime he had committed, though no suspicion that he was uncle John's murderer had ever fallen upon him.

Bertram had shown the man some trifling kindness, and he, smitten by remorse, confessed the truth—a truth he was only able to tell to Bertram in snatches and at long intervals when Bertram had occasionally been with the dying man in the infirmary of the prison.

It seemed that Hubert had become involved in monetary difficulties of a serious nature, and the forgeries at the bank had been his handiwork, as also the doctoring of the ledgers, which he had skilfully made to appear the work of poor Bertram.

Bertram's fellow convict had, in older and more prosperous times, been a friend of Hubert's, and having fallen on evil days, was a willing prey in his hands, and ready even to commit the most dastardly crime if money was the reward.

The very large sum offered him by Hubert tempted him to murder uncle John—an easier matter than had appeared possible at the trial.

He explained to Bertram that he had affected an entrance into my uncle's private room through a courtyard at the back of the house, and that having committed the crime he had managed to escape the way he came. My uncle's well-known habit of sitting with his window wide open confirmed the story.

Bertram's stick had been used at the instigation of Hubert, who had himself given it to the murderer.

The story had been told again by the dying convict in the presence of the governor and chaplain of the prison; but, meanwhile news had reached Bertram through a letter from his mother of my approaching marriage, and barely waiting for his order of release to be signed—not waiting to change the convict garb he wore—he had hastened with all the speed that trains and cabs would allow to stop the ceremony and prevent my being joined for life to an intentional if not an actual murderer.

Those handcuffs I had seen clasped upon Bertram's wrist were soon removed by the apologetic constables when the truth of his story was known and corroborated by the governor of the prison, whose letter he showed them; and his exit from the church was speedily followed by Hubert's exit also, safely in the custody of two other constables who had arrived close on the heels of the first pair bearing a warrant for his arrest.

But for Bertram's timely appearance upon the scene I might have been tied for life to as big a scoundrel as ever walked this earth.

Instead of this I am married to the man who has always seemed to me the best and noblest man in the world, save for a short time when my eyes were blinded, my judgment weakened, my faith shaken by the man who committed crimes to win me—Hubert Dallas, that consummate villain!

L. G. Moberly.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

October 14. — Those whose birthdays fall here will experience an unsettled time; give attention to business if success is desired.

Girls born in the early morning will have some strange experiences in love affairs.

The day is good for dealing with aged people, farmers, landlords, and coal merchants.

A child born here will be fond of travel; never settle long in one place. Will be cautious and reserved.

October 15.—An unfavourable birthday for health, business, and general affairs. Some criticism and private enmity.

Girls will need care with lovers; engagements are broken through quarrels.

The day is not good for speculating, love affairs, pleasure seeking, or engaging servants.

A child born to-day will be changeable, untidy, and never very fortunate.

October 16.—A fairly successful year for those in business; avoid law and rash actions.

Young girls meet with disappointment with opposite sex.

The day is good to buy and sell, to travel, and deal with electricians or new inventions.

A child born here will be fortunate and advance in life. Fond of change and travel; lack order and method.

October 17.—An unfortunate birthday; business, health, and domestic affairs need extra care.

Girls born near four a.m. have anxiety over love letters and through third parties.

The day is evil for most things; keep quiet and let others make the first move. Don't ask favours.

A child born here will be active and rash; will have a troubled and unfortunate career.

October 18.—An active year for those born on this date. Pay attention to business and don't speculate.

Girls will have a quiet time in love matters.

The day is good to write and travel; evil for speculation, buying, and selling.

A child born to-day will be rather unfortunate, though it will have a clever and active brain; should keep in the employ of others.

October 19.—The year will be one of much stir and movement. The mind will be rash and law can easily result.

Girls will have anxiety, and quarrel with lovers; finances and jealousy will be the cause of discord.

A child born this day will be rash and headstrong. Rather fortunate in its affairs. Not so good for a girl.

October 20.—A good year for business and general affairs, but a lot of worry and annoyance is indicated. Take care of health

Girls will find love affairs very interesting; they become engaged or marry.

The day is good for business, pleasure, and visiting. Unfavourable for writing and dealing with landlords or property.

A child born here will be generous, affectionate, and lucky. Should go in business for itself and do well.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

A TEST IN FLATTERY.

WHICH BROUGHT ABOUT A VERY UNEXPECTED RESULT.

"I MAINTAIN," said Bertha Sargent, "that a man is even more easily flattered than a woman."

"And I," returned her betrothed, "insist that you are wrong. Do you suppose that any sane man would be taken in by the exaggerated compliments which most women blissfully swallow?"

"I will concede," replied Bertha, "that flattery, to affect a man, must usually be coated with subtlety. But he will take it every time, whereas a woman sometimes knows better."

Frank Horton laughed in high amusement.

"Show me the man," he cried, "who cannot see through any form of flattery, no matter how artful!"

"Show me the man," retorted Bertha, "who is not invariably influenced by it, when the woman who flatters him is clever enough. Even you, Frank, are not exempt from that weakness. I'll wager that even now some designing woman could make you believe she liked you and wheedle you into paying her such attention as would satisfy her vanity."

Frank Horton inclined his head with exaggerated deference. "Thank you, Bertha, I see you have an exalted idea of your affianced husband."

"There's no use being offended, Frank; but that is my honest conviction, my actual belief concerning the genus man."

"And woman?" he queried coolly. "I presume you, for instance, would be absolutely invulnerable if any man endeavoured to flatter you into believing that he loved you better than I?"

"Why, Frank! Do you think I'd be so fickle in the first place as to allow him such an opportunity?"

It ended by their having a downright quarrel. Of course after it was all over and they had made it up, each was heartily ashamed of the affair.

It seemed inevitable that these two should wrangle whenever a question came up for discussion. This disastrous habit was growing upon them.

The chemical make-up of the two characters seemed to be such that the heat of a spirited argument never failed to cause combustion.

Friends and relatives of the pair prophesied an unhappy wedded life unless matters changed for the better.

During the next few days Bertha was busy making preparations to entertain a friend of her school days, who was coming to visit her.

Kate Richards was a bright, clever, companionable girl, but not pretty, according to accepted standards.

Bertha, musing over the old days and recalling Kate's tactful ways and quick understanding, had a sudden inspiration.

"Just the thing!" she cried, clapping her hands jubilantly in the privacy of her home.

After Kate's arrival she lost no time in revealing her brilliant plan. The friend hesitated at first, but her doubts and scruples were soon swept away by the force of Bertha's enthusiastic arguments.

"You know just how to manage it, Kate dear, and I do so want to prove to Frank that he is in the wrong! I am absolutely certain that he'll walk right into the trap. And, of course, I won't have any personal feeling about it, for I know you so well. If I were dealing with an unprincipled girl it would be different. But you are so true and reliable, Kate."

She might have added, "And so plain of face." Perhaps she did mentally.

When Frank Horton called the next evening, bringing his chum, Will Armstrong, to meet his fiancée's friend, Bertha managed, without making the matter too conspicuous, to give Kate and Frank an excellent opportunity for a tête-à-tête.

She herself took Will Armstrong in hand and endeavoured to console him for his presumable disappointment. If Armstrong was dissatisfied with the arrangement he certainly did not show it.

After that evening followed Bertha's informal dinner dance given in her friend's honour; then commenced a round of delightful affairs which promised to fill to overflowing the three weeks allotted to Kate's visit.

Bertha smiled triumphantly to herself to note the apparent success of her little scheme. Just as she had imagined, Kate's method of flattery had brought the expected result.

Horton was unmistakably attentive to the girl. There was no need now for further manœuvring. He voluntarily sought her side whenever occasion permitted.

Armstrong had become a frequent caller. The thought flashed upon Bertha one day that she was perhaps acting unpardonably rudely in keeping him and Kate from becoming better acquainted. No doubt he was desirous of a closer friendship with her. As hostess she should really have assisted in the affair, instead of arranging things to suit her own selfish desire for triumph over Frank.

The scheme had proceeded far enough, anyway. She had won.

Almost any day she might divulge the secret and have a good laugh at his expense. Wouldn't he be ashamed and confounded, though!

Meanwhile she tried to atone for her former rudeness by making the way for Armstrong to see more of Kate. To her astonishment, that young man showed no disposition to follow up his advantage.

"I believe you are trying to get rid of me, yourself," he accused her one day, when she made a particularly bold move to further her new purpose.

She gave him a quick look of astonishment. How strange his eyes looked! There was a warmth, a sweetness in them that she had never noticed before. And how handsome he was!

The revelation thrilled her. She understood, now. And the understanding did not displease her.

In talking with him further, she became thoroughly convinced of his superlative delicacy and consideration where an argument was concerned. He showed such respect for her opinions! Truly, to talk with him was a wonderful relief from the nerve-racking friction which always attended an earnest conversation with Frank Horton.

Her intention of taunting Horton with the success of her test was forgotten in the exhilaration of this new experience. There was no denying Will Armstrong's influence over her.

She resolved to be honest with her affianced.

(Concluded at foot of next page.)

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY COMPETITION.

STILL ANOTHER OPPORTUNITY FOR YOU TO WIN ONE OF THE TEN HANDSOME GRAMOPHONES OFFERED.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

The picture on this page illustrates a certain sentence in this week's instalment of our powerful new serial "A Foe in the Family." All you have to do is to read the instalment carefully, and to write under the picture the sentence which you think is illustrated by the sketch. Ten splendid Gramophones will be awarded to readers whose correct solutions are posted to us soonest after the publication of this number of Short Stories.

Sentence:	Page .....
.....	Column .....
.....	Line .....

In order that all competitors shall have an equal chance of winning these handsome prizes, we have decided to distribute the Gramophones over the British Isles thus:

Two Gramophones will be won by readers living in the London postal district whose correct solutions are posted first.

Two Gramophones will be awarded to readers living within 100 miles of London.

Two to those English readers living over 100 miles from London.

Two to Scottish readers sending in correct solutions and two to those living in Ireland.

When you have found the sentence write it down in the space below the picture, together with the number of the page, the column, and the line. Then put your name and address in the space provided, cut out this page and post it to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Mark your envelope in the top left corner with the name of your postal town, and the time of posting, thus:

MANCHESTER.
2.45 p.m.

Then post it at once.

Name..... Address.....

Frank listened calmly to the bravely delivered account. Then a strange gleam broke over his face.

"Bertha," he said quietly, "don't you think you walked into the trap very readily?"

"Trap? What trap?" Amazed, astounded, she stood gasping before him. Then came a flash of understanding. "How dared you! Oh, how dared you!" she cried.

"You pursued the same plan with me," rejoined Horton, smiling. "Did you think I could not see through your purpose when you arranged for Kate and me to be thrown so constantly together?"

Bertha was silent.

"However," resumed Frank, "the manœuvre resulted differently than either one of us anticipated. I have really learned to love Kate, and now that you have given me my freedom I shall ask her to marry me. Will Armstrong has confessed to me his feeling for you, so I was prepared for your story."

After all, Bertha felt that she could afford to be magnanimous.

"You and Kate will make such a delightful pair," she said. "I know you will be happy. And we'll all of us be friends, won't we, Frank?"

"Oh, most assuredly," answered Horton, "for we each helped the other to find happiness."

Angela Mollan.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS:

Mrs. FRANCES NORTON	An adventuress who makes her money by robbing her friends.
CYNTHIA HAMILTON .	Her cousin and companion who, when the events related below took place, was quite unsuspicious of Mrs. Norton's guilt.
FLUFFY	An accomplice of Mrs. Norton's.
LORD KINROSS	One of Mrs. Norton's most devoted admirers.
SIR JOHN STRICKLAND	A poor baronet who is deeply in love with Mrs. Norton.
MARY VERNON . . .	At one time engaged to be married to Lord Kinross.
HIRAM PETTIGREW .	An American millionaire.
PERCIVAL HOPE . . .	Pettigrew's secretary.
CASELLIS	A man from Jamaica who knows Mrs. Norton's past history.

Frances Norton: Adventuress.

Cynthia Hamilton: Her companion.

NEW READERS START HERE.

HAVING arrived in England from a Bruges convent to be companion to my cousin, Frances Norton, I soon discovered that my cousin was taking part in midnight card games, at which large sums of money were lost and won. The climax came one night when Mary Vernon staked her diamond earrings (a gift from Lord Kinross), and one of the onlookers found them to be paste. The diamonds, it appears, were stolen by Mrs. Norton.

A few weeks later, my cousin stole a pocket-book, containing about eight thousand pounds in paper money, from Hiram Pettigrew, an American millionaire, at the Café Regal.

We next moved into a house in Pont Street, where Sir John Strickland proposed to Frankie, and was refused.

Later on Lord Kinross called at Pont Street for a private interview, during which Percival Hope entered the room unannounced, and made the startling statement that Mary Vernon had discovered the thief who stole her diamonds, and that in a fortnight's time he would prove that Frankie was an adventuress living upon the proceeds of the robbery of her friends.

The next evening Lady Gaveston, Frankie's chaperon, informed her that she didn't approve of her behaviour towards Sir John Strickland, and that unless she decided at once either to marry or refuse him, she would return to Scotland.

We went to the Derby, lost heavily, and to pay our debts, Frankie prevailed upon a young fellow, by promising marriage, to sign his uncle's name to a bill for £5,000.

That same night, at the Duchess of Warminster's ball, my cousin came face to face with Casellis, a man from Jamaica, who knew all about her past life. Percival Hope brought him in. It was a critical moment, but once again Frankie scored, for she bought his silence.

The next day marked the end of the fortnight, during which Hope was to obtain proofs of Frankie's guilt. Owing, however, to Frankie's ingenuity, the indictment failed miserably. Kinross then formally asked Frankie to be his wife. They were still in conversation when Sir John Strickland arrived. He had not heard of Frankie's engagement.

Before I could stop him he had gone into the room where my cousin and Kinross were talking. At sight of them he staggered and fell. Doctors pronounced it to be a paralytic seizure.

Frankie being in a desperate strait, then got a large sum of money by worming a state secret out of Dollie Grendale, the wife of an M.P., and selling it to Pettigrew.

Frankie's next adventure was to drug an American billiard player, whose opponent she had backed heavily. When alone, she was accused by Pettigrew, who swore to condemn her before the whole world. She secured his silence by managing to be found in his embrace by Lord Chesterton.

My cousin at this time met a Hungarian attaché, and fell violently in love with him. One day Lord Kinross called, and Frankie was nowhere to be found. Fearing she contemplated eloping with the attaché, Lady Gaveston determined to find her. Together we drove to his flat and found Frankie just ready to leave with him for the Continent. As she would not yield to our pleading, Lady Gaveston made the astonishing statement that the attaché already had a wife. He confessed, and, mad with wounded pride, Frankie stabbed him. He was taken to the hospital, but the doctor, guessing the truth, one day called upon us.

Digitized by Google

THE BEGINNING OF THE END.

My cousin made no haste to see Doctor Musgrave, but lengthened out her dinner for quite half-an-hour. She spoke but little; gaiety had left her, her eyes, grown suddenly dark, half frightened me, and her mouth looked hard.

"Come with me, Cynthia," she said at last. She turned as she reached the door, and glanced back with a hurried yet wistful look at the room whose every detail bore the impress of her taste—the silver flagons on the mantlepiece, the quaint blue bowl upon the sideboard, the sketches on the wall.

"I sold them all," she said between her teeth, "but I did it to pay my debts—not to pay blackmail. He shall not have the money."

She swept into the drawing-room, and I followed her.

Doctor Musgrave greeted my cousin with effusion.

"He was delighted to see her looking so well. Better than he had dared to hope she would be after—after the distressing events she had passed through." This with a suave smile, but a cold look in his eyes that somehow made me think of a snake.

"Thank you, I am very well," said Frankie. "It is quite charming of you to feel anxious on my account. I could almost regret that I am in no need of your prescriptions."

The doctor bowed, and then, still more politely:

"You are too kind, Mrs. Norton, but I mustn't sail under false colours. I'm afraid I must confess my motive for calling on you was not wholly disinterested."

"No?" My cousin leant back on the lounge, arranging herself comfortably among the cushions, the picture of indolent luxury and ease.

"So long as you are here, Doctor Musgrave, the motive is really unimportant." Her eyes flashed as she spoke, she looked dangerous.

"You mustn't say that till you hear why I've come."

"If you insist," she laughed and offered him a cigarette.

"Thank you, but I rarely smoke."

"You must, or I shall have to put mine out. Just this once." She leant towards him, holding the dainty silver case at arm's length.

No one could withstand my cousin when she looked and spoke like that. Doctor Musgrave succumbed like the rest of his sex, he smiled and took the cigarette—but his eyes were still cold, and, I thought, crafty.

"I suppose you're leaving town shortly?" said Frankie. "Everyone who is anyone is ashamed to show their face in London during August."

"That," said the doctor judiciously, "depends."

"Your patients you mean? Of course, I was forgetting. But couldn't you get someone to take charge of your practice for a while. You want a holiday, you're looking tired and pale, almost haggard."

The doctor flushed. He was a vain man, and proud of his well-preserved looks.

"There would be no difficulty about my practice," he said stiffly. "I am kept in town on business."

"Yes? I thought it was only the stockbrokers, and people in the City, who had to worry over 'business,' I didn't know medical men had to do with those sort of things."

He smiled and stroked his fair moustache.

"I am not worried about the Stock Exchange, Mrs. Norton," he said slowly, "a much smaller affair engrosses my attention—I am interested, deeply interested in the welfare of poor sick children, and am anxious to found a home at the seaside where they can spend the first few weeks of convalescence after leaving hospital. But funds are scarce, and," he shrugged his shoulders, "subscriptions difficult to get, and——"

My cousin interrupted him with a bright smile.

"My dear man," she said, "why didn't you say so sooner? I'll give you a subscription with the greatest pleasure. I'm awfully fond of children, and I think it's sweet of you to want to give the poor mites a taste of the sea. What shall it be, doctor?" She rose and walked to her escritoire. "Fifty pounds?"

She glanced at him over her shoulder, her face flushed with interest or excitement. I could see she felt relieved at the turn matters had taken. There was nothing to fear in a request for a donation to a children's seaside home!

The next moment I had reason to alter my opinion.

Doctor Musgrave leant back in his chair and stared gravely at the ceiling.

"Fifty pounds is but a drop in the ocean, Mrs. Norton," he said slowly. "The exigencies of the case require a far, far larger sum. The Children's Home will require £2,000 at least!"

My cousin turned round with a sigh and a shake of the head.

"How I wish I were a millionaire," she said. "Your home should want for nothing! As it is, I'm afraid I can't do much. You see, it's quite too late for a bazaar or even a fancy fair. If I'd known sooner I could have arranged a fête or something of the kind, and got the money easily. But now," she shook her head, and seemed quite sorrowful.

"I, too, despair of the bazaar, Mrs. Norton, also the fancy fair. But," he smiled, "I have faith in you."

"I simply haven't a suggestion! When I return to town I might be able to think of something that will help you, but not till then, I am afraid."

"You will not return, I presume, until after your marriage with Lord Kinross?"

"Yes. We shall go abroad for a month or two, until the beginning of December, I expect."

"Ah! I'm afraid the Home can't wait till then. It is imperative the money should be raised"—he paused, and for the first time during the interview seemed irresolute. "It must be raised before your marriage, Mrs. Norton," he said quickly.

"I'm afraid I don't understand you."

"If you insist on it I will explain more fully. But"—he glanced towards me—"it would, I think, be more discreet if you did not press for an explanation."

"My dear man," said Frankie airily, "you speak in riddles. Why should I give you or your hospital £2,000?"

"You are known to be charitable," he answered with a sneering little smile. "But if you cannot see your way to help the institution I must carry my petition elsewhere. Lord Kinross, I am sure, would not refuse me."

"Lord Kinross gives me his list of charities to revise," she answered. "I'm afraid I could not countenance so large a gift."

The doctor bowed.

"His cousin perhaps would be more generous? Do you think Mr. Hope would refuse me?" Frankie caught her breath, and for a moment made no answer. Hitherto I felt she had made sure of victory, now she began to doubt her strength. Doctor Musgrave was clever, resourceful, a man of infinite tact and self-control. Throughout the interview not a word had escaped him that could be used to his discredit. He had asked for a subscription, a large one truly, but there was nothing discreditable in that. And yet he meant to get the money from her. His price for silence was £2,000!

Digitized by Google

My cousin studied him eagerly, her figure tense with anxiety. How much did he know—this man with the inscrutable smile and cold, cruel eyes?

Fashionable physicians are the recipients of many and strange confidences, dark and curious secrets. It seemed quite impossible to fathom the man or the amount of his knowledge!

"I'm quite sure Mr. Hope would help you," she said at last, "especially if Lady Gaveston approved of the project. Both Lord Kinross and his cousin think a great deal of what she says."

"I don't think I should want Lady Gaveston's co-operation with Mr. Hope," said the doctor slowly. "He'd take my word—about the Home."

Frankie smiled at the words, a sudden, radiant smile Perhaps she remembered, as I did, that whatever Hope might know against her, Kinross would pay no attention to his accusations. On that afternoon when Percival's witnesses one after the other had collapsed, Kinross had declared he would never again listen to a word against her. The doctor might go to Hope and welcome, so far as Frankie was concerned.

"Well," she said, "perhaps you're right. I believe Mr Hope rejoices in an independent mind. I'm sure I trust your home will succeed, Doctor Musgrave."

"Thank you, I have great confidence in it. Failing Mr. Hope I shall try another member of the family. Lady Paula—your future sister-in-law, Mrs. Norton—is truly generous. As her medical adviser, I feel sure I shall not appeal to her in vain; nor, if you will forgive my saying so, do I think her brother will put her express wish aside—even at your suggestion. I shall have that £2,000, Mrs. Norton, you may be sure of that."

He rose and gave signs of departure.

"I shall go and see Lord Kinross to-night," he said. "I am a little anxious about Lady Paula's chest, she is delicate. Can I—or—deliver any message?"

It was a critical moment; I waited anxiously for Frankie to reply. So much hung on her answer. If she remained firm and still refused to give Musgrave the cheque, he would go then and there to Kinross and tell his tale, how and when he had found Mrs. Norton in Von Essler's rooms. And then—farewell, even at the eleventh hour, to the marriage she had risked so much to bring about.

On the other hand, two thousand pounds would buy the doctor's silence, but if she paid him she would still remain involved in debt. That, and the contempt, the fury, which the man roused in her, held my cousin back.

"Am I to go, Mrs. Norton?" he said, watching her face.

For a moment I thought my cousin would almost strike him. Her breath came in short, hard gasps, she shook with a passion that only her will could hold in leash.

Then with a sudden gesture she waved the man aside and went to her desk.

"Here's your hush money," she said contemptuously, handing him a cheque. "You earn a larger income as a blackmailer than a doctor, I make no doubt. I have paid you your price this once. I have given you two thousand pounds on behalf of the Home for Sick Children. But"—and she smiled maliciously—"if you ever again ask me for a penny, ever again dare to threaten or blackmail me, I shall demand an account of that Home. I shall ask what you have done with my subscription. You understand?"

"Perfectly, madam. You are clearness and courtesy itself."

He was not in the least perturbed, smiling and suave at the end as at the beginning of the interview.

He bowed to Frankie and to me, and was about to leave with the honours of war when there came a ring at the bell that set my heart beating twenty to the dozen.

"Wait," I said impetuously. "Wait. Lord Chesterton is here. I shall fetch him and tell him about you," and I glanced defiantly at the doctor.

"Don't be silly, Cynthia," cried my cousin. "You'll make matters worse."

As she spoke she slipped past me and out of the door. As the door shut the doctor clasped me by the wrist and forced me over to the window.

"Do you know what will happen if you tell Chesterton—big idiot that he is—of what has occurred here to-night?"

"Yes," I returned indignantly, "he'll throw you out of the house at once."

"Pray what good would that do? Silly child, such a scene would only disgrace him and your cousin, not me. Besides I should have something to say as well as you. I should tell Chesterton what happened in Von Essler's rooms, tell him that you—yes, you—took up a knife and stabbed the Hungarian. The motive? Jealousy perhaps. Not the truth?" as I indignantly denied it. "Tush, you cannot prove it. Your cousin is not likely to clear you at her own expense. Now, now will you call Lord Chesterton?"

His eyes burnt into mine, his fingers tightened on my wrist.

"Consider, Von Essler is not yet out of danger, even now he may die. And you may be charged with his death."

In a paroxysm of terror I fell on my knees, too frightened even to scream. I could not think clearly, nor reason properly, I could only remember that if this man fulfilled his threat and told Jack that I had stabbed Von Essler, honour to Frankie must keep me silent. And he, Jack, would believe.

"You won't say it," I gasped, "you won't——"

The man's face changed. He looked at me curiously, as though he really believed I had done what he accused me of. He drew in his breath and a smile, his hateful smile, came back to his lips.

"I will say nothing to-night," he returned gravely. "Get up and sit down quietly. That is better. Now," he gazed at me narrowly, "you must be sensible and do as I tell you. You're nervous and excited, you'd better go to bed, and I'll send you a soothing draught. To-morrow"—he paused—"to-morrow I shall come and see you, and we'll discuss the matter thoroughly. Meantime, keep as quiet as you can. Good-bye."

He bowed himself out, leaving me crouched on a chair.

The horror of it, the horror of it!

Again and yet again I'd been the scapegoat not of my cousin—that I could never believe—but of circumstances.

Pettigrew's missing pocket-book, Pettigrew's stolen notes, both had found their way into my possession, and had helped to estrange me from Percival Hope. And now that this other, and I felt strange interest had come into my life, now that I had learnt to care for Jack, the same dark shadow fell over me. The shadow of unjust and cruel suspicion.

My cousin entered the room abruptly. "Has he gone?" she said.

I nodded.

She sat down beside me, and laughed in a jarring, mirthless sort of fashion.

"My dream of a calm future with no unpaid bills to worry me, or spectres to haunt me, hasn't lasted long," she said. "It's a difficult matter to run straight, Cynthia, once"—she paused—"once you've done the other thing. I was a fool to sell my furniture," she added fiercely, "a fool to listen to Lady Gaveston. I've left myself without a home, for what? To satisfy that man's rapacity."

Digitized by Google

Can't you pay any of your bills, Frankie?" I urged. I so longed for my cousin to get free of debt that I roused myself to discuss the possibility.

"No," she shook her head, "not one. I'm going to stick to my last thousand. I'll not be left without a penny."

"I wish you could pay them, Frankie," I sighed. "I'd do anything to get you the money."

"Well," she glanced at me quickly, "if that's so, you might do more than wish! Chesterton's in the morning room. Ask him for three thousand pounds; he'd be delighted at the chance of lending it to you. You can pay it back after I'm married, you know. I shall have a good allowance."

I shook my head. "I could not, Frankie, after—after what that dreadful man said to me just now."

"Do you mean Musgrave?"

"Yes."

"What's he been saying, or rather threatening? He surely didn't try to get any money out of you."

"Worse than that. He—threatened to tell Chesterton it was I who stabbed Von Essler. Frankie, if he does I can't say anything. I wouldn't give you away for all the world. But"—I laid my head on her shoulder, and, having nothing better to do, began to cry.

"Didn't you tell the doctor the rights of the affair?"

"No."

My cousin made no answer, but suddenly caught me to her and kissed me hard.

"Don't fret, Cynthia," she said softly, "whatever happens, Chesterton shan't think anything but what is true about you. I haven't always been fair and square to you, I know, but this time you shan't suffer the least little bit. I will explain everything that may seem strange to Chesterton about you. When the time comes I will speak out."

I remembered that promise later. So did she!

"You'll ask him for the money, dear?" she said, after a while.

"Yes, I'll go now."

"You're a good child. Does it ever strike you, Cynthia, as a strange thing that what has taken me such time, trouble, and—and other things to reach, you should have gained without any effort at all? Look," she pulled me in front of the glass, so that we faced the mirror side by side, "we make a charming pair, Cynthia, and we're different as night from morning. Yet we're both engaged, you to Chesterton—don't be silly, child, it's nonsense to deny it—I to Kinross; men of wealth and title. You're pretty and ingenuous. I'm something more than pretty," she glanced at her lovely face and perfect figure, "and I've more brains in my little finger than you have in your flaxen head. And yet you are beginning where I leave off. It's strange, and it's not altogether fair. It's easy, of course, to point a moral, and declare that innocence unaided has accomplished what I found so difficult to do. But that's all nonsense. If it hadn't been for me you'd have stayed at the convent all the days of your life, teaching and sewing from cock-crow till sunset. Whereas I broke away from a life of drudgery by sheer strength of will. You would never have had the courage to do as I've done, Cynthia."

"I know I owe everything to you," I whispered, feeling vaguely reproached.

"Get the money from Chesterton, and I'll give you a receipt in full," she laughed with a sudden change of manner. "Hurry!"

I went swiftly towards Frankie's den, picturesque in its medley of rose-coloured draperies, soft-cushioned chairs, and its quaint array of shoes. Strangely enough, I had no doubt or hesitation as to what I was about to do. Had it been Percival Hope I was going to ask, I should have been weighed down by the thought of those searching eyes, that firm, hard mouth, the suspicion that it seemed to me lay ever in his smile. But in the case of Lord Chesterton it was quite different. Frankie had assured me that she would never let him think ill of me. I had no cause to fear.

I went straight up to him, and without any preliminaries asked abruptly:

"Will you please lend me three thousand pounds for six weeks? I can pay it back then."

He laughed in an amused sort of fashion.

"Six weeks or six years, if you want it Cynthia. What is it—bets?" and he smiled provokingly.

"You know I never bet," I answered flushing. "It's, it's — bills. Dressmakers' and milliners', you know."

"Bills? For £3,000! You're a transparent baby, Cynthia; as if anyone would give you credit for such a sum. A little girl like you," and he tried to slip his arm round my waist. I suppose he meant to be paternal!

"I don't want to tell you whose bills they are," I said gravely, "they may be mine or Lady Gaveston's, or"—I paused—"Mrs. Curtis Blount's. Anyway they've got to be settled. The money is only wanted for six weeks," I continued. "Can you trust me to repay you?"

I don't think it's necessary to state exactly what he said. Some things should be left to the imagination. Anyway, he left shortly after in great contentment, and I returned to Frankie with the promised cheque. Once again she had triumphantly surmounted a threatened danger—turned a defeat into a victory.

Next morning Dr. Musgrave made his promised call. I think he was surprised, though hardly pleased, at the result of the interview.

"Thank you," I said quietly in answer to his kind inquiries, "I am all right to-day, quite recovered, in fact. By-the-bye, if you have anything you want to tell Lord Chesterton, you'd better see him this morning. He's leaving for Cowes this afternoon. This"—I produced a card—"is his address. I've nothing more to say, Dr. Musgrave. You can tell Lord Chesterton anything you like—and—good-morning." I left the room breathless, but with dignity. The doctor, thinking discretion the best, if not the only card to play, departed silently.

That afternoon we said "Good-bye" to Pont Street. In but a few hours the house that had been our home for the past six months, where every room was reminiscent of a chapter in my cousin's life, in but a few hours, I say, it would be empty, desolate! Stripped of its gods, desecrated by the unholy fingers of a dealer in furniture!

Once again Mrs. Ponsonby would instal her horsehair chairs, her mahogany tables, and early Victorian sofas. Once again Sir John would cross the threshold of the house that had brought him so much ill, carried helpless as a child through the rooms, where he had waited in the flush of a strong and vigorous manhood for the woman he had loved more dearly than all else.

Tears filled my eyes as I passed down the stairs, looking a last farewell in every nook and corner.

Only a short time truly since I came there, but how much had happened in that time!

Frankie was waiting impatiently in the hall.

"Sentimental as ever," she said. "Cynthia, you're a goose!"

We got down to Southampton at half past six, Kinross and Chesterton, who had arrived by an earlier train, met us at the station, and we had dinner together at the hotel.

About eight o'clock we went down to inspect the yacht—

Digitized by Google

Hartland's latest and most expensive craze. She looked like a picture in the clear moonlight, her white sails like pinions unfurled in the breeze!

We were to cross to the island that evening and join the rest of the party at Mrs. Venables' house in Cowes.

I enjoyed the trip immensely; the twinkling lights across the Solent, the gentle swishing of the sea upon the distant shore, the breaking of the surf against the rocks, the churning of the water as the yacht sped on its course, gave me a sense of rest and quiet. Here, on the eternal sea, the life of the teeming city seemed very far away, a thing of fret and worry, without end or purpose.

Mrs. Venables' reception, however, speedily dispersed the sense of quiet. She was a little woman of overpowering activity. Wanting no rest herself, she denied her guests the right to wish for any, and stirred them up to tennis, yachting, to go for a picnic or a drive at weird hours of the day and night.

My old friend, the pink youth, was there, also the faithful Algy, and Mrs. Curtis Blount was expected shortly! I wasn't best pleased at the intelligence and was very dignified with Chesterton in consequence, until he assured me that if there was a woman for whom he felt a cordial detestation, it was Vi! Then I felt sorry for her, but pleased with him.

The time passed very pleasantly, enlivened by "games" of the pink youth's invention, puerile but harmless. Kinross won a cup at the regatta, which he handed with great joy and pride to Frankie.

They were a most devoted couple in those days.

Frankie laid aside her coquetry and had eyes only for Hartland, while he grew more infatuated daily.

"Everything," as the pink youth remarked constantly and with great irrelevance, "was lovely!" It seemed as if Frankie had passed out of troubled waters, and could hope for a quiet and peaceful future.

The marriage was to take place at Cromer the second week in September, from the house of one of Hartland's aunts. It was arranged that we should spend a fortnight cruising round the coast in his lordship's yacht, and arrive at Cromer a week before the wedding.

The party was to consist of ourselves, dear Vi, Algy and Chesterton. Mrs. Venables was to come as a chaperon, and the pink youth was thrown in by way of ballast.

The evening before we were to start, Frankie and I went on board with Mrs. Venables to settle our belongings.

About half past nine Chesterton turned up and called us on deck.

"The post's just come," he explained. "I thought I'd bring you your letters. There's an important looking missive for Mrs. Norton marked 'Immediate'."

My cousin smiled her thanks and took the packet. She tore it open quickly and glanced hurriedly over the contents; as she read her face whitened and she grasped the rail as if for support.

Then thrusting the letter in her dress, she crossed over to Kinross.

"Hartland," she said, "I want you to do something for me." She linked her arm in his, and led him to the end of the boat. (I'm sorry, but to this day I can't tell the bow from the stern.)

I could not hear what she said, she seemed pleading for something, half in earnest, half in play. At last, with a quick glance round, she dropped a light kiss on his cheek.

"You can't refuse now," she cried.

"You're a witch," he returned, "and entirely unreasonable. But you shall have your way."

A minute later Frankie called me and Mrs. Venables to help her move a trunk in her cabin.

"It seems to me," observed that lady, when, after much exertion, we had put the box in place, "as if we'd slipped anchor. Positively"—she started to her feet—"I believe we're out at sea," and she ran up on deck in great excitement.

Frankie shut and bolted the cabin door.

"Mrs. Venables is right, Cynthia," she said, "we're off! We shan't put into port for three weeks—not till the day before my wedding."

"But the rest of the party——"

"What do they matter? Who wants Vi or Algy? As for gossip," she shrugged her shoulders, "Mrs. Venables is a sufficient chaperon, and love is a colourable explanation. People do mad things for love, don't they, Cynthia?"

"But you?" I exclaimed. "What's your reason, Frankie?"

For answer she gave me a letter—the letter.

"Read it," she said, "and you will understand."

"It's from Fluffy?" I asked, recognising the handwriting.

"Yes."

"But you've nothing to fear from him, he wouldn't do you any harm!"

"Read," she said impatiently. "Your questions madden me."

Trembling I drew near the lamp. For a while the words were blurred before me. Gradually, however, they grew plain—

"I have just returned to England," said the letter, "to learn that a marriage between you and Lord Kinross is arranged to take place in September. I tell you now, as I have told you many times before, you shall marry no one but me. You or I must tell this to Lord Kinross. Remember, if it is not you, it will be I."

I dropped the letter, and stared blankly in my cousin's face.

"What have you said to him in reply?" I gasped.

"Nothing—it is no use! Listen, I have still one chance. I must marry Kinross before Fluffy can see, or speak, or write to him. Fluffy could tell him things——" she paused. "If they see each other before the marriage I am lost," she cried; "after, he can do nothing."

"But how can you prevent their meeting?"

"I have persuaded Hartland to put off to-night instead of waiting for the rest. I shall persuade him to keep to sea till the last moment—the sea, where no letters can reach him, nobody find him. We shall not put into port until the day before our marriage. And then——" She broke off and stared at me with wide, unseeing eyes.

"I'll do it," she said, in a low, hoarse voice, lifting her hand as though to strike. "I'll do it. Nothing shall stop me now, not even——"

With a scream I rushed to her and forced my hand over her mouth.

"Don't say it," I shrieked, "you shall not say it."

She put me from her, and spoke no more until the morning. But all through the watches of that dreadful night, again and yet again, I heard the words—

"You or I must tell Lord Kinross. You or I——"

The yacht flew through the waters, my heart beat loud and fast. It was a race, a race between this man and Frankie. He to find Lord Kinross, she to hide him.

Who, who would win?

[This series of articles will conclude in two weeks' time, and will be followed by another series of equal interest entitled, "How I Chaperoned Belinda."]

"Doesn't your mother like me?" asked young Mr. Gilley in an effort to ascertain why Miss Keedick refused him. "Oh, yes, she likes you," was the reply of the maiden, "but she is already married to papa."

Uncle Joshua: "These city people have very polite manners, Maria." His Wife: "How so?" "Just let a couple of fellers have my watch, which they offered to regulate free gratis. They're to bring it back to me at the hotel."

Digitized by Google

He Saved as Much.

"This talk about it being more expensive to live when married than when single is all rot," said Groomley. "Why, I've been married a year, and I save just as much as I used to." "And how much is that?" "Nothing."

Never too Late.

Miss Withers: "I'll never marry." Miss Prime: "Don't say that. Someone may leave you a fortune some day."

Where the Prompting Came from.

Hunker: "What prompted you to ask Miss Giddey to be your wife?" Spirits: "I think Miss Giddey herself prompted me more than anybody else."

But Mary Knew.

"Mary, did anyone call while I was out?" "Yes. Mr. Snooks." "Mr. Snooks—Snooks? I don't know anyone of that name." "Probably not, mum; he called to see me."

His Mission in Life.

"You are Mr. Quezeen, the husband of the celebrated lecturess on cookery, are you not?" "Yes, sir," replied the dejected, hollow-eyed man. "I am the man she tries her new dishes on."

Kissing Powder.

A very agreeable girl about twenty, having, during a country visit, run out of powder to whiten her face, has tried pounded sugar with the best results; she says it tastes nice when she is kissed.

The Benefit of the Doubt.

Emmeline: "Alfred, I am very fond of you, but I doubt if I love you well enough to be your wife." Alfred: "Emmeline, give me, oh, give me the benefit of the doubt." Emmeline: "I will, Alfred. Henceforth, all is over between us."

And Didn't Come again.

"Is your sister in?" "Yes, but she's sewing a button on a coat. You'll not see her yet awhile." "But it doesn't take long to sew a button on a coat." "It does when there's a man inside the coat." Hearing which, he went to call on his next girl.

Base Ingratitude.

Mr. Newhitch: "There, my dear, I've locked all the doors, turned off the gas, brought up the silver, and shut the hall window. Don't you think I'm an angel?" Mrs. Newhitch: "Well, I don't know; the butler used to do all those things at mamma's, and he was a fiend."

Why Harry Stayed out Late.

Middle-aged Matron: "And do you find married life as pleasant as you expected?" Young Wife: "Oh, it would be if it were not for the dog next door. He barks all the early part of the night and Henry is so nervous that he has to stay in town until two or three in the morning to escape the annoyance of hearing him."

And He Got it.

"I have had a delightful evening," he said, as he rose to go. "May I call again?" "I shall be glad to see you," she replied, with a blush. As he walked into the hall he saw in the mirror of the hat-rack a reflection of the roguish girl slyly throwing a kiss at him, and he turned back. "I must have that in the original package," he whispered. And he got it.

As He Wished it to be.

She: "You'd be the last man in the world I'd fall in love with?" He: "Well, that's all I ask. I don't want you to love anybody after me."

Very much Settled.

She: "Really, now, aren't you a married man?" He: "No, why?" She: "Oh, you have such a settled look." He: "Yes, I've been refused by thirteen girls."

Why he Left.

Miss Summit: "I was very much surprised, Mr. Jagway, to see you coming out of a public-house on Thursday afternoon." Jagway: "Yes; I had to catch a train."

Where Ignorance is Bliss.

He: "And did you see Monte Carlo whilst you were at Nice?" She: "No; papa called on him, I believe, but from his disappointed appearance when he returned to the hotel I think Mr. Carlo must have been out."

Couldn't Trust Herself.

Jenny: "Here comes Jack, auntie. I wish you would come down and stay in the room." Auntie: "Why?" Jenny: "I'm afraid he's going to propose, and I can't trust myself—he looks so poor and so handsome."

The Ways of Bachelors.

Proud Mother: "You haven't kissed the baby." Bachelor Uncle: "Um—er—I'll try to remember next time. I'll kiss her when I—er—come back from India." "When will that be?" "Let me see. About sixteen years."

Short Relationships.

"No, Mr. Jones, I cannot be your wife." "But you'll be a sister to me. Promise me that." "It is unnecessary. Your brother proposed to me last week, and I promised to be his sister. I have been your sister for a week."

Had to be Particular.

She: "It can hardly be questioned that every woman is more or less of a mind reader." He: "Do you think you could read mine?" She: "I'd rather not. Mamma is a little particular as to the character of my reading."

The Inconstant One.

A pretty girl, a winter night, a moon impassioned fellow, a gentle word, a solemn vow, a kiss— And all is well oh! Again the girl, another night, same moon— Thus far, 'tis well, oh! But if we took another look, we'd see— Another fellow!

Pa was Sarcastic.

Father (entering parlour at midnight): "Here is the jug, Ethel. You can get an extra half pint of milk when the man comes in the morning." Ethel: "Why, pa?" Father: "And get two extra rolls. I presume George over there likes them for breakfast."

Wanted Value for Money.

Wife: "Why are you smashing the works of your watch in that way?" Husband: "Well, I presume there's a grain of dust in the hairspring that makes it necessary for me to take it to the jeweller. He always charges me for rebuilding it throughout, and this time I intend him to earn his money."

A Week's Success.

Widow: "Do you think marriage is always a failure?" Bulfinch: "Always a failure! Well, I should say not. Why, I know a case where a wife fairly idolises her husband, and he—why, he can't keep away from her a minute." Widow: "Bless me, how long have they been married?" Bulfinch: "Nearly a week."

Digitized by Google

A LADY OF RANK.

A Charming Little Tale of a Milliner's Bill.

If ever a man ought to have married money it was Charlie Lorrimer. Brought up in good style, the death of his father just before he, Charlie, came of age, revealed to him the unpleasant fact that instead of being in receipt of a good income, all that he had coming to him was a few hundreds a year; quite enough, of course, for many men to enjoy life comfortably upon, but not so to one who had been accustomed to have his every whim gratified without considering the cost.

Through influence, a post under Government was in due course obtained for him, and if he had been content to remain single, as hundreds of other young men similarly situated would have done, he could have been exceedingly comfortable, seeing that he had the entrée of some of the best society in town.

He was really an extremely good-looking young man, of undeniably pleasing manners; still, girls are more sensible, or more mercenary, whichever you like to call it, nowadays than they were formerly, and do not give their mothers and chaperons so much trouble in the way of forming undesirable attachments as they used to.

Hence it came about that as Charlie Lorrimer had the good sense not to pay marked attention to any young lady individually, in the particular set in which he moved, he was regarded as harmless enough. It is true there had been something between him and a certain Miss Diana Carew, a lady several years his senior, the daughter of a rich, fox-hunting baronet whose property adjoined the Lorrimers.

She was a lady who, if report spoke truly, was not only one of the best horsewomen in the county (a fact which was universally admitted on all sides), but just a wee bit fast as well; preferring to make her bets in coin of the realm rather than orthodox boxes of gloves, and not disdaining to take a hand at a card party where the smallness of the stakes was not a prominent feature.

Whether there had ever been more than a flirtation between them, or whether he or she were to blame, is a matter of uncertainty.

At any rate, before Charlie Lorrimer's bad luck came upon him, a coolness had sprung up between them, and Society was startled one day by the announcement that Miss Carew was engaged to Lord Duncombe, a middle-aged peer who did not enjoy the best of reputations.

In course of time they were duly married; the alliance, as people had predicted, proving anything but a happy one for the lady, her spouse speedily dissipating her ample fortune, and finally, finding England too hot for him, betaking himself somewhere abroad.

Possibly it was from being unsuccessful in his first effort that made people set Mr. Lorrimer down as a confirmed bachelor, but to everybody's surprise, he quietly announced one day, when he had just entered his twenty-eighth year, and ought to have known better, as his friends said, that he was going to get married; and, what was in their eyes still more discreditable, to a girl without a penny—a clergyman's daughter from a remote parish down in the west of England.

His friends could not help admiring his choice, a handsome specimen of English girlhood; but so for the matter of that was Miss Bungleigh, the rich brewer's daughter, who had unmistakably set her cap at him, and would have jumped at the chance of marrying him, and brought him a fortune into the bargain.

In due course the wedding came off, very quietly, down in Devonshire, and the happy couple, after the usual Continental honeymoon, set up housekeeping in a very pretty flat in West Kensington.

For a time all went well; he was not continually going to his club, and she, charmed with the novelty of life in London, after the dull quiet of the country, was perfectly happy and contented; but after a while the desire seized her to extend their somewhat small circle of acquaintances, and she began to rally her husband on not taking her about more, and introducing her into the set in which he had moved before they were married.

At the same time she had by degrees developed a somewhat expensive taste in the matter of dress, and her milliner's bills had more than once given her husband a severe shock, indeed he had hinted as much to her on one or two occasions.

Things had been going on in this way for upwards of a twelvemonth, and a certain amount of estrangement had grown up between them. The sweet, girlish maiden became somewhat snappy at times, and he in consequence had recourse to the pleasures of his club more regularly than she altogether approved of.

One day things came to a climax; the dinner had not been quite what it should be. Mrs. Lorrimer did not, as a rule, keep her servants very long, and the cook was under notice to leave, so that when the trim parlour-maid had brought in the coffee, the storm broke.

"I was looking for some stationery in your escritoire this morning, Charles, and I came across some letters signed Diana Carew. You never mentioned her name to me, I think."

"Didn't I, dear? Oh, she was an old flame of mine; used to live next door to our place in Loamshire; very jolly girl she was too."

"And what became of her, may I ask?"

"Got married."

"To whom?"

"Oh, a fellow who was no good, Lord Duncombe; ran through her money in no time, and then bolted."

"I wonder you never thought it worth while to mention her name to me, Charles."

"Oh, it was all over years before I knew you. I quite forgot I had any letters still by me; they were all very matter-of-fact, if I remember right;" he went on in as airy a tone of voice as he could command.

"I see she used to address you as 'Dear Charlie,' so you must have been pretty intimate?"

"Oh, that's nothing; we were brought up together, you know—oh, by the way, Hilda, I have an invitation for a dance at the Laces' next week."

Digitized by Google

"I am glad to see that some of your old friends are beginning to recognise my existence, and that reminds me, Charlie, I want some money. I have ordered a new dress at Madame Elysée's, and I want to pay her account. She does charge awfully."

"All right, my dear, you can have a tenner," said Charlie, thankful at the turn the conversation had taken.

"If you mean ten pounds, Charles, all I have to say is that that will be no good at all; this dress I have just ordered will be £10 10s. at least, and I fancy my account must already be nearer £60 than £50; you don't want me to go about like an old frump, I suppose?"

Her husband lit a cigarette before replying. "I am afraid £15 is the very most I can spare you—you see, my dear, we are living in a rather more expensive style than my income justifies! and £70 for dress. Well——"

"I beg your pardon, I said about £60."

"Yes, and then this new one which is going to cost £10 10s., you say?"

"Oh, she can wait for that."

"Yes, but it must be paid sometime, I suppose; I have meant to speak to you about your dress expenditure for some time. Your mother told me before we were married that if I allowed you £30 a year I should be doing——"

"Oh, mamma doesn't know what things cost in London; it is for your sake more than my own I dress well. You always say how necessary it is to study appearances."

"Well, it is no use arguing about it; all the money I have at my disposal until the end of the quarter is less than £50, and I cannot possibly spare you more than £15."

"I wonder what your cigar bill comes to in the year?"

"I can easily tell you; for months past I have almost always smoked a pipe."

After a few more controversial remarks the lady retired with as much dignity as she could command.

"I wonder," thought Mr. Lorrimer to himself, "whether there was anything very compromising in those letters. Poor Di, she was a good sort. It is not quite the thing to do to dun a lady for a debt, but I know she would have paid up long ago if she had ever thought of it. It's lucky Hilda did not see it, though. Perhaps she did, and did not understand what it meant."

A minute later Mr. Lorrimer opened the drawer from which his wife had a few hours ago unearthed the bundle of letters from Miss Carew.

"Ah! here it is," as he picked up an envelope in which was contained a half-sheet of note-paper bearing the words, in a bold handwriting, "I.O.U. £100, Diana Carew, July 3rd, 1887."

"Now, what's to be done? If I drop her a line she will reply by return, but Hilda would know the handwriting at a glance, and that would never do. If I go and call, some good-natured friend would be sure to tell Hilda, which would be worse still. Hold on. Yes—the very thing—I'll do it, too."

The subject of finance was not again referred to between them that evening, but the following afternoon, on his return from the Foreign Office, Mr. Lorrimer saw unmistakable signs of a storm brewing on his wife's face, and was not long in being enlightened as to the cause of her displeasure.

"I went about that new dress to-day, and the way in which people go on in London is really quite incomprehensible. Having been brought up in the country, my education in certain social matters may have been neglected, but I certainly should not expect a gentleman holding any sort of position in the country to take off his hat to a milliner, and in her own shop, too."

"And do they in London?"

"Why, the men who go to this Madame Elysée's not only take off their hats to her, but her customers chat away to her as if they were on grounds of perfect equality."

"And she isn't a particularly pretty woman either?"

"Pretty indeed—as if that ought to make any difference—why, she is as ugly as sin, and will never see forty again."

"Are you quite sure? She is a very quiet, unassuming woman."

"Oh, you know her, then?"

"And if her customers like to make themselves agreeable to her," he continued, ignoring her question, "from what you tell me of the class of people you see there, it is, you may depend upon it, the correct thing to do, and you'd better do the same. I have told you how my account stands at my bankers; you had better be civil to her until you can afford to be independent, I think."

"I shall most certainly give her a piece of my mind if she attempts any familiarities with me."

"You must please yourself, my dear."

"I mean to," was the reply.

The opportunity was not long in coming. On Mrs. Lorrimer's next visit to the Bond Street emporium she found the proprietress engaged in affable conversation with a well-known M.P. and his wife.

An assistant came forward to attend to her, and before she had concluded the mysterious operation of "fitting," Madame had taken leave of her friends, the gentleman courteously taking off his hat as he wished her good-bye, and she came forward to Mrs. Lorrimer to express a hope that everything was satisfactory.

"As satisfactory as can be expected, I suppose."

"I don't understand you, madam. I am very sorry if you have any cause for complaint."

"I have been recommended to you as a person who gave individual attention to her customers, instead of which I find myself invariably waited upon by one or other of your assistants."

"I cannot possibly be everywhere, madam, and all my helpers are thoroughly qualified to execute orders and attend to customers, even more so than I am, probably."

This was said in a quiet, ladylike tone of voice, although the speaker, a plain, middle-aged woman looked as if she could, on occasion, bandy sharp words with anybody.

"When I come to a shop I expect to be attended to by the principal."

"Very well, then, madam, it will be best for us to sever our connection; I will send in my account shortly."

"Send it in at once by all means."

Mr. Lorrimer was agreeably surprised when he next saw his wife to find her in a very good temper.

"I told you I should give that milliner woman a bit of my mind."

"And you have?"

"Yes, I have; I told her to send in her account as soon as she liked."

"And if she takes you at your word?"

"You will have to pay it."

"I have told you I can't, that is, not at present; I might in one way, though," speaking as if he had suddenly remembered something.

"I don't care how you do it so long as she is paid. What do you mean to do, borrow it?"

"No; in going through some papers in that drawer in which you found Miss Carew's letters, I came across an I.O.U. for £100, and, of course, I could get that by asking for it."

"A hundred pounds owing to you and you complain of being short of money? Really, Charlie, you are altogether incomprehensible."

"You see, my dear, this money is owing to me by a lady."

"I don't see that matters much. Not a lady of rank, I suppose?"

"She is, as it happens."

"Oh! isn't it rather a strange thing for ladies to incur debts with gentlemen?"

"I thought you might think so,

IF YOU WOULD LIKE TO WIN A GRAMOPHONE, TURN TO PAGE 495.

Digitized by Google

when I decided to mention it to you, but then this isn't exactly a debt."

"What on earth is it, then?"

"A sum I won at cards some years ago now, and I imagine the fact must have escaped the lady's memory, otherwise I am sure she would have sent me a cheque long since."

"All the more reason you should remind her. I would do anything rather than be under an obligation to that Bond Street woman."

"If I get this money to-morrow I will send you a wire, and you can meet me at Madame Elysée's."

"Do you mean to call for it? If so I think you might take me. Women are so much more tactful in these matters than men."

"On second thoughts I will meet you in Bond Street to-morrow at four o'clock; I am quite sure to get the money, and I can settle by cheque afterwards."

* * * * *

Punctual to the appointed time, Mr. Lorrimer arrived in Bond Street, and after waiting something like half-an-hour he saw his wife's brougham (hired) coming along.

Mrs. Lorrimer's look of triumph gave way to one of genuine consternation when on entering the shop she saw her husband courteously raise his hat to Madame Elysée, and express himself pleased at seeing her looking so well. "My wife tells me she wants her account if you have it ready, please."

"Here it is, Mr. Lorrimer. I hope you won't think me awfully extortionate," replied Madame with a laugh.

"Just glance over it, dear, will you?" handing it to his wife, and turning to the proprietress he resumed his conversation. Presently she was called away, and Mr. Lorrimer asked his wife casually if it was correct.

"The—the items seem all right, but what does this mean, Charlie? Total £73 15s.; less due to Mr. Lorrimer on his I.O.U., £100; balance in his favour, £26 5s."

"That's the I.O.U. I spoke to you about."

"But you said your debtor was a lady of rank."

"And so she is! Madame Elysée to the world at large, Lady Duncombe to her friends. You see, when Duncombe left her she had to do something, lots of titled people are in business nowadays, and——"

"Charles, you will oblige me by calling the brougham at once!"

"Certainly, my dear, but I must just say good-bye to Lady Duncombe first."

L. Payne.

A man must make his own way in the world, while a woman merely has hers.

"They say she's worth half a million." "Well, she wants it in her business." "What's that?" "Looking for a husband."

She (pensively): "Ah, well! What is wealth, after all, but the mere difference between income and expenditure!" He: "So is debt."

She: "Why does that piano sound first loud and then soft when your sister plays it?" He: "Well, you see, she is learning to ride a bike, and uses the pedals alternately from force of habit."

"Ah, beautiful lady," exclaimed the clairvoyant, "you have come to find your future husband, is it not so?" "Not much," replied the beautiful lady. "I have come to find out where my present husband is when he's absent!"

He: "I had a queer dream about you last night, Miss Louisa. I was about to give you a kiss when suddenly we were separated by a river that gradually grew as big as the Thames." She: "And was there no bridge and no boat?"

The blushing bride-elect was rehearsing the ceremony about to take place. "I shall expect you to give me away, papa," she said. "I'm afraid I have done it already, Caroline," replied the old man nervously. "I told your Hubert this morning you had a disposition just like your mother's."

Your Editor Chats.

Last week I promised to tell you something more about the lady who is writing a series of her confessions as a chaperon.

All the articles have now been written and delivered, and I may say that I consider them even stronger than "The Confessions of Cynthia," which I think my readers will readily admit are extremely good. The fact which makes the new series more interesting is that the scenes are laid, not only in London, but in the chief centres of gaiety all over the Continent.

Naturally all the names of persons and places have been disguised. This is absolutely necessary, and is a condition of the terms under which the articles were written, for to give the real names would be to cause a great deal of unpleasantness and ill-feeling amongst those dealt with.

The object of the series is by no means an idle one. It is not my desire merely to arouse the interest of readers by tickling their mental palates with brightly written facts, but to give them a vivid insight into the way in which members of "the smart set" in Society pass their time.

In the last number of Short Stories I published extracts from certain letters which appeared in a big London daily dealing with the moral tone of "The Confessions of Cynthia," and I think that, as the matter finished up, there was everything to be said in favour of the articles, and nothing to be said against them. One half of the world is always interested to know how the other half lives. It would be of little interest to you to read of how those people in your own sphere of life manage to pass the time. You know how they do it. But, unless you are living in high Society circles, you cannot possibly know how these people live. Their methods of existence, from the time they are born until the time they die, are so absolutely different from those of the ordinary person.

No one can write about their doings except a person who has lived with them since childhood, and even then there are very, very few people who can truly and vividly portray their exact method of living. One of these very, very few people is Lady Peggy Carstairs—the name under which the new series of articles is being written. Lady Peggy is unquestionably an able writer, and I am sure that the revelations which she makes will interest you more than anything else has ever done.

The first article will appear in Short Stories, ready Tuesday, October 28th.

The offer of £5 for distributing leaflets of our new serial has been increased to nearly £15, and is being awarded in the shape of five splendid Gramophones, each worth, with records, about £3.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

DOROTHY MERRILL had taken it into her head to be literary. The fact that she showed more decided talent for other things seemed to her no indication that she should not persevere in the matter of becoming an authoress.

She could make her own hats and dresses, she could play the piano, and she could sing. But all of these accomplishments, in her eye, were of pallid insignificance compared with the one burning ambition that possessed her.

She would be a writer. Just what steps to take she did not yet know.

Kindly disposed friends gave her varied advice. "Set about cultivating it just as you would anything else," said one who honestly thought she knew. "Take notes on people and things about you. Carry a writing pad and pencil with you always to record impressions. Get into the literary atmosphere."

Which advice sounded alluring indeed to the listener. Dorothy proceeded at once to lay in a stock of writing materials and invested also in a brand new dictionary. This she supplemented by a book of synonyms and a wonderful volume which bore the luminous title "How the Inexperienced Author May Succeed."

Miss Merrill congratulated herself that during the approaching vacation she would have ample time to follow the wonderful instructions contained in this book. By winter she would be seeing her name in print as a charming new writer of fiction.

When she went on board the steamer which was to carry her to the resort where she purposed spending the summer she buoyantly took with her pencils and writing paper.

No doubt this trip would afford her a most excellent opportunity to record impressions.

"There will be all sorts and conditions of people to study," she reflected.

It happened, however, that she did not find asserted humanity quite so interesting as she had anticipated.

After a few minutes' survey of the blank-faced, weary individuals who lounged about the cabin with parcels and lunch bags at their feet she went outside, hopeful of improvement.

She found herself confronting people even more uninteresting than those she had just left.

Lifting her trailing skirts gingerly—and unconsciously her dainty nose as well—she crossed to a seat by the railing.

At her left a vexed mother scolded two fretful children. Yielding at length to their importunities, she opened the lunch basket. Thereupon the youngsters fell to and attacked with vigour some abnormally large sandwiches and home-made cake.

Miss Merrill was not hungry and withdrew her eyes.

At her left sat a young miss in an exceedingly pronounced pink lawn dress. It had a yoke and sleeves of very open work lace. Her rose laden hat was reminiscent of a draper's shop on bargain day.

She and her sweetheart were blissfully discussing chocolate and apples. His honest face shone above a candidly clean collar and an innocent blue tie.

Miss Merrill sighed impatiently. Any author who could gather inspiration from such discouraging material deserved fame and fortune. For her part, she would give it up for the present.

Certainly there was no one in sight who would serve as the hero of a charming romance. If only some really nice young man——

Miss Merrill glanced up suddenly as there appeared in the doorway of the cabin a person whom she had not seen before.

It was as if some unseen wand were wafted and she found her uncompleted wish gratified. The young man who stood there was handsome of face, well groomed and distinguished.

He crossed to a seat not far from her and she could observe him without being observed. He brought an impression of deep, healthful tan and a flashing sweetness of brilliantly clear blue eyes.

Miss Merrill produced writing paper from her magazine and forthwith proceeded to make jottings.

Now, it must be admitted that the young man in question, although most polite as to behaviour, did not entirely conceal his interest in the maiden who wrote. Not that the fact of her writing concerned him. He was only vaguely aware that she was so engaged. The picture of the young woman herself was what engaged his thoughts. She looked so sweet and bright and fresh—so altogether wholesome and attractive.

More than once did he send a glance over his shoulder—a glance presumably aimed at the sea-green waves, but which nevertheless included the daintily clad maiden with the piquant face and dark grey eyes.

He was sorry when she left her place and went inside to listen to the music. Others followed, and soon the chairs near him were quite deserted.

There was no earthly reason why he should not follow, too, and hear the musical performance within. However, he wavered. A guilty soul is its own accuser. He felt somehow that she would divine his interest and hate him for his presumption.

So he lingered outside, still undetermined. Strolling abstractedly about among the chairs he picked up a magazine lying upon one of them.

The leaves opened at a definite place. Pages of pencilled jottings faced him.

"He was well browned and athletic, my hero, with the bluest of blue eyes, a strong but tender mouth, and—yes—a very stubborn jaw, which I like, and——"

He looked up and flushed guiltily to behold the unknown divinity beside him. She reached quietly for the magazine, with a cool frown and a murmured "Pardon me," which expressed worlds of mingled contempt and chagrin.

"Pardon me," he said quickly, with emphasis on the pronoun. "I am exceedingly sorry—I——"

But she checked further words with a cool nod of disdain.

Her looks only faintly expressed the mortification and shame that burnt within her. He had actually read it!

Her lips drew closer, her face flamed a deeper crimson.

When she left the boat at her destination and climbed into the vehicle that would take her to the Langley Hotel it was with a great sigh of relief.

The driver waited. Was it possible that she was the only party bound for the Langley Hotel? Evidently so. But no—a young man was approaching, bag in hand. It was her hero of the blue eyes!

Dorothy Merrill gave a gasp and sat with exaggerated dignity in a far corner of the seat as he entered. She would show him that she was not so foolish as her pencilled words might indicate.

As this narrative aims to tell the truth, however, it must be related that she unbent from her hauteur before the journey was over. There was a beautiful sunset, and certain remarks concerning it were not only appropriate but unavoidable.

In short, all animosity had vanished when they reached the hotel.

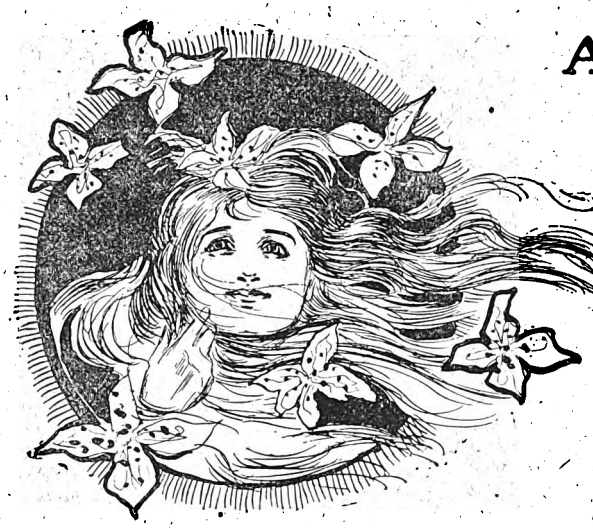
The hero—Joseph Hanly by name, had intended to stay only one week. He remained four.

Her affianced was not at all regretful when she decided to give up becoming an authoress.

"Bother the writing," he said. "I like you just as well without that accomplishment."

A. M. Hearst.

Digitized by Google



A BELIEVER IN REALITIES.

A Pretty Little Story of a Fight Between Riches and Poverty.

"He is very rich and very good-looking, Amy," said Mrs. Ainsworth. "You can't do better than captivate him. I give you full leave, so far as I am concerned."

"Thank you," I responded, smiling; "but are you sure he is at liberty? Has not such a prize been secured by some one before now?"

"I think not; indeed, I am quite sure of it. You have only to go in and win."

I made no disclaimer, though this kind of conversation did not really please me; it hardly coincided with my ideas of delicacy. Not very consistent, you may say, since I was not too delicate to think about it. But then, who ever is consistent? I did not pretend to be. I thought a good deal about Mr. Otis for the next three or four days; wondered what his own style might be, and what he preferred in women. Perhaps he liked blondes best. No matter. I had tolerable confidence in my own ability to teach him to admire brunettes.

He came at last, and Mrs. Ainsworth gave a party in his honour. She was always giving parties, if she could find sufficient excuse; a temper of mind which, you may imagine, made her popular with the young folks of the neighbourhood. I wore my prettiest dress, and looked well enough; so, at least, the mirror said when I consulted it; and no eyes that met mine spoke any contradiction. I went downstairs a trifle excited, though outwardly serene. It seemed as if the meeting with Mr. Otis might be the turning-point in my fate.

But I forgot his very existence in five minutes.

He had not come alone; a friend had accompanied him—Mr. Heathcote. I could have told him, had he asked advice of me, that it was very poor policy to carry about a person so much more attractive than himself. If Mr. Otis was good-looking, Mr. Heathcote was superb. Just the tall, stately form, the deep, dark eyes, the broad, white brow, with which girls fit out a hero of romance.

He was introduced; we talked together. Of anything that came up—the weather, the place, the company. He was not the kind of man to diverge into side-paths of sentiment or poetry. Yet some people can give a charm to commonplaces; some eyes, some voices, have poetry in their very glance and tone, no matter what they say. That sounds fanciful, perhaps—but it is true; at least, in my experience.

The evening passed, and I went home; mother was sitting up for me, as usual. I told her there never was such a delightful party. She asked in what it differed from our ordinary gatherings. I could not say; there was music and dancing, as always; only it happened to be so very pleasant! Being a housekeeper, she inquired about refreshments. Did we have nice ices, and was the cake made at home, or bought? Oh! we had ices, of course, I said; or no, I wasn't certain—but it was probable, was it not? Mrs. Ainsworth always had them. As for the cake, I couldn't say; I really did not notice.

Mother looked surprised, but made no comment. "And how did you like this cousin?" she asked—"this Mr. Otis, whom we have heard so much of?"

I did not know; I had hardly seen him. We were introduced, I believed, but that was all. "But I can tell you of an acquaintance that I did make, mother—Mr. Heathcote." I paused, and did not care to expatiate upon the subject.

Mother gave a little smile, and then looked grave.

"You found him pleasant, I suppose," she answered.

"Yes," I answered—"very pleasant." I was ashamed of the colour that I felt creeping and tingling up into my cheeks. "I hope you will think the same," I added, with an effort. "He asked if he might call to-morrow, and I said yes."

As it was late, I bade her good-night.

Why could not the evening end as it began? Why must one be obliged to stop and think instead of floating on in pure enjoyment? Who was Mr. Heathcote, and would it do to find him so delightful? What had become of all my fancies about Mr. Otis? How immeasurably insignificant did the man appear, he who had filled so large a space in my plans that very morning! I was a little frightened. I said to myself, "You must be careful. You know you can't marry a poor man, however enchanting he may be." Why? Because I had long before decided that I had seen enough of poverty. It had been an inmate of our dwelling from my earliest remembrance. We belonged, indeed, to the gentry of the place, if you will not laugh at me for speaking so about a little country-town; but no one else was, or appeared to be, so limited. We had shelter, and food, and clothing, to be sure; but in everything we stopped just short of what was pleasant; the plainest necessaries were all we could accomplish. I sighed for something that should embellish life; I hoped one day to achieve it—for I thought I held the golden key that would unlock all treasures, and leave me to enrich myself at will. I was handsome, and knew it. It is so long ago that there is no harm in speaking of it now. My olive cheek mantled with a rose-red flush; my profile might have been copied for a cameo; large, lustrous eyes, dark, shining hair lit up and framed my beauty. This was my capital; I meant to make the most of it. Not that I ever thought of marrying for money; no, indeed! Oh! the gay arrogance of youth! I was to have everything; love and splendour, and luxury. All would come in time; but meanwhile it would never do to find a poor man charming.

I made a sort of compromise with myself. I knew nothing of Mr. Heathcote, had never heard his name before; for aught I could tell he was a millionaire. I must inform myself. He might prove as eligible as he was agreeable. If not—I must avoid him, that was all.

This does not look very pleasant, written down in black and white; but so I settled it. Having thus arranged for future prudence, I was at liberty to recall the evening's happiness, to dwell on certain glances, to wonder if such and such remarks had special meaning, or were at the service of any lady Mr. Heathcote encountered.

Digitized by Google

There was soon an end to dreaming. Breakfast was hardly over the next day when Mary Orme came in. She was just the one to tell me all I wished to know—a girl who heard everything, and repeated it as fast as she heard it. She rallied me on being so "taken up," as she expressed it, at the party, and neglecting the lion of the evening.

"Why should not Mr. Heathcote be as much a lion as the other?" I inquired.

"He is good-looking," she admitted; "not that I admire him as I do Mr. Otis. I always prefer fair men. But one is rich, and the other poor. It's a choice between a West-end mansion and a suburban villa. Oh, you need not look so vexed! Mrs. Ainsworth told me about him. He is a young lawyer, just getting into practice; very promising, and all that. But, bless me! how many promising young lawyers there are that one never hears of a second time! Not that I suppose it would make any difference to you—you're such a romantic thing!"

"I wish you would choose your words a little better," I said not half so savagely as I felt. "What have you ever seen in me of the moonstruck, maudlin sort, that you should fix such an epithet upon me?"

"Take care that you don't justify it, that's all," she said, nodding with a look of wisdom. Then mother came in, and the conversation changed.

"Justify it," indeed! Of course I wasn't going to do that. When Mr. Heathcote called, I tried to be extremely cool and self-possessed. I must be on my guard against that happy outflow of spirits, that careless yielding to the impulse of the hour, which had made last night so pleasant. Yet I was glad to see him—glad and flattered. At one moment I behaved too coldly; that would never do—rudeness was inexcusable. In trying to avoid it, I passed, perhaps, the limit I had set myself.

Then, mother, I was sure, would notice anything peculiar; this embarrassed me yet more. I grew impatient for his departure; yet, when he was gone, felt grieved and angry with myself.

I could not go on thus; I had sense enough left to see that. If I had not sufficient self-command to treat him rationally, I must keep out of his way. The next time we met I gave the brightest answers to everything he said, and left his neighbourhood as quickly as I could. It was prudent, doubtless, but not pleasant. However, when the evening ended, I was able to praise my own discretion; and wish, with all my heart, that there was no occasion for it.

A day or two after we had a picnic down the lake. We went in boats—a merry party. Mr. Heathcote was very troublesome. Apparently he liked to be with me, and indulged the preference, knowing no reason why he should not. I was unable to avoid him without rudeness, and, perhaps, was not sorry that prudence, for once, must have the go-by. It was such a happy day; I enjoyed it all the more in that it was a stolen pleasure—a something that I must not have again. We spread our tablecloths upon the grass, and set forth the feast; encountered a hundred inconveniences, and made light of all. The meal was over, coffee was served. Mr. Heathcote handed me a fragrant cup, and seated himself at my side.

"Delightful, isn't it?" he said, glancing at the waving tree-tops and bright lake. "What a relish there is in this gipsy freedom, after being pent up for months in bricks and mortar!"

"You are rather Bohemian, I fear."

"Not at all. But there is a sort of 'vagrant' instinct that awakens in such scenes; an inheritance from the old days when the race dwelt in tents. Have you never felt it?"

"Never. I should not fancy tent-life in the least."

"Are you sure? Don't you feel the charm of that unfettered, wandering existence? To rise in the morning without the least idea where you shall rest at night; to go forth, impelled by nothing but your own will; to linger or depart from any spot, just as the humour prompts? How different from the hard recurrence of our conventional ways! Life would have no chance to grow stale amid this frequent change and absolute freedom."

Facts About the Alphabet.

You know the English alphabet has twenty-six letters. Do you know the number in other alphabets? The Sandwich Islanders' alphabet has twelve letters, Burmese eighteen, Italian twenty-three, Bengali twenty-one, Spanish twenty-seven, Arabic twenty-eight, Russian forty-one, and Sanscrit fifty. There is an A B C of disease too. In various countries, climate and conditions attack various organs. In the British Isles the organs most affected are the liver and digestive system: and the A B C of health lies in keeping these healthy. Authorities agree that the use of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans is the most certain means of doing this. Mrs. W. Davidson, of Dunhead Farm, Monikie (Dundee), says:—"Indigestion and biliousness made my life one long misery for years. Night after night I had to sit up in bed racked with pain. My head often seemed as though it would split, and the pains across my back, shoulders, and stomach, were almost unbearable. I held cold, damp cloths to my head to ease the pain, and I tried to bring up the bile from my stomach by making myself sick, but it was all to no purpose.

Sometimes I would be going about doing my work, milking the cows and doing other farm work, when suddenly a mist would rise before my eyes and almost blind me. So acute were the pains in my head that my eyes would get quite black underneath. I was also subject to dizziness, and often when I crossed the farmyard I would turn so giddy and faint with pain that I had to walk about almost doubled in two. No matter what I took I could get no relief. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans were recommended and I owe my life to them. A few doses gave me relief and you may be sure after that I gave them a good trial. They have cured me entirely, and ill health is now unknown to me." Such is one case out of thousands. Wherever Bile Beans are used, beneficial results follow. Indigestion, constipation, piles, biliousness, anæmia, rheumatism, all female ailments, dizziness, and headache cannot resist their powerful yet painless action. All chemists stock them at one and three-half-pence or two and nine per box. The large box is really the most economical.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

Digitized by Google

"I doubt your being so free," I said. "You would have to consult the welfare of the herds, and go where they had pasturage and water. Bondage at once! And there would be no easy chairs in the tents—and when dinner-time came, oh! what woeful wants you would experience!"

"Perhaps you are right—if we must come down to details."

"That is always my way of looking at things," I said. "I am matter-of-fact, entirely."

"Young ladies often tell us so," he replied; "but, of course, we never believe it. They do not expect that we should."

"Indeed! But I expect it, because it is so."

"Don't!" he said, with a little lazy smile. "A touch of romance is as native to youth and beauty as the bloom to fruit.

Well—this was surely a good time to declare myself. "To youth in some circumstances, perhaps," I answered; "not to me. I look at the world in the most prosaic fashion possible."

"Why so?" he asked. "Why do you insist on brushing off the charm so early?"

"Because I am poor. I can't afford it."

"You must be poor, indeed," he said, gravely, "if you cannot afford the feelings natural to your years."

This seemed like a rebuke, and vexed me. What right had he to take that tone?

"I don't say it is of set purpose," I replied. "People are different, you know. Romance is very pretty, but so are some realities. I believe in these last devoutly."

"I congratulate you on your prudence," he said, pointedly. After that I felt a difference in his manner. What had I spoken? Mere nonsense, such as any girl might utter. So I told myself; but I did not so mean it, nor did he so understand me.

Thenceforth I had no further trouble with him. It was hard. I don't think I could have kept on my way had he not aided me so well. Had he followed me about, persisting in attentions, I should have been obliged to yield, in spite of resolutions; but I was never tempted. I felt some twinges of conscience in adopting my plan of operations; I did believe in my heart that Mr. Lorimer was attracted by me, would be pained by my behaviour. I had a sense of guilt, of something like cruelty, in determining to set him aside and think of him no more. I might have spared myself all trouble on that score. His feelings were safe, out of my power to wound. He was attentive to the other girls, especially to Mary Orme. Me he let alone. This was what I had decreed; and surely such a result should have been gratifying; but it did not gratify me. I began to be really jealous of Mary Orme. I remembered what she had said about admiring Mr. Otis. "Oh, yes!" I thought, "she would call Caliban, with money, handsomer than Apollo without it! Mercenary creature!" Here conscience aroused, and made some unpalatable remarks. I had very little to say, she averred, about anybody being mercenary. Besides, was not Mary now vindicating herself from such aspersions? Did she not show far more interest in Mr. Heathcote than in his richer friend? This view of the case suited me no better. I was afraid I would rather have had him entrapped, for a time, by a heartless manœuvrer, than have believed her honestly in love with him.

What would I not have given to know his feelings! Mary was a pleasant girl; rather pretty, very clever; and men were so fickle! "Let him go," I said, "if he wants to go—if he can console himself so soon!"

If he could change with so much ease, it certainly did not become me to mope and pine; particularly as I had taken such pains to bring this very state of things about. And the world stood just where it did before; poverty was just as painful, affluence just as much to be desired, though I had lost sight, in some measure, of the truth. I set myself seriously to cultivating Mr. Otis. He was good looking, as Mary had said, and intelligent. Very well disposed, too, to be gallant, if one offered him a crumb of encouragement occasionally. Other girls could be interested in him; why should not I, and take the good of it? I tried faithfully. Oh, but it was weary work! He used to stand at my side, chatting and playing with my bouquet, and any looker-on supposed, no doubt, that we found each other exceedingly agreeable; and all the time I hardly knew a word that he was saying. My mind was busy with the one endless theme—does he like her—does she care for him—will it come to anything?

I grew pale and thinner with this constant worry. It was bad enough now. But what if we were parted utterly? I began to doubt the wisdom of my stern resolves. Poverty was not so dreadful, after all; there were worse things in the world. Mother was not an unhappy woman, in spite of her cares and her privations; and we might not be so very poor—there was always a hope of rising. Yet, take it at the very worst, could we not bear it together? At that I flushed, half with joy and half with shame.

I fell in love presently with a picture I had conjured from the future. A little house, but, ah, so exquisitely neat! Myself, going about brightening, arranging, beautifying everything—for him! Then nightfall, the curtains drawn, the lamp shining softly over books and work; his footstep at the door; the evening at his side, with all the world shut out! What could be more delicious than poverty like this?

But how to realise these charming visions? I had sent him from me, I could not go out of my way to seek him now. Yet might not look or manner convey some signal of relenting? Would he not hail the change with joy? Yes, surely. I went in good heart about my work of reconcilement.

Only disappointment awaited me. I saw with terror that my timid wiles were all unnoticed. He did not or would not understand.

I took long, restless rambles in those days, and came back wretched from them. One day we chanced to meet. He turned and kept on with me, talking rather fitfully. As happens in such cases, we touched on dangerous themes. One word followed another, till suddenly he stopped and stood in the path before me.

"Amy," he said, seizing my hands in his, "do you love me?" I trembled from head to foot. I could not speak. "For I love you," he said, "with my whole heart! I cannot go on as we have been going lately. You have understood me, I am sure, from the very first night we met. Did you not read my heart when you warned me from you?"

I could not answer in words. But I dreaded to drive him away again. I had long repented of my foolish warning. I stole a beseeching glance at him, as much as to say, "Spare me!"

"Forgive me, dear," he said. "I am ungenerous to accuse you. I have been to blame. Determined to appear indifferent, I have pretended to admire Mary Orme. Pride, and pique, and folly, had almost led me further—this chance meeting has saved me—I see now I can never love anyone but you."

"I am punished," I said, softly.

"We have both been punished," he answered, gently. "You could love me, darling—you do!"

He drew me to him, as he spoke, and I did not resist. I was ready to forgive and forget it all; for had I not been the more to blame? My head fell on his shoulder, and I burst into tears; but they were tears of happiness, nevertheless.

Before we parted, I had told him all. I could not be fully happy till I had made my confession and been forgiven. How I had thought I could give my hand without my heart; how I had been taught to fear poverty; and how, at last, I had found that I did not know myself.

"No, you are too noble," he said. "It is not poverty, however, darling, that I ask you to accept. If I am not as rich as Mr. Otis, I have, at least, a sufficiency."

I was doubly punished, I could not, after all, make the sacrifices for him I had planned; for the "sufficiency" proved to be a handsome fortune. Our marriage, which soon took place, removed me for ever from the old atmosphere of want and limitation. Luxury surrounded me. My husband's generosity even brightened the old home, and relieved my mother's declining years of many cares. All my early dreams were realised.

My husband has risen to fame and eminence. We have everything that earth can afford. I sometimes think I am too happy. Certainly I am more happy than I deserve.

E. B. Ripley.

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REGD.

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co.

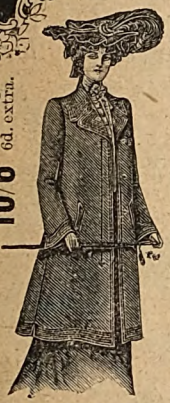
THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Patterns Post Free.

ALFOSCO REGD.

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.



Design No. 1261. 10/6. Carriage, 6d. extra.

Send Post-card for PATTERNS and New Sketch Book of Winter Fashions in Jackets and Costumes. Free on Application.

CALL OR WRITE.

VALUE FOR MONEY.

Design No. 1425. 10/6.

Design No. 1425. 10/6.

The latest in Costume Skirts. Made in a good black Vicuna Cloth with bright finish. This ladylike skirt is lined throughout and trimmed with tailor-stitched strappings of same material and small black silk buttons. All sizes in stock. Direct at first cost from the "Alfosco Factories." Price only 10/6, carriage 5d. extra. When ordering send waist measurement and length of skirt in front.

Design No. 435. 10/6. Skirt alone, 6/6. Carriage, 5d. extra.

Design No. 1261. 10/6.—Chesterfield three-quarter Sacque Jacket for Autumn and Winter. This Jacket is produced in Black, Fawn, and Brown Beaver Cloth, also in pretty Grey Tweeds and Black and Dark Grey Vicuna Cloth. Price only 10/6, carriage 6d. extra. This jacket can also be ordered 33ins. long, 11/6; 36ins., 12/6; 39ins., 13/6; and 42ins., 14/6; carriage 6d. extra.

Design No. 435. 10/6. Special Value for Half-a-Guinea.

Costume made in Allen Foster & Co.'s world-renowned Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth. All colours and sizes kept in stock. The Bodice has pouched front, and is stylishly trimmed, strappings of Taffeta silk, and small buttons. Well made Skirt, bell shape, fastens at side, pocket, and trimmed with silk and buttons to match Bodice. Price only 10/6; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 6/6; carriage, 5d. Best Value in London. Good fit guaranteed. This costume made in the new "Alfosco" Tweed, all colours, will be 25/-. Patterns post free.

ALLEN FOSTER & Co.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 Golden Lane, Barbican, London, E.C.

FREE TO ALL

MR. H. STANSFIELD (from a photo).

A trial of an entirely new method of curing

RUPTURE,

the same method that cured Mr. H. Stansfield. No cumbersome steel truss, and no loss of time from work. Write to-day for free trial and for interesting literature, including a book containing many testimonials.

DR. W. S. RICE,

57 Stonecutter Street, London, E.C.

BY ROYAL WARRANT

BOVRIL

BORAX

Extract of Soap.

Tens of Thousands of the shrewdest housekeepers in the Kingdom are daily using Borax Extract of Soap for washing clothes and general house cleaning.

For more than 25 years it has been adding recruits to the army of those who have found the best. Pleased women are hourly acquainting their friends with its wonderful time- and energy-saving qualities.

If you do not say "BORAX" when buying Soap Extract you are paying the same price for something inferior, both in quality and effectiveness. Borax Extract of Soap does all that others can do, and more.

Ask for it the next time and be convinced.

Sold in ¼lb. packets and dozens everywhere.

Write to-day for free packet, naming this paper and your Grocer.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

Digitized by Google

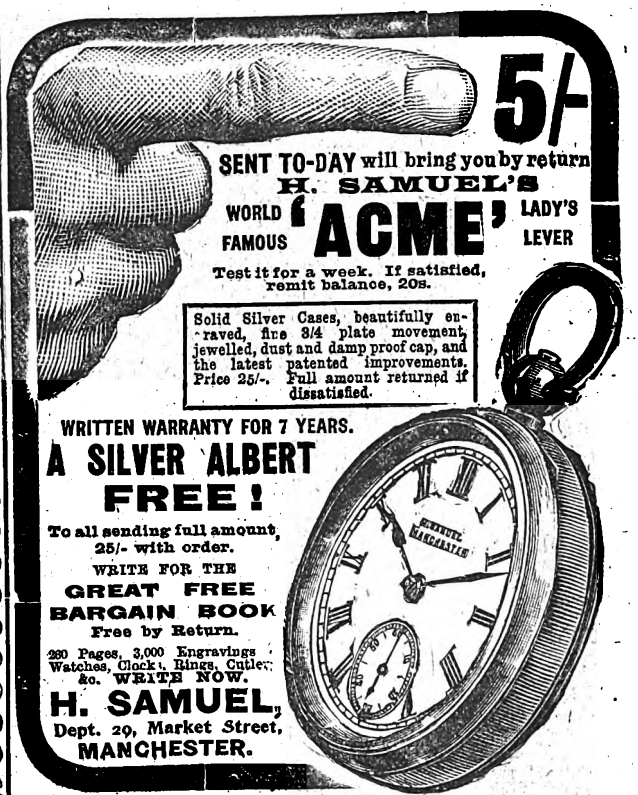
Worth a Guinea a Box.

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

No other medicine in the world can claim so many regular users. Thousands of families always keep a box of BEECHAM'S PILLS in the house, so that, on the first sign of any irregularity of the system, a timely dose may be administered, and further trouble and suffering averted. Nine-tenths of the BEECHAM'S PILLS sold are purchased by those who HAVE USED THEM BEFORE and have found them indispensable as

A FAMILY MEDICINE.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).



5/-

SENT TO-DAY will bring you by return

H. SAMUEL'S

WORLD FAMOUS 'ACME' LADY'S LEVER

Test it for a week. If satisfied, remit balance, 20s.

Solid Silver Cases, beautifully engraved, fine 3/4 plate movement, jewelled, dust and damp proof cap, and the latest patented improvements. Price 25/-. Full amount returned if dissatisfied.

WRITTEN WARRANTY FOR 7 YEARS.

A SILVER ALBERT FREE!

To all sending full amount, 25/- with order.

WRITE FOR THE

GREAT FREE BARGAIN BOOK

Free by Return.

280 Pages, 3,000 Engravings Watches, Clocks, Rings, Cutlery, &c. WRITE NOW.

H. SAMUEL,

Dept. 29, Market Street,

MANCHESTER.

NOSE RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (B T), Specialist. South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 99 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2l. in stamps for details.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

THE BIGGEST BARGAIN EVER OFFERED.—This Bale contains Pair Full-size heavy Witney Blankets, 1 Quilt, red and white, blue and white, White Honeycomb, Marcella or Red Twill, your choice of these; Pair full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 3 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 6 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths. 28 articles for 49s. 6d. How to pay—Send 4s. 6d. only, we send the Bale, carriage paid, for your approval; the balance can be paid 5s. monthly. If you prefer to pay balance on receipt of goods send only 40s., saving 5s. cash discount.—Write for list of our bargains.

PRUDENTIAL SUPPLY STORES,

150 & 152 Seven Sisters Rd., Holloway, N.

THE SMARTEST NOVELTY OF THE DAY!

An Electric Pocket Lamp, ready for use, post free for 5/3 each. Gives out thousands of bright flashes. Ready for any emergencies by pressing the button. Well made and compact. Size 3½ by 2½. Price 5/3 post free. J. W. Rowe & Co. Successors, 15 & 16 Aldermanbury, London, E.C.

Order

E. & T.

PINK'S JAM

Undoubtedly the Best.

PURE.

No Artificial Colouring or Chemical Preservative.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor

66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s 1½d. tins everywhere.

Digitized by Google

A PRETTY GIRL AND A PLAIN WOMAN.

Out on the screened verandah it was cool, quiet, and cosy. Easy chairs, rugs and sofa cushions suggested the comfort of indoors. Vines, flowers, a hammock and the freedom of open air proclaimed the advantage of outdoors.

Never had the Pretty Girl looked prettier than she did to-night, swinging gently to and fro in the hammock, her coquettish face half turned from the man who sat and watched her.

Everything was propitious for a proposal. There was moonlight and there was fragrance—such fragrance as the gods distil on dew-drenched nights to enchant a lover's soul and lure his lips to confession.

Yet Ernest Holmes failed to feel either intoxication or enchantment. He was only placidly conscious of the beauty and the allurement about her. He was aware that conditions were favourable if he wished to speak. The time, the place, the acquiescent sweetness of the Pretty Girl—all pointed that way. But in spite of the readiness of circumstances his heart maintained a fixed indifference, refusing by some stubborn law of its own to respond to the external drawing.

He was a spectator, not an actor. He had no part in this scene—could have none. Never had this fact impressed itself so forcibly upon him as now.

He found himself wondering vaguely why this should be—why it was that he had no impulse to say the thing that was expected of him—the thing which all events leading up to the present time would seem to warrant him in saying.

Why could he not feel anything deeper than admiration for this girl—this girl whose beauty had so appealed to him at first? Why could he not tell her he loved her?

How very lovely she was! A perfect figure of curves and daintiness and grace. How absolutely faultless her profile, touched by the moonlight. How luminously white her dress and the snowy carnations that nestled cool and sweet in the coils of her dark hair.

Yes, she was perfect. And yet—was he capable of no greater depth of emotion than this? Could this surface admiration, this regard for mere form, be the love of which his soul had dreamt?

Somewhere in his heart lay a hope, a dear imagining, of what real love should mean. This cherished ideal seemed to rise and face him now.

The hour wore away. Still he had not spoken the words that would bind his future to that of the Pretty Girl. It was with a sense of relief that he rose at last to go. He had preserved the dear ideal inviolate. It glowed before him brighter than before.

* * * * *

It was two months later that he met the Plain Woman.

She was not really plain, even of outward feature, but she lacked the curves, the tints, the perfection of the Pretty Girl. By contrast people spoke of her as plain. That was before they knew her, however.

After they had really come in contact with her vigorous sweetness, her wholesome charm, they recalled the former verdict and pronounced her beautiful beyond compare.

Even from the first, Ernest Holmes had a stimulating sense of her real loveliness. There was that in her individuality which appealed to the unsatisfied depths of his nature.

After he had once met her he wanted to meet her again and yet again. Like a sun-starved plant, his soul reached yearning tendrils towards the wondrous light of her glowing companionship.

He remembered the inadequate quality of that other friendship and smiled. Now he could understand. It was like the husk and the kernel contrasted.

This true and powerful attraction needed neither moonlight nor fragrance to lend it magic.

Common daylight became enchanted if he was in her presence. Her charm, her magnetism bewitched the most prosaic landscape. It was on a dim, drizzly day that he told the Plain Woman of his love. It is doubtful, however, if either he or she realised the unfavourable conditions of the elements.

In the heart of each were sunshine and skies of blue. In the soul of each was a song.

* * * * *

"I can't understand it!" said the Pretty Girl, when she heard of the engagement.

She stood staring into her mirror with wounded, incredulous eyes.

"I can't understand it!" she repeated.

She looked upon the beautiful reflection that faced her; the exquisite face, with its baby freshness, its perfect curves; the long lashed, lustrous eyes, the softly-rounded throat, the prettily-moulded arms.

"And he chose her—deliberately chose her—in preference to me. It's beyond belief."

But as she looked her mood changed. A new realisation dawned. She seemed to see herself as a mere image, an insignificant bit of flesh and blood.

A consciousness of her lack, of her insufficient soul-development, came over her all at once.

"I'm just like a stuffed doll— a dummy—a harmless, helpless, pretty piece of prettiness," she told herself.

Then she sighed and turned slowly from the mirror, still meditating.

"There's something else, after all," she mused. "Something besides beauty, and I never believed it until now."

A. M.

READ THIS.

HOME PETS, FURRED AND FEATHERED.

A Book of Advice on Pets of all kinds, and how to keep them in Good Condition.

By MARY FERMOR. With Eight Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, price 2s. 6d., post free 2s. 9d.

Practice Strokes at Billiards.

By F. M. HOTINE.

Late Editor of The Billiard Review. With numerous Diagrams and Illustrations.

Cloth, price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta St., London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of

"HOME PETS." I inclose 2s. 9d.

"PRACTICE STROKES." „ 1s. 2d.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

Please cross out book not required.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

Should Girls Go to Sea?

"M. D." is twenty-one, and has a passionate desire to go abroad. She asks me if I would advise her to seek the position of stewardess on a liner, if stewardesses have "bad names," like actresses, and if it is difficult to secure a post as one.

* * * * *

Firstly, why has "M. D." such a violent desire to go abroad? In a man one can understand the desire to seek new fields for gaining wealth and experience, but unless a girl is an authoress, artist, or a serious professional of any kind, I cannot see why she must want to leave her own country, save, of course, for short periods. Further, "M. D." would not get the travel she seeks by becoming stewardess on a liner. She would only remain in port for a very few days, and a girl left alone in foreign seaports could scarcely do herself any good unless she has friends. Then the continuous tedium of work on board ship would jar on most women's nerves. I do not think stewardesses have "bad names" any more than actresses, as in both cases all depends on the person. Positions would largely be filled by those having influence and able to get introductions to principals of steamship lines. I advise "M. D." to give up this fantastic idea of getting employment on board ship and to knuckle down to home life.

Lena's Critics.

"Last summer I stayed for a week with some friends on a house-boat. While there, naturally, I made myself as agreeable as possible to the gentlemen. But whenever I was seen by my hostess and her lady friends talking to a man, I heard they were referring to me as a flirt. How, my dear Miss Morris, can a girl behave to the other sex without giving this unpleasant impression, and yet make herself agreeable?" This letter comes from "Lena," and is, I am sorry to say, not an unusual one for me to receive.

* * * *

If "Lena's" hostess is of the kind likely to make such malicious remarks, if I were "Lena" I should decline any further invitations from her. "Lena" should most certainly make herself as agreeable to men as she can, without passing the bounds of correct conduct. No man likes the stiff, prim miss, and a girl who can talk nicely will always be popular. You can afford to disregard such mischief-making people as you late hostess, "Lena," if you are confident that your own behaviour has been quite correct. There are always jealous people in the world, who seek to lay down the law for others, and it is as well to absolutely ignore them if a girl is to have any enjoyment in life.

Should He Take His Wife?

"Leonard" has been working at a business without success. He is married to a girl with a lot of relations, of whom she is very fond. He thinks he would do well at his business in the Colonies. If he continues his present work he is afraid he can never make a good living. Should I advise him to go abroad, though his wife would have to be parted from her people?

Every man ought to consider his wife before making such a change, and I am glad "Leonard" is doing so. Assuming him to be right in what he says about his business, I think he ought to take whatever steps are necessary for success in life. But it would be very unkind of him to take his wife out to the Colonies unless he has some definite prospects to go upon. If he is serious in this idea, why should he not go out first himself, leaving his wife to be looked after by her people? If prospects out there are good, and he sees chances of success, he might ask her to follow him after a certain time. If they are not good, then he should arrange to be able to return home and resume his old work without loss of connection. It is certain that if he is going out on speculation, he should not take his wife with him at first. A woman could not share with him the privations he might have to undergo.

How to Address the Unknown.

How should a man address a girl he does not know? "Jackie" is in love with a girl he has seen about, but sees no other means of getting to know her than by writing to arrange an appointment. Should he address her as "Madam," and sign himself "Yours respectfully," and how should he couch the wording of such a letter?

* * * *

I should think "Jackie" had better omit any such expression as "Madam" in writing to her. It sounds stiff and formal, and quite unsuited to such a letter. He should write without any word of address. And as for "yours respectfully" it sounds ridiculous. Better omit any such expression before the signature. Couching a letter such as this must depend on "Jackie's" literary style. If I were he I should say something like this—"I should very much like to meet you. I have long admired you. Would it be presumptuous to ask if my wish is returned? If so I shall be at—— at such and such a time." Formality would be out of place in a letter of this kind.

The Lorn Lover.

"Maisie" has been receiving attentions from a man for whom she does not care. He is a solitary individual, with few friends and very little knowledge of women. But the other day he told her she was the only woman he had ever loved, and asked her if she could return it. Now "Maisie" was very sorry for him, and not wishing to give him a pang, allowed him to think she really did care for him, whereas she really has no serious feeling at all. Was she wrong in doing this, and how can she best extricate herself from the position without driving the man to despair?

* * * *

"Maisie" would have been better advised had she told him at the very outset that she could not care for him. It might have been a blow, but one that would have been more easily recovered from than the present one. I think she had better now make a clean breast of her state of mind, telling him just how far she likes him. There is no reason why she should not continue his friendship. It should not be necessary to give him the pang of parting, as there should be no obstacle to friendship.

A Case for Kindness.

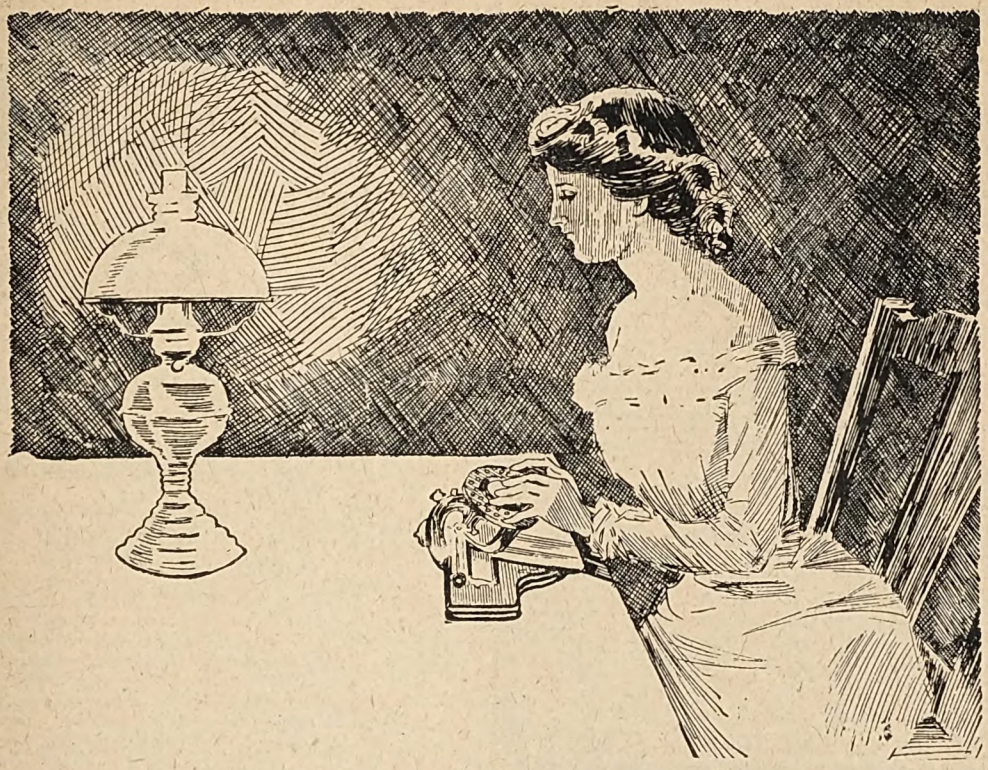
"E. F. C." used to know a man, and at one time there had been some intimacy between them. But for a long time they had seen nothing of each other. The other day she heard that he was lying seriously ill in hospital. Would it be wise for her to visit him?

* * * *

She should write to him expressing her sympathy, and say that if he would like to see her she would be very glad to visit him. One cannot be too kind to those who are suffering, and "wise" or not, it would be a gracious action which could do "E. F. C." no harm.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



HOW SHE DRESSES SO WELL.

Miss ——— is employed in the West End, and earns 18s. a week, yet she always has pocket-money to spare, and is always nicely and fashionably dressed, and this in spite of the fact that she contributes liberally to the up-keep of her old father and mother's home in the South of London. How does she do it? The explanation is simple. She bought a LAMBERT Typewriter. It cost her £7 10s. She canvassed her friends and neighbours, and obtained commissions to type programmes, menus, business letters, and articles for the magazines. She has now as much work as her spare time will allow her to undertake. The result is a constant source of income. This girl has gained the respect and admiration of the neighbourhood.

The LAMBERT fits into a dainty case (included in the price). It weighs, case and all, 8lbs. 14ozs., and can therefore be carried about comfortably. A descriptive booklet will be forwarded to you on receipt of a post-card. We also tell you where you can see a machine

WE HAVE AGENTS IN EVERY DISTRICT.

The LAMBERT Typewriter is made by the

GRAMOPHONE & TYPEWRITER LTD.,

21 City Road, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

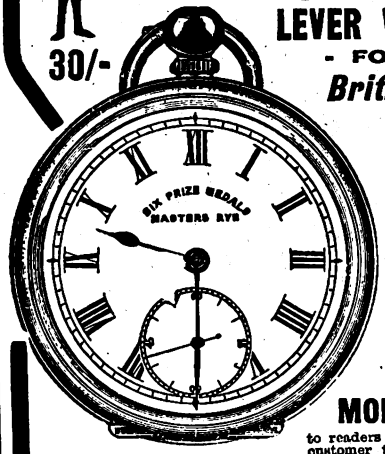
MASTERS'

FAMOUS 30/- CAPPED LEVER WATCH

- FOR -

British Workmen.

30/-



These Workmen's Watches are the perfection of what a watch should be. Fitted with Dust and Damp-proof Cap, carefully adjusted and timed to the greatest accuracy, specially heavy Solid Silver Cases (stamped), handsomely Engine-turned Engraved Shield and Garter Centre, Gold Hands, Sunk Seconds. Hard White Enamel Dial, High Crystal Glass, which gives the watch an extremely rich appearance, removable Dust and Damp-proof Cap. Price £1 10s., or supplied on to readers of Short Stories, allows each customer to test his purchase before entirely paying for it. Forward a Postal Order value 2/6 as first payment, and you will receive watch, together with written warranty for seven years. If approved of you send 2/6 on receipt, and pay 5/- monthly; but our net cash with order price is 27/- only. Money refunded in full if watch is not approved of and is returned at once.

MASTERS' MONTHLY TERMS

WEEKLY WELCOME, December 11th, 1900.—"When a Watch has won Six Prize Medals (J. N. Masters Ltd.) it is not difficult to accept the assertion that it is the Best 30/- Silver Watch in the World.

CATALOGUE of Watches, Rings, &c., Post Free.

MASTERS LTD., 157 HIGH ST., RYE, SUSSEX.

EVERY WISE WOMAN
Will Insist on Having

CROSFIELD'S PURE CANE SUGAR

Sweeter and More Economical than Common Beet Sugars. It Produces NO Fermentation. The Best Sugar for Household Purpose. Write for Name of Nearest Agent to CROSFIELD'S LTD., Sugar Refiners, LIVERPOOL.

Chapman's ENTIRE-WHEAT Food

IS NOTHING NEW, BUT HAS
Without Advertisement Stood the test of 30 years.

Every Physician knows that it contains the Greatest Nutriment in Smallest Compass.

BUILDS & SUSTAINS THE BODY.

Stocked by all Chemists,

CHAPMAN'S FOOD COMPANY
BATTERSEA.

A WRINGER FOR 2/6

ALL OUR WRINGERS ARE TESTED AT THE FACTORY.

1/- WEEKLY

RESPECTABLE MEN with spare time will do well to take up an agency. There is good money to be earned.

PRICE 54/6

1/- PER WEEK

CASH 45/-

SEND 2/6 or 2/- Fortnightly

Deposit, we then forward it at once, carriage paid, to nearest station, and you pay 1/- Weekly, until paid for. If however you wish to pay cash the price is but 45/-.

MAXEY & CO., MEADOW STREET, SHEFFIELD.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

THE GREAT HOME STORY PAPER.

TARTAN COVER No. 5.—MACMILLAN.

No. 721.] Week ending October 25th, 1902. [One Penny.

Digitized by Google

TO BE FIRST

Is to occupy an enviable position. Many aspire for first place, but few attain it. To acquire the lead, aspiration and push alone are not sufficient. Merit is required. This is exactly why . . . .

BEECHAM'S PILLS

stand foremost among medicines. They possess real merit, and have proved themselves worthy of a permanent position in the family medicine chest. Trial purchasers become regular users, because they find nothing to equal Beecham's Pills for dispelling

BILIOUS AND NERVOUS DISORDERS,

Indigestion, Sick Headache, Languor,

and other such troubles which arise from a Disordered Stomach. They regulate and tone up the entire system. The genuine worth of BEECHAM'S PILLS has obtained for them the unique position of having the Largest Sale of any Patent Medicine in the World.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Watches

A SOUND . . . INVESTMENT.

APPROVAL BEFORE PURCHASE TERMS . . . .

Lady's Sterling Silver Watch and Albert in Case for . . . 30/-

METHOD: Send only 3/- with order, the Watch and Albert will then be forwarded; if satisfied, send 8/- per month until the balance is paid, (Cash Purchasers receive HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT).

The Full Amount of the deposit will be refunded if you are not satisfied.

Description. Sterling Silver Watch with horizontal movement, fitted with all Modern Improvements, and Fully Jewelled; Handsomely Finished Opal Dial, Decorated and Embellished in High-class Style; Artistically Designed Sterling Silver Cases. Warranted 5 Years. Very Neat Two-row Sterling Silver Albert, with Bar and Drop Piece.

Send for our No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, &c., &c. Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED.

Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division Street, Sheffield.

NO CAPITAL REQUIRED.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1906 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—

NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE, Delamere Crescent, London, W.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.

Guaranteed 4 years. Will work by hand or treadle. To ensure satisfaction, machine sent on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL; or, if desired, can be paid 5/- Monthly. Write for terms, Designs, and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W.; 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

THE BIGGEST BARGAIN EVER OFFERED.—This Bale contains Pair Full-size heavy Witney Blankets, 1 Quilt, red and white, blue and white, White Honeycomb, Marcella or Red Twill, your choice of these; Pair full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 5 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 6 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths. 28 articles for 49s. 6d. How to pay—Send 4s. 6d. only, we send the Bale, carriage paid, for your approval; the balance can be paid 5s. monthly. If you prefer to pay balance on receipt of goods send only 40s., saving 5s. cash discount.—Write for list of our bargains.

PRUDENTIAL SUPPLY STORES, 150 & 152 Seven Sisters Rd., Holloway, N.

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

NOSE

RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (RT), Specialist. South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

£ HYPNOTISM

Would you like to know just how to hypnotise? How to control others? To make them see, hear, feel, and act as you command? To hypnotize even by post or telephone? To learn this alone in your own home?

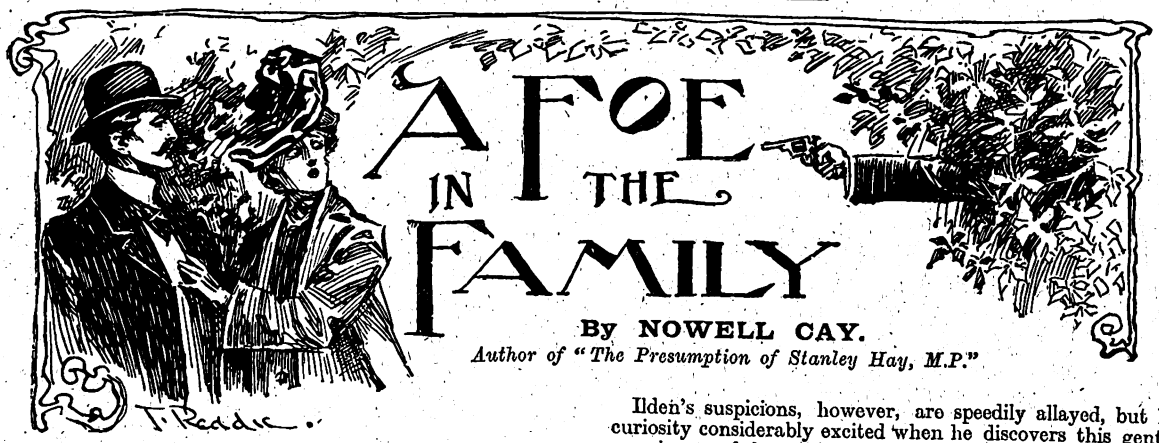
FREE.—Send for the instructive and fascinating illustrated booklet, "The Power Within." It is published and given away free by The PSYCHIC RESEARCH CO. (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Av., E.C.

Enclose 1d. stamp for return postage.

Short Stories.

No. 721. For the Week Ending October 25th, 1902. One Penny.

YOU MAY WIN A GRAMOPHONE BY READING THIS INSTALMENT OF OUR NEW SERIAL. SEE PAGE 527.



Five Abortive Attempts on a Peer's Life.

While returning one evening to Pennybrook Hall, the residence of his uncle Jasper, Lord Ilden discovers a young girl in great distress at having lost two five pound notes, the whole of her wages for six months as a country governess. Together they search for the missing money; but as it is getting dusk, and Lord Ilden wants to get rid of his pretty companion, who turns out to be the sister of one of his old college chums, he manages to substitute two of his own notes and return them to her. She goes away overflowing with gratitude.

When she disappeared, however, Lord Ilden continued the search. He failed to find the money, but instead discovered an envelope addressed to himself, the contents of which he had never seen. The envelope, addressed in a girl's handwriting, is postmarked "Lallerton." Pocketing his find, Lord Ilden is lighting a cigarette, when the report of a rifle suddenly breaks the stillness of the evening, and a bullet whizzes just past him and buries itself in a tree behind.

"That," mutters Lord Ilden, "is the third attempt which has been made on my life during my stay at Pennybrook Hall."

On his return to his uncle's, he tells his cousin, Catherine Hay, of his adventure, and, feeling assured that the attempts are being made by some member of the family, many of whom would profit considerably by his death, proposes marriage to her as a means of reducing the value of his own death to his enemies. Cathie, however, refuses.

Meanwhile Lord Ilden has discovered that it is his cousin Percival who opened the post-bag and extracted the letter addressed to himself, the envelope of which he found in the coppice.

That same evening Lord Ilden's valet discovers a large quantity of poison in his master's flask. This makes the fourth attempt.

Upon receiving the news, Lord Ilden considers it wisest to leave Pennybrook Hall at once. He is driving to the station with Cathie when they overtake a man who appears to take a great interest in them. Ilden's suspicions are instantly aroused, especially so as the man takes a short cut across the fields, and is waiting at the station when they arrive.

All rights reserved.]

Ilden's suspicions, however, are speedily allayed, but his curiosity considerably excited when he discovers this gentleman in one of the carriages in the train he is about to enter, in animated conversation with Florence Courthorpe, the lady of the bank notes. At Witterly station Florence is met by Mrs. Morgan Wright, her new employer. Lord Ilden alights at the next station and wanders along the main road, looking for a quiet inn where he could stay for a time. All unconsciously he walks back towards Witterly and settles down at the "Black Bull," exactly opposite Florence's new home. Florence, however, sees him, and that same night, after all in the house had gone to bed, sits at her window gazing abstractedly across the street. Suddenly a man in a slouch hat is silhouetted against Ilden's bedroom window. He carries a revolver—his purpose being easily discernible. Fortunately Ilden is not in his room, and, taking advantage of the few minutes' grace thus allowed, Florence slips on a dressing gown, quietly leaves her room and the house, and runs across to the "Black Bull" to give the alarm. But the would-be murderer has escaped. Florence then returns to her house, only, however, to meet her scandalised employer on the stairs.

Thus a fifth attempt has been made on Lord Ilden's life.

(The above is a short summary of the opening chapters.)

Cast Adrift for Ilden's Sake.

Lord Ilden was becoming serious. The unmistakable plot against his life showed itself as more and more formidable. He had complacently imagined that a trifling artifice would put him out of the power of pursuit, and allow him to live in perfect security so long as he was willing to remain in exile. His only uneasiness had been that by remaining in exile he lessened his chances of discovering his opponent, and he had taken precautions to avoid being followed half-heartedly, as something not really called for. And now his precautions had shown themselves not only called for but insufficient. The speed with which he had been followed and his life threatened robbed him of a certain contempt he had felt for the cunning pitted against his own, and it changed the position very considerably. He had imagined the struggle one from which he could retire whenever he pleased, so long as he remained hidden and passive, but it had become a struggle from which he could not know a moment's escape until it ended one way or the other.

Digitized by Google

To-night it forbade him to sleep. He had examined his bedroom and its approaches critically. The windows had no fastenings, while a sloping roof beneath it made access as easy as the least athletic of would-be assassins could desire. Ilden decided that it would be the height of imprudence to close his eyes in such a place after his warning, and intolerant as he felt of the necessity he sat up all night by the window on the watch.

He could not remain at Witterby. That was apparent. Apart from the sense of insecurity at night, he would not be able to take a single stroll without expecting a bullet from behind the hedge. And when he changed his whereabouts he would no longer feel secure. He must think out some new plan, and he gave the night to planning.

Not that any brilliant plan suggested itself. It was true that he could, if he chose, enlist the aid of the police, but the idea did not appeal to him. He had no great faith in their ability to protect him or to discover his enemy. The long list of political assassinations tended to show how little their protection was worth, and their investigations would almost inevitably mean publicity, a thing he was determined to avoid at all costs. The deeply-rooted impression that his danger was due, directly or indirectly, to some member of his father's family, had made him from the first determined to keep the whole matter so far as possible in his own hands. Without having a very high regard for any of the individuals who shared his name, he had a very tender regard for the name itself, and he had no mind to see it in the papers in connection with a disgraceful plot.

The welcome arrival of dawn found him with no practical resolve except that of leaving Witterby at the earliest possible moment. But with morning the possibility of evading pursuit had assumed a more cheerful aspect. It was true that he had been traced once, but he had given the pursuer too many opportunities. In sending for his bag to the next station he had completed the clue for anyone who might have seen him leave the train there. In future he would remember that he had a person of some little astuteness to cope with.

At the first sound of anybody stirring below he ran down, glad to think that a new day had begun, and breakfasted in good time to catch the first train that left for Rickerby.

The landlord of the Black Bull drove him down in person, and by calling him "my lord" with every word showed that Florence's question of the previous night had not been lost upon him. He was so concerned for "his lordship's" safety, and so curious about the danger which threatened him that Ilden was glad to get rid of him.

It was barely seven yet and the train was not due till a quarter past, and the young man was irked by the waiting.

He was alone on the platform, and in spite of his steady nerves, a sense of the danger surrounding him insisted on holding his mind. He felt nervous of the empty waiting-rooms, in any one of which an assassin might be waiting revolver in hand, and he turned back to the booking-office where he could scarcely be taken unawares. He found himself watching the doorway with an intensity which annoyed him, although he could not control it, as footsteps approached from the road. They belonged to the porter who had given him Mrs. Morgan Wright's name and address, coming to begin his day's work. Then a vehicle stopped, and Ilden's eyes turned once more to the doorway. A groom was bringing in luggage, and he turned to the ticket office which had just opened. He booked to Ilden Market as a precaution against inquiries that might be made there later.

Then as he turned to watch the doorway again, his face filled with a surprise in which was something both of pleasure and dismay. For following her luggage which the doctor's groom had deposited unceremoniously on the floor, was its owner, Florence Courthorpe.

She had already seen him, and made some effort to control the rush of emotion which had brought all the blood involuntarily to her cheeks.

She managed to smile almost with composure as he hastened forward with outstretched hand.

"This is a pleasure I did not anticipate," he said. "But you are not leaving Witterby? You only came yesterday."

Her face crimsoned again at the question.

"Yes, my engagement at Minerva House has ceased," she said with attempted indifference. "Mrs. Wright has discovered that I shall not make a suitable governess for her children."

Ilden's face grew anxious and disturbed.

"Not on account of what happened last night, I hope?"

Florence hesitated.

"I am sure that Mrs. Wright was prejudiced against me before that."

"But the affair of last night led to your dismissal?" he insisted.

The girl nodded.

"But you must really not blame yourself," she added quickly, as she saw how disturbed he was. "I am sure that I should not have been happy there."

"Tell me what happened," he said, ignoring the palliative, and the sternness of his tone frightened her a little, even while it thrilled her with a sense of sympathetic championship. She no longer tried to evade his questioning.

"She met me as I returned and would not believe me when I told her what had happened. She spoke very cruelly, and insisted that I should leave the house the first thing in the morning. I never guessed that you would be leaving by the same train." For her it had been another of the wonderful coincidences.

"But this is intolerable," he interrupted hotly. "To be insulted like this for performing a simple act of humanity! Why did you not let me know? I will come back with you to the house at once and insist on this woman offering you an apology and reinstating you."

The girl's expressive face showed how disturbed she was by the suggestion.

"It would only make it worse," she cried quickly. "She would believe nothing that you said, and I could never go back there after the way in which she has spoken."

Her distressed earnestness impressed him.

"I can quite understand that," he said gravely. "I should not like to think of your going back. Such women are best avoided; but I shall write to this Dr. Wright and give him a proper sense of his wife's injustice. I wish that I had known—I should not have left you last night to give your explanation alone. But where are you going now?"

A sudden sense of responsibility weighed upon him, as something burdensome but not by any possibility to be avoided after what had happened. He must interest himself in Miss Courthorpe's future—no longer as a voluntary acknowledgment of his regard for her brother, but as a duty demanded by simple justice.

Intuitively, no doubt, she read something of what was passing in his mind, and answered with forced cheerfulness.

"For the present I am going to stay with a friend—an old schoolfellow, at Lallerton, near Shipton Gate. You know the village?"

His surprise at the coincidence had shown itself involuntarily in his face.

Digitized by Google

"I have never been there," he said; "but the neglect is soon to be remedied. For, strangely enough, it is my destination this morning. We shall fortunately be able to travel together."

Politeness demanded the speech, but Ilden was inclined to doubt whether the circumstance was fortunate. It was always more easy to trace two than one, and the fact emphasised itself when he took a ticket for her to Shipton Gate.

But the claims of courtesy were paramount with him, and his manner gave her no hint that the coincidence was anything but pleasing. Florence's pleasure was undiluted, and could not hide itself.

The thought of his mysterious danger, never actually out of her mind, only made the meeting more providential. She had been conscious of a vague yearning to watch over him and avert danger, as she had averted it on the previous night; and an emotion of tender, womanly protectiveness was satisfied for the present, when she knew that on the journey at least she would be with him. Her attention was already on the alert, as they walked out on the quiet platform together.

The train was just coming in, and there was little opportunity of speaking until they were seated in it together.

Florence drew a breath of relief.

"We are sure, at least, that nobody has followed you from here," she said, as the train started again without taking up any other passengers than themselves.

The words sounded like an echo of his own thoughts and surprised him. He had not expected her to understand his anxiety so intimately.

"No, but they may be in the train already," he said.

"That is what I feared. He might guess that you would leave by the first train and enter it at the station before this. But I think I noticed everybody as the train came in, and I certainly saw nobody wearing a slouch hat. It is certainly the only thing I noticed about the man last night."

Ilden became less conscious of the disadvantage of having a companion. It was pleasant to be able to compare notes and plans with her. She might indeed be of service to him if she seconded his vigilance in this manner. He pleased her by saying so.

"If I could only help you," she said, her eyes glowing, "but I know so little about you. Have you no idea who it is that is trying to kill you? Can anybody have any motive for wishing you dead?"

It was the question which Catherine Hay had asked him, but Ilden had no thought of answering it so explicitly this time.

"I am quite in the dark," he said; "that is what handicaps me. But before we talk about my enemy, I want you to tell me about yourself. Have you no relatives living?"

"None at all. My father and mother were both only children, and my father's death left me absolutely alone in the world."

"But you had friends?"

"Practically only one—the friend to whom I am going to-day. We lived a very secluded life after my brother's death and adversity showed me that those I had counted friends were only acquaintances. But Miss Despard, my friend at Lallerton, is a very true one. We were at school together, and I stayed with her after my father's death. She would have had me stay with her altogether. But I could not do that. She is not rich. She and her brother share a small annuity and live together in an idyllic little cottage. I travelled part of the way to Witterby with Mr. Despard yesterday."

"The gentleman who got in at Pennybrook with you?" asked Ilden, and smiled at a past suspicion when she answered in the affirmative.

"And you will remain with your friend until you obtain another post as governess?" he asked, and her face fell a little. But she answered with assumed brightness:

"I shall probably have to exert my talents in some new direction; Mrs. Wright will not recommend me as a governess, and she is writing to Mrs. Haydon."

Ilden nodded rather gravely. He was thinking that even the Marchioness would prefer the written testimonials of her former patrons to his personal recommendation.

But he had learnt all that he wanted to know before writing to her and enlisting her sympathy on the girl's behalf, and he returned to his own affairs.

"You say that you have stayed at Lallerton," he remarked. "Have

"They have all gone away, and Mr. Despard told me nothing," cried Florence in dismay.

Digitized by Google

you met anybody there who knew or was interested in me in any way?"

Florence shook her head.

"No. Have you friends there?"

"That is what I am going to try and ascertain," said Ilden with his characteristic smile, and drew out an envelope.

"I suppose you do not happen to recognise this handwriting?"

Florence examined it carefully and looked up with surprise in her eyes.

"Why, it is Miss Despard's! Then you know her?"

Ilden was as surprised as she, although his face did not show it so clearly.

"Are you quite sure?" he asked sceptically.

"I only know that it is exactly like her writing. Was it she who wrote it?"

"That is what I have to find out. Do you know of any reason why your friend should write to me? Has she ever mentioned my name to you?"

"Never."

"Then I think that the similarity of the handwriting is probably a coincidence," said Ilden, "but you make me curious to see your friend, if I may, when we reach Lallerton."

The train was slackening speed at Rickerby as he spoke, and all their attention became engaged again in the attempt to detect any sign of pursuit.

There was nothing, however, to rouse their suspicion. Of the few other passengers in the early train only two left it at the junction beside themselves, an old countrywoman obviously beyond suspicion, and a workman who left the station at once without displaying the least interest in them.

As they changed over to the other train, the scene brought back a remembrance of the previous day, and it gave direction to his questioning when they had resumed their journey again.

"Your friend, Mr. Despard, was on his way home to Lallerton, I suppose, when I saw him travelling with you yesterday?"

Florence nodded.

"And had he been to Pennybrook to see you?" he asked, and her violet eyes lifted themselves in quick surprise.

"To see me? Oh, no. I was very much surprised to see him at Pennybrook station. And I was very pleased, too, because I was wanting to know whether anything had happened to Daisy. For more than two months she has not answered my letters. If it had not been for my meeting with her brother, I should have been feeling a little nervous to-day, wondering whether my friend had left home or become estranged from me in some way. Mr. Despard put my mind quite at rest. It is only that his sister is absorbed in a new picture she is painting. I am sure that she will be glad to see me."

Her voice had a touch of anxiety, despite the words.

"And suppose that she could not for any reason give you a home?" asked Ilden, impelled to anticipate the fullest possibility of his responsibility. He regretted the question when he saw the shadow of hopelessness that crossed her face.

But she forced it back with a smile. Somehow it seemed easy to be brave this morning.

"I really do not know," she said with a nervous little laugh, and Ilden's face grew graver as he changed the subject.

"And you do not know what took Mr. Despard to Pennybrook? I ask," he added, noticing the incipient surprise on her expressive face, "because I had an idea, when I saw him, that he might have gone on my account. I have to suspect everybody." And he told what had passed on his way to Pennybrook station.

"Oh! that is just like him," she said. "He is the most absent-minded of men, and is always falling into fits of abstraction in which he forgets everything. He had no doubt forgotten that he had a train to catch until the passing of your wagonette reminded him of the fact. I found him very abstracted myself, and I did not like to ask him what had brought him to Pennybrook when he did not volunteer the information. He is a very curious and melancholy sort of a man, as different as one could imagine from his sister, but they are very deeply attached to one another. In fact I almost think that it would break Guy Despard's heart if Daisy married and left him. He is even jealous of her affection for me."

"That is unfortunate, since you say she is your only friend," said Ilden. "And is Miss Despard equally opposed to the idea of her brother marrying?"

Her quick glance made him colour slightly with the feeling that he had been detected in an unjustifiable inquisitiveness. He was conscious that he had been wondering what the chances were of this Guy Despard solving his companion's difficulties by making her his wife. The idea did not please him. He had taken a prejudice against the tall, lean man, with his hooked features and moody eyes, and little as he had welcomed the responsibility thrown on his shoulders, he did not wish to find his help made quite unnecessary by another man.

Her answer did not reassure him.

"Oh, no! Daisy is quite different," she said. "There is no jealousy in her affection. But I do not think Mr. Despard will ever marry. He is over thirty now, and he is a very curious man. But you will probably see him for yourself within the hour. For here we are at Shipton Gate."

They left the little station apparently as free from any sign of pursuit as ever, driving in an old-fashioned fly that carried Ilden's bag as well as Florence's luggage. This time the Gladstone should not serve as a clue to any possible pursuer. The fly should leave it at the hotel where he would put up after seeing Miss Courthorpe to her destination and interviewing her friend.

The chance that Miss Despard would turn out to be his unknown correspondent seemed to him unlikely. His companion must have been misled by a resemblance in the handwriting. Such remarkable coincidences only occur in stories. But still it was strange that the postmark of the mysterious envelope had shown it to come from Lallerton. Possibly it had been written by Miss Despard, but had contained a letter only on some trivial matter. She was an artist. Perhaps she wanted permission to paint Ilden Castle. He smiled at the importance his fancy had given the communication, and was glad to remember that he had at least a slight justification. The lost letter was evidently one which somebody had thought it worth while to intercept.

The thoughts kept him silent as the rattling fly took them down a steep, winding road into the pretty valley of Lallerton.

Florence, too, was silent. Now that her anxiety on her companion's behalf was put to rest for the time being by the fact that nobody had left the train beside themselves at Shipton Gate, she had time to let her mind dwell on her own position.

If her one friend failed her, it seemed to her tragically hopeless, and the dependence she was placing on Daisy Despard's help filled her with a feverish anxiety for the meeting which would assure her that she was not counting on it in vain. She had no reason for doubting it.

Digitized by Google

In spite of her friend's silence, Guy Despard had assured her that his sister's feelings for her remained unchanged—and yet—when so much depended upon it, she could not dismiss her uneasy fears.

Her impatience increased as the fly, rolling across a picturesque stone bridge over a babbling stream, entered the approaches of Lallerton village. They were passing the forge now, musical with the fight between glowing iron and human muscle.

In the distance the square tower of a church showed itself above the trees, and the next turn brought them in sight of the village green, a picture of lazy peace in the morning sunlight.

"Chez-nous," as the Despards had called their pretty, rose-covered cottage, lay at the other side behind a thick-grown privet hedge which shut it out from the road.

Florence's impatience increased visibly as they approached the wooden gate, and Ilden was very conscious that some at least of the puzzling questions in her mind were likely to be answered within the next few minutes. Before he could assist her, Florence had alighted while the fly was still moving.

"I will see whether Daisy is at home," she said, her voice trembling a little, and it was not until a minute or two had passed that he decided to go down and follow her.

As he swung open the gate the first sight of the cottage with its shuttered windows told him that the place was deserted. He was prepared to find Florence with a face full of hopeless dismay pulling in a vain hope at the bell, which only sounded a hollow answer from an evidently empty house.

He was afraid that she was about to burst into tears as she turned to him with the dismaying truth.

"They have gone away, and Mr. Despard told me nothing."

A Message in the Pathway.

"What can I do?" cried Florence Courthorpe, her lips trembling, as they stood together in the porch of the deserted cottage; and the complete dependence upon him which showed itself unconsciously in her appeal, made Ilden realise that his responsibility had assumed a new shape.

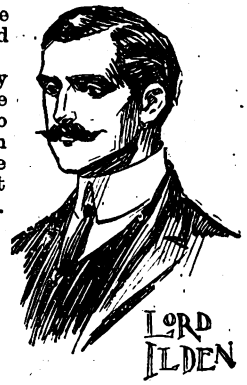
But the thought was not unwelcome. The expectation of a few minutes earlier, that he was about to hand his charge over to the care of this Despard and his sister, and resign his claim to any immediate interest in her welfare, had pleased him so little that he was conscious of some relief even when he found that, for a little while longer at least, Florence was left entirely to his care.

The charge had shown itself, so far, much less burdensome, and much more agreeable, than he had anticipated. He had found Miss Courthorpe very different in her complete absence of self-consciousness from the women to whom he was accustomed, and of whom he had always been a little afraid.

And it had been pleasant to find an ally in his plans who understood and sympathised so completely with his efforts to escape the pursuit of his unknown enemy. It had been as easy and natural to confide in her as in Catherine Hay; and, much as he liked his cousin, he was conscious of an additional attraction in the new ally. Her beauty charmed him. It had been a pleasure to watch the subtle changes that passed over her delicate face as she talked. It was a pleasure to watch it now, although she was almost in tears. The tiny, trembling lip filled him with a vague tenderness, which he did not try to analyse, but which made him welcome the chance that had placed her in his charge.

The picture of her, as she had appeared to him in the inn, with flowing hair, and little, slippered feet beneath her dressing-gown, recurred to him, as it had done a hundred times in the night. She had looked so child-like in her fear that he had felt an impulse to take her up in his arms and soothe her with a kiss, as he would have soothed a child.

He was conscious of the same impulse now, but he only smiled cheerfully.



"What can we do? Well, for my part I am very hungry, so the first thing is to get something to eat if we can manage it at the inn across the green. After which we can make inquiries and find out where your friends have gone. They must surely have decided to move very quickly if Mr. Despard told you nothing about it yesterday."

"That is what makes it so strange," she said anxiously. "They must have left Lallerton when I saw Mr. Despard. See, there are cobwebs across the door already. He does not wish me to know where Daisy is, and she is the only friend I have in the world. What shall I do if I cannot find her?"

"I have no doubt that we shall find out very easily where she has gone when we begin to make inquiries," said Ilden cheerfully, "and you must not speak of her as your only friend. I should like you to look upon me as one."

She looked up gratefully with the tears in her eyes.

"You are very kind. I do not know what I should have done if you had not been here to advise me."

Then a smile burst like sunlight through the cloud on her face.

"I suppose I should have sat down on the step to have a good cry," she added.

"Whereas you simply realise that you are my guest instead of Mr. Despard's. Wipe your eyes and drive on to the inn to lunch with me while we consider the next step. We can evidently learn nothing more from these shuttered windows."

"But my luggage?" she said dubiously, as they turned back to the waiting fly.

"Oh, that can come to the inn too, until we decide what the next step is to be."

She did not answer, but her pretty brows remained dubious and anxious.

"I do not know what I ought to do?" she said after a long pause. "I cannot think."

"Then you must let me think for you," he said cheerfully, although his own thoughts were serious enough.

In his heart he had very little hope of her finding a home with the Despards. The fact that the brother had given her no hint of his sister's departure from Lallerton was significant, as was also his sister's previous silence. Despard had seemed a little mad to him. If, as Florence suggested, his madness took the form of jealousy of his sister's friends, he had probably managed to force or persuade her to abandon her friendship with the governess. In either case, his charge could scarcely hope to find a home with them, even when their address was discovered.

And putting aside the thought of Florence joining her friends, her position was indeed a gloomy one. She was a governess without references, the latter disadvantage due in a great measure to himself. And the worst of it was that any help he gave her only threatened to increase the prejudice against her which her late employer had conceived. Mrs. Wright's attitude had enabled him to realise very clearly how much more necessary circumspection is on the part of a governess—than, say, of a hereditary baron.

He was already feeling doubtful of the success of his meditated appeal to his aunt. Yesterday he had felt more than hopeful. The Marchioness' interest could be depended upon for the sister of a dead friend of his who had fallen upon evil days, with whom personally he was practically unacquainted, a young lady who had accepted bravely the drudgery of governess-work, and could produce credentials from her employer. It was just the "case" which would have appealed to the good lady and set her exerting herself until she had obtained for Miss Courthorpe some comfortable post, either as companion to one of her aristocratic friends, or secretary to one of the many charitable institutions in which the Marchioness was interested.

Digitized by Google

But it was quite different now, when, instead of the credentials, her nephew could only offer her an explanation proving that he was responsible for their loss. His aunt was scarcely the woman to accept it in a right spirit. To suspect him of any personal interest in his protegée would be to prejudice her at once, and the more Ilden thought of her the more hopeless he felt of enlisting the help that would have been so valuable.

It seemed preposterous that he could not help the girl himself, when he had both the will and the means. Why could he not out of his wealth offer her an allowance sufficient at least to keep her out of want until she found something to do?

The thing was not to be thought of, of course. In the first place, he knew that she would never accept it, and he racked his brains trying to find some possible way of escape for her from her difficulties.

And yet he was scarcely conscious of disappointment when inquiries at the inn made the chance of their tracing the Despards appear more remote than ever.

It appeared that their departure had been raised by village gossip to the dignity of a mystery. Mr. Despard had not been seen in Lallerton for some time, although nobody knew precisely when he had left home.

His sister, however, had been gone only four days, taking her maid with her, but nobody had known that they were leaving the cottage for good, until on the following day a van came from Marnham Market to remove the furniture.

"We thought then that we should know where they had gone to," said the landlady, who was gossiping as she laid the cloth in a dismal little sitting-room for their lunch; "but it remained just as great a secret as ever. The furniture has only been taken to Marnham to warehouse."

Her tone suggested that she felt personally injured by her inability to satisfy curiosity.

"And I suppose you have no idea why they left Lallerton?" asked Ilden, half expecting to hear a tale of unpaid bills.

The woman hesitated.

"Perhaps you are friends of Miss Despard?"

"She is a great friend of mine," said Florence quickly.

"Then I am sure I hope that it is not true, ma'am. But they do say in the village that the young lady got into trouble with some gentleman who was staying at Castledale, just over the hill, in the summer."

Florence flushed and turned pale.

"No, I do not think that can be true," she said.

"No," remarked Ilden, "stories like that are so easily invented when there is a little mystery to explain."

"Had the Despards no friends here who would be likely to know what has become of them?" he asked when the landlady had left them alone to their meal. Florence had grown silent and preoccupied, and a deep concern for her growing anxiety and hopelessness struggled in his mind with this new enjoyment of his responsibility.

To have a beautiful woman so entirely dependent upon his aid, so exclusively delivered over to his charge. For him it made quite a novel and pleasing romance, and he had to remind himself that for her it was almost a tragic one.

She shook her head.

"No, they lived a most secluded life. Daisy, I think, has always felt it to be dull, but she is ruled by her brother in everything, and he has never made friends. I shall never know where they have gone. And if I discovered——"

"Oh, I think they must have left some trace," he interrupted with affected sanguineness. "I propose making a voyage of investigation round the village. Perhaps you would like to stay here and rest."

He wanted to be alone to think out the problem quietly without the distraction of her presence, as she guessed intuitively. The anxiety in her face deepened.

"Do you think that you will be safe?"

"Safe?" he repeated.

The thought of his own mysterious danger had almost been forgotten in the concentration of his mind on a new problem, and her unforgetfulness touched him when she reminded him.

"You may have been traced here already. I feel afraid as soon as you are out of my sight. But——"

She did not finish the sentence. She was thinking that the time must come very quickly when it would no longer be possible for her to keep him in her sight, or feel that she was helping in some small way to guard him from danger.

He answered almost indifferently. Once more the plot against his life had become an unreal thing, which it was difficult for him to realise or take account of.

Florence, however, could not forget the sinister scene of the previous night so easily, and her beautiful face was full of a repressed fear and anxiety as she watched him leave the inn in the direction of the village

She was evidently trying to attract his attention to some object in the path. A moment later and she had completely disappeared.

Digitized by Google

street. Standing where he could not see her if he looked back she watched him with apprehensive eyes until he was out of sight.

Then she turned back to the dismal little sitting-room to try and forget his danger and concentrate her mind on her own hopeless plans. She would have to leave Lallerton, of course; but her heart filled with a double bitterness at the thought. For away from Lallerton the world seemed very cold and friendless, and she would never know what happened to the man she would leave there until it was too late. Her eyes filled with tears, but it was not at the thought of her own uncertain future.

Meanwhile, Ilden was pursuing his investigations without much hope of result. They served to give an object to his wanderings while his mind busied itself over the problem of Florence Courthorpe's future.

An interview with the Rector of the parish served to show him that the rumoured reason for Miss Despard's departure was a generally accepted one. As for her destination, the Rector could hazard no surmise. He seemed a little indignant at being consulted on the subject when the Despards had never been members of his flock. But Ilden gained from him two facts that might be useful. The cottage which they had vacated was the property of the squire of the parish, whose residence, Lallerton Hall, was at the other end of the village. He was as likely as anybody to know what the Despards' movements were. The other piece of information was that, although Miss Despard had taken one of her servants, an elderly woman, with her, she had left another behind her, a young girl who was living now with her parents in the village.

Ilden copied the name and address down in his pocket-book and took his leave. He had two places already to visit, and took the servant's cottage first as being the nearer.

The girl herself, Clara Wimple, was not at home. She had gone on an errand to Shipton Gate, but was expected back shortly. A garrulous mother made it apparent to him, however, that he was not likely to gain anything by waiting to interview her. The girl, it seemed, had left Miss Despard's service nearly a month before the latter left "Chez-Nous." The departure had been as much a surprise to her as to anybody else.

Nor at the Hall was Ilden any more successful.

On the day that the furniture was removed from "Chez-Nous," the squire had received an intimation from Mr. Despard that he was leaving Lallerton, and a cheque in lieu of notice. Reference to his papers showed that the letter had been posted at Marnham Market, where Despard had also given orders for the warehousing of his furniture.

Ilden turned back to the inn with his impression confirmed that his charge could find no home with her former friend. And the question of what to do with her became more than ever pressing. The day was advancing, and the longer she remained in his personal care the greater would be the need of explanation, when he enlisted the interest of his aunt or some other lady friend on her behalf.

The thought of doing so was still unpalatable. It had seemed outrageous to him at the first that Gerald Courthorpe's sister should be suing for a situation like a nursery-maid, and all that he had seen of her had served only to make him tolerate the position less.

He was approaching the village again along the high road that led from the Hall, when his attention was attracted by the sight of a young woman leaning over the high wall of roughly-piled stones which divided the road from the fields. She was a hundred yards or so in advance of him, and it seemed to Ilden that she was trying to attract his attention.

He hastened his steps, so forgetful of the shadow hanging over his life that he never thought of caution.

The girl seemed to be pointing now to something on the path. Ilden hastened more than ever, his curiosity fully aroused, but before he could reach the spot where he had seen her, the young woman had disappeared, and he looked up at the tall wall wonderingly. Then his eyes turned to the path where she seemed to point, and his wonder increased. For lying on the gravel was an envelope with a name written upon it.

When he found that the name was his own, wonder turned to something akin to consternation. He had been scrupulously careful since leaving Witterby not to give his name to anybody, although both the rector and the squire had asked it. To see the words "Lord Ilden" staring at him from the paper here in a place where he thought himself so completely unknown, filled him for a moment with a thrill of almost superstitious fear.

He thrust the paper into his pocket before even stopping to see what was written inside, to clamber up the wall. But no sign of the woman was to be seen. It was easy enough for her to have hidden where the fields were so hilly and so thickly intercepted with hedges, but the loss of all trace of her added to his feeling of strangeness. It seemed almost as though some supernatural agency were at work to prevent him hiding his identity for a day, and he remained for full five minutes staring in vain from the top of the wall before getting down to read the message so mysteriously delivered.

Only One Way to End the Plot.

"Lord Ilden, if you value your life, you will keep clear of Lallerton."

Ilden stood and stared at the badly-written and ill-spelt words, which appeared to have been hastily scribbled in pencil on the sheet of paper which he had found thrown in his path.

Who could have sent him the warning? He gave up the attempt to form a conjecture in sheer hopelessness. He had no starting point—no loose end of a clue by which he might even begin to unravel the mystery surrounding him. The intrigue against him surrounded him on every side. Here, in this quiet village, where he had imagined himself quite unknown—where he certainly knew nobody—it seemed that his life was just as much in danger as it had been at Pennybrook.

A feeling almost of despair seized him. The fight was too unequal when he was forced to walk in darkness, and his enemies seemed to know everything that he did.

It appeared from the scribbled warning that he had a friend; but of what use was a friend who remained as unknown as the enemy against whom she warned him.

The thought occurred to him that he might try to find the girl who had thrown the note; but she had shown plainly enough that she was anxious to avoid him, and, while he was searching in the dark, the enemy was awaiting his opportunity with eyes open.

He took out the envelope he had found in the coppice at Pennybrook, and compared the writing on it with that of his strangely-delivered warning; but a glance was sufficient to tell him that the writing was not the same. He was baffled in every attempt to form even the beginning of a theory, and in his bewilderment he was conscious of something nearer to actual fear than he had ever been conscious of in his life.

Even now, if the warning meant anything, the mysterious assassin might be lying in wait to take his life behind any one of the low stone walls which surrounded him.

He walked back to the inn absolutely nervous.

Digitized by Google

He found Florence waiting for him anxiously in the little parlour.

"I have been very uneasy about you," she said frankly, as he sank into an ample armchair. "In a quiet little spot like this it seems as though anything might happen. You have heard nothing about my friends?"

"Nothing practical."

"I felt that you would not," she said, making a brave effort to keep her voice steady. "And I have been looking at the trains. I have decided to go to London. There is a train from Shipton Gate in an hour's time."

Ilden's face fell.

"To London? Have you friends there?"

"No, but there always seems a chance of getting employment in London. Here it is of course quite hopeless to think of such a thing. And I must find something before my money is spent."

Her voice was heroically cheerful. He wondered whether she realised as clearly as he did how tragically hopeless was the plan on which she had decided. He could not think of allowing her to carry it out.

"But I was hoping that you would help me in my troubles," he said, as they turned into the dismal sitting-room. "I have never needed an ally so much as now, or been so completely non-plussed."

Her eyes filled with instant alarm.

"Something has happened? You have been followed here after all?" she cried.

"I do not know whether I have been followed, or whether I have unconsciously followed my enemy, but it is known that I am in the village. It seems impossible for me to hide myself.

And he told her what had happened, feeling his own uneasiness decrease strangely as she began to share it.

"You will leave Lallerton at once?" she said.

"I suppose so, but this travelling about seems a hopeless business, when I am traced so easily. I was counting on having your help."

"I wish that I could help you," she said with her heart in her voice, "but what can I do?"

"There is only one thing which can put an end to this plot against me. And you are the only person I should care to ask to do it."

Florence's eyes opened wide with wonder and hope.

"I? I would do anything to make your life more safe," she said earnestly, and Ilden hesitated no longer.

"Would you even become my wife?"

(Florence's answer, among other things, is told in a further long instalment on Tuesday next.)

Mrs. Forrester's First Husband.

A Story of Blackmail and Love.

My name is Spencer Lockwood, my profession the law. As a barrister, not altogether briefless, I find it more difficult every year, even in vacation time, to get away from the Middle Temple for my annual fortnight's holiday.

Last year, it was a toss-up whether I should be able to go at all, so that it was much to my satisfaction that I found myself, one week-end, comfortably settled in snug quarters at the old-fashioned "King's Head" Hotel, Overcoombe, Bucks, in the very heart of the lovely Vale of Aylesbury.

I congratulated myself upon having left "pleas," "plaints," and all things legal far behind, for a time at any rate, absolutely unsuspicious that I was on the eve of becoming a leading actor in a stranger criminal drama than ever I had played in, in my capacity as advocate, at the Old Bailey.

"By Jove!" I said to myself as I sat at the open window after dinner, on the evening of my arrival, and watched a young lady, accompanied by an elder one, passing up the main street towards the railway station, "that's the sweetest-looking girl I have seen for many a day! Wonder who she is? I thought I knew pretty well everybody, by sight at least, in Overcoombe. I'll ask Jackson, perhaps he knows; or, rather, he's sure to know."

As Overcoombe had been my yearly place of retreat for the past five or six years, Jackson, the landlord of the King's Head, knew me well, and would have no hesitation in enlightening me as to the identity of the fair stranger.

"That, sir!" said Jackson, "is Mrs. Russell and her daughter."

"Russell!" I said. "Russell! I don't remember the name."

"Like as not, sir; they've only been here about six months; since just after Christmas."

"They look quite superior people, Jackson."

"They are, sir. Mrs. Russell, so I've heard, is the widow of a captain in the Navy, and, I should say, is pretty well off."

"Where do they live?"

"You know that old red-brick house, sir, on the Aylesbury road, half a mile the other side of the station?"

"I know; the place that was empty for so long. 'Sandilands' is the name of it, I think."

"That's it, sir! Well, that's where they live. The old lady's a bit soft-headed, so they say, hasn't a soul above tea-table gossip, and is about the worst mother a young girl could possibly have, according to my humble opinion."

All this only whetted my curiosity to know more of the young lady, a desire which the next day was gratified through the good offices of a mutual friend, who introduced me to Miss Russell.

She was young; in fact, barely twenty-one. She was good-looking, too, but wore, I thought, a depressed and anxious expression. Naturally, I concluded that she was in ill-health, a victim, perhaps, to the gaieties of the London season. Later on I hinted as much to Mrs. Russell, who, as it seemed to me, with somewhat heartless indifference deprecated the idea in no measured terms.

Netta Russell and I became very good friends, but came no nearer to getting at the reason of her trouble. Her strangeness of manner haunted me, and yet, after all, I thought, why should I worry about it. It did not concern me.

But I was not able to satisfy myself so easily. I was obliged to confess that my interest in Netta Russell was stronger than I had imagined. I was not in love with her; the idea was absurd, having regard to the shortness of the acquaintance, though she peculiarly interested me, and I earnestly wished to be of service to her.

An exploring pedestrian of the ardent order, I was making my way, towards the end of the week, through what was locally known as the "Nut Scrub."

This was, at least, a square mile, if not more, of dense hazel bushes, through which ran a narrow strip of path.

I was about half-way through this leafy tangle, when I heard voices within a stone's throw of me.

One of them was evidently a woman's, and, for the life of me, I could not shake off the impression that I knew its owner. The other was that of an uneducated, if not vulgar man.

"Very well, Mrs. Forrester!" the latter was saying. "I've give you Jack's message, and you'll only have yourself to blame if you don't do as he says. Which, shall I tell him, is it to be; you to go back to him, or—what I think'll suit him just as well, or, perhaps, better—that you send him, by me, five hundred pounds before the end of next week?"

Digitized by Google

"Neither!" replied the woman, in raised, decisive tones, "and you may tell him so!"

"You'd best listen to reason," persuasively replied the other. "Jack Forrester is a dangerous customer to cross, and I know as he'll never let you alone, or leave you, if you don't do one or the other of them two things."

"Well! you have my last word! I will do neither, and any attempt to molest me in any way will only bring trouble to you and to him."

"Have you any money about you now?"

"No; and if I had I would not give it you!"

"Supposing I were to take it! This is a pretty lonely spot; nobody could hear you, I fancy!"

It was Netta Russell without a doubt, and, unless I was mistaken, in sore strait from some blackmailing ruffian. That he addressed her as Mrs. Forrester did not for the moment appeal to me.

Forcing my way, in breakneck fashion, through the intervening scrub, in the direction of the voices, I came face to face with Miss Russell and her threatener.

"Don't be too sure of that!" I cried, addressing the latter, a truculent-looking, flashily-dressed specimen of the genus cockney. "I have overheard quite enough to know that you are intimidating this lady, and I warn you that if you don't sheer off on the instant, it will be the worse for you!"

The fellow looked me up and down, as if to calculate probabilities, but, judging discretion to be the wiser course, with a jeeringly defiant laugh, disappeared in the thicket to the right.

The immediate strain lifted, Netta Russell all but completely collapsed on the reaction, and I saw that there was nothing for it, but for me to accompany her home to Overcoombe.

Her helplessness rendered her still more an object of solicitude to me, and I begged her to, if possible, confide in me, so far, at least, as to enable me to do what I could for her.

She then, after a brief hesitation, told me the most extraordinary story, imposing upon me, however, the condition that I would not repeat it to a soul.

I, of course, assured her upon this point, and listened thunderstruck to what practically amounted to a confession.

"Miss Russell," I said, "I——"

"That is not my name," she interrupted me.

"Not your name?" I exclaimed.

"No. Not a human being knows what I am going to tell you—I am married."

"Married!" I echoed.

"Yes; I was married nearly four years ago, and my name is—is Forrester."

Then she went on to say that when—a girl of seventeen—she was staying with some friends at Scarborough, she met a man with whom she fell in love. Handsome, fascinating, and knowing far more of the world than she did; she believed in him. His proposal to marry her, on the condition that she should keep the matter a profound secret for a month, so that he might obtain the consent of his father—who, he said, was a wealthy landed proprietor in the Midlands—she innocently agreed to.

She, indeed, told her mother, who, with the imbecility natural to her, made no inquiries; letting the girl in fact do just as she pleased.

Leaving home one day on the pretext of paying a visit to a relative in London, she met Jack Forrester, by arrangement, at a certain little church in Chelsea, and was married with only the pew-opener and verger as witnesses.

The catastrophe was not long delayed.

At the entrance of the hotel, where they were to dine, her new-made husband was arrested on a charge of "long-firm" swindling, by a couple of detectives, who it appeared had been upon his track for days.

Not staying to think or to hear more, she returned home at once, and managed to keep the whole wretched affair a secret.

Her mother thought it was but an engagement; weak-minded as she was, she never dreamt of a run-away marriage. Had she known that, Netta's life would have been unbearable. The poor girl just threw away her wedding-ring, and resigned herself to misery.

In little more than a year, she saw in a paper that her husband was dead. He had tried to escape from Dartmoor, and had been shot.

Though once more free, she was never able to shake off the haunting memory of her mistake and its consequences. Her conscience upraided her with deception as towards her mother, with passing under a false name, and with posing as an unmarried girl, when she was in reality a widow.

"But this man," I said, "who is he—the man I mean who accosted you this afternoon?"

He had followed, she explained to me, upon a letter—a terrible letter—received from her husband.

"But," said I, a bit bewildered, "I thought you said he was dead."

"Yes—yes!—I quite believed so; but I suppose the man who had tried to escape was another of the same name. He demands——"

"I know," I interrupted her. "Your return to him, or a sum of money."

"I would sooner die than return to him; and as for five hundred pounds, I haven't it, and would not send it to him if I had."

"You have his letter?" I asked her.

She produced it and gave it me.

"You are sure that it is his handwriting?"

"No; I am not sure, but I think it is—I never had a letter from him before."

In a flash I saw what ought to be done, and at once.

"You must answer this letter," I said.

"No;" she replied, "I will not write to him!"

Then I sought to show her that if she would write a note at my dictation, saying that at that moment she had no money, but promising to send him some in the course of a few days, I would take charge of it, and go to London with it.

The same evening I left Overcoombe with the letter in my pocket, and within three hours had laid the whole case before the smartest private detective in town.

In three days he had news for me. Jack Forrester, confidence-man, swindler, and cracksman, had been undoubtedly married to Netta Russell; and, as undoubtedly, was now dead, in the way the newspapers had stated.

The relief I felt was immense. Netta was free, and the way was open to me to win her for myself if I could.

There was, however, one little thing more to discover—the writer of the letter.

"I think," said the detective, "that if you will wait half an hour, my agent will have something to tell us about this very enterprising gentleman." As, indeed he had.

He reported that having taken Netta's note to the address given—a tobacco shop—he left it to be called for.

He found that a man had been asking for letters in the same name, each day for the two previous days.

Posting himself in the passage, the agent saw the man come and receive the letter, and shadowed him home. He knew him as a notorious "crook."

Handing his memo-book to his principal, the latter read out:

"Name, Earney. Well-known turf operator. Ten years in 1888. Out on ticket."

It was decided, subject to Netta Russell's opinion, that nothing much was to be gained by a prosecution of the rascal.

It is needless to say that I caught the first train back to Overcoombe, and that, prepared by a wire from me, Netta met me at the station.

Already she looked brighter, and comparatively free of her melancholy.

I found, too, to my great satisfaction, that she had told her mother everything.

Netta married a year later. Who she married you may well guess, and I think I may suggest that her second husband was an improvement upon her first.

E. Ralph.

Digitized by Google

A DOUBLE EVENT.

A Tale of Four Lovers.

"What in Tophet is amiss with me to-night?" muttered General Warringham savagely, as he strolled restlessly out of the glittering ball-room at Lady Merton's. "I'm as seedy as a Smyrna fig! It's that confounded boy of mine, I suppose!"

The General stepped on to the terrace, and thence down the broad flight of marble steps into the lovely gardens of Doringham Park, where he resumed his meditations.

"The puppy has had his own way in everything, and I have never interfered. But when it comes to marrying her daughter—by Jove! it's time I put my heel down!"

He stopped, took a choice Havana from his cigar-case, viciously bit off the end, and lit it with a scented fusee. The light revealed a frown upon his handsome sun-burnt face that was not agreeable.

"Hang it!" he muttered, as he resumed his walk, "why couldn't the lad have chosen someone else—anyone else but her daughter!"

He walked on, musing as he went, down the long, curving paths, white in the moonlight, which intersected the beautiful summer-gardens of Doringham Hall. There was not a breath of wind to disturb the stillness of the lovely scene around him. Not a leaf stirred among the branches of the stately old trees that skirted the moonlit gardens. Exquisitely tinted fairy-lamps glowed with a subdued radiance from every point.

Not a bough but had its pendant of sparkling jewels. Not a bush that did not lift its blushing roses to be kissed and beautified by the warm, amorous light that dropped in limpid streams from glistening globes. Even the fountains, merry in their play, sent forth their gurgling jets of sparkling water into the warm air above. And then, as if unwilling to desert such fair enchantment, they shook out their dewy tresses in the air, till every drop became a diamond, full of liquid light, which rained, in cascades of reflected radiance, among the many multi-tinted lamps which lit the fountains, and fell into the marble basins beneath.

Yet, though moon, stars and fairy lamps combined to dissipate the darkness, they only served to vaguely outline shadows which, before, had seemed not to exist. The air was still and warm and languorous. A subtle tropical enchantment brooded, like an angel's wing, upon the sleeping scene. Ever and anon, the General caught a fleeting glimpse of other guests who, like himself, had left the dazzling glories of the ball, to wander out among the gardens. But these, he saw, were generally in pairs.

"Ugh!" he grunted. "Poor deluded fools! But time will teach them wisdom! I wonder whether they are out here too. I've half a mind to go back and investigate. But that would be distinctly 'nosing'—quite a feminine mode of strategy—so the other half of my mind is, perhaps, the wiser."

He was gradually approaching the outskirts of the gardens, where the great, stately trees of the surrounding park shut in the fairy scene. But he still walked on, unconscious of the path he took, and lost in reverie.

"And she objects as well!" he mused, as a little puzzled look came into his face. "I wonder why. It is but natural I should do so, after all that has passed. But what cause has she to forbid her daughter's union with my son? It is not possible our reasons are identical. Confound the boy!—and the girl too, for that matter—one is as bad as the other! By Jove, there almost seems a fate in it! But it shan't be!—if I have to turn the boy adrift, it shan't be! I'll see him — Hullo!—there's a lady in front! Just my luck! Give a man a chance to relieve his pent-up feelings with a wholesome British oath, and a woman bobs up to strangle it in its birth! I wonder what she's doing out here alone. Same old game, I suppose. Going about like a roaring lion—by Jove, no!—that's an insult to his majesty the king of beasts!—fox is the animal—sneaking about like a cunning old fox, seeking whom she may devour! The saints be praised, I'm past such peril! But I don't want to be recognised, mooning around out here in this veritable hot-bed of sentimental impropriety, so I'll hang back a bit."

Apparently the lady in question had also been made aware of the close proximity of a stranger, for she immediately quickened her steps, and was soon lost to view in the dim, uncertain light. No other path diverged from the one the General was pursuing, and he had a fancy for the deep shadow of the tall trees that towered before him. So, after waiting a few moments to allow the lady to get well in advance, he once again resumed his walk. A short stroll brought him to the verge of the gardens, and he stood under the jewelled branches of the stately sentinels which girt them about. Two other paths here joined the one from which he had emerged, but no one was in sight.

Presently he saw a low, trellised structure close to where he stood. It proved to be a pretty, creeper-covered summer-house, standing among the fragrant flower-beds of the garden, and, though the roses and creepers without were illumined here and there with softly shining fairy-lamps, the inside—either by accident or design, but probably the latter—had been left in deepest shadow. The place looked quiet and inviting, so, after listening for a moment to assure himself that no one was within, the General entered the low porch and tried to discover the nature of the interior.

The structure had been curiously built. It was circular in shape, but appeared to have been cut into four quarters, and placed at a distance of some four feet from each other. Thus it presented the appearance of four summer-houses. The two cross-cuts that had been made in the circle formed transverse passages, terminating in four rose-latticed porches, one of which the General had entered. These passages had originally been open to the sky, but were so thickly covered with creeper and vine as to be impenetrable even in the day. Entrance to the four summer-houses, or arbours, could only be obtained from these passages, the outsides being thickly trellised. There was just sufficient light to reveal this much to the General, and, as nothing stirred within, he entered one of the arbours and sat down on the rustic seat with which it was provided.

"Another impropriety of Lady Merton's!" he grumbled under his breath. "Thank Heaven, however, no one—or perhaps I should say, no two—have availed themselves of such an unqualified aid to folly! I wonder at it, too, for folly—or at any rate, that sort of folly—is amazingly keen in discovering the existence of such disgraceful nooks as this. There's that boy of mine, for instance—confound him!"

The General took a long, last, stubborn pull at the butt of his Havana, and tossed it viciously out into the dark passage. A moment later he heard the sound of footsteps on the gravel outside.

"Ah!" he muttered grimly, "I am a little premature!"

The footsteps were coming nearer.

"I'll bet there's two of 'em!" he went on in a whisper.

Digitized by Google

"Twenty to one in shillings there's a deuce of 'em! If there isn't, General Warringham, you will send a sovereign first thing to-morrow morning to the Dogs' Home as a donation for the benefit of the inmates—anonymously too—that's a wager!"

The footsteps sounded beneath the porch, came slowly down the dark passage, and entered an arbour on the opposite side of the summer-house. Presently a voice, which he knew well, said:

"Someone has been smoking in here! I wonder if they are here still."

There was silence for a moment, during which the General sat bolt upright upon his seat—grim and frowning.

"They must have gone," resumed the voice. "The place is as deserted as people in our position could wish to find it."

Then followed two sounds. The first was unmistakably a laugh—a merry, boyish laugh. But the second is altogether untranslatable upon paper. It reached the ear of the General, however, and he immediately became even more rigid and grim and angry.

"The Dogs' Home has lost that little bet," he whispered to himself. "Hang the Dogs' Home!" he went on. "I wish the yelping little beasts had won! Confound that boy! What the dickens does he mean by coming here, after my strict injunction to him only this afternoon to discontinue this impossible and preposterous business! By my spurs, it's sheer mutiny—bare-faced rebellion—and he ought to be tried by court-martial!"

He bit his moustache savagely and listened.

"Milly," said the young man, when the extraordinary sound above mentioned had been repeated. "I am loth to distress you, but I feel it my duty to conceal nothing from you that touches our betrothal. I had a talk with my father this afternoon, darling, and he still persists in reiterating his objections to our engagement."

"Did he say why, Harold?" asked the girl.

"No. I asked him point-blank, but he curtly said that was his affair."

"It seems so unreasonable," said Milly after a pause. "There must be some cause for his antipathy to me."

"He has no antipathy to you, dearest. That is the most inexplicable part of the mystery. He said distinctly he had no doubt that you were gentle and good, and all that could be desired in the choice of a wife. But he had reasons—indisputable reasons—wholly unconnected with yourself—for strongly opposing our engagement."

"Mamma talks in exactly the same strain," said the girl with a sigh. "I wish I could discover this secret, which proves such an obstacle to our love."

"Not to our love, darling," said Harold quickly—and again the untranslatable sound reached the General's ear—"To its fulfilment, yes—but not to our love. That is incapable of change."

"There is comfort in that, dear Harold," said Milly, "but can we not unravel the threads of this dark mystery?"

"Well," responded Harold, "let us look the matter square in the face. We have known each other from children—ever since the time when we were both called upon to suffer a common loss—the loss of a parent—you, of your father—I, of my mother. No restraint has been put upon our intimacy or our friendship, and, until the question of marriage was broached, everything went on swimmingly. But that consideration completely changed the situation. Immediately the possibility of such a contingency is mentioned, the governor and your respected mamma kick up rough, put a damper on our little plan, exercise their high authority, and read us homilies on filial obedience. They both declare that we are not the causes of this unlooked-for decree—consequently, we must look elsewhere. The governor does not dislike your mother, nor, so far as I can see, does she hate him. True, they are not given to gush when they meet, but people of five-and-forty seldom do, and they are always polite and amiable to each other."

"Harold," interrupted Milly, "I may be silly and fanciful, but I sometimes think their amiability—if not their politeness—is a trifle forced. There is a look in the General's eyes when he looks at mamma that has often surprised me. I cannot define it, or even guess its meaning, but it is indisputably there."

"You are quicker than I, darling," said Harold thoughtfully, "for I have never noticed it. What on earth can be the reason?"

"I do not know," said Milly plaintively. "They say a good detective should excel in two things—observation and deduction. I may do something of the former, but the latter is beyond my power."

"Never mind—you do the observing, and I'll try my hand at deducing from your observations," said Harold hopefully. "The plot thickens, as they say in the play—or perhaps—perhaps it isn't quite so treacley already. Have you observed anything else, Miss Scotland Yard?"

The girl laughed, and the General had to wait for the resumption of the conversation until a little by-play had been gone through, whereat he was greatly scandalised—or imagined he was. Presently Milly resumed:

"Yes, dear—something very surprising. I have never spoken of it before, because it seemed so strange and unaccountable. From the day the General sailed for the Transvaal to the day when he returned, some six months ago, mamma was never like herself. The day he left England, she locked herself in her room and saw no one. Whenever news came from the war, she was almost beside herself with excitement until she had read the details. Then she would generally become more composed. But sometimes it made her even more agitated than before. She would never let me look at the papers, but took them up to her own room. One day I saw her open the paper, and give a great start. I pretended not to notice her, but covertly watched her all the time. Her face grew deathly white at first—then she blushed—I have never seen mamma blush so vividly before. Then, as she read, I saw the tears trickle down her cheeks.

Harold, dear, I may not be skilled in reading countenances, but this I do know—they were not the tears of sorrow, but of joy. I felt as if I could have cried too, and fearing lest she should see me, I walked quietly to the window. Presently I heard a sob, and, looking round a moment later, found that she was gone. The paper lay upon the table, where she had left it, so I picked it up. And what do you think I read?"

"Heaven only knows!" said Harold irreverently—"but go on, for goodness' sake!—this is growing exciting!"

Milly laughed.

"On the top of the page, in big black type, I read this heading:

'GENERAL WARRINGHAM'S SPLENDID VICTORY!

THE GREATEST ACHIEVEMENT OF THE WAR!

A Masterpiece of Military Manœuvring and Unparalleled Bravery!'

No doubt you remember the incident well enough, Harold."

"Rather!" he ejaculated, with a note of unmistakable pride in his young voice. "Three cheers for the governor!" And he would actually have given them, had not Milly promptly restrained his enthusiasm by stopping his mouth in a very (from the General's point of view) gracefully immodest way — a process which was evidently infectious.

"Well," said Milly a few moments later, "what do you make of it all?"

"I'm hanged if I know!" was the rejoinder. "Have you told me all?"

"Yes—all—except one thing. Later in the day, I saw mamma reading a bundle of old letters, and, while I was looking, a photograph dropped from one, which looked just like the General must have looked when he was your age. It seems so odd, for they did not know each other then."

"They did!—they did!—they must have

YOU MAY WIN A CRAMOPHONE BY READING THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT OF "A FOE IN THE FAMILY." SEE PAGE 527.

Digitized by Google

dono!" almost shouted Harold. "What fools—what asses—what unmitigated idiots we have been, not to have guessed it long ago!"

"Eh? What did you say?" said Milly with dignity. "Speak for yourself, sir!"

For answer, he took her in his arms and kissed her rapturously.

"By Jove!" he blurted out, "you're a regular brick, Milly! You've given me the key of this mystery, and now I'll see it through, so don't worry any more. Now let us go back to the dancers."

A few more of those indescribable sounds, and they turned to go.

"I think I have a plan," said Harold meditatively, as they went out.

But Fate decreed that Harold's plan could very well be dispensed with in the working out of this little drama.

Ten minutes later the General went out too. Just outside he paused, and, as he did so, another figure glided from the summer-house—a dress rustled in the rose-trellised porch, and a woman stood beside him in the dim, uncertain light of the fairy-lamps. Some instinct told him who she was, and the same instinct apprised him of the fact that she had been crying.

"You heard?" he said, in a voice that would have disgraced him on parade.

"Yes. Did you?"

"H'm!" assented the General gruffly.

There was an awkward pause. Then the General turned and faced his companion.

"And you—you cared?" he asked huskily.

No answer.

"Madge," he said, "we have let a foolish quarrel of our foolish youth wreck half our lives. Can we not remedy the past by finding happiness in the possession of each other in the future?"

She laid her head contentedly on his shoulder, and the General lifted up the happy, tearful face and kissed it.

"Thank God!" she whispered in his ear, "the day has come at last! But it has seemed so long, dear—so very long!"

"We married the wrong people last time, Madge," he said, "but this time there'll be no mistake."

Again he stooped and kissed the upturned face with such warmth and tenderness that even he himself marvelled at the change which, in a few brief moments of time, had been wrought in the opinions which he had so very recently voiced.

Next morning, Harold was summoned to his father's study, where the General awaited him. Evidently desirous of getting through with what he had to say, the General plunged awkwardly in the business by announcing his withdrawal of his former objections to his son's engagement with Milly. He even went so far as to approve the match. Harold stared in bewildered amazement, and the General, noticing this surprise, attempted to explain. He stammered—grew confused—and even blushed—but it all came out bit by bit. And Harold, who had been bottling up his feelings during the recital, burst forth at last.

"Hurrah!" he shouted, as he executed a sand-jig on the study carpet and clapped his astonished and somewhat outraged parent on the back—"Hurrah! Three cheers for the governor! Hip, hip, hurrah! Never too late to mend! Who the dev—I beg pardon! Who'd have thought it! Well I'm blowed!"

And he dashed wildly out of the room, leaving his bewildered parent in a state of mingled surprise, confusion, outraged dignity, amusement and happiness, and tore off to acquaint Milly with the astounding developments of the morning.

But Milly knew already, and he found her waiting for him with her mother's sanction.

And six months later, the newspapers announced, what the sporting world would call—A Double Event.

W. J. Mowbray.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

October 21. — Those celebrating their birthdays to-day will have a favourable year for business; not a good time to travel and change.

Girls born between two and four p.m. need much caution and prudence in their love affairs.

The day is good for writing letters, asking favours, and dealing with doctors and military men.

A child born here will be active and ambitious; fond of travel, and will probably go abroad.

October 22. — Business will need careful attention during the next twelve months by those whose birthdays fall to-day. The mind inclined to pleasure and society.

Girls will meet with strange experiences in love matters, and must have a care where they place confidence.

The day is evil for most matters; guard against mishap, especially with water. Not good to deal with landlords or property.

A child born here will be fond of the sea, and give much thought to music, pleasure, and the opposite sex.

October 23.—Much worry and anxiety over business, health, and general affairs. Avoid law and quarrels; some trouble with property.

Young girls have an anxious time with opposite sex; disappointments, and broken engagements.

The day is not good for signing papers, buying property, asking favours, marriage, or visiting.

A child born this day will be moody, suspicious, and ill-tempered. The constitution will not be strong.

October 24.—A year to avoid speculation; do not change or start new things. Health will need some extra care.

Girls will have cause for jealousy; some opposition in love affairs.

The day is one of uncertainty; go quietly.

A child born to-day will be active, generous, and high-spirited. Not very successful in business.

October 25.—A favourable birthday for those born on this date. Business, health, and domestic matters are favoured.

Young girls are much interested over news and letters, those engaged marry during the next twelve months.

A good day to travel, write letters, marry, visit, engage servants, and speculate.

A child born here will be fortunate and make headway in life. Will be clever, cheerful, witty, and inventive.

October 26.—A mixed year; favourable for those in employ. Have a care against law and accident. Insure against fire.

Girls will need some tact or they quarrel with lovers.

A child born this day will be headstrong, ambitious, active, and daring. Will be fortunate in the employ of others.

October 27. — Rather fortunate for landlords, aged people, and farmers. Avoid risky speculations and do not change or travel.

Girls born near seven p.m. will receive attentions from married men and need care in love matters.

The day is good for dealing with landlords and shipping agents, but evil for speculating and engaging servants.

A child born to-day will be thoughtful, but unsettled, and not very fortunate in business.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

A Story of Hospital Life.

A Good Man's Love.

"Are the apple trees in bloom in the orchard? I thought I heard the bees humming amongst them."

The sister of the ward who had stopped beside No. 6 bed thought that her patient was delirious, and looked down at her anxiously. But the woman in the bed met her glance with a pair of blue eyes that were unclouded and clear—she smiled faintly.

"I wonder," she said, "if the orchard is all pink and white with apple blossom, from my window it used to look like a sea of bloom; and the air that blew in upon me was so sweet. I wish"—she sighed and broke off all at once, turning her face sharply to the wall.

"You must feel that London is very strange after the quiet of the country," Sister Helen said gently, "how glad you will be to go back there. Perhaps the apple trees will still be in bloom when you are well enough to leave the hospital."

"Go back?" The woman turned her face as sharply round towards the nurse, as she had just now turned it away. "Go back—I shall never go back to the farm again—I am not likely ever to see the orchard any more; I wish I didn't dream of it all every night—every night now. It's being in this great hospital does it. I never dreamt of the orchard—and of—home, before I came in here."

She moved restlessly, and the sister laid cool fingers upon her hot head. "You must try not to worry and fret yourself," she said, "we want you to get well."

"What's the use of my getting well? What is the object of saving a useless life like mine? It was a pity anybody ever brought me in here; why couldn't they have let me die in peace?"

Sister Helen was a very tactful, and a very sympathetic woman. She saw that her patient was excited and overtired, and that this was no moment for talking to her. Stroking her hand very softly again with those cool, firm fingers whose touch in itself was restful, she said:

"I think we must have a talk some time, just now I have several patients to see before their bedtime! And I want you to promise me to try to go to sleep, and do not think of any worries for a while. Will you do this to please me?" There was something in Sister Helen's quiet voice, and in the glance of her grey eyes; not to say in the compelling touch of her hand—that always made her patients anxious to please her. The woman in No. 6 bed was no exception to the rule. She smiled up into her nurse's face, and a more restful look came over her own.

"I'll try and do what you wish," she said, "and sometime, when you are not busy, I should like to talk to you—about—about—oh!—many things."

And then, as the sister moved away, the patient turned her face to the wall again.

Sister Helen's thoughts that evening very often went back to the woman in No. 6 bed; whose name, as set forth on the board that hung over it, was Elsie Dangerfield. She had been brought into the hospital a week before, sent by a doctor who said that he had found her in a miserable lodging house, desperately ill, and apparently on the verge of starvation. The sister remembered noticing as she helped to undress the woman, how old and worn her clothes were; her boots almost in holes; her dress threadbare. She recollected too how she had realised that this woman in spite of her worn and haggard face was not really old; and that she must once have possessed great beauty, traces of which still lingered in spite of the ravages which time had made.

Sister Helen's heart had ached often and often over the wreck of womanhood that lay in No. 6 bed; but to-day was the first time that Elsie Dangerfield had spoken in any way of herself or her past. She had been civil and pleasant to her nurses; but beyond that she had never gone—until to-day—and her words about the farm and the apple blossom in the orchard had roused Sister Helen's interest in her afresh. It was not till late on the following afternoon that the busy sister had a moment to sit down beside Elsie Dangerfield, and she began her talk with the sick woman by speaking pleasantly of other matters, and not of the patient herself. Then after a little pause, she said tactfully and gently.

"Last night we settled to have a little talk, didn't we? I wonder whether you will tell me now about your old home—and lovely orchard you spoke of?"

The woman's face flushed; she moved uneasily.

"I don't know that I want to tell you now," she said sullenly, "it all belongs to the past—the stupid old past, which I have forgotten."

There was defiance in her voice, "the present is enough for me, the future is—a blank."

"Oh! surely not that?" Sister Helen spoke soothingly. "I think perhaps you will find the future has some good things in store for you."

Elsie Dangerfield laughed harshly.

"Not it," she said, "there are no good things in store for me. I have made my bed and I must lie on it, even if it is a bed of nettles."

She was silent for a few seconds, then she burst out suddenly:

"I will tell you—though you will hate me afterwards, or preach at me. All you good women either loathe or preach at we women who are not good."

Sister Helen did not answer, but her grey eyes met the defiant blue ones that glared at her from the pillow, with such tenderness in their depths, that a look of shame crossed the patient's face.

"I believe you are really good," she said more quietly, "perhaps you can forgive sinners. But I will tell you the truth. Long ago—I think I have lost count now of how long it was—I lived in a farm away in Surrey. I had always lived in that village, and everybody said I was a lucky girl when Godfrey Dangerfield of Manly Farm asked me to be his wife. I wasn't sure about my own luck—because—because I was a fool." She spoke vehemently. "I had read a lot of silly trash about the life of a town, and the gay times folks had in London, and I thought I was buried there in the country, and that if I married Godfrey I should be doing him an honour, and sacrificing my own chance of seeing something of what I called life. Oh! I was a fool—a fool—a fool. Well, I married Godfrey; I thought after all it would be nice to be the mistress of Manly Farm, and raised above my old neighbours and friends—and it was very pleasant to be made much of, as Godfrey made much of me. He treated me like a queen—and I—I broke his heart." There was a long pause, and it was in a lower, more broken voice that the sick woman went on.

"My home was as beautiful as any woman could wish. It stood upon a hill, and from my door, and out of my windows, I looked across the open country to the great hills. My God! how I have longed sometimes in these city streets, to see the hills again. Just below my bedroom the orchard climbed up behind the house, and the scent of the blossoms came in to me in the early mornings when the blackbirds whistled in the branches of the apple trees, and the larks sang on the hillside. I ought to have been a happy woman—my home was so lovely—my husband was so good to me. But I was discontented all the time. I wanted gaiety and amusement. I pined for city life, I thought I was wasted in the country—I was a pretty woman then, sister, very pretty, they told me Godfrey was patient with me in spite of all my cross ways; he was always loving and tender, always trying to think of ways to amuse me and keep me happy—and I was never grateful to him! One day he came and told me he had taken places for some play that was to be acted in the country town three miles away; he thought I should be amused, and that it would be a change for me. I was pleased enough and excited over it; for even strolling players in a country town seemed to me delightful—then. So we went—Godfrey and I. But after that night I was just wild to go and be a player myself, I hated my life more than ever. I could think of nothing but the glory and delight of being on the stage, and of hearing ringing cheers of applause. I was dazzled with the pictures my own silly fancy painted; and I hated my peaceful life more than ever—and then, oh! sister, one day I threw it all away, my beautiful home, my peaceful life—and worse than all, my husband's love. In a fit of impatient anger, I ran away from home, and came to London." She paused and Sister Helen said gently:

Digitized by Google

"But your husband—did he not follow you?"

"I left him no address—I wrote him a note saying I was sick of my dull life, and that I had gone away for ever—I came to London, and I managed to get work in a small, out-of-the-way theatre—but—oh! nurse, I cannot tell you of all my life since the day I left my home. I have sunk down lower and lower; and—and when I was no longer pretty or young I sank lower still—down to the depths of misery and want and wretchedness till, when the doctor found me—I was nearly starving. I have been a wicked woman—a wicked woman; but if only I might know that Godfrey forgave me, I should die happy!"

"But have you written to your husband?"

"No—oh no—I am not fit to write to him; I am not fit," and all at once she burst into low sobbing, then controlled herself suddenly, and said, "if I die, sister, will you send and tell my husband that I was sorry, bitterly, bitterly sorry for all I did. Godfrey Dangerfield, Manly Farm, Harefield—that will find him."

Sister Helen gave the desired promise, and soothed her patient to the best of her power; and that night in her own room she thought long and anxiously over the sick woman's story, making up her mind finally to a strange step.

Two days later there stood at the door of the ward a tall man with a kind, strong face who asked for Sister Helen. And when he was taken into her sitting-room to her he held out his hand and grasped hers in a grip that almost hurt her.

"God bless you," he said, and his voice shook, "you must be a good woman."

Sister Helen looked into the strong face, and the kindly brown eyes, and instinctively trusted their owner.

"You are Mr. Godfrey Dangerfield, are you not?" she said. "Was I wrong to write to you? I could not make up my mind at first what was right to do; and then it seemed to me that I must write and tell you that your wife is here. I think I was right, because—you have come."

"I am sure you were right," he answered. "My poor little wife; my poor Elsie. If she knew how I have searched for her all these years; how I have grieved for her; she would not speak of forgiveness!—May I see her?"

"You know, Mr. Dangerfield, that she is very, very ill; and that you will find her terribly changed. You must let me prepare her a little for seeing you. I felt you would come, but I hardly thought you would come so soon."

"I came at once, directly I had read your letter," he said, and his voice was surprised, "of course I came at once."

And through Sister Helen's mind swung the words, "Thy love to me was wonderful." Truly this man's was a wonderful love.

Sister Helen went softly to the bedside of Elsie Dangerfield and told her very quietly that someone wanted to see her.

"To see me? Why I haven't a friend in the world," the sick woman said, and laughed harshly, "it must be some mistake."

"No, it is no mistake," Sister Helen replied, "it is—an old friend—who is very anxious to see you, and who has come—a long way on purpose to do so."

A flush of colour flamed over the white face.

"It is not Godfrey—it could not be Godfrey," she said brokenly, "that is impossible—how could he know?" Her voice trailed into silence as Sister Helen walked swiftly away, returning in a moment with a tall man at her side.

Elsie Dangerfield's bed was in a corner of the ward surrounded by screens, and it was not until the sister and her companion were close to her side that Elsie caught sight of her visitor—as the sister stole away. Then with a little cry the sick woman covered her face with her hands, saying brokenly:

"Oh, why have you come? You cannot ever forgive me, when you know—when you know——"

"I do not want to know anything, my dear," Godfrey answered gravely, and as he spoke, he knelt down beside his wife's bed, and took her trembling hands in his, "I want nothing but to take you home."

"Take me home?" She looked at him with dazed eyes. "you can't mean that you would have me at home again, you can't mean that."

"But I do mean that," he spoke very quietly, almost in a matter-of-fact voice, seeing her great agitation, "I have come on purpose to see—to see how soon you can travel, dear. I must nurse you back to health again."

The sick woman was sobbing, low, pitiful sobs.

"I didn't know there was such love in the world," she whispered, as Godfrey stooped and kissed her, "I didn't know anybody could forgive like this."

And a great restfulness came into her eyes; a wonderful peace upon her worn face.

"Oh! I will be good now, Godfrey, I will be good," she said. "Now you have forgiven me—I think God will forgive me too. But—I have spoilt your life and my own—I can never undo the past."

"We will put the past behind us and not look back at it again," he answered. "We will start afresh from to-day, my little wife, and go on together hand in hand. We love each other, and we will help each other, dear."

And when later on, Elsie Dangerfield told Sister Helen something of what her husband had said to her, the sister said softly:

"Oh, my dear, I think your husband's love for you is wonderful. Do you know those great words come back to me when I think of him and of you, 'Down on your knees and thank Heaven fasting, for a good man's love.'"

L. G. Moberly.

Draper's Assistant: "Can it be possible! Miss Coupon, whom I had the pleasure of meeting at Margate last summer? How long——" Miss Coupon: "Three yards, please."

Friend: "What did he say to you when he proposed?" Miss Rox: "He said life without me meant nothing." Friend: "He was sincere in that. That's just what his possessions amount to."

"By the way, Bishop, why is it that you always address your congregation as 'Brethren,' and never mention the women in your sermons?" "But, my dear madam, the one embraces the other." "Oh, but, Bishop, not in church!"

Husband: "The new cook makes everything too salt. It's terrible." Wife: "She can't help that, poor thing. It isn't her fault that her hands are big." Husband: "What earthly difference can that make?" Wife: "That shows how much you know about housekeeping. The cookery books always measure salt by the pinch."

Digitized by Google

SERIAL STORY COMPETITION.

STILL ANOTHER OPPORTUNITY FOR YOU TO WIN ONE OF THE TEN HANDSOME GRAMOPHONES OFFERED.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

The picture on this page illustrates a certain sentence in this week's instalment of our powerful new serial "A Foe in the Family." All you have to do is to read the instalment carefully, and to write under the picture the sentence which you think is illustrated by the sketch. Ten splendid Gramophones will be awarded to readers whose correct solutions are posted to us soonest after the publication of this number of Short Stories.

Sentence:	Page .....
.....	Column .....
.....	Line .....

In order that all competitors shall have an equal chance of winning these handsome prizes, we have decided to distribute the Gramophones over the British Isles thus:

Two Gramophones will be won by readers living in the London postal district whose correct solutions are posted first.

Two Gramophones will be awarded to readers living within 100 miles of London.

Two to those English readers living over 100 miles from London.

Two to Scottish readers sending in correct solutions and two to those living in Ireland.

When you have found the sentence write it down in the space below the picture, together with the number of the page, the column, and the line. Then put your name and address in the space provided, cut out this page and post it to the Competition Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Mark your envelope in the top left corner with the name of your postal town, and the time of posting, thus: MANCHESTER. 2.45 p.m. Then post it at once.

Name..... Address.....

"Yes," said Mabel, proudly, "when a young man kisses me I scream." "Mabel," said Reginald, with a sudden coldness, "why is it you are so often hoarse when I call on you?"

Husband: "Come, sit on my lap, my dear, as you did in our old courting days." Wife: "Well, I declare! I haven't received such an invitation for an age." Husband: "And—er—bring a needle and thread with you, my love."

She: "Now promise me, Ralph, that you won't go to drinking just because I have refused you." He (despondently): "Certainly not. I'll have to swear off for three months to get even on the flowers and things I've wasted on you."

Mrs. Grey: "That is such an affectionate couple over there. I heard him call her 'dear' several times as if he meant it." Mr. Grey (gruffly): "Of course he meant it. She has got a three hundred pound fur mantle on."

Mother: "What! crying, Ethel? Don't you and Herbert get along well?" Bride of Six Weeks: "Yes, we get along too well, mamma. I told Herbert the other day I was willing to do all the housework, and—and now he wants me to do it."

Wife: "I have a new maid coming to-day, dear." Husband: "Is she well recommended?" Wife: "Well, she has lived in seventeen of the highest families." Husband: "I should think that would be against her." Wife: "Not at all. What delicious scandals she must know."

Digitized by Google

Frances Norton: Adventuress.

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

Cynthia Hamilton: Her companion.

FRANKIE PLAYS HER LAST CARD.

LIFE on board the yacht went very smoothly after a few days. There was some slight friction at first between Frankie and Mrs. Venables, relative to what that lady called "her kidnapping arrangement." But after a while the vivacious little woman settled down, and accepted the situation with a good grace. She seemed, indeed, to find a certain satisfaction in it.

"It's all very well, my dear," she informed me, "to have the reputation of a smart hostess, but, I assure you, it has drawbacks. Of course I felt vexed with your cousin at first; putting out to sea in such an unexpected fashion, more like pirates than anything else, upset me. But now it's quite delightful. I've wired to Vi, and she'll look after my guests and the house till I get back. Your dear cousin is charmingly romantic, Cynthia. It's quite an ideal arrangement to cruise about like this, 'the world forgetting,' and that sort of thing, don't you know."

I murmured an assent. I was too worried about Frankie to pay much heed to the little lady's prattle.

My cousin was looking well; there was not a shade of anxiety on her face or in her manner. She seemed resolved to make Lord Kinross more in love with her than ever, and had never been more winning or so gentle. Hartland appeared to idolise her, and would sit at her feet of an afternoon, with a rapt expression of countenance, watching her pale, sweet face, and murmuring irrelevancies in her ear.

The weather was perfect, not a cloud in the sky, nor a breaker in the sea. I could have been happy, quite happy, but for the haunting fear that never left me night or day—the fear that Frankie, despite all her beauty, all her wit, her courage, and her strength of will, would at the last moment fail to bring about her marriage.

But Frankie showed no sign of fear or doubt. Day after day went by; we would put in at some small fishing-port for fresh vegetables and provisions, explore the recesses of a deep caverned cave, or land in the boats at a sandy cove and have a gipsy tea. Otherwise we held no communication with the world; letters could not reach us—we were "at sea."

On one of our runs on shore I bought a society paper. I read therein, to my amazement, that Lord Kinross was cruising in the Mediterranean, and that his approaching marriage with the handsome Mrs. Norton would take place in Paris.

"Frankie, look here!" I cried.

My cousin nodded, taking the paper from me.

"Tear it up," she said, "I don't want Hartland to see the paragraph. I know all about it; I sent the notice myself."

"Why?"

"Don't you understand," she cried impatiently. "The paragraph will be copied by the other papers. Fluffy will be sure to catch sight of it somewhere, and——"

"He'll go to Paris?" I exclaimed.

"I hope so."

"And all the time you're going to be married at Cromer?"

Frankie shook her head. "Not if I can help it, Cynthia. You don't know Fluffy. He won't leave me a loophole of escape if he can help it. He will be prepared for me at Cromer and at Paris too. My only chance is to be married at a little out-of-the-way place that Fluffy's never heard of. And"—she paused—"be married quickly."

I glanced at her anxiously. We had been at sea just on a fortnight. We were, in fact, due at Cromer the end of the week—seven days before the date fixed for the wedding. Up to the present my cousin had not spoken to Hartland as to lengthening the cruise. She was, I thought, leaving it somewhat late. For the first time Frankie seemed to have lost her nerve.

That afternoon we sighted the Channel Islands. Frankie and Mrs. Venables grew quite enthusiastic over their beauties.

"Such a climate!" said the Venables woman.

"Such lovely walks," cried Frankie, "and such flowers! I believe Guernsey's a paradise of roses."

"It sounds promising," said Chesterton.

"It's perfect!" returned my cousin, her eyes sparkling. "What do you say, Hartland, shall we explore paradise?"

Digitized by Google

"I'm quite willing to stay at Guernsey for a day or two, if that's what you mean, Frankie," said his lordship. Then, under cover of the wind, softly whispered, "If it will please you, dearest."

"That's settled, then," said my cousin brightly. "To-night we dine on shore."

"I'm willing," announced Chesterton, "and so is Cynthia. We always think alike," with which astounding statement he vainly tried to take my hand.

Nobody seemed to think it necessary to consult Mrs. Venables. But then she did not think it necessary herself. I felt much relieved at the arrangement. It seemed as if Frankie had made her first step towards defeating Fluffy!

I stood close beside my cousin watching the shores of the island growing more distinct.

Shortly after Kinross carried her off.

Together they paced the deck, until, fearing she would be tired, he placed her on a pile of cushions, throwing himself at her feet. The moon was rising over the water, we were drifting slowly, smoothly into the harbour. The whole world seemed at peace.

I knew my cousin was going to appeal to Hartland, and felt anxious, cruelly anxious, as to the result. I could not wait, I felt I must learn then and there whether or no she was successful. I lingered near them, hovering in the shadow.

"We've had a happy time, Hartland," said my cousin, "this last fortnight."

"The best and happiest in my life, sweetheart," he answered.

"You'll be sorry when it comes to an end?"

"Our cruise, do you mean?"

"Yes."

"Hardly. You see," he put his arms about her with an eager gesture—"you see, my darling, every day that brings our voyage nearer to a close, hastens the day when I shall have you for my own. My sweet, my love, the weeks have gone so slowly, the hours are leaden, each day lengthens itself to six. How can I sorrow that the time of waiting will so soon be over? How can I, tell me?" He took her in his arms and kissed her passionately—kissed her eyes, her throat, her hair, made glorious by the moon's soft light.

He loved her, surely he loved her! In face of such a love, he would, he must, forgive her everything. And yet?

I sighed and wrung my hands. Men are hard, hard and cold in judging the woman they love. Percival Hope had cared for me, I thought, but he had judged me.

But Kinross was softer, more gentle than Percival. What could Fluffy know of my cousin that her lover would not forgive? Percival had tried to prejudice him against her but in vain. Was it likely that Fluffy—Fluffy! how the name mocked the man—would succeed where Percival had failed?

And yet Frankie had defied Hope, had laughed at him. This other she could not defy. She feared him, feared him greatly.

Frankie's voice, low and thrilling, broke my thoughts.

"Would you weary of sailing the summer seas under the blue sky and the warm sun—just you and I, my dearest?" She threw her arms round his neck and gazed at him with those strange, those wonderful eyes.

"So you were with me, I should never weary," he answered readily, almost, I thought, too readily.

"I always loved the sea," she went on softly; "but never, I think, so much as now. Wild, restless, caressing, fierce, it appeals to me like some beautiful feline thing—I hate to think of crowds these days; people and fashions and functions seem to jar on me. Need we go back to Cromer just yet, Hartland? Let us snatch all we can of this free, this beautiful life."

"My dearest——" He paused, and seemed a little at a loss. Then—"It's quite delightful of you, Frankie, to like this quiet life. In fact, it's positively charming—and so unexpected. All the same, you know, the world, being as it is, I don't think we can keep out of it much longer. We're not in Arcadia, Frankie, and the notion of prolonging our cruise indefinitely, turning up for our marriage at the last moment, so to speak, doesn't commend itself to me. After we're married we'll sail the summer seas to all eternity—if it please you."

Frankie leant against him in the darkness.

"Hartland," she said softly, "don't you think a fashionable wedding's an awful bore? A nice quiet affair in a country village is much more to my taste. Say"—she held up her face for a kiss—"shall we be married in Guernsey, you and I?"

For a moment he hesitated. She was lovely enough to stir romance in any man, and the notion was romantic, not to say far-fetched. It might even be considered ridiculous by some. That decided him, of all things Lord Kinross dreaded ridicule.

"You're whimsical as the sea itself, Frankie," he said, with an uneasy little laugh.

"Don't you think it's a delightful idea?"

"Entirely; but—well, you see, there's a horrid lot of rules and regulations about licenses, and things. A man can't get married in a casual sort of way, you know, he's got to go through an immense deal of formality. Society expects it, Frankie, and Lady Linton, my aunt, you know, simply demands it. She would be furious, and——" He laughed. "A furious aunt I cannot bear with, even for you. We'll stay a day or two in Guernsey, till Monday if you like. And then—then we must set sail for Cromer."

He spoke with an air of determination. To combat his decision further would be useless. Frankie did not attempt to do so. She patted his coat-sleeve, and said, smiling, "You're terribly wise, Hartland."

"You're adorably foolish!" he retorted, and the matter ended.

That evening, as Frankie had determined, we dined on shore, at a delightfully quaint old inn, smothered with roses and wisteria.

During the next few days we had a happy, peaceful time. Frankie's fears lessened, she felt secure in Hartland's affection, sure of her own powers of fascination. Fluffy had made no sign; he was doubtless cruising the Mediterranean or searching Paris.

I was very sorry when our stay in Guernsey drew to a close, and so was Frankie. We were to start for Cromer early Monday morning. On Sunday evening Hartland proposed an expedition to an old abbey some miles inland.

"We'll drive there," he said, "and walk back in the moonlight."

Mrs. Venables decided the fatigue would be too great, so leaving her comfortably settled on the verandah the rest of us started in high spirits for the abbey.

It was a delightful drive, the country, a very wilderness of flowers, lay fresh and fair under the blue sky, while in the distance the white-crested waves dashed against the cliffs.

We had a meal at a farmhouse near the ruins, sweet-tasting bread, coffee and cream, with pears, apples and plums. Then just as the moon tipped the trees with light, we started on our homeward way.

Laughing and talking in light-hearted fashion, the time and distance passed quickly. As we neared the town we met a group of peasants, dark-eyed women in white caps, and pretty, fair-haired children. Hartland paused to distribute pence and smiles to the little ones; Frankie, half impatient at his delay, went on. I watched her, tall and slim, as she went up the hill that looks upon the little town. She reached the top and, for a moment, stood a solitary figure outlined against the moonlit sky. The next, someone, a man, had joined her. They stood together, his face was turned towards me.

I felt as though a cold hand gripped my heart. There in the moonlight, a smile upon his face, a greeting on his lips, stood—Fluffy!

For a moment Frankie could not speak, then, with an effort, she pulled herself together and shook hands with him. By this time we had all come up the hill. Kinross welcomed Fluffy warmly, and Chesterton seemed charmed to see him.

"Where have you come from?" said my cousin at last "It's delightful, but surprising, to stumble on you here."

"So long as you're pleased," he said softly, "what does it matter. Still, if you're curious, I've come on business. You're looking well, Mrs. Norton, and Miss Cynthia," he looked at me in his old, kindly fashion, "is quite blooming. When do you leave the island, Kinross?"

Digitized by Google

"HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA," IS THE TITLE OF A NEW SERIES OF REMARKABLE SOCIETY STORIES WHICH COMMENCES IN "SHORT STORIES" ON NOV. 4TH.

"To-morrow morning early. And you?"

"My plans for the moment are unsettled."

"I shall hope to see you at Cromer, any way," said Kinross. "Thursday's the all-important day, you know."

"Your wedding is fixed for that date?" Fluffy asked.

Kinross nodded.

"I congratulate you." Fluffy smiled and offered Frankie his assistance down the hill. She laid her fingers lightly on his arm, and with wonderful self-possession commenced to ask how he was, what he had been doing, and if he had missed her very much.

Not once did she flinch or show a sign of fear, but throughout the evening she did not leave him. He had no chance, no opportunity to speak to Kinross.

At length he said he must go, he was stopping at a hotel at the other side of the town.

"I shall see you in the morning," he said to Kinross. "I'll look you up before you start."

"All right," said his lordship. "Remember, we leave at nine."

Fluffy waved an adieu and started quickly down the road.

"Cynthia," said my cousin, drawing me aside, "run after him now, at once. Give him this," she handed me a note, "and bring back the answer. Run."

Obediently I hurried down the long white road. Fluffy heard me coming and turned to meet me.

"Frankie said I was to give you this," I panted.

He took the note and read it thoughtfully.

"What is the answer, please, I must make haste?"

For a moment he paused, then in a low voice said—"The answer, Cynthia, is 'yes'!"

Frankie hurried me up the stairs before she let me speak.

"He says 'yes!'" I announced breathlessly. "What does he mean, Frankie?"

My cousin faced me, a strange look in her eyes, a look which frightened me.

"It means that I shall win," she cried, "yes, I shall win. Listen, Cynthia," she came close to me and spoke rapidly. I'm going to meet Fluffy to-morrow morning at half-past six. I shall steal out of the hotel without anyone seeing me, but in case of inquiry you must say I'm sleeping here with you. Keep your door locked till I come back. Say I'm ill, or asleep, if anyone asks for me. You understand?" She tightly grasped my arm. "You mustn't fail me, it's the last thing I shall ask of you."

"You're going to see Fluffy, to try and persuade him——" She interrupted me.

"Yes," she said, "I'm going to persuade him," and she gave a horrid little laugh.

She left me then. I heard her footsteps down the passage, heard her softly enter her room and lock the door. Perhaps—I do not know—perhaps she slept that night; for me there was no sleep.

I feared, yet longed to meet the morning. The look in my cousin's eyes haunted me. The mockery of her laugh chilled me. She was going to meet Fluffy, to persuade him, to——. I shuddered and covered my face with my hands, a horrible fear at my heart. I waited, chilled, fearful for the dawn to break.

At six o'clock I heard those same soft steps outside my door. Frankie was going out. Should I go after her, beg and pray to accompany her? It would be useless! Frankie would tolerate no interference. Besides, what excuse should I make? What cause had I to fear? Nothing but a look in her eyes, a tone in her voice. And yet that vague, that horrible dread lay upon me like a nightmare. I tried to shake it off. I opened my window wide and drew in long breaths of the cool, morning air. I watched my cousin down the street, straining my eyes to follow her as she walked swiftly along the road that led over the hills towards an old stone quarry.

I wondered, was it at the quarry she was going to meet him?

Long after she had passed out of sight I gazed, until my eyes grew heavy and my head ached. I dropped upon the floor and rested my arms upon the window-sill. My head drooped, my eyes closed—I fell asleep.

A quick, sharp knock at the door aroused me. I sprang to my feet—the clock was on the stroke of eight.

"Open, Cynthia, quick, it is I," said a low voice.

Trembling I drew back the bolt and Frankie entered.

"You have seen him?" I asked. "What has happened, tell me?"

I bent towards her eagerly, but, as I met her gaze, I saw that in her face which brought a cry of terror to my lips.

"Where is he?" I screamed. "You've—you've——"

She thrust her hand over my mouth and forced me on the bed.

"You fool, you little fool. Be quiet—be quiet, I say."

"Tell me," I pleaded, thrusting her from me. "I will be quiet, indeed I will be quiet, but tell me what has happened."

"All that I wished," she answered quietly. "Fluffy will not get to Cromer in time to stop my wedding now."

"But how? Frankie, I must know, I will know." Something seemed to give me courage, I started to my feet and stood before her. "You've got to tell me," I said firmly.

She glanced at me curiously. "Fluffy will keep silence," she said, "does not that satisfy you?"

I shook my head. "Where is he?" I asked hoarsely.

"I don't know," she returned flippantly. "At the hotel, I suppose."

"Frankie!"

She turned upon me fiercely. "I'll have no more of this," she cried. "You are beside yourself. What has happened, indeed? What should happen? Anger and threats on his side, sweet words, promises, and flattery on mine. And as usual I proved the stronger. Get yourself dressed, child, and give me no more nonsense. I have told you too much of my affairs, it seems. Make haste, it is past eight already. We have to be on board the yacht at nine."

At this moment there came a knocking at the door.

"What has become of you, Cynthia?" chirped Mrs. Venables, "your cousin has quite disappeared, her room's empty."

With a warning look at me, Frankie, admitted the little woman.

"Cynthia's not well, poor child," said Frankie. "She's been ill all night, and couldn't sleep. She came to me quite early this morning, I've been with her ever since."

"She does look bad," said Mrs. Venables. "What is it, do you think?"

Frankie smiled, and laid her hand caressingly upon my arm.

"She can't bear the idea of parting from me, Mrs. Venables. The silly child positively dreads my marriage, it's making her quite ill. I tell her I shall always care for her the same, but she won't believe it. She's been crying half the night—look at her eyes."

"Dear, dear!" said Mrs. Venables, "what a silly thing to do. You may be getting married yourself before long. You shouldn't grudge your cousin her happiness."

"You mustn't scold her, Mrs. Venables." Frankie stooped and kissed me. "Dear little girl," she said.

Passively I let my cousin smooth my hair, arrange my dress, and lead me down to breakfast. As usual, she had proved too much for me, I was as wax in her hands.

I got through breakfast somehow, though it was a terrible ordeal. They were all very kind to me, and said how sorry they were I was not well. Hartland was especially nice—just like he used to be in the days when I first knew him.

"Mrs. Venables has been telling tales, Cynthia," he said softly. "What a silly little girl you are! Is it likely I should wish to part you from Frankie? I'm quite as fond of you as she is. You ought to be pleased to gain a nice-looking cousin like me."

I smiled feebly and forced some toast down my throat. I was in a state of terrible expectancy. Something, I felt, was going to happen.

Digitized by Google

Breakfast over, we sauntered down to the quay, taking a last look of the town on our way.

"Fluffy's not turned up after all," said Kinross. "I suppose he's overslept himself."

"I'm sorry," said Frankie, "I should like to have seen him."

"He's sure to turn up at Cromer, anyway," remarked Kinross.

Frankie gave a start at the words; I gave a shudder.

Just as we were about to embark, Mrs. Venables discovered she had left her writing-case behind.

"It's most unfortunate," she cried. "I must go back for it at once. I could not possibly leave it in a strange hotel."

"They'll send it on all right," said Kinross. "I've left them our address in case of any letters coming. It will mean quite twenty minutes' delay if you go back. Can't you do without it, Mrs. Venables, the tide's just on the turn?"

"I'm sorry, but I can't," was the reply.

"Send a messenger." Kinross motioned to a group of loiterers on the quay.

"Thank you, I would rather go myself."

After that there seemed nothing more to say, and Mrs. Venables was about to start back to the hotel when Frankie interposed.

"You simply mustn't go," she said, "you'll tire yourself completely; and, what is more important, we shall miss the tide. Cynthia will be there and back in no time. She shall fetch the case. No," as Chesterton stepped forward to accompany me, "you're not to go with her, we shouldn't see either of you for an hour at least. Go, Cynthia, like a dear girl, and be as quick as possible."

I hurried back to the hotel, procured the writing case, and was making my way once more to the quay, when somebody shouted to me to stop. A young man came running towards me.

"There's been a bad accident," he said, "a gentleman staying at the Hotel Poulin has fallen down the quarry. He went out early this morning, and has only just now been discovered."

"Is he dead?" I asked, with white lips.

"No, but badly hurt. He is, I think, a friend of your party?"

"He is," I said. "I will go now and tell them. He must not be left among strangers."

I flew down to the quay. Come what would, poor Fluffy should not be left alone. Some of us, or all of us, must go back and look after him. Frankie was waiting for me in the boat, the others had already gone aboard the yacht.

She realised at once that I had news.

"You must come back," I cried distractedly. "Fluffy is hurt, dangerously hurt, dying perhaps."

For answer she tried to pull me in the boat. In my fright and agitation I missed my footing—the next moment I was in the sea. The sound of many waters in my ears, the sight of Frankie's face, white and set, before my eyes—I sank down, and down, and down.

I knew no more until I found myself in my berth on board the yacht. Frankie was beside me.

"You're not to speak, dearie," she said, watching my face. "Just drink this and go to sleep."

I pushed her hand aside, and sat up with eager, questioning eyes.

"It's all right, Cynthia," she said, with a soft smile. "There's nothing for you to worry about. Fluffy's much better; Chesterton went back and made inquiries. It wasn't a serious accident, after all. How did it happen? Why," she paused, and her hands opened and shut convulsively; "He walked too close to the edge of the quarry, I suppose; he must have been standing right on the edge, and—and he lost his balance," she said hoarsely, "and fell over."

"And you, where were you when he fell?"

"I?—I?" She laughed. "I was with my little cousin; with you Cynthia, dear."

"Frankie!" I sat bolt upright and clutched her arm, "it is not true," I said. "He did not fall; you—you pushed him over!"

(The last of this series containing the grand climax appears in next Tuesday's issue.)

Your Editor Chats.

It has been necessary, owing to an unlooked-for development in connection with the new series of articles—"How I Chaperoned Belinda"—to postpone publication for a week. In dealing with statements of the kind contained in the articles it is absolutely necessary that the greatest possible care should be taken to give offence to no one, and I am sure that in this matter readers will agree with me. The first article will be published in Short Stories, ready on Tuesday, November 4th, and the cover will bear a picture of Lady Peggy Carstairs (the author of the articles) and of Belinda North.

We have paid a large amount of money for the right to publish these articles, but we hope to get a good return by way of increased circulation. Those readers who think sufficiently well of the paper and appreciate it enough to help us, can do so by simply buying one extra copy of the issue ready on Tuesday, November 4th, and giving that copy to a friend who might be interested. The extra cost to you is only a penny, yet if you and your fellow-readers each bought an extra copy just for one week and gave it away to a friend, the circulation would be doubled.

Don't think to yourself—"Oh, well, if I don't buy an extra copy it won't make much difference; there are thousands of other people who will do so." If everyone who reads these lines thought the same no good would be done. Your arguments should rather be—"Anyway, whatever anybody else does, I will buy an extra copy for that particular week."

PERCIVAL HOPE.

I gather from letters received from readers that they do not consider Percival Hope a sufficiently interesting individual to justify my trying to obtain from him an account of his experiences. I shall, therefore, not trouble him in the matter.

AN APOLOGY.

Will those readers who applied for leaflets in connection with the new serial story, and who did not receive them, please accept my apologies for the disappointment. The truth of the matter is that, so numerous were the applications that the stock of leaflets was exhausted before all the applications were dealt with. I shall, however, communicate with these readers in the course of a few days

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

A REAL LOVE AND A FALSE.

The Tale of an Accident.

I WAS a coquette.

Many a lover's heart I had lacerated by refusing his offer of marriage, after I had lured him on to a "declaration."

My last victim's name was James Frazer. He was a tall, awkward, homely and ungainly man, but his heart was as true as steel. I respected him highly, and felt pained when I witnessed his anguish at my rejection of him.

But the fact was, I had myself fallen in love with Elliott Tracy, a smart City man, who had been unremitting in his devotion to me. James Frazer warned me against Elliott, but I charged him with jealousy, and took his warnings as an insult. A few days later Elliott and I were engaged, and my dream of romantic love seemed to be in a fair way towards realisation. I had a week of happiness. Many have not had so much in a lifetime. Many awake from the bright, short dream to find themselves in lifelong darkness, and bondage from which there is no escape. Thank God, I was not to be so miserable as they!

There was a party on horseback winding through our grand old woods and quiet country roads. Elliott and I led the cavalcade. I rode my own beautiful Brown Bess. Elliott was mounted on the handsome black horse that had been given to him by a rich uncle. Following us were a bevy of merry girls and their cavaliers, and among them, tall, awkward, and silent, rode James Frazer. His presence had marred all the pleasure of my ride, and I was glad to be in advance of them all, that I might not see him.

And so we rode on through the lovely country and I listened well pleased to the low but animated words of Elliott Tracy, who wished himself a knight, and me a fair ladye of the olden time, that he might go forth to do battle for me, and compel all men to recognise the claims of his peerless love.

Very eloquently he spoke the inspiration of love, of the brave deeds and perilous exploits it had prompted, wishing again and again that he might thus proclaim and maintain his love before the world. It pleased me to listen to this, and to believe it sincere, though I surely had no wish to put my lover to such a test.

Suddenly a shot rang through the still woods, and a wounded bird, darting past, fluttered and fell at the feet of Brown Bess. With a bound and a spring, that nearly unseated me, she was off.

Struggling to regain my seat, I had no power to restrain her, and even as she flew the fear and madness of the moment grew upon her. I could only cling breathlessly to mane and bridle and wonder helplessly where this mad gallop was to end. She swerved from a passing waggon, and turned into a cart track that led to the river. In the sudden movement the reins had been torn from my hands, and I could not regain them.

I clung to the mane, and closed my eyes that I might not behold the fate that awaited me. How sweet was life in those precious moments which I thought my last! How all its joys, its affections, its last crowning love rose up before me! I thought of the pang that would rend Elliott's heart as he saw me lying mangled and dead, and then the thought would come that he was pursuing and trying to save me, even, as he had said, at the risk of life and limb.

I remembered no more. I felt a sudden shock, a fearful rushing through the air, and knew nothing until, days afterwards, I woke to a faint, weak semblance of life, in my room at home.

I never saw Elliott Tracy again. The last words I ever heard from his lips were those of knightly daring. The last act of his life, in connection with mine, was to follow in the train of frightened youths who rode after me, to contemplate the disaster from afar, and as soon as he saw me lifted from the shallow bed of the river into which I had been thrown when my frightened horse stopped suddenly on its bank, to ride hastily back to the village. That evening he sent to make inquiries, and learning that I was severely but it was hoped not fatally injured, he thenceforth contented himself with such tidings of my condition and improvement as could be gained from village rumours.

At last it was known that I would never recover entirely from the effects of my injury, and that very day Elliott Tracy departed suddenly from the village.

He made no attempt to see me, nor sent me any farewell. When I was once more about, and beginning to learn the lesson of patience and resignation that awaited me, I received a letter from him, in which he merely said that he presumed my own judgment had taught me that, in my altered circumstances, our engagement must be at an end; but to satisfy his own sense of honour (his honour?) he wrote to say that, while entertaining the highest respect for me, he desired a formal renunciation of my claim.

Writing at the bottom of this letter, "Let it be as you wish," I returned it to him at once, and thus ended my brief dream of a romantic love.

I had heard ere this of Elliott Tracy's cowardly conduct on that day, and now I first bethought me to inquire who had rescued me from imminent death.

Then I learnt that James Frazer, his arm already broken by the jerk with which Brown Bess tore away from him as he caught at her bridle, had ridden after me, and was the first to lift me from the water.

Many times daily he had made inquiries for me. His had been the hand that sent the rare flowers that decked my room. His were the books I read in the lingering days of convalescence, and his, now, was the arm that supported me as, slowly and painfully, I paced the garden walks.

I have been his wife for many a year. I have forgotten that he is not handsome, or rather he is beautiful to me, because I see his grand and lovely spirit shining through his plain features, and animating his awkward figure.

I have long since laid aside, as utterly untenable, my pet theory that beautiful spirits dwell only in lovely bodies.

It may be a providential compensation that, in denying physical perfection, the soul is not dwarfed or distorted, but shines the brighter that it is not marred by petty vanity or love of the world's praise.

E. Ashton.

Mr. Younghusband (reading from paper): "'Married—Blanche de Smythe to Walter Wellington Jones.' What old memories that name awakens!" Mrs. Y. (blushing): "I never imagined you knew of my engagement to Walter." Mr. Y. (chillingly): "I was alluding to Blanche."

He: "My dear cousin, I assure you I would never dare rob those sweet lips of a kiss." She: "Oh, you hypocrite! Didn't you make an attempt of that character the other day?" He: "Never. Far from having any intention of robbing you of a kiss, I was trying to give you one."

Digitized by Google

The Diplomacy of Sir Dennis.

"What is the matter now?"

Sir Dennis Hawtrey laid down his book, and gazed with mild exasperation at the excited, tearful woman who had just burst into his study. The most peace-loving and easy-going of men, his hard fate had bestowed on him a restless, excitable, nervous wife, who did her best to worry his life out with constant petty grievances.

"It's Hilda," she exclaimed. "To think I have but the one child, and she such a trial, wilful, perverse, idiotic——"

"Compose yourself, my love," gently interposed Sir Dennis. "Your voice is rising to a scream. Pray don't prance about the room. Sit down quietly and tell me what is wrong. Some trifle, as usual, I suppose."

Lady Hawtrey gave a hysterical laugh, and coming to a halt opposite her husband, gasped out, in a voice intended to be calmly ironical, "Oh, yes, a mere trifle. Hilda has just informed me that she is engaged to, and means to marry, a man in a bicycle shop." Then she paused for the expected explosion. None came. Sir Dennis took off his glasses, rubbed them carefully, settled them once more upon his nose, looked placidly at his wife, and uttered a very unemotional "Dear me."

"Is that all you say?" cried Lady Hawtrey. "Hilda! not yet introduced—scarcely eighteen—our only child and heiress—proposes to marry a young man who teaches in a bicycle school, and all you say is, 'dear me.'"

"What did you say?" quietly asked Sir Dennis.

"I told her she was a silly child, and I should send her to a strict school at once, unless she promised to be more sensible. I forbade her to dream of such a thing, or ever to speak to the man again. But she is in open rebellion, says her life's happiness is at stake, and no one shall come between her and her choice. For once you must exert your authority, and act as her father and the head of the family."

"I will," responded Sir Dennis, rather to his wife's surprise. "I have always known the time would come when I should be obliged to take the reins altogether out of your hands, and drive the coach myself. That time has now come." Sir Dennis rose to his feet, and his gentle, weary voice took a commanding ring which was as new as it was disagreeable to his wife. "I forbid you—I repeat, I forbid you to say one harsh word to Hilda, or to have anything whatever to do with this affair. Leave it entirely to me. I will take Hilda in hand."

Lady Hawtrey had always considered her husband a weak, indolent man, who allowed her to govern partly because it saved him trouble, and partly because he recognised in her his superior. This latter idea she now feared was a mistake.

Hilda proved difficult to manage. She had her father's surface pliability with a strong will underneath. Like her father, she never wasted time or strength in argument. She now simply stated that she had fallen in love with Leonard Chandler, and intended to marry him, with or without her parents' consent.

"I have not refused my consent," her father observed. "Your happiness is my first object, and if marriage with this young man will secure it, I will certainly not put any obstacle in your way. Have you considered that the young man is not in your own rank of life?"

Hilda had considered it, but was no believer in rank. Leonard was quite as much of a gentleman as any of the men she had met; indeed, his manners were superior in suavity and courtly grace even to her father's. The distinctions of rank were now obsolete. One peer was a coal merchant, a countess had a shop, a tea-dealer was a baronet, and on quite intimate terms with royalty.

"There is much in what you say, Hilda," replied her father thoughtfully, "and I daresay your mother's prejudices are foolish. Best not discuss the matter with her. Write to Mr. Chandler, asking him to call on me to-morrow afternoon. Meantime, say no more to your mother on the subject."

Lady Hawtrey suffered agonies next day. Scold Hilda or nag her husband she dared not, keep her anger to herself she could not, so she found a safety valve in writing long letters to her dearest friends, hinting at terrible events about to take place in the family. She was thus occupied when her husband strolled into her boudoir, and sat down, remarking casually, "I've just seen young Chandler—Hilda's future husband—you know."

"What, has he dared to approach you?" Lady Hawtrey was beginning, when Sir Dennis interrupted her.

"Florence, if you cannot discuss this matter calmly, I shall not discuss it with you at all. Yes, I know you're her mother and all the rest of it," he added, anticipating the flood of words about to issue from her protesting mouth, "but you are also a tactless and indiscreet woman, and this is a matter which will want the nicest management, the keenest diplomacy to avert disaster. Hilda is difficult to manage, and if you interfere, you'll ruin everything."

Lady Hawtrey gave an indignant snort, but her husband went ruthlessly on: "This fellow is wonderfully handsome, well-educated, and gentlemanly. I don't altogether wonder that a romantic child like Hilda should idealise him into a fairy-prince, but if she's pulled up too sharply, she'll bolt. Chandler's father had a general shop, which the widow carries on, and they are well-to-do people for their station, but of course the lad knows he might as well propose for a royal princess as for Hilda. He spoke quite sensibly, and I could not help seeing that Hilda had—well, made the running, so to speak. He owns it's absurd on the face of it, but he says Hilda loves him, and he won't fail her, which of course means if she wants to run away with him, he's ready."

"Can't you buy him off?" burst in Lady Hawtrey. Her husband shook his head.

"No," he said placidly. "I shan't try. I've given my consent."

Lady Hawtrey gave a yell of dismay.

"Please don't make that disagreeable noise. Hang it all, Florence, you don't suppose I want a grocer's son in the family. Now, look here, I pointed out to him that his present position in life was undesirable, and offered to assist him to a better one."

Lady Hawtrey clasped her hands, and raised her eyes in mute appeal to Heaven.

"And, if he does well," continued Sir Dennis imperturbably, "the marriage will take place next summer—provided Hilda has not changed her mind."

"Changed her mind? Hilda? Why, she's as obstinate as a mule—or yourself."

"Precisely, and if I put this fólly down with a strong hand, there's no knowing what she may do. As it is, I've been so kind, so fatherly, so sympathetic, that they are both on honour to do nothing underhand. Chandler is to be received here, and I must ask you to be gracious to him—civil, at least. No doubt Hilda has confided to him your opinion of the matter, so he won't expect much."

The suggestion of a trip to the Paris Exhibition, which her father made a week later, and which would have delighted her in other circumstances, brought a mutinous little frown to Hilda's brow.

Digitized by Google

"I don't want to leave Leonard," she said, looking defiantly from her mother's compressed lips and flashing eyes to her father's bland countenance. "And I am going to pay a visit this afternoon to Mrs. Chandler. She sent me a kind message by Leonard, saying she never paid visits—I suppose her health is not good—but hoped I would come and see her. And I shall."

"Quite right, my dear," cordially responded Sir Dennis. "And we can put off the Paris trip till you feel inclined for it, so you need not leave Leonard yet awhile."

"You shall not go and visit that woman," burst in Lady Hawtrey, looking dangerous.

"Nonsense, my love, why should not Hilda visit her future relatives?" mildly inquired Sir Dennis. "I will take you there this afternoon, Hilda, if you like."

"Oh, thank you, father; I shall like that!"

"We won't have the carriage, but go on the top of a 'bus, and I'll leave you at the door, and send the carriage for you later. Go and get ready now, dear," he added, as his wife began a furious tirade, addressed partly to Hilda and partly to himself. "Don't interfere, Florence!" he continued, as the door closed behind their daughter. "This visit will be the first shock to Hilda's illusions. The child hasn't an idea where or how these people live. She thinks they have a place like Harrods' Stores, and a private house somewhere. I've been to the shop. It's a mean little place in a dirty back street, and Mrs. Chandler matches it. Whether the mother and sisters are servile or familiar, they'll equally disgust Hilda. I've seen them."

Hilda reappeared, a dainty little figure in her simple but stylish costume, and father and daughter started off together. Hilda always enjoyed her father's society, and this afternoon he was more fascinating than ever, so it was not until they had alighted from the 'bus, and walked some little distance that she noticed her surroundings.

"This isn't at all a nice street!" she observed, looking round her with marked disfavour. Her father made no rejoinder, but chatted gaily on for another ten minutes, when he stopped before a small provision shop, with the remark, "Here we are, my dear!"

Hilda looked at the shop, and then at her father.

"This? This—it—it can't be!" she faltered.

"Yes, dear, it is. There's the name above the door. I see there's no private entrance, so you must go in through the shop. You had better invite the family to dinner. Settle it with Mrs. Chandler, and your mother shall fix a day. Good-bye, dear, the carriage will call for you in about an hour."

Lifting his hat, he walked airily away, leaving his daughter standing transfixed at the shop entrance, a strong perfume of onion, cheese and pickles, saluting her nostrils. As she entered the shop, there issued from the room beyond it a portly, very handsome woman, who came forward, wiping her mouth with her apron, and inquiring, "What might you please to want, miss?"

"I want to see Mrs. Chandler."

"That's me, miss," returned the woman, with a smile which gave her an appalling resemblance to her son.

"I'm—I'm—Hilda—Hilda Hawtrey!" faltered the girl, and her future mother-in-law instantly plunged round the counter at her, folded her in a warm, fat embrace, and said in a voice to match, "You're welcome, my dear, heartily welcome. Come into the parlour, and make acquaintance with the rest of us."

It was five o'clock, and the Chandler family had just sat down to tea, which with them was the chief meal of the day. The 'round table was laden with hot buttered toast, tea-cake, shrimps, ham, watercress, radish, and other good things.

"This is Hildar," said Mrs. Chandler, introducing her young visitor—"Leonard's young lady. These are my girls, dear, Beatrice, Adar, and Maud, and this is my youngest boy, Albert."

The girls, plain likenesses of Leonard, welcomed Hilda with warmth, and rather greasy kisses; Albert, a common-looking lad of eighteen, with a shrimpy, but cordial handshake

"Ain't this comfortable?" beamed Mrs. Chandler, in front of her stout brown tea-pot. "Here's your tea, dear. Pass the cake, Albert. And how's your mar, dear?"

"Very well, thank you," said Hilda mechanically.

"Leonard tells us she's against the match," pursued honest Mrs. Chandler, who was as worthy an old soul as ever served behind the counter, or went every Sunday to chapel; "and, you know, my dear, we can't wonder for you are far above us, though Leonard is a good, well-principled lad, which is better than gold. But our stations is very different, I know."

"Lor', mar!" cried the eldest girl, "how you do go on. Love levels all ranks, we know, and Hildar's got a young gentleman to be proud of. Adar's young gentleman is quite a toff—a clerk in a very big place of business, but he don't look down upon Adar because her mar's in a very small way."

"Well, now, Beatrice, that's quite different," replied the mother. "Trade is trade, whether large or small, but Hildar here is in quite a different spear. She is an aristocrat."

"'The rank is but a guinea stamp a man's a man for a' that!'" suddenly spouted Albert, so unexpectedly that Hilda, who sat next him, quite jumped.

"Yes, and Miss Evans, my teacher at school," chimed in Maud, a pert, plain girl of about fourteen, "says that distinctions of rank are quite obsolete now. It's only education that counts nowadays. An educated chimney sweep is the equal of a duke, Miss Evans says."

"Then Miss Evans is a fool!" broke in Ada, sharply. "Fancy a chimney sweep being my equal! No, but a lady is a lady; you can't be more than that. I'm a lady, and Hildar's a lady, so it's ridiculous to say we ain't equals!"

"I wish you'd stop talking nonsense, and leave this poor child in peace!" said the mother, whom Hilda regarded as the only person of common sense in the party. "Can't you find something pleasanter to talk about than Miss Evans and her silly ideas? Leonard will be home soon, now, dear," she added kindly to Hilda, "and then you shall have the best parlour to yourselves for a bit. You'll want to do some spooning, I know."

Hilda murmured something inarticulate, and the conversation went on round her full of jokes and allusions which were Greek to the girl from another world.

"I'm going to have a new dress, Hildar!" Beatrice suddenly called out. "Can you tell me what is being worn most just now?"

"This, I believe," faltered Hilda, indicating her own dress. Beatrice threw a scornful glance at her.

"That? Why, I call that downright dowdy!" she cried, and plunged into a discussion with her sisters upon the prevailing fashions. Hilda felt as if in a nightmare. How came she in this stuffy shop-parlour, with these common, vulgar girls, this underbred lad, this kind, but terribly cook-like old woman? Could she ever marry the son and brother of these people? The mere idea of ever meeting them again made her shiver, and she hailed the sound of carriage-wheels as a shipwrecked mariner might hail the sight of a sail.

It was a very meek, dejected little Hilda who entered her parents' presence an hour later, and went swiftly up to her father.

"Take me away, father," she said, in a low, repressed tone, "to Paris—anywhere. Say what you like to Leonard Chandler, only never let me see him or hear his name again. Promise me I shall not!"

And Sir Dennis carefully kept all signs of joy or triumph from face and voice as he gave the desired assurance.

Vera Serkoff.

"How I Chaperoned Belinda."

This is the title of a remarkable series of true Society stories, which commences in Short Stories on Tuesday, November 4th.

Digitized by Google

A Cooking Secret.

Mr. E. Conomie: "Did you write to that man who advertises to show people how to make puddings without milk, and have them richer?" Mrs. E. Conomie: "Yes, and sent him the shilling." "What did he reply?" "Use cream."

He Found Her Dear too.

"Old fellow, I'm engaged to Miss Dashe. She's a dear girl." "She is so. She cost me about £100 the time I was engaged to her."

The Modern Engagement.

Young Man: "May I present myself as a suitor for your hand?" Maiden: "I am sorry to disappoint you, but the fact is, I betrothed myself to-day to another." Young Man: "Well, what about to-morrow?"

A Protection against Thieves.

A.: "Why, man, all your shop-girls are squint-eyed! Can't you manage to obtain a prettier set?" B.: "I have got these as a protection against shop-lifters. The scamps will never know where the girls are looking!"

A Case of Heredity.

Bertha: "Sometimes you appear really manly, and sometimes you are absolutely effeminate. How do you account for it?" Harold: "I suppose it is hereditary. Half my ancestors were males and the other half females."

Quite Unfair.

Mrs. Potts: "Just to think of you talking to me in such a style. You used to vow I was an angel." Mr. Potts: "Look here, my dear, that isn't fair; you know it isn't. What is the use of twitting a man about the lies he told fifteen years ago?"

A Pleasant Task.

He: "My dear Miss Golding, I should love to assist you in performing all the tasks that fall to your lot." She: "Oh, I have no tasks. I've nothing to do but sit and hold my hands." He: "Well, I should like to assist you in doing even that much."

A Difference of Years.

Miss Fourthseason: "Mr. Fledgely proposed to me last night." Miss Stinger: "Did you accept him?" Miss Fourthseason: "No, he is so young, I promised to wait a few years, however." Miss Stinger: "So nice of you, dear! He is younger than you, of course, now, but in a year or two he won't be."

Not even Cracked.

Clare was perched upon the fence-post, swinging her chubby legs and singing at the top of her sound little lungs. "Be careful, Clare," said I, as I passed; "you might fall and break your bones. I'm afraid you'll get hurt." "Oh, don't be 'fraid," she answered, reassuringly; "I did fall yesterday, and I never even cracked."

A Pleasure Lost.

Ethel: "What are you so angry about to-night?" Maud: "I've received a note from Jack saying that he's engaged to Clara Beachly." Ethel: "Well, I should think that would relieve your mind rather than make you angry. You were engaged to Tom Shore and intended to throw Jack over." Maud: "Yes, goosey, but do you think I wanted to lose the fun of throwing him over?"

What He Found.

Mr. Crossly: "I tell you before I go that I want beer for dinner, and when I get home what do I find?" Mrs. Crossly: "Fault, every time."

An Artful Miss.

She: "If you should attempt to kiss me I would call mamma." He: "And what would happen then?" She: "Oh, nothing, for mamma isn't at home."

Answered.

He: "If I should ask you to marry me, what would you say?" She: "Guess." He: "Well—er—what would it rhyme with?" She: "Guess."

Hope for Him.

He: "I shall never marry until I meet a woman who is my direct opposite." She (encouragingly): "Well, Mr. Duffer, there are numbers of intelligent girls in this neighbourhood."

How He Knew.

Arthur: "That's a newly married couple. He is always stepping on her dress." Bert: "What does that prove?" Arthur: "After he has been married some time, and found out what a dress costs, he will be more careful."

That Young Brother Again.

Little Johnny: "I'd a good deal rather have you callin' on sister than Mr. Nicefellow." Sister's Admirer (delighted): "Would you? Why?" Little Johnny: "'Cause whenever Mr. Nicefellow calls he stuffs up the keyhole."

No Need for Worry.

Mr. Nuwed (gloomily): "My salary has been cut down ten per cent." Mrs. Nuwed (cheerily): "Oh! don't worry about that, dear. Silk, Ribbon and Co. are advertising perfectly lovely things at a reduction of twenty per cent."

A Large Order.

Happy Bridegroom: "Waiter, I want a dinner for two." Waiter: "Vil ze lady and gentleman haf table d'hôte or à la carte?" Happy Bridegroom (generous to a fault, but weak in French): "Bring us some of both, and put lots of gravy on 'em."

Needed Lots of Support.

Father (sternly): "That is all very well, young man, but can you support my daughter?" Son-in-law: "Oh, yes, fairly well—that is to say, I can support her for an hour or two, but I begin to get tired after that. She's thundering heavy, you know."

But the Donkey didn't See it.

She: "You know, Reggie, that girls are being called by the names of the flowers now, and my sister suggested that I should be called Thistle." Reggie: "Oh, yes, I see; because you are so sharp?" She: "Oh, no; she said it was because a donkey loved me."

Pronunciation.

"George," said a girl the other night, "here's a piece in the paper headed 'Kismet.' What does Kismet mean?" "The word must be pronounced with the 't' silent, Nettie," replied George. "Why, that would be 'Kiss me,'" said Nettie. "With the greatest pleasure," replied George. And he did.

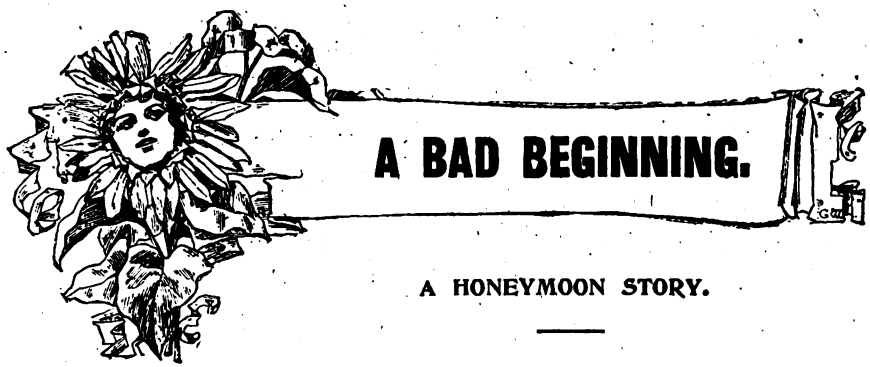
A Reformation Quelled.

"Look here," said the reforming husband, "we must have things arranged in this house so that we shall know just where everything is kept." "With all my heart," sweetly answered his wife, "and let us begin with your late hours, my love. I should dearly love to know where they are kept." He lets things run on as usual.

Her Code of Signals.

Caller: "Why are you waving your handkerchief so wildly?" Murilla: "Since papa has forbidden Jack the house we have arranged a code of signals." Caller: "What is it?" Murilla: "When he waves his handkerchief five times that means, 'Do you love me?' and when I wave frantically in reply it means, 'Yes, darling.'"

Digitized by Google



A BAD BEGINNING.

A HONEYMOON STORY.

"You'll be good to her, Spencer?"

"Good to Dora? Could I be anything else?"

"Yes, my dear boy, I believe you will, but you must forgive if a mother's feelings get the better of her on such an occasion as this, when her daughter—her only child—is going across the sea out of her sight."

"Of course! I quite understand. But look over there at Dora, saying good-bye to her bridesmaids; she doesn't look as if she had any fear for the future, does she?"

"No, I suppose she doesn't; and if she believes in you, so will I!"

"That's more like it," said Spencer Braithwaite, who, to tell the truth, was disposed to look upon his newly-acquired mother-in-law as a bit of a bore. "Dora and I will get along all right, for though I'd far rather live for her, I'd willingly die for her, if it would do her any good."

Spencer Braithwaite and Dora Drew had that morning been joined in the holy bonds of matrimony, and as the bridegroom's business interests demanded his immediate presence in Johannesburg, the happy pair had decided to regard the voyage to Cape Town in the light of a honeymoon.

Mrs. Drew, the four bridesmaids, and one or two personal friends of the bridegroom, had accompanied the couple to Southampton, whence the Walmer Castle was to sail at four o'clock.

Dora was one of those fragile little creatures, such as Dickens has made David Copperfield's first love. She adored her husband, mainly because he plainly let her see that he knew of her craving for the protection of a strong heart and arm, and would never let her lack it.

But it must be confessed that Spencer Braithwaite's claim to the possession of such strength, was, to say the least, problematical. He was—and he knew it—a highly nervous man, a man who, place him in a false position, would inevitably lose his head.

So long as he was a bachelor, this did not matter much; but with a wife to look after, who found it more than difficult to look after herself, there was evidently trouble in store for him.

The moment came for parting. "Strangers for the shore," sounded from end to end of the big liner, and the bridesmaids and Mrs. Drew only waited for the bridegroom's friends, who were having a "farewell" symposium in the saloon.

This was Dora's first experience of an ocean voyage, and it must be admitted that she looked forward to it with a certain amount of dread. Spencer did his best to allay her fears, and so far succeeded as to prevail upon her to keep the deck and watch the scenery.

He himself felt inclined for an adjournment to the smoke-room, for a restful cigar after the labours of the day.

She was disposed to be a little tearful at his implied desertion of her, but on his promise of a return after his first "weed," surrendered at discretion, and sought consolation in Marie Corelli's latest.

The trip was absolutely uneventful until Madeira was reached.

It is not usual for the African liners to stay long off the island, but, by a trick of fate, an accident to the screw shaft necessitated anchoring, and a delay of twelve hours or more.

"Will you come ashore for an hour or two, darling?" said Spencer.

"Oh, no, no!" replied Dora, with a pretty shriek. "I wouldn't go in one of those horrid little boats for anything, and I hope you won't, Spencer!"

"My darling! I don't want to cause you any anxiety on my account; but I've promised the doctor, and Captain Maskell (one of the passengers), to go and explore Funchal. Why won't you come? The boat is quite safe."

"It is very unkind of you to leave me, Spencer. How am I to know but that you may be stabbed, or something, by one of those dreadful-looking Portuguese!"

"Nonsense, my love! The boatmen are as harmless as—as I am."

"Well, I shall not have a minute's peace till you return, and I will not speak another word to Captain Maskell for the rest of the voyage."

It was, of course, very unkind of him, in his character of newly-married man, but what would you do? A bestowal of her in a cosy corner, a kiss, and a solemn declaration that he would be at her side again before she had finished half-a-dozen chapters of Marie Corelli, and he left her for the shore, fully intending to more than make up to her for the seeming neglect.

Except in the case of a stranger, there is not much to be seen in Funchal, therefore Spencer Braithwaite had but poor excuse for his dereliction from matrimonial duty. He knew it well, having often touched at Madeira in the course of his South African trips. During the late war, these expeditions had been suspended, so that he was glad to renew his acquaintance with the members of the British Club in Funchal.

Had this been all, everything would have been well.

"Ah, Braithwaite, glad to see you! Where have you been this age, old chap?"

Thus Arthur Ponsonby, Acting British-Consul, and an old friend of our new bridegroom.

A bottle of champagne; a brief explanation; and, on the announcement of the late wedding, profuse congratulations.

"Never thought you a marrying man, Braithwaite. Why didn't you bring Mrs. B. ashore with you?"

"She's nervous; very. Never been on the sea before; and she's frightened at the natives."

"That's bad; but I say, old fellow, do you remember the Señora?"

"The Señora? Oh, yes. She's married again, I suppose, by this time."

"Not a bit of it! Here, I'll tell you something. Do you know she's waiting for you. Ha! Ha! Ha!"

"Don't be idiotic, Ponsonby! Waiting for me. Why, what would Mrs. Braithwaite say if she heard you?"

"Oh! I expect you would have a sultry quarter of an hour, my boy! But seriously, old chap, she has delayed her return to Madrid, solely because of you."

"But it's too absurd."

"Would you like to see her?"

"Not for worlds!"

"Well, you saw me give that message to the waiter just after you came in, didn't you? I'm very sorry, but had I known of Mrs. Braithwaite's existence I wouldn't have done it—I really wouldn't!"

"What on earth do you mean?" queried Spencer, in a fever of apprehension.

"Why, I sent to tell her you were here."

Digitized by Google

"You did?"

"Yes, and you may bet that, before many more minutes, she will be at the door inquiring for you."

Spencer Braithwaite was a fairly brave man, as men go; but this information completely took every ounce of spirit out of him.

"I haven't a minute to spare!" he gasped, as he consulted his watch. "I must get back to the ship!"

"But you have to wait here for the doctor, and your military friend!"

"I can't wait. I shall get on board at once! Why, that horrible Spanish woman would seize me and marry me in spite of myself! And what would become of—of Mrs. Braithwaite?"

"Very well, then, aboard it is. I'll come down to the landing-place, and see you safe on board the lugger."

In less than five minutes, the almost demented Braithwaite and his friend were within sight of the anchored liner.

"There's a boat pulling shorewards," said Ponsonby. "The passenger won't have much time ashore, I'm thinking."

Spencer was too occupied with his own affairs to worry about other folks, and never rested till he was safe in a boat and on his way to the Walmer Castle.

Springing up the side, the first thing he heard was the hoarse order to "up anchor."

"You're only just in time," said the doctor, who met him as he stepped on deck.

"Why, how long have you been aboard?" asked the bewildered Spencer.

"Half-an-hour; the repair has been done sooner than was expected, and I was signalled for. I hadn't time to let you know; in fact, thought your friend the Consul would tell you."

"Oh, well it doesn't matter, so long as I've caught her!"

"Caught her? Oh, the ship! I thought you meant Mrs. Braithwaite."

"Mrs. Braithwaite?"

"Yes. Don't you know?"

"Know what, in Heaven's name?"

"Why, that Mrs. Braithwaite, out of her mind almost because you did not seem likely to be back before the ship sailed, took a boat which happened to be alongside, and——"

"Yes! Yes!"

"Went ashore after you."

Spencer Braithwaite sank down on the nearest deck-chair, and for a space was speechless. When he could collect himself a bit it was to find that the Walmer Castle was leaving Madeira well behind at the rate of a good sixteen knots an hour.

The Captain and the doctor tried their best to comfort him, assuring him that his wife would without doubt seek the Consul's aid to get sent on by the next steamer, which would be in a few days.

"But she's like a child!" groaned the wretched husband, "she has no more idea of getting on without me than a baby."

"Oh, come, come!" said the skipper. "Mrs. Braithwaite will pull through all night."

"You'll get a cable from her as soon as we make Simon's Bay, depend upon it."

He was obliged to be content with this cold consolation, and could only pray that Ponsonby, if, as she probably would, she applied to him for assistance in her extremity, would not drop a whisper even of Señora Ajanda.

Possessing his soul, therefore, with the best patience he could until they were in sight of Table Mountain, Spencer stood fixed by the gangway watching the snorting little steam pinnace making its way to the steamer with letters and news.

He was the first to speak to the official as he touched the deck.

"My name's Braithwaite—Spencer Braithwaite—have you a cable message for me?"

"One moment, sir, please; if you'll come to the saloon, I'll see."

Hardly able to control himself, Spencer followed the speaker to the saloon, and waited.

"Yes, sir, a cable message, as you say," handing it to the eagerly expectant man.

Tearing it open, he read that which turned him into stone.

"Am staying with the Señora Ajanda till next steamer sails. You are a bad man. My heart is nearly broken."

"I'll kill Ponsonby!" were his first words when he came to himself.

She knew it all! His former flirtation with the Señora! But what could the two be concocting together? He felt his brain would go, if he thought much more about it.

* * * * *

It was a wreck of a man that wandered restlessly about the quay at Cape Town on the day when the next boat was expected.

Every suspicion of smoke in the distance made him shake as with ague.

He was in the dark with regard to much, but knew quite enough to cause him to fear the worst.

Should he go out to meet the steamer? Yes, he would, and as at that moment she was signalled, he made arrangements with the harbour-master, an old friend, to allow him to go in the medical officer's boat, which was then getting up steam.

How he made that journey he doesn't know to this day. He only knows that, when within hail of the liner, he saw by the rail on the hurricane deck a little face, and a little hand waving a tiny pocket handkerchief, that he felt, somehow, that hope was not quite dead for him.

"Spencer! I'm up here!" cried a joyous little voice, as he sprang on the deck.

Up the companion he tore, and, oblivious of passengers and deck-hands, received into his arms his Dora.

"But I know why you were so long gone," she said, with a mock frown, and pushing him away from her.

"You know?"

"Yes, the Señora told me."

"The Señora told you."

"Yes. You sent to say you had arrived for an hour, and would like to see her."

"I will certainly kill Ponsonby," muttered Spencer.

"And"—here she glanced mischievously at him—"I am not surprised, for I think she is about the very nicest woman I ever met in my life."

At this moment the Señora came up.

"Señor Braithwaite," she said, holding out her hand, "I only made this journey in order to see your little wife safe into your hands. But I am very glad to see you."

He didn't know what to say, beyond pressing the Señora to come and pass a week with them in Cape Town before they started for Johannesburg.

"No, no! I go back to-morrow by the Walmer Castle, to Madeira first, and then to Spain. You two will have much to talk about and to explain."

They could not persuade her, and were bound, on the whole, to admit that she was right.

"You must never be so foolish again, darling," he said after dinner that evening.

"Well, I don't think it was exactly foolish, dear," she answered him, "because if I had not been left behind you would, and then——"

"Well?"

"I should never have known the Señora."

Ralph Enderby.

Mrs. Wickwire: "From the happy expression you had when Mrs. Potts was singing one might imagine that you enjoyed that sort of thing. You don't break out into happy smiles over my singing." Mr. Wickwire: "I wasn't smiling over her singing. I was just thinking how lucky I was that she belonged to Potts instead of myself."

Digitized by Google

The . . . Plan that Went Agley.

An Old-World Story of the Time of King Charles.

"So your father wishes to marry you to this new Court star!" cried Miss Betty Mance, to her cousin, the Lady Susan Whitley. "You must tell me all about it, cousin."

The Lady Susan frowned slightly.

"Sir Reginald Moscombe met our King during a hunt in the northern country, and King Charles took a liking to him and invited him to Court. He has won praise on all hands since he has been in the capital, and my father thinks he would be a good match. The King let fall some words to this effect while speaking to my father. I have, so far, run counter to the wishes of my respected parent, by declining the suitors he has put forward, and I doubt me that this time it will be the same!"

"You have the reputation of being——" began Miss Betty; but a little cough seized her very conveniently, and instead of adding "a coquette," she substituted, "hard to please."

"I should like to have speech with this Sir Reginald without his knowing that 'twas I," observed the Lady Susan thoughtfully. "A mere whim, perhaps, but one that I would fain gratify! Is it a possibility, cousin? You are ever ready with suggestions."

Miss Betty Mance, thus flattered, assumed a thoughtful expression.

"I have it!" she cried, after a pause. "You are going to the Duchess' masked ball at the Gardens, and 'tis certain that he will be there. Contrive that he shall wear a bow that you will recognise, and let it be known to him that you will be dressed in certain fashion, and will wear a rose near the left shoulder. Then get someone to dress like you; that someone will wear the rose, but you will have the same dress and no rose. 'Twill be easy for you to have speech of him; he may think that you have forgotten the rose or have taken it off, and you can arrange with your double to hand the rose to you during the evening if you find that he is agreeable, this Sir Reginald, and you desire more of his society."

"Yes!" exclaimed Lady Susan, pleased with the suggestion. "Your plan lacks detail, but I can arrange that. But who is to play the double? You are not going to the ball, and others are either not near enough to my build, or might decline the exchange of parts and seek to captivate him for themselves."

"Would that much matter?" inquired Miss Betty demurely, although inwardly she was vastly amused at this unexpected turn. It would be amusing to see the coquette caught or worsted by another woman!

"Send your new serving maid, Sophie," suggested her cousin.

"Sophie is a jade who requires to be humbled!" declared the Lady Susan spitefully. "She might try the effect of her child's face on him, though, as she must have done on Lord Cathcart when he called to see me, or he would not have attempted to kiss her."

"I thought that Sophie resisted, and struck him for what she called his insolence. A fine word to address to your betters, I must say!" said Miss Betty. "It shows that her present position has not brought her to a proper and respectful frame of mind."

"Her resistance was feigned!" said the Lady Susan decisively, and with a malicious ring in her voice. "Feigned because I saw the little play! Yet I like the notion of sending her! She could act the part well, for she was a somebody before her father's estates were confiscated and he had to flee the country! It would serve to humble her—to be among the gentlefolks as she once was in the north, and yet to remember that she is but a servant. I'll do it!"

As Miss Betty Mance quitted her uncle's mansion she felt just a touch of pity for Sophie Carlton. She knew her cousin's jealous, spiteful nature, and she knew that Sophie's face was far prettier than her mistress'. Lord Cathcart had been regarded as an eligible, and the Lady Susan had favoured his suit in a lofty manner till the nobleman, struck by the charm and beauty of the maid's face, had forgotten his dignity and honour and had endeavoured to kiss Sophie. The Lady Susan could have pardoned a step from the right path such as the kissing of a maid, for the times were not so decorous then, but she could not forgive either him or Sophie for the superior beauty of the maid. She dismissed Lord Cathcart, but she retained Sophie in her service that she might make her punishment more lasting.

The Lady Susan sat for a time in silence developing the plan. Sophie would not allow her face to be seen—that was a great relief, so that Sir Reginald, if he were inclined to be led away, would not have the temptation. Finally she summoned her maid.

Sophie Carlton entered demurely. Her sweet countenance wore a somewhat sad expression and the rosy lips were compressed. Yet it was a face that could be full of vivacity under happier conditions; the eyes could be sympathetically soft or could blaze with anger. There was a grace about her movements that attracted one's attention immediately. The Lady Susan's face grew hard as she looked at the girl; there was only three years difference in their ages, yet Sophie was so fresh of complexion compared with her mistress that the latter had to stifle the thought that arose in her mind—Sophie was the superior of the two!

Briefly, and in a tone of command, the Lady Susan told the girl what she desired to have done, giving all details save the name of the man, who would, in all probability, address her as Lady Susan Whitley. All that Sophie was permitted to know was that he was a Court favourite.

"You will answer him very briefly, so that you do not betray yourself, and you will watch me for the signal to leave. Your part will be a short one, for he will come to me on missing you; and I can have speech with him while he is trying to discover whether I am the Lady Susan and have lost my rose. And if he does not please me, I can pretend—— Yes, that will do!"

Digitized by Google

Sophie Carlton demurred to taking part in the scheme; but her faint protest raised such a storm that she decided to yield.

Once outside the apartment, she burst into tears.

"Why is Fate so cruel to me that my father is unjustly suspected of treason, and I am reduced to the necessity of serving this woman as a maid?" she sobbed. "She is continually subjecting me to indignities; and yet, if I leave her, who will take me? To save myself from starvation I should see myself compelled to marry some rough, vulgar retainer. Oh, no! I must bear it yet awhile, and perhaps justice will come!"

She dried her eyes and went about her work. After all, she would be doing no harm by acting as her mistress' double, and that was no worse, regarded as work, than she had to do every day!

The night of the masked ball arrived and the Gardens were filled with a gay crowd of men and women, all intent on enjoyment. The King was there, it was whispered, and a certain figure was pointed out as that of the ruler called the Merry Monarch, but who was, in more private life, a somewhat sad man. Sophie was set down at the Gardens by one of the family coaches and conducted into the Gardens by Lord Whitley, who had reluctantly agreed to his daughter's proposition. The Lady Susan was to arrive later.

Sophie Carlton felt strangely out of place, and shrank from the remarks addressed to her by certain revellers; but she mustered her courage on Lord Whitley's leaving her, and walked straight to the spot where she understood, the unknown gallant would be found. She thought she espied him, and then she pretended to be going in another direction, according to instructions. She was trembling with suppressed agitation, and nearly uttered a nervous cry when a hand was placed on her arm.

"May I have the honour and pleasure of escorting the Lady Susan Whitley through the Gardens and claiming a dance with her?" asked the unknown in a melodious voice.

Sophie started, and her head seemed to swim. Her tongue clung to the roof of her mouth, and she could not speak. That voice! She had just sufficient presence of mind to bow, and the stranger offered his arm. Sophie was glad of the support.

The young baronet was somewhat at a loss to account for the silence of Lady Susan. He had heard so much about her that he was prepared for a different reception. He had not wished to accept the honour of being the companion of this young Court dame, but he had been persuaded into it. The King had thrown out a hint, and he should act upon it.

"It is an honour to be so favoured!" he remarked gallantly. He said it tamely; he felt that he was not accustomed to make use of Court flattery; and, moreover, he feared that the Lady Susan would compare him with others, to his disadvantage. "Would you rather join the gay throng?"

"No, no! I would rather keep away from them!" the girl cried hurriedly. "Oh, what have I done?" she murmured inaudibly. "I have betrayed myself!"

At the sound of her voice, altered as it was by agitation, Sir Reginald Moscombe started and stopped short in his walk. Grasping her tightly by the arm, he stood directly in front of her, his eyes fixed on her mask as though he would try to see beneath it.

"Who is it? The voice is that of the woman I have been seeking for months!" he declared, his breath coming quick and fast with excitement. "It is not the Lady Susan Whitley. Sophie, it is you!"

No answer. The masked face near his own was turned downwards, as if to avoid his ardent gaze.

"Come with me!" His voice was slightly hoarse with emotion. "Come into the shadow!"

She could not resist. He took her to a secluded spot within a clump of trees, lighted by the full moon which was shining gloriously above them.

"Sophie, I have found you! Remove your mask and let me gaze on your sweet face once more. See!" He removed his own mask, revealing his handsome features. "It is I—Reginald!"

(Continued on next page.)

When Should a Woman do Her Shopping?

Should a woman do her shopping, in the morning, during the afternoon, or should it be delayed till the lamps are lighted, and the evening shadows have merged into the blackness of night? Sometimes the latter course is the only one available on account of illness; but Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness will save women this inconvenience, because they have the power to restore you to health, as they did Mrs. M. A. Jones, of 35 Trafford Street, Hulme.

"My weakness after an attack of influenza," she said to a Manchester Chronicle reporter, "was inconceivable, being increased, no doubt, by my years. I had little appetite for anything. I tried all sorts of nourishment, but I made no progress. I was compelled to move about with the greatest care lest faintness overtook me as a result of the exhaustion. My knees were weak, and I felt perfectly miserable. I suffered terribly from sleeplessness, and with such a succession of weary, restless nights, there was a very remote chance of my strength returning. Many days I was so done up that I could not stir out to do my shopping till eventide. My case seemed hopeless. Being a member of the Radnor Street Wesleyan Chapel, I had a large number of friends coming to see me, and they together with the pastor, gave me up and said I should not pull through.

"I remained in that pitiable plight until I heard of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. I went in for a course. The result was amazing! First of all, I began to get more sleep, and on a morning awoke thoroughly refreshed. Throughout the day I did not experience any more of that tired, weary feeling I used to have, and ever since I have been a stranger to it. The weakness left my knees, and instead of hobbling about, I was soon able to move with comfort. In fact, after a little while, I was quite cured. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are unequalled for sleeplessness, debility, indigestion, headache, dizziness, constipation, piles, liver and kidney troubles, anæmia, female ailments, colds, chills, rheumatism, and as a preventative of influenza. All chemists sell Bile Beans, or they may be obtained post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co, 119 and 120 London Wall, London, E.C., for prices one and three-halfpence, or two and nine.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The Birkbeck Almanack, with full particulars, post free

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MACKINTOSH'S

IS DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

PUREST OF THE PURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

TURN AT ONCE TO THE SERIAL COMPETITION ON PAGE 527 AND WIN A GRAMOPHONE.

Her head drooped, and she made no effort to take off the mask. With deft fingers he performed the task for her, and raised her downcast face to his.

"It is my own Sophie!" he cried rapturously. "Found at last!" He kissed the rosy lips passionately. "What, tears? Tears of joy, I doubt not! But why have you hidden your sweet face from me for all these months?"

She was in his arms, and, unmindful of the fact that others might approach, she yielded to her emotions and allowed him to strain her to his breast and kiss her again and again.

"Dry those tears, my sweet Sophie, and tell me how it is that you fled from me and why I find you here in the character of the Lady Susan Whitley. There is some mystery which you must explain. We must assume our masks once more and move among the throng. There is to be a dance and we will dance together again as we did in the old home!"

"When my father was unjustly accused, all his friends seem to have thought him guilty and turned coldly from me. His estates confiscated, where could I go? You were away, and I feared that you would share the general opinion. Your prolonged absence confirmed my fear. Even if you held a different opinion, you would not care to marry the daughter of a supposed traitor, lest you were condemned as an accomplice. So I fled to London—oh, the horror of the journey!—and I entered the service of the Lady Susan Whitley as a—as a serving maid!"

They were just leaving the shadow of the trees, but Sir Reginald caught her in his arms compassionately and kissed her.

Encouraged by his sympathy, she told him of her life with the Lady Susan, the indignities she had to bear, and the command of her mistress that she should impersonate the Lady Susan. And then a touch of jealousy seized her.

"I did not know 'twas you whom I had to meet," she said, with a strange quiver. "I fear that I am not to be compared with the Lady Susan, and that I have spoilt your pleasure, for you are——"

"Sophie!" The tone was so full of reproach that she cried for forgiveness at once. "I came against my will, because they said that the King had hinted something," he continued. "I have sought you since my return to England, but could find no clue. I took the opportunity to come to London, because it was rumoured that you had come to this great city, but I could not find you. I have taken advantage of a show of favour from the King to plead for your father, and, I hope, with some chance of success. Thus have I shown my love for you. Do you doubt me?"

"Oh, no! Forgive me! I was so miserable, I have been so unhappy!"

He stopped as though he would embrace her again, but they were now in full view and he was forced to renounce the intention.

"Let us have a dance. See, they are forming couples on the platform!" he cried, hurrying her forward.

They passed close to a group of men and women, and one of the latter touched Sophie as she passed and uttered the injunction "Leave!" It was the Lady Susan.

"I cannot dance with you, Reginald!" said Sophie anxiously. "The Lady Susan has just whispered that I must leave!"

"I noticed a figure dressed like yourself," said the baronet calmly. "Well, she must wait! She played a trick on me and also on you, and now we will repay her! Yet we ought to be grateful, for by her plotting she has brought us together! Come, the dance is beginning! Forget the past and be happy—with me!"

"You will fall into disgrace if you are known to dance with me, a traitor's daughter!" faltered Sophie.

"Tut, tut! Does love care for that? I will marry you whatever befall!"

He swung her along, and in a moment they were whirling round in the midst of the dancers to the strains of a fashionable dance of the period. Sophie forgot all her misery in the delights of that dance with her lover, and both the young people were oblivious of the malignant glances cast at them by the Lady Susan, who was beside herself with rage at the disobedience of her maid.

"May I claim the honour of the next dance with the Lady Susan Whitley?" asked a voice by her side.

"Mr. Downes!" she exclaimed. "How fortunate that you recognised me and that you are here! Betty has told you about it? You can help me?"

"I am at your service!" was the reply.

"I wish to separate those two, you know whom I mean! Take me to them when the dance is finished and engage her!"

"You might think it a pity to part them if you had seen and heard what I saw and heard yonder!" he asserted, with a malicious twinkle in his eyes which she could not see.

He related to the Lady Susan some portion of the scene within the clump of trees, and his companion was furious.

"I knew not that she was the daughter of a traitor!" she cried. "These small plots do not always come to our knowledge when they are hatched in the provinces; they are kept secret for reasons of State. Now, you must help me!" she continued imperiously. "She will soon go to my carriage in order to return. You must arrange that she be carried off and sent away. Keep her anywhere out of his reach and marry her, if it please you, to some varlet. As for him, we will upset him! He will be accused of conspiring through her with her father, and her disappearance will confirm the suspicion. That will be the end of his career as a Court favourite!"

"The plan falls in with my views," observed Mr. Downes, "provided that I reap some benefit! I do not see any provision for my benefit in your scheme yet, my lady!"

"I will ask my father to help you, if you require some mark of favour!"

"Good!" he responded. "A knighthood! Betty longs for a title, and she may e'en marry another if I do but get one. It is a bargain!"

At the conclusion of the dance, however, the plotters missed their prey. They sought the lovers for some minutes before making their way to the entrance. Lady Susan had an idea that Sophie would get Reginald to conduct her to the Lady Susan's carriage. Mr. Downes ascertained that the Whitley carriage was still waiting and returned to tell the Lady Susan this important fact.

He had left her with some others who had made themselves known, and on returning he found her with the man whom he knew to be Sir Reginald Moscombe.

"I fear that someone has been playing a sorry joke on you, Sir Reginald, during the past hour!" she declared, "and you have been attentive to an impostor." She spoke sweetly, and Downes understood that she had given up the original plan of having a chat with Sir Reginald without his being aware of her identity.

"She is bent on her plot!" muttered Downes. "She can be a demon if she likes, and I should not like to fall into her clutches. I doubt me if it is safe to aid her, and yet the knighthood is worth a little risk!" Approaching her, he contrived to whisper in her ear that Sophie had not yet left the Gardens.

"Watch for her!" was the whispered reply, while Sir Reginald was looking aside. "Don't fail me!"

Downes returned to the entrance and requisitioned the services of four men on whom he could rely. The coachman knew him and was prepared to do his bidding. Then he waited for the figure to appear.

The coach had been sent a short distance away, so that the would-be rider would have to look for it. It was an hour later before Downes observed the masked figure emerge and look about; she wore no rose, and he chuckled.

Digitized by Google

A Famous Specialist on the Permanent Cure of Obesity.

Just as the name of some great physician or surgeon springs to the mind when some particular disease or class of disease is mentioned, so when the word "Corpulency" is uttered, the name of Mr. F. Cecil Russell comes to mind on the instant. Not that that well-known authority looks upon obesity as a disease, however; but his name, as that of the most successful of specialists in the treatment of obesity, is inseparately connected with that branch of the curative art.

If any of our stout readers wish to know what Mr. Russell has accomplished in this direction, and by what particular methods, let that reader at once write him at Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C. (enclosing three penny stamps), for a copy of the nineteenth edition of his standard work, entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," an admirably lucid treatise of 256 pages. Our reader's effort in making the application will be amply rewarded.

"Corpulency and the Cure"* goes at once to the root of the matter and tells all about the various causes of obesity. It then deals in extenso with its cure, and explains the radical differences between the "Russell" treatment and the many other treatments, British and Continental, which have met with but partial success where they have not failed altogether. As an indisputable proof of the harmlessness of the treatment, Mr. Russell publishes the receipt of the liquid vegetable compound upon which he chiefly relies as a reductive agent. By this, also, it will be seen that the purely herbal ingredients of the mixture are quite innocuous. By Mr. Russell's method it is clearly proved that a person, however stout, may regain normal dimensions and weight with ease and safety, and without any racking and exhausting purgatives or any needlessly severe exercise. Only a little prudence and care is required, and the decrease of fat goes on naturally but perceptibly at the rate of from ½lb. to 2lb. daily until the desired condition is reached, when the treatment may be set aside with no fear of a recurrence of obesity if only ordinary hygienic rules are observed. This most important feature of the treatment stands out very prominently in the hundreds of extracts from patients' letters which the author has thought fit to incorporate in his book. Moreover, whenever the matter of general health is mentioned the patient is usually enthusiastic. The truth is that the "Russell" treatment—or rather the principal compound employed—is a splendid tonic, improving appetite and aiding the organs of digestion and assimilation, so that a larger amount of wholesome food is required and taken and new muscular tissue is formed in place of the unhealthy adipose which is being steadily destroyed and eliminated. However looked upon, the system is sound and admirable, and "Corpulency and the Cure," with its mass of well-arranged facts and figures must of necessity appeal to any reader possessing the logical faculty.

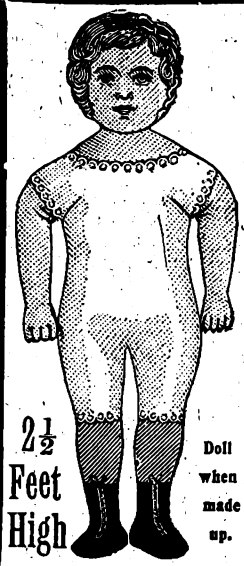
 A Copy of "Corpulency and the Cure" will be sent under plain sealed envelope to readers of "Short Stories," who will forward their address, with three penny stamps, to the Author,*

F. CECIL RUSSELL,

Woburn House, Store St., Bedford Square, London, W.C.

All correspondence regarded as strictly confidential.

Digitized by Google



LIFE-SIZE DOLL FREE!

"Baby's Clothes will now fit Dollie."

GIRLS can get this beautiful Life-size Doll absolutely free for selling only ten packages of the Electric Polishing Fabric, at 6d. a package. Something new for cleaning and polishing Jewellery, Silver Ware, &c., without the use of powder, paste, or liquid. Sells at sight. Write to day, and we will send you the Fabric post paid. When sold send us the money (5s.) and we will send you post free this Life-size Doll, which is 2½ft. high, and can wear baby's clothes. When stuffed, this doll is an exact reproduction in fast colours of a hand-painted French creation, done on extra-heavy cloth that will not tear. The workmanship is perfect, the colour effects the very finest. The doll is intended to be stuffed. It is this century's model of the old-fashioned Rag Doll that Grandma used to make and would make Grandma open her eyes in wonder. Dollie is printed with Golden Hair, Rosy Cheeks, Brown Eyes, Kid-Coloured Body, Red Stockings, Black Shoes, and will stand alone. If Mamma can donate one of baby's out-grown dresses that her little daughter can put on and off, button and unbutton to her heart's desire, the Life-size Doll will live in that child's memory long after childhood's days have passed. If you do not care to sell our goods we will send the Doll postfree, upon receipt of 2s. These dolls are sold all the year round. A single packet of SHY-NALL sent post paid on receipt of 6d. Address:

SHY-NALL,

Doll when made up.

SHY-NALL CHEMICAL CO. (Doll Dept. 38K), 75, Queen Victoria St., London, E.C.

"ALKAN" CURES IN ONE MINUTE

by inhalation, HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, FACIAL NEURALGIA, NEURALGIA OF THE EAR.

PRICES 2/9 AND 4/6 PER BOTTLE.

Of all Chemists and Stores, or of the Proprietors,

The "ALKAN" Ltd., General Depot, 150 STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Cures in Ten Minutes
Never Fails!
Nothing "Is like It" or "As Good"

KAPUTINE

The Safe Remedy for

HEADACHE & NEURALGIA

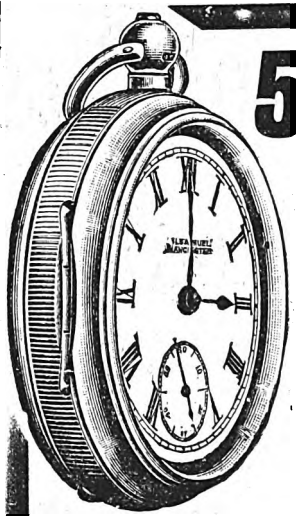
Supplied for use in the Field Hospitals of H.I.M. THE KING OF GREECE, the Red Cross Society in the South African War, the Anglo-Chinese Hospitals, &c., &c.

Recommended by many medical men, including Dr. Alexander, M.D., Dr. Thompson, M.D., Dr. Boyd Williams, M.D., &c., &c.

There is no similar preparation, nor anything as good.

All leading Chemists sell it at 1/-, packet of 18 doses, or for 12 stamps, from

KAPUTINE LTD., Huddersfield.



5/- ONLY

SENT TO-DAY will bring you by return of post

H. SAMUEL'S FAMOUS

"ACME"

SILVER LEVER.

Test it for a week. If satisfied, remit balance, 20s.

Solid Silver Cases, fine 4 plate jewelled movement, dust proof cap, and the latest patented improvements. Price 25/-. Full amount returned if dissatisfied.

Written Warranty for Seven Years.

A SILVER ALBERT FREE!

To all sending full amount 25/- with order.

Send a Post-card Now for the . . .

FREE BARGAIN GUIDE,

260 Pages. 3,000 Engravings of Watches, Clocks, Rings, Cutlery, etc. Factory Prices. Half Saved,

FREE BY RETURN MAIL.

H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, Market St., MANCHESTER.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back, Puts the hair right, Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALÆOLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be withoutit on any account.—Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.—

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trowbridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find the renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

Colonel PERRY—

"My Dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER—

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

Mrs. BROWN POTTER.

A 4/6 full size bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemist and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9 and 5/-

Digitized by Google

"This way!" he said softly, "the carriage is here, ready."

She entered the coach, Downes made signs to the coachman and his four rascals, and the coach was driven off at a great speed.

On the following morning there was a great to-do, for both the Lady Susan and her maid were missing. Lord Whitley made all investigations that were possible, and gradually he learnt part of the truth.

Downes furnished the first clue by telling how he had caused the maid to be carried off by the Lady Susan's orders. He was unable to trace her ladyship on returning to the gardens.

Then the coachman came home without the coach, and told his story. He thought he was helping to abduct a maid, but before he had gone far he heard his mistress' voice, calling to him to stop.

He tried to pull up, but the four men knocked him about and left him by the roadside while they went off with the coach and the lady. They knew what they had to do, they told him.

Downes' consternation may be imagined. By some mischance, the Lady Susan had been abducted instead of the maid!

Luckily the abducted woman was to be taken to a certain spot and kept there until he arrived, so he and Lord Whitley went off at once and rescued the Lady Susan from her plight.

She had been preoccupied on leaving the Gardens, and, thinking that Downes had had Sophie carried off and had brought another coach for her, as arranged, had entered the vehicle quite unsuspectingly and had become a victim to her own plot.

And what had become of Sophie?

Her lover had insisted on sending her to the house of one of his friends in London, where she would be treated as a lady and have the companionship of his daughters till Reginald could marry her.

He had taken her straight to a coach after that dance, and had seen that she was in safe hands. It was after he re-entered the Gardens, alone, that he had met the Lady Susan and had resolved to play with her as she had played with him. She was so mortified, however, at what Downes had told her, that she was in no mood for the festivities or for further companionship with Sir Reginald, and stayed only long enough (as she thought) to enable Downes to carry out the latest plot.

The rage and mortification of the Lady Susan were equalled only by the joy experienced by the lovers at being reunited after their separation for so many months. Their joy was increased by the knowledge that the King, in an interview for which Reginald had boldly asked, had expressed his suspicions that Sophie's father was not the real culprit in connection with the attempt against his life in the north, but that the blame had been thrown on him by the guilty parties in a very skilful manner.

"I am not sure who the criminals are," the King had said, "but I will grant your request that Carlton may be pardoned and have his estates restored to him. So you intend to marry his daughter, anyhow? You are over-bold, methinks, but yet I like a bold man and I will send you a gift for the bride on her wedding day. But that must not be till her father returns, eh?"

With characteristic generosity, the King issued the pardon at once, and he was present at the marriage ceremony, a month later.

While Sophie was being led to the altar by the man she loved, thus realising the height of her happiness, the Lady Susan was living in retirement to avoid the laughter and scoffing of those who had learnt of the failure of her precious schemes.

She is now extremely careful never to engage a maid who could for one moment be called either a beauty or a lady.

George Day.

"WILL you be mine, Miss Bullion?" asked George. "No, George. I don't want to be anybody's mine," replied the lady, with a rich, wary smile. And then George called a meeting of his creditors and effected a compromise for sixpence in the pound.

JACK: "Maud wants to know why you shun her company now." Tom: "Well, the fact is, I'm hard up." Jack: "I'll tell her, and you needn't shun her any more." Tom (brightening up): "By Jove, do you think so?" Jack: "Yes. She'll shun you."

MAUD: "How do you like that young Mr. Peduncle?" Irene: "I don't like him at all. He's either very stupid or he's an impudent upstart. I said to him at the party last night that I didn't feel like eating anything, and he said: 'Why, Miss Squires, you certainly look well enough to eat.'" "Well, what of that?" "Why, he should have said I looked good enough to eat."

LITTLE JIMMY visited his father's office, and after examining the typewriting machine, observed to his mother: "What do they take those to the theatre for?" "My boy," replied his mother, "they do not take them to the theatre." "Well, it's mighty funny then. Pa was telling that gentleman he took his typewriter to the thea——" "James," said his father sternly, "I will see you in the stable after we get home."

How and What to Dance.

By W. LAMB.

President of British Association of Teachers of Dancing.

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price 1s., post free 1s. 2d.

Containing complete instructions in the art of Dancing, including all the latest and fashionable square dances and skirt dancing.

THIRD YEAR OF ISSUE.

FOOTBALL WHO'S WHO.

1902-3.

Cloth, Price 1s. net; post free 1s. 3d.

Contains the biographies of nearly 1,000 of the best known players, together with statistics and much general information relating to all the prominent Association Clubs. It gives information as to the various Leagues, Cups, and other Trophies, Rules, Fixtures, etc., and will be found invaluable to all followers of football.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send "How and What to Dance." I inclose 1s. 2d.
" " "Football Who's Who." " " 1s. 3d.

Name .....

Address .....

Please cross out book not required.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of Short Stories.]

Advice Misinterpreted.

In a recent issue I said "I have heard of cases when a wife, exasperated by neglect on the part of her husband, has left him altogether to go and live with relatives." A correspondent, who does not appear to be blessed with an over-supply of good manners, especially in writing to those with whom he is unacquainted, interprets this as advising a wife to desert her husband. Having uttered this tremendous piece of misinterpretation, he is good enough to refer to my advice as a danger, and also trash. Myself he designates as a "type of conceited womanhood."

* * * * *

Thank you, my amiable friend, I am very sorry to have thus incurred your displeasure. However, I can only say that I am constantly receiving letters from my clients themselves in which I hear that the advice given has put an end to the troubles, and as those principally concerned seem to be satisfied, I do not know that the opinion of even an abusive third party is of very much value. As to "conceited womanhood," perhaps my readers will not regard it as a greater evil than ill-mannered manhood, which, when unable to agree with the opinions of others, has recourse to abuse. As to your point itself, nobody of average intelligence could possibly interpret my remarks on the occasion in question as "advice to a wife to desert her husband." Anyone who has even carelessly glanced at this page in the past will know that such advice would be quite foreign to the principles on which I deal with questions submitted to me.

❦❦❦

A Changed Lover.

"Agatha" is engaged to Leonard, who is twenty-two years of age. Until six months ago there appeared to be no obstacle to their marriage. Then he was sent abroad for six months, and has travelled a great deal. She now notices a change in his manner. He no longer seems to look on her as the one thing in life, but has developed a love for all sorts of pleasures never before apparent in him, and which she could not share. To put it bluntly, he shows signs of wishing to back out of the engagement, though, of course, by mutual consent.

* * * *

I think I should give Leonard a rest for a while. People who have just completed a trip abroad do very often develop all sorts of odd fancies, which, however, seldom last. Leonard is evidently going through a phase common to most young men of his age. If he really devotedly loved you before, be assured his change is only imaginary. He will come back to you. Meanwhile, let him go his way, and bide the time of his return. It is no use forcing a man to remain entangled, if the desire on his part has for the time being departed.

❦❦❦

How to Talk to a Man.

What should a woman talk about to a man when she meets him out? "Margaret" does not know. Quite often young men call on her people, and sometimes they have not very much to say for themselves. Perhaps, thinks "Margaret," they are a trifle nervous in her society. How can she bring them out?

* * * *

Talk to a man about his own work, pleasures, hobbies, books, and such things. Every young man likes to think that his life is of some interest to a girl. When you have found out what most interests him, talk on that subject as often as you can. In this way men get sooner or later to discover what good and sensible friends girls make in times of trouble, and the reflection sometimes develops to such an extent that proposals of marriage may result. For a man who is doubtful about his relations with the opposite sex, a girl cannot use better means of satisfying him than by proving herself to be interested in his life and able to help him in the event of trouble.

❦❦❦

The Summer Girl.

"Theo" met a girl at the seaside last summer, and was very attentive to her. They went to picnics and so on, and he thought she really had taken a great fancy to him. Now he has met her in town, and finds that she appears to care very little for him, in fact, she is not the same girl. He professes to be very fond of her, but would like to see some return on her part.

* * * *

Perhaps she is a girl who likes a man in summer but not at other times. You know that kind of flirt. On a holiday, girls will make themselves very agreeable to the young man who can take them for picnics, drives, and other enjoyable excursions, but when brought face to face with them under the dull surroundings of town life, may alter their minds. "Theo" had better give the matter three months' trial, and if after that time, he finds she shows no signs of reviving their summer intimacy, he had better come to the conclusion that she is a "summer girl" simply, and has no use for a man under the ordinary routine of life. Such a girl, of course, is not to be considered seriously as a future wife, as in married life it is the humdrum which really tests affection.

❦❦❦

How to Start a Courtship.

How should a man start a courtship? "A.S." is about to make his first experiment, and asks me for a few general hints. He has met a girl who attracts him, but of course cannot yet say he is in love with her, as that can only be proved by subsequent meetings. He wants, however, to get on to fairly intimate terms with her, and beyond the ordinary commonplace relationship, so as to make up his mind. What help can I give him in making the first overtures?

* * * *

Well, "A.S.," a woman is generally won over and prejudiced in a man's favour by a compliment. Don't tell her right away she is the most beautiful woman you have ever seen, and so on, as that only embarrasses her. Congratulate her on simpler things, such as the way she plays the piano, or her good taste in wearing hats, or selecting patterns for dresses. Anyhow, show yourself appreciative of some trait of her character. This softens her, and inclines her to hear more from you—provided the flattery is judiciously given. When you have thus softened your relationship, talk as friend to friend, and you will soon discover whether or not you are in love with her. Love, in fact, generally discovers itself, and if, after a while, it does not in your case, let the affair pass and do not bother your head about it any more.

Printed by Horace Cox, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

EVERYBODY SHOULD SEE IT.

FREE FOR THE ASKING.

ASK FOR ONE TO-DAY.

THE BOOK OF THE YEAR.
J. M. DRAPER'S Wonderful Catalogue.

Not a mere price list, but a really useful Buyer's Guide, profusely illustrated, and containing valuable and interesting information regarding Articles of Utility and Articles of Adornment.

No music-lover should be without it. It illustrates all kinds of Musical Instruments,

&c., and tells you just How to buy them and Where to buy them, FREE on application to

J. M. DRAPER,
Dept. 360,
Northern Emporium,
Higher Audley Street,
BLACKBURN.

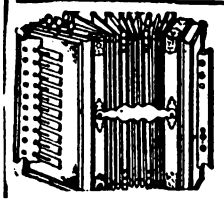
MONEY SAVING BUYERS' GUIDE.

EVERY LADY
should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 99 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2d. in stamps for details.

GIVEN AWAY
with this week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 458.)
PAPER PATTERN
of
CLOTH KNICKERS.
Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,
For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.

LADIES ONLY
Need read this and you will afterwards always look smart, and your hair keep beautifully curly and wavy.
WAVINE. A NEW HAIR WAVING AND CURLING FLUID.
Invaluable for keeping the hair in wave or curl, is not affected by damp or wet weather. Unlike other preparations, it imparts a brilliant gloss, is not sticky or greasy, and has a delightfully refreshing perfume, is inexpensive, and acts as a tonic. Can be used on the most delicate hair. Send for full-size sample bottle direct from manufacturers, post free, by sending P.O. for 1/1. WAVINE CO., 19 Park Street, Highbury, London, N.



BANKRUPT STOCK.—26/- Melodeons for 9/6. Rich, full, organ-tone instrument. 12 fold, metal bound bellows, three sets reeds, four acting stops, including tremolo and diapason. Perfect order guaranteed. Only 9/6, carriage free. Money back if not satisfied. C. DAVIS, Pawnbroker, 294 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

S.S. WARSHIP PACKET OF POSTAGE STAMPS.
This is a unique offer and only costs 2d. with 1d. extra for postage. There are 50 different stamps, including set of 10 Canada (including Map Stamp), Martinique, St. Pierre and Miquelon, New Issue France, Queensland New South Wales, Trinidad, Roumania, Norway, Jamaica, Japan, Philippine Isles, Sweden, Switzerland, Russia Denmark, rare old Portuguese, India, 1852 (Crown), &c.&c.

SPECIAL OFFER.—We will send free with each packet a rare Set of 8 United States War Revenue Stamps 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 10 25, and 50 cents (all with designs of Warships, as illustration). Only one packet will be supplied to each customer. We send free our beautifully Illustrated Price List of Foreign and Colonial Stamps, Albums, &c. Best value. Send now.

ERNEST WOOD & CO.,
Chorlton-cum-Hardy, Manchester.

NEW SELF-HELP.

HOW TO ACQUIRE AND STRENGTHEN Will-Power.
By Prof. R. J. EBBARD.
RATIONAL TRAINING of the WILL and the DEVELOPMENT of ENERGY.

His ingenious course of self-treatment first of all removes all impediments to energy and will-power such as:—NEURASTHENIA, absence of mind, insomnia, exhaustion and debility, headaches, trembling, timidity, trepidation, neuralgia, nervous pains, loss of appetite, indigestion, weak memory, confusion, fits of rage, alcoholism, nicotinism, hysteria, cowardice, absent mindedness, lack of self confidence, melancholia, stage-fright, fright of exams., bashfulness, etc.

Furthermore, an appendix has been added which gives an unfailing and permanent cure of

GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.

As a cure for neurasthenia and all the impediments to the development of energy, the following advantages can be claimed for this method:—

It is infallible.

It takes effect immediately, and effects a complete cure in a few weeks, according to the severity of the case.

Even the weakest and most wanting in energy can start with the treatment immediately without any trouble, but with unfailing success.

It requires no pecuniary outlay other than the daily cost of living.

It is neither troublesome nor tedious, nor does it take up your valuable time.

No expensive medicines are required, no course of treatment, no sojourn at bathing resorts, etc., no cold-water cure, massage, electrical treatment, hypnotism, etc., is necessary.

It can be carried out without interrupting or interfering with your business duties or calling.

It needs no assistance from a physician.

It can be followed up unknown to those around you, and without the assistance of anyone. It lies solely in your own hands.

After complete cure it is the surest means of preserving the health, a protection against any relapse.

It is also an invaluable means for healthy people for strengthening and increasing mental and characteristic propensities.

It strengthens the will, self-confidence, determination, develops energy and activity for reaching the highest aims. This is really "what the world wants!" Etc., etc., etc.

Numerous Testimonials Received Every Day.

Send for Explanatory Prospectus, free from (Dept. 17),

THE MODERN MEDICAL PUBLISHING CO.,
57 and 58 Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

NO DRUGS. NO MEDICINES.

CADBURY'S Cocoa

"A Perfect Food."

It has stood the TEST OF TIME.

"FIRST and FOREMOST."

'Cadbury's'

Is COCOA and the BEST COCOA only.

Points from the Press.

"The perfect purity of CADBURY'S Cocoa—a strong point with the makers—constitutes its firm hold upon the public confidence, and the secret of its universal popularity."—Health.

Strength, Purity, Nourishment.

BIRD'S CUSTARD POWDER

A DAILY LUXURY.

BIRD'S CUSTARD is Pure, Creamy, Nutritious, and easily digested. It is a wholesome, delicious article of diet for daily use. Eggs often disagree; BIRD'S CUSTARD never.

AS AN ARTICLE OF DIET
BIRD'S CUSTARD
is unrivalled for nutriment and delicacy of flavour.

BIRD'S CUSTARD is the one thing needed with all Fresh, Stewed, or Tinned Fruits. Practical housewives always keep a supply ready at hand.

NO EGGS! NO RISK! NO TROUBLE!

Reckitt's PARIS Blue.

The Best is the Cheapest.

Digitized by Google

Short Stories.

THE DAINTY HOME FICTION PAPER.

No. 722.] Week ending November 1st, 1902. [One Penny.

Before the astonished driver could protest, she had mounted the box and had driven off with her lover at a fearful pace.

Digitized by Google

BEECHAM'S PILLS

THE REMEDY FOR THE PEOPLE.

RECOMMENDED BY FRIENDS TO FRIENDS.

NOT PUSHED BY DOUBTFUL METHODS.

DESERVING OF THEIR POPULARITY.

NOW ENJOYING A GREATER SUCCESS THAN EVER.

STILL WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

are

'LET'S TALK OF GRAVES' Cutlery

THE "ENTERPRISE" PARCEL

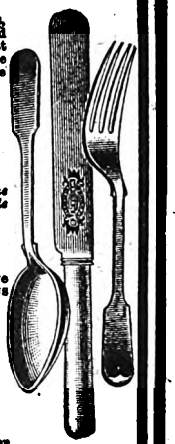
25/-

Household Cutlery & Plate.

Containing: 6 Table Knives and 6 Dessert Knives, made of reliable Sheffield Steel and fitted with polished white "Ivorette" Handles. "Ivorette" is the best substitute for genuine African Ivory. The Plate consists of 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Table Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 1 Mustard Spoon, 1 Salt Spoon, 1 Pair of Sugar Tongs, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon and 1 Pickle Fork.

The Spoons and Forks are made of 'Columbian' Silver, a hard white metal. It is the finest substitute for Sterling Silver known, will wear white throughout, and is unaffected by acids or exposure.

J. G. Graves is the only Manufacturer who supplies the Public direct, and the whole of the above Goods are made in the Firm's own factory in Sheffield.



HOW TO PAY.

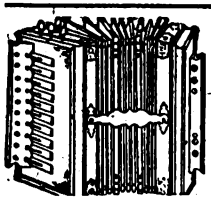
Send 5s. with order and complete purchase in five more monthly payments of 4s.; or HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT for full cash payment.

All orders are executed under Positive Agreement to refund the full amount of the deposit if the Goods are not perfectly satisfactory in every respect.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars. No Risk. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD.



BANKRUPT STOCK.—26/- Melodeons for 9/6. Rich, full, organ-tone instrument. 12 fold, metal bound bellows, three sets reeds, four acting stops, including tremolo and diapason. Perfect order guaranteed. Only 9/6, carriage free. Money back if not satisfied. C. DAVIS, Pawnbroker, 284, Brixton Road, London, S.W.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED).

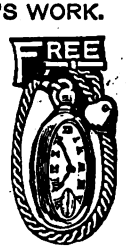
Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.



THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO., 72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

"ALKAN"

Cures in One Minute By Inhalation

HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, FACIAL NEURALGIA, NEURALGIA OF THE EAR.

THE "FAMILY DOCTOR" writes:—"From investigation of the constituents, we have confidence in saying that the good results are not only rapid, but lasting and free from danger."

Price: 1st size, 2/9; 2nd size, 4/6 per bottle.

THE ALKAN LTD.,

General Depot:

150 STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

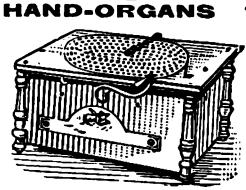
EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 99 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2d. in stamps for details.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH,

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 13½d. tins everywhere.

HAND-ORGANS from 20s.



Made in 3 sizes, ebony and gold case. With 6 metal tunes. Full organ tone. Plays songs, hymns, dance music. Sent on receipt of 4s. P.O., if desired, can be paid 4s. monthly. Write for terms, price list, and tunes. ATLAS CO., 164a High St., Camden Town, London; 63 Seven Sisters Rd.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn. PHONOGRAPHS, 10/6; MUSICAL ALBUMS, 10/6.

NOSE RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (BT), Specialist. South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

DRUNKENNESS

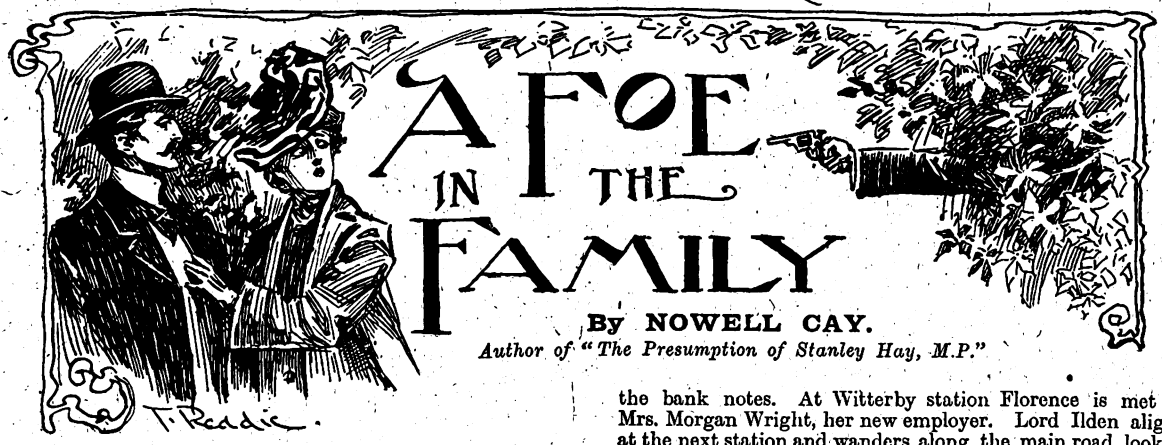
CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

JUST READ IT.

FREE. To advertise our business we are giving away presents to the value of £5,000. Just give us plainly your name and address—a post-card will do—and we will send you by return a post-card will do—and we will send you by return a post-card will do—and we will send you by return

Short Stories.

No. 722. For the Week Ending November 1st, 1902. One Penny.



A FOE IN THE FAMILY

By NOWELL CAY.

Author of "The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P."

Five Abortive Attempts on a Peer's Life.

WHILE returning one evening to Pennybrook Hall, the residence of his uncle Jasper, Lord Ilden discovers a young girl in great distress at having lost two five pound notes, the whole of her wages for six months as a country governess. Together they search for the missing money; but as it is getting dusk, and Lord Ilden wants to get rid of his pretty companion, who turns out to be the sister of one of his old college chums, he manages to substitute two of his own notes and return them to her. She goes away overflowing with gratitude.

When she disappeared, however, Lord Ilden continues the search. He fails to find the money, but instead discovers an envelope addressed to himself, the contents of which he has never seen. The envelope, addressed in a girl's handwriting, is postmarked "Lallerton." Pocketing his find, Lord Ilden is lighting a cigarette, when the report of a rifle suddenly breaks the stillness of the evening, and a bullet whizzes just past him and buries itself in a tree behind.

"That," mutters Lord Ilden, "is the third attempt which has been made on my life during my stay at Pennybrook Hall."

On his return to his uncle's, he tells his cousin, Catherine Hay, of his adventure, and, feeling assured that the attempts are being made by some member of the family, many of whom would profit considerably by his death, proposes marriage to her as a means of reducing the value of his own death to his enemies. Cathie, however, refuses.

Meanwhile Lord Ilden has discovered that it is his cousin Percival who opened the post-bag and extracted the letter addressed to himself, the envelope of which he found in the coppice.

That same evening Lord Ilden's valet discovers a large quantity of poison in his master's flask. This makes the fourth attempt.

Upon receiving the news, Lord Ilden considers it wisest to leave Pennybrook Hall at once. He is driving to the station with Cathie when they overtake a man who appears to take a great interest in them. Ilden's suspicions are instantly aroused, especially so as the man takes a short cut across the fields, and is waiting at the station when they arrive.

Ilden's suspicions, however, are speedily allayed, but his curiosity considerably excited when he discovers this gentleman in one of the carriages in the train he is about to enter, in animated conversation with Florence Courthorpe, the lady of the bank notes. At Witterby station Florence is met by Mrs. Morgan Wright, her new employer. Lord Ilden alights at the next station and wanders along the main road, looking for a quiet inn where he could stay for a time. All unconsciously he walks back towards Witterby and settles down at the "Black Bull," exactly opposite Florence's new home. Florence, however, sees him, and that same night, after all in the house had gone to bed, sits at her window gazing abstractedly across the street. Suddenly a man in a slouch hat is silhouetted against Ilden's bedroom window. He carries a revolver—his purpose being easily discernible. Fortunately Ilden is not in his room, and, taking advantage of the few minutes' grace thus allowed, Florence slips on a dressing gown, quietly leaves her room and the house, and runs across to the "Black Bull" to give the alarm. But the would-be murderer has escaped. Florence then returns to her house, only, however, to meet her scandalised employer on the stairs. She is instantly dismissed.

All rights reserved.]

The next day, Lord Ilden decides to leave Witterby and find the girl at Lallerton who wrote to him. Arrived at the station, he finds Florence, who tells him of her dismissal and of her intention to stay with friends at Lallerton. They go together but find that Florence's friends, the Despards, have left the village.

Taking Florence to an inn, Ilden makes inquiries in the village regarding the Despards. Failing in his quest, he is returning when he picks up a message, directed to himself, warning him to leave Lallerton immediately. He returns to the inn, and as the easiest way to baulk the designs of his enemy, proposes marriage to Florence.

(The above is a short summary of the opening chapters.)

"Will You be My Wife?"

SHE glanced at him timidly with half-frightened eyes, but her first instinctive doubt was met by the seriousness of his face. He was in earnest, and a crimson flush succeeded the pallor of her cheeks. Her startled eyes were suddenly downcast. But her voice kept itself steady.

"No, I could not be that, Lord Ilden."

The calm note of decision chilled him. He had scarcely dared to hope that she would consent—at first. But then—well, he had expected her to hesitate, and consider the proposal.

"You care for somebody?" he asked, with the sharpness of disappointment in his tone. It made her answer quickly.

Digitized by Google

"Oh! no, I never cared for anybody—in that way. I——"

She stopped in a little confusion.

Ilden smiled persuasively. Her words had taken a load off his mind, and he was self-contained and at his ease again.

"Then, if there is nobody else, why won't you be my wife? I think I can promise that I would make you a good husband. Of course, you know very little of me."

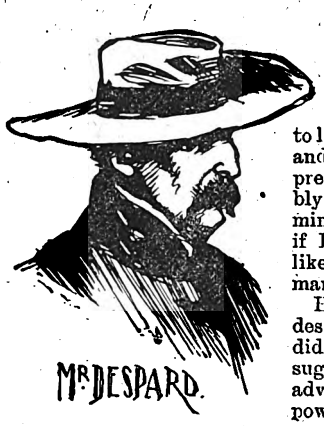
"It is not that," she interrupted quickly. "I knew before I ever saw you how good and kind you are. You are the most generous man in the world, but——" she helped herself out with a little laugh—"I could not think of letting you marry me through generosity, Lord Ilden."

Ilden looked shocked at the suggestion, and tried to feel that he was quite honest in his protest.

"Please do not shame me by talking of my generosity. I am only wondering whether I ought to ask anybody to share my lot when my object is such a selfish one. But I must try in some way to save my life and upset this plot against me. And I see no way to do it except by marrying. You see, there can only be one motive for these attempts on my life. They must be the work of somebody who is directly or indirectly interested in the succession to my property or title, and the number of people who would think themselves gainers if I died unmarried is, unfortunately, a pretty large one. Their activity is not likely to grow less so long as my life alone stands between them and the satisfaction of their ambition. Of course it is scarcely fair for me to ask any lady to marry me under the circumstances. It is halving my own danger by asking her to share it. But you have shown yourself so sympathetic, so willing to help me that I have dared to hope you would even accept this danger for me."

His voice had all the humility of a devoted and diffident lover, and Florence, sitting with downcast eyes, twisted her slender fingers nervously. If she could only believe that it was possible for her to help him and lessen his danger by sharing it! If she could only believe that this was not merely a generous disguise of the fact that he was offering her the protection of his name through pity, through a quixotic sense of responsibility for the hopeless position into which she had been thrown by serving him. The incident of the bank-notes came back to make her more doubtful and uncertain. She could not possibly accept an offer so generously unselfish. But even as she decided hopelessly to close her eyes to the wonderful dream which his words had opened out to her, the thought of his danger came back to check the answer on her lips.

How she had longed to remain with him, ever vigilant and protective. The hour or two in which he had been out of her sight had been full of torturing fears, a foretaste of what her thoughts would be if they parted. And of course this was the only way in which they could remain together.



"I ought not to disguise the fact that your own life might be in danger," Ilden was continuing. "For the first year at least we should be obliged to live in the utmost seclusion, and in anxiety as great as the present, your life being probably as much in danger as mine. They would know that if I lost you I should not be likely to try the experiment of marriage again."

He spoke honestly in the desire to be quite fair. He did not know that every suggestion of danger or disadvantage for her was an overpowering argument urging her to accept the happiness which had offered itself to her as something too great and wonderful to be taken.

"I want to share your danger," she said, speaking impulsively at last, "but how can you wish me to be your wife when you know me so little."

"And yet I seem to know you better than anyone else," he said smiling. "Every hour that we have been together has added to my respect and admiration for you. You are brave and sympathetic and unselfish. You have shown yourself a good ally. And——" he hesitated with a touch of boyish diffidence, for he had never been a man to pay compliments, and felt that he was expressing himself bluntly—"and you are very beautiful. I thought when I met you in the coppice that evening that your face was the most beautiful I had ever seen. It made you different from all other women at once. And the more I see you the more beautiful you seem to me. I shall never forget the picture you made last night. I want to see you again with your wonderful hair unfastened."

Her heart beat rapidly. It is sweet to every woman to hear her beauty praised by the man she admires. And yet how could he really admire her when he must know so many women more beautiful than she. She wanted to protest still, but when she tried words failed her and tears came instead.

Ilden no longer resisted the impulse with which they inspired him.

He clasped her in his arms.

"Don't cry, dear," he said, speaking as tenderly as he would have spoken to a child, and he knew that the contract was settled when she buried her face on his breast to sob unrestrainedly.

A pleasant sense of possession thrilled him as he passed his hand soothingly over her hair, waiting till her passion of tears exhausted itself.

Then he lifted her face and kissed her on the lips, and as he did so the passive inertness with which she had rested in his arms seemed to leave her, and she startled him by the intensity with which her arms clasped round his neck and her lips met his.

There was a grave light in his eyes.

"She loves me," he said to himself, almost with misgiving. The arrangement which had been so convenient for both had somehow become less fair.

A Notice in "The Times."

"On the 3rd inst., at St. Agatha's, Fulham, by the vicar, George FitzHenry Stewart Ilden, Baron, of Ilden Castle, Yorks, to Florence Estelle, only daughter of the late Charles Courthorpe, Esq. No cards."

This was the announcement which, appearing in all the principal papers, startled Society on the morning of the 4th.

Ilden himself, who had launched his thunderbolt with much satisfaction, would have been surprised if he could have known into how many families of marriageable daughters and matchmaking mothers, it carried disappointment and chagrin. It caused a profound sensation in the homes of ladies differing as widely in social importance as the Marchioness of Dalmenay and Mrs. Morgan Wright, the country practitioner's wife.

At Pennybrook Hall the Honourable Jasper was the first to come across the paragraph as he glanced through The Times over breakfast, and he drew the attention of the table with his exclamation of surprise. Then, as they all looked up, he read it aloud without comment.

After which, as nobody spoke, he broke the complete silence which had fallen on the room with an amused chuckle.

"Well, there is a sly young dog, for you. To leave us without a word of this."

His wife had grown crimson. Her passion had been vainly seeking an outlet and found it in her husband's inane laugh. Her fine eye flashed upon him wrathfully.

Digitized by Google

"And is that all you have to say? I call it outrageous. To eat our bread and make a pretence of friendship, and then to spring this upon us. He has treated us infamously. But, of course, you don't care. You think it clever when he treats you with no more respect than if you were an enemy instead of his kith and kin."

The master of Pennybrook Hall was, as usual, amiably indifferent to her tirade.

"You would not have liked it a bit better, my dear," he said with cynical truthfulness, "if George had invited us to the wedding."

"But who is this Florence Estelle Courthorpe?" interrupted Catherine, unable to restrain her inquisitive wonder any longer. "He has never mentioned her name to me."

The question served to divert Mrs. Jasper's wrath into another channel.

"Yes, that creature of all people in the world," she cried hotly. "The designing minx! If I had only guessed that George was such a poor, weak creature I would have taken care that he never came here. I knew well enough from Mrs. Haydon what a designing minx she is, but one did not even know that he had met her. Oh, she knew what she was about, keeping it so quiet."

"But who is she?" cried Catherine impatiently, and the question was echoed round the table.

Mrs. Jasper calmed herself a little to answer it.

"A little blue-eyed, yellow-haired governess, if you please. Mrs. Haydon at the Rectory employed her out of charity when the girl's father died a bankrupt, and she rewarded her by setting her cap at young Haydon. She had to give her notice, and of course, now we come to think of it, George left the very same day that she did. We ought to have suspected it, and tried to save him, poor young idiot. Grant, you saw George off at the station, didn't you? Wasn't the girl with him?"

The poet answered in the negative, absently. He was absorbed in watching Catherine's face, with a fierce feeling of jealousy for the pained dismay which he saw there.

The pain and dismay were not due to his imagination. To Catherine the news of her cousin's hasty marriage had come as a great shock, filling her mind with misgivings. She had never met the governess at the Rectory, and it never occurred to her to question how much of Mrs. Jasper Ilden's description of her was due to unmerited prejudice. The very fact that she had jumped into Ilden's arms, as she must surely have done, to permit of him marrying her almost within a week of his proposal to Catherine herself—served to confirm the character which Mrs. Jasper had given her.

And Catherine's heart grew sick with the thought that her cousin had thrown himself away on a worthless woman, and that the responsibility was partly her own. She found herself asking whether she had not neglected her duty in refusing to marry George when he asked her, since he had found the step so necessary that he must needs, in default of her, marry the first girl he met.

She had not a romantic love for him; but, as George himself had said, they had always been good friends, and Catherine felt that she would have made him a better wife than this adventuress could ever do. Had she neglected her duty for a foolish fancy—a fancy which seemed destined to lead to nothing?

Unconsciously her eyes turned to Grant Ilden's handsome Byronic face, and she lost her pallor suddenly as she found him watching her with moody eyes that seemed to read her thoughts.

But Jane was addressing her. The baronet's wife felt personally aggrieved by her cousin's marriage. It was a relief to twit somebody whom she imagined to be feeling more aggrieved still.

"Is it possible that Cousin George gave you no more idea of what he was going to do than he gave the rest of us, Miss Hay?" she asked, with an acid smile. "I imagined that you were quite in his confidence."

Catherine's composure came back, as she answered easily that the news was as much a surprise to her as to the others.

"I have been expecting to hear from Cousin George," she added. "He promised to write when he went away."

"But has apparently been otherwise engaged," said Jane, with an unpleasant laugh. Her brother scowled at her.

"He would not even promise to write to you, would he, Janey. I heard you begging him to."

It pleased Grant to think that he had done Catherine a service when his sister subsided at the thrust.

"But what are we going to do?"

Mrs. Jasper was crying plaintively, and turned angrily on her husband again because he had resumed his breakfast.

"You go on eating just as if nothing had happened," she cried.

And Mr. Ilden answered with his mouth full:

"No, dear, I go on eating because something has happened. George is married, and it is too late for us to say whether we give our consent. For my part I don't blame him. He has certainly saved himself a good deal of worry by marrying first and taking our opinion afterwards. What do you say, Rupert?"

"I hope George will be happy," said the Honourable Rupert, rousing himself apparently from a fit of abstraction.

Mrs. Jasper laughed derisively.

"Happy? How can he be if we let him fall into the hands of a girl like that? We must do something. If he cannot get the marriage annulled, he ought at least to arrange a separation."

"But on what grounds?" asked Jane with sympathetic interest.

"Oh, they would be found easily enough in connection with a girl of that sort. It would only be necessary to show her to George in her true light, and if Jasper had any respect for the honour of the family he would do it. I only wish that Percival was here. He would soon find out sufficient about the lady to cure Ilden's infatuation."

"He would no doubt have a good try," said Grant cynically, "but it strikes me that Ilden has taken precautions. At present none of us knows where he is, and I do not expect that he will enlighten us until we have had time to reconcile ourselves to his marriage. That is if we want reconciling. For my part I am glad to hear that it is settled."

Mrs. Jasper glared at him contemptuously, and wished more earnestly than ever that his brother was in his house. Percival at least would not abandon without a struggle the hopes and ambitions which they had both nursed for more than twenty years.

She left the table to write to him, pointing out—for similarity of interests had made the two very confidential and outspoken—that an apparent misfortune might be turned into a blessing, if Lord Ilden while remaining bound to his wife, found it impossible to live with her.

She had barely dispatched it when Mrs. Haydon was announced, and came in flushed and important.

"I felt that I must come at once and show you a letter my friend Mrs. Morgan Wright has just sent me," she said impressively, "because it concerns your nephew, Lord Ilden, I am sorry to say as well as Florence Courthorpe."

Mrs. Jasper flung out her hands.

"Oh! I have heard. It is in to-day's Times." The rector's wife was startled.

Digitized by Google

"In the Times? Then it has become an open scandal as my friend feared that it would."

It was Mrs. Jasper's turn to stare.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that Lord Ilden followed that girl to Witterby and—but let me read you Mrs. Morgan Wright's letter. The girl's conduct seems to have been positively appalling."

"With Ilden or others?" asked Mrs. Jasper eagerly, and her momentary interest faded when the rector's wife answered primly:

"With your nephew, I am sorry to say. But what does the account in the papers refer to?"

"Their marriage," said Mrs. Jasper hopelessly. "It was celebrated at some wretched little London church yesterday."

"Married!" gasped her visitor, and her face changed strangely.

"Yes. There is a reward for intrigue and trickery, if you like."

Mrs. Haydon's voice had grown more deliberate.

"I do not think that I ever accused Lady Ilden of trickery exactly," she said as if weighing the word. "Of course it would not have done for her to marry Sidney, when his future is so unassured; but for a man like his lordship I could understand her making a very suitable wife. She comes, of course, of a good family. It is not as though she were born a governess, and—well, I hope she will not be ungrateful for the kindness I have shown her, now that it may be in her power to repay a little of it. I must go home and write to Mrs. Wright. This will quite set her mind at rest."

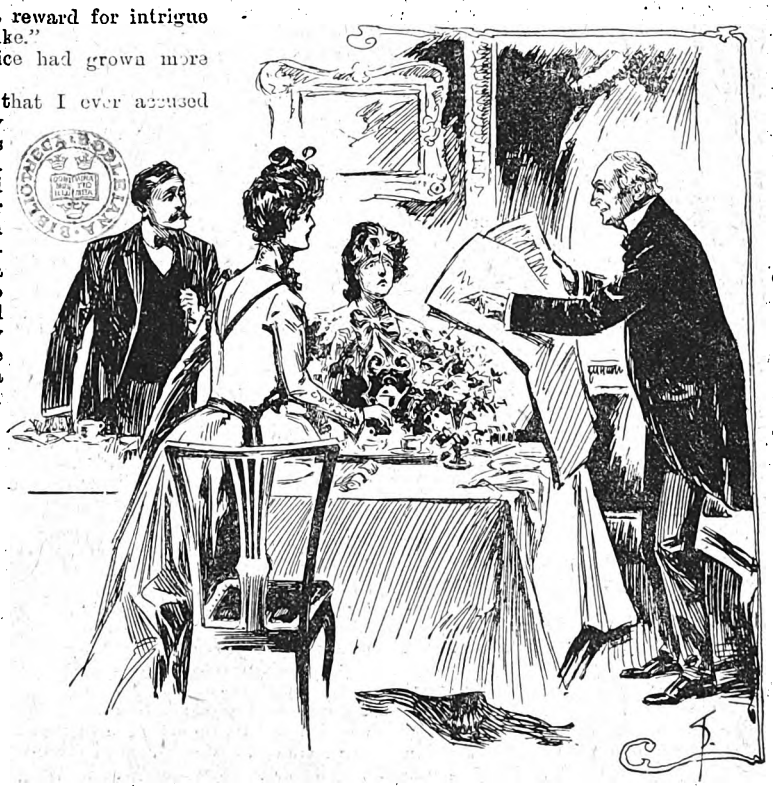
She was quite anxious to tell the rector the astonishing news and inquire the value of the living which was in Lord Ilden's gift.

On the terrace she passed Grant, who was striding up and down moodily. He had been through the grounds in search of Catherine, who had wandered away to ponder over the news alone; but he had discovered her only to turn back without attracting her attention, for Catherine was in tears.

"What a fool Ilden is," he said to himself. "He deserves to be shot."

And he marched up and down the terrace, pondering on the irony of Fate, which only gives its gifts to those who do not want them, until the figure of his aunt appeared at the window of the morning-room beckoning him towards her.

"Your father has gone back to bed, complaining of illness," she said. "I wish that you would persuade him to let us send for a doctor."



The Hon. Jasper was the first to come across the parag aph announcing Ilden's marriage in The Times.

A Call from Pennybrook.

THE news that his uncle Rupert was dangerously ill and was anxious to see him, probably for the last time, reached Ilden in the first week of an unconventional honeymoon spent in an unfashionable suburb of London. It had been Florence's idea that they should remain in England, and her belief that the London suburbs are the best place in the world in which to hide had been justified so far completely. At Fulham they had been able to pass under their own names and marry openly without the least sign of pursuit, and when the announcement of their marriage, which Ilden was depending upon as the first signal blow at his unknown enemy, made it advisable for them to leave the neighbourhood where it had taken place, they had found a refuge to all appearances as safe at Sydenham.

But though no single sign of discovery obtruded itself into the quietude of their retreat there, the expectation of it served to make every day exciting. Every walk that they took together was an adventure, when in each passer-by they were prepared to find either an assassin or a spy. And their common danger served as a tie keeping them more closely together than any personal attraction. If Ilden went for the shortest of strolls by himself, he could not return without a certain sense of uneasiness as to what might have happened in his absence. He could only justify himself for allowing Florence to share his danger, he told himself, by keeping constant guard over her. As for her, she was in torture every moment that he was out of her sight. She would receive him on his return with a passionate relief which showed how great her anxiety had been.

And Ilden was a little surprised to find that this more than ordinary closeness of intercourse did not at present pall upon him in the least. He had always been a little afraid of marriage, as indeed he was still. The virtual pledge that he would always take pleasure in the society of any particular woman seemed too heavy a one to give, when a promise was such a serious matter with him.

When he had asked Florence Courthorpe to be his wife, as when he had asked Catherine Hay, he had taken it for granted that the pledge was not understood. For he had spoken to neither of love.

With Florence especially the arrangement had seemed to him a perfectly fair one without it. He was offering her a position, the advantages of which, in her friendless position, must certainly be worth the risks which it entailed.

Digitized by Google

He had felt quite safe in promising that her life should be a happier one than that of a friendless governess. He knew that he would never be tempted to treat her with discourtesy, just as he was sure that with her beauty and refinement she would never offend his somewhat fastidious taste, or make him regret that he had given her his name.

But he had realised when it was too late that Florence had taken it all differently. Her first kiss of betrothal had told him that she had given him her whole heart in the perfect belief that he had given her his. The pledge, which he thought too serious to take, had been accepted without the making.

Because he had praised her beauty quite truthfully, she had taken it for granted that they were all in all to each other, the sharers of a perfectly romantic love story, and the fact rendered him vaguely uncomfortable. Without intending it, he seemed to have committed himself to play the part of the ardent lover.

Not that he found any difficulty in it at present, when his least smile or kindly word seemed to give his wife such complete happiness, when their joint anxiety for each other made it necessary for them always to be together, with no need of asking whether he desired it. And she was very charming, more charming than he had imagined. Each day revealed to him some new, subtle prettiness of thought or expression or gesture. After keeping himself jealously aloof from women, it was a delicious and novel sensation to feel that he possessed one, all his own, to study and admire. She surprised him every hour by making him feel his importance to her, and the feeling, although it made him serious, made him more important in his own eyes.

It was the thought of her possible disillusionment that frightened him. Already he felt that he would rather cut off his hand than tell her the truth, and say, "I have never claimed to love you. I only suggested our marriage as a matter of mutual convenience, because I owed you a debt and could thwart my enemies by discharging it; because Fate threw you in my path just when I needed you—a woman who did not offend my taste, and at the same time was so circumstanced that she did not complain of the conditions under which I must marry."

He could not disillusionise her like this, and so he played the lover cheerfully, and was still surprised to find pleasure in it, when the letter arrived, begging him to return to Pennybrook.

It was written to Percival Ilden, who had been summoned back to Yorkshire by the news of his father's serious illness, from the dictation of the sick man himself, and had been addressed to Ilden Castle in the hope that it would be forwarded to Ilden, wherever he might be.

It had been sent on with others by the faithful Jardine, who remained there to serve as a medium of communication between Ilden and his friends. The valet was the only person to whom the secret of his whereabouts had been disclosed. The promised letter to Catherine was still to be written. He was telling himself, as he postponed it from day to day, that it was too early as yet to boast of a settled address. The next hour might set them journeying again; but in his heart of hearts he was conscious that the duty of writing had become an undesirable one. His cousin's sympathy had become strangely unimportant to him, and she would expect him to give her some explanation of his marriage. He shrank from the task of putting his motives and emotions into black and white. Of the former he was feeling a little ashamed.

The latter he did not understand clearly himself; and it seemed to him that his exact relationship to his wife was a matter sacred to themselves. And yet he could not write to Catherine without mentioning his marriage, nor could he mention it without offering her some explanation of it. And so the latter had been put off from day to day until he understood himself better, and now it seemed that he was likely to give his first explanation to Catherine by word of mouth.

The letter had come while they were at lunch together, and he read it aloud without comment.

Florence's face grew white as she listened.

"And you have decided to go," she said, reading his thoughts from his face as she had learnt to do without any need of words. She knew better than he knew himself that his decision was already taken, and her heart sank. This then was the end of her dream which from the first had seemed too wonderfully beautiful to endure. He would go back to Pennybrook and be killed, and she would never see him again.

"Yes, I suppose I ought to go," he said thoughtfully. "Uncle Rupert told me when I saw him last that he was fonder of me than of his own sons, and one cannot disregard the wishes of a dying man. I should feel like a coward if I ignored it through fear."

"You do not think that it is a trick intended only to take you back?" she asked timidly. "It is written by the cousin you distrust."

The idea had not occurred to him, and she impressed him again pleasantly, as she was always doing, with a sense of her value as an ally.

But in this case he scarcely suspected intrigue. The motive was one which would not have suggested itself to Percival as likely to succeed, and he said so.

"Besides, if it were a trick, their object could only be to discover where we are," he continued, "and I shall be very careful."

The fact that his decision was fully taken showed itself more clearly than ever in his voice, and with a passionate gesture she flung her arms round his neck.

"Darling love, if you must go, will you not let me go with you?"

The tears that had gathered in her pleading eyes made him stoop and kiss her as he answered, telling her that it was impossible.

"You must remain here as my hostage, little one," he said gently. "Only the fact that I leave you hidden makes it safe for me to expose myself. I am only half a person now, and nobody would think it worth while to kill one without the other. So long as you keep your whereabouts unknown, you will know that you are protecting me from attack."

This was the thought which made him almost eager to leave his retreat. So far as the plot against his life was concerned, it seemed to him that his marriage had been a masterly move, and he wanted to test its efficacy, and enjoy the triumph which it gave him.

By going back to Pennybrook openly, he would be saying in effect to his unknown enemy: Here I am. Shoot me now, if you think it worth the risk.

The spice of audacity in the challenge pleased him, and he steeled himself against the pathetic fear in his young wife's face. The necessity of which he had always been conscious when a serious problem suggested itself to his mind, to be alone and think it over in solitude, made the idea of leaving her in a way a relief, and he was uncertain of his own sincerity when he assured her that it would be a wrench to tear himself away.

The assertion seemed demanded of him, and he made it warmly, but it was just this question of his own sincerity that he wanted to think out without the distraction of her presence. A day or two by himself would enable him to understand himself, and if he still kept his girl-wife happy, as he must do, with love-words and caresses, he would at least be saved this disturbing uncertainty as to whether they were genuine or only the outcome of the part which he had unintentionally committed himself to play.

Digitized by Google

Florence had already accepted the inevitable, and was making an effort to accept it bravely. There would be time when he had gone for tears. At present she must not distress him or add to his anxieties by showing how tragically she felt and feared the parting.

"You will be starting at once, dear?" she asked, with only the slightest tremor in her voice to show how much the effort of self-control cost her.

Ilden was already consulting a time-table.

"Yes, little-one. The sooner I start the sooner I shall be back with you. I shall catch the express to York if I am lucky and go at once."

And so the parting, which to her seemed almost as serious as the parting of death, came with little preparation. It seemed to her only a few minutes from the time when she had been perfectly happy in her dream elysium before she found herself alone, crying her eyes out in an abandonment of grief, and feeling that the end of all happiness had come.

She was conquering a mad impulse to hasten after him before it was too late, and beg him to return for her sake, as she knew that he would if she only spoke the word, to tell him that to know that he was going out into danger alone was more than she could bear.

But she conquered it resolutely. She had married him to help him, not to be a drag upon him, and no pity for her own weak fears should stand in the way of an action which he thought generous and right.

In a fit of hopeless agony she buried her face in her arms.

"Oh! my love, my love," she sobbed, "come back to me safely. I cannot lose you now."

She raised her head hastily as a knock sounded at the door, and the landlady of the house entered looking a little embarrassed by the sight of the grief on which she had obtruded.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," she said, "but a young person has called who says that she must see you."

Uncle Rupert Dies.

ILDEN seized the opportunity offered by his passage through London to call on his lawyer and sign a new will, hurriedly drawn up while he waited. He had paid a similar visit immediately after his marriage, and disturbed the usual humdrum routine of the office by demanding that important alterations should be made in the disposal of his personal fortune, for him to sign on the spot.

But this time the lawyer's duties were more simple, for the new will left everything which it lay in his lordship's power to bequeath en bloc to his wife.

In the will which he had signed on his wedding day, Ilden had contented himself with leaving Florence a modest competence, sufficient to provide her against want if he died. He had felt that his marriage to a virtual stranger, for their mutual benefit, ought not to interfere seriously with the claims of friends and relatives—chiefly on his mother's side—whom he had intended to benefit.

But the week at Sydenham had changed his views. His marriage had become a much more serious thing; for, in whatever light he looked upon it himself, there was no doubt that Florence regarded him as her husband, in heart as well as in fact, and regarded their tie as purely the outcome of mutual affection, as if the other motives were merely accidental incentives of their love. She had given herself to him, heart and soul.

She was his real wife, and, beside that tie, those of friendship and blood became insignificant. He was ashamed to think that he had treated her in his first will almost on a par with his cousin, Catherine, and breathed more freely when the injustice was remedied.

The fact that the newly-signed will would leave her, if he died, as wealthy and influential as his widow ought to find herself, served as solace for certain scruples he was beginning to feel about leaving her at all. Her pathetic face haunted him.

The knowledge that his life had become of the utmost importance to somebody besides himself gave to his adventure a gravity which made it exciting. A new sense of responsibility forbade him to risk a single unnecessary danger, and kept his vigilance throughout the long journey more thoroughly awake than a purely selfish concern for himself had ever been able to do.

But the utmost vigilance failed to discover any sign that he was recognised or followed.

At Rickerby Junction, where he had to change for Pennybrook, his mind was well on the alert. For he was in the midst now of the neighbourhood which he had found so full of danger. The lines branching north, east and west, pointed not only to his destination but to Ilden Market, Lallerton, and Witterby. After the peaceful fortnight he seemed to be once more in the midst of mystery and intrigue.

But the return to the old excitement found him wanting zest for it. He had been conscious all the way of something lacking, and he realised more clearly now that it was the company of his wife. Alone and without an ally, his adventure seemed a dull affair. With Florence at his side it had been a romance.

The platform at Rickerby brought it all back. He recognised with something of surprise how much more interesting life had become since that morning when they travelled together from Witterby to Lallerton. He wondered that he had been so unconscious of its dulness before. What interest had he found at Pennybrook that had made him look forward cheerfully to his visit when a month ago he found himself at Rickerby on his way there. He had to justify himself for coming at all by reminding himself that it was a duty he owed to a dying man.

Even the thought that he had outwitted his unknown enemy seemed of little moment, and the ever-present sense of his duty to his wife made him glad that, so far, no danger had suggested itself to lessen the monotony of the journey.

He had been the only passenger to enter the Pennybrook train at the junction, and he was the only passenger to leave it when the end of his journey came.

He had thought it prudent to give no hint of his arrival, and he reached the Hall on foot without an incident of any sort on the way.

The sight of the place, dreary and forbidding in the darkness, struck him with a sense of foreboding. Perhaps after all it had been foolish of him to come back for a sick man's whim.

He was entering the house now, and Catherine met him in the hall.

Her face filled with consternation.

"Oh! George, why have you come?" she cried.

"To see Uncle Rupert. I could not refuse when I received his letter."

"But that was sent three days ago, and he died the next morning. You have come too late, and only placed your life in danger again."

[What Lord Ilden's danger was will be told next Tuesday.]

Woman's Wit v. Woman's Wit.

WHEN a woman has to guide a beautiful, young, rash, wealthy, and romantic girl through the troublous waters of the matrimonial sea, she is pretty certain to find that her path is beset with any number of difficulties. This is what Lady Peggy Carstairs had to do for Belinda North, and the lovely Belinda led her into some remarkable and desperately exciting adventures. We have secured Lady Peggy Carstairs for readers of Short Stories, and she will tell of her adventures in a striking series of articles which commence next week, entitled: "How I Chaperoned Belinda." You must not miss them!

Digitized by Google

The Plot that Failed.

A Story of Land and Sea.

"Mercy, Michael!—the last man I'd have thought of seeing in Liverpool. Where have you been all these years?"

"Where have you been, Dick? I haven't roamed very far from Tat's Corner, but you!—why, nobody's heard a breath of you for the last six years or more."

Dick Corbett laughed recklessly, and looked at his one-time chum, Michael Fenwick, in—as the latter thought—a peculiarly defiant way.

"No; they haven't; but, as that is my business, and not anybody's, just be content, my son, to know that I've been 'sailoring' in nearly every sea, and that now, I'm chief mate of the fastest little fruit steam 'tramp' that trades between Liverpool and the Spanish ports."

"Have you a vacancy for a 'forrad hand'?"

"Who for—for you? Why!—what's pretty little Kitty about that she's letting you go to sea?"

"Never mind Kitty, Dick!—I'm going to sea again, because things have been a bit rough round about Tat's Corner lately."

He spoke as if any reference to his sweetheart by the other, was distasteful to him; for he saw clearly that Dick Corbett, since he had seen him last, was changed, and for the worse; he was no longer the "good fellow" of old days.

For the moment Dick was inclined to resent Michael Fenwick's evident disinclination to bring Kitty Hazell's name into the conversation, but thinking better of it, he brought his hand suddenly down upon Michael's shoulder.

"Look here, old chap!" he said, with a show of good-natured heartiness, that quite deceived the other, "I don't want to poke my nose into your love affairs; I've lived out my soft side, and don't care a 'rope-yarn-end' for the trimmest petticoat that walks the earth. If you want a berth on the Erl King, you can have it—I'm going aboard now; come along, and you can sign on, and finish the business."

The two men were standing by the high wall which bounds the Albert Dock, and but a few yards from the dock gates.

"When do you sail?" asked Michael, as he went up the Erl King's gangway.

"Day after to-morrow," returned the mate, over his shoulder.

"Time enough to send a letter to Tat's Corner and get a reply."

"Yes," muttered Dick Corbett as he unlocked the door of his cabin in the alleyway opposite the engine-room hatch.

"You can write your letter here," he continued, "before you sign on. After that, for the sake of discipline, I can't say anything to you much in the daytime—but at night, middle-watch sometimes, we'll have a chance for a 'palaver'."

Michael Fenwick's letter was to Kitty Hazell. It was not a long one; just saying that "she must not think badly of him for leaving her in this way, and that an unexpected meeting with Dick Corbett had made things easier, and the future more hopeful."

He was addressing the envelope, when Dick, who had left him for ten minutes, returned.

The mate's eyes gleamed viciously as he caught sight of the superscription over the other's shoulder.

"Shall I post it for you?" he said.

"No, Dick!—or Mr. Corbett, I suppose I ought to say—No, thanks, I've got to go after my 'duds,' to the boarding-house."

The other tried hard not to appear disappointed, and so far succeeded as to awaken no suspicion in Michael's mind of any desire to tamper with the letter.

The new A. B. then signed on; agreed to be on board the following afternoon, and left the ship.

Had he but turned round as he went down the gangway, he would not have failed to see such an expression on Dick Corbett's face, as the latter stood watching, with his arms on the rail, as would have set him thinking that the easiness of things, and the hopefulness of the future, were not quite so substantial as they appeared to be.

So he posted the letter in the first pillar-box and the play went on.

Tat's Corner was a quaint little old-world fishing village on the west coast, where, seven years before, Dick Corbett and Michael Fenwick idled as inseparable cronies.

Kitty Hazell, then a girl of sixteen only, was pretty and sweet enough to turn the heads of more than one young fellow in the place. But from the first, Michael made the running.

One thing he did not know; that his friend was, behind his back, scheming to supplant him in Kitty's affection; using as his principal tool, the girl's own father, Joshua Hazell; the drunkenest fisherman in all the fleet that sailed out of the little harbour of Tat's Corner.

Kitty's would-be lover played upon the old fisherman's weakness to such an extent, that in a short time, things seemed ripe for a declaration on his—Corbett's part.

Fortunately, however, for Michael and his sweetheart, though disastrously for old Joshua, a storm, that swept the whole of the west coast, was the means of defeating, for the time being, at any rate, Dick Corbett's mean and dastardly betrayal of his friend.

Old Hazell with many another deep-sea fisherman, was drowned, almost within sight of land.

In him Corbett lost the only ally who could have influenced Kitty; though she herself declares to-day, that not even her father could have shaken her faith in Michael Fenwick.

Hard times then came to Kitty, and at the date of Dick Corbett's disappearance, she was earning a scanty living, as one of the many net-menders to the fishing fleet.

By-and-by, the fishing industry declined so, owing to the overwhelming increase in steam trawling, that Michael found it impossible to make a living even, while his prospects of marrying Kitty seemed more remote than ever.

Then it was that he determined to go to sea for a year or two, leaving Tat's Corner with that object, without saying a word to Kitty; or, indeed, to anyone.

Kitty's only mistake was, that she had not told Michael that she had guessed that Dick Corbett loved her; her excuse to herself being, that no word had actually been spoken.

There were thus faults on both sides, the consequences of which might, with a little mutual confidence, have been averted.

* * * * *

The Erl King was preparing to warp out of dock, and Michael Fenwick, sick with disappointment at not having had a reply from Kitty, was listlessly coiling up a rope on the fo'castle head.

The chief mate was standing by the break-rail, shouting orders to the man in charge of the steam-winch, when, casting his eyes for a moment quaywards, he saw a girl's tearful face looking up at that part of the ship.

He could not take advantage of her proximity to speak to her; besides, Michael was too close for that action to be quite prudent—so he made a virtue of necessity, and called his subordinate's attention to his sweetheart's presence on the quay.

Digitized by Google

It would have been rank insubordination to leave the ship, even for five minutes, so all Michael could do was to lean over the rail and speak to her.

"You shouldn't have come!" he said, first looking round to see that there were not immediate listeners. "We shall cast off in less than ten minutes."

"I couldn't let you go without saying good-bye, Michael."

"Yes, I know; it was wrong of me to leave you without a word; but I did it for the best, Kitty."

"Don't say anything more about that, Michael!—I just want you to promise me one thing."

"What is it?"

"Promise me you'll do what I've asked you in this!"

As she spoke the last word she threw on board a piece of paper wrapped round something hard. It fell at his feet, and he picked it up on the instant, and put it in his pocket.

"You mustn't remain any longer, Kit!" (even then the ship had begun to move away from the quay), "I'll remember. Good-bye!"

"Good-bye, dear!"

At that moment Corbett called him to do something, and when he looked round again the steamer was a hundred yards from the quay; all he could see being a little figure, waving a white handkerchief.

When they were well in the Mersey, and fairly on their way seawards, he took out and read Kitty's last little note of appeal.

It was not really a letter; it was just a request in one sentence.

"For your own safety's sake, dear, and for love of me, beware of Dick Corbett."

Nothing more; and Michael knew, for the first time, that his sometime friend had not only been false to him, but that he had also to fear his present enmity, and perhaps violence.

* * * * *

Owing to bad weather, the Erl King had to put in to Brest, on the third day after, they made another attempt to reach Cadiz, though it was known that, outside in the "Bay," a fierce gale was still blowing.

Somewhere abreast of Cape Finisterre, it came on to blow harder than ever, and Michael, who was at the wheel, had as much as he could do to keep the spokes from jumping out of his hands.

The night had drawn in intensely dark and cold, and a rough Biscay swell was running mountain-high from the west, to break furiously, with a cloud-mist of hissing spray, on the rocky coast of Portugal.

At six bells, first watch, Michael was relieved, and before descending to the fo'castle, stood leaning on the rail, looking at the seething, rushing water.

Suddenly a hand was laid on his shoulder. It was the mate, Dick Corbett.

"Cold to-night, Michael!" he said.

"Ay!—it is that."

"Makes you think of—of firesides, and Kitty—our Kitty—eh, Michael?"

"Let Kitty's name alone!"

"No offence, mate. But she's not yours yet."

"As good as mine. Only this one contract, and then——"

"You may never finish this one, my son; the Erl King isn't much of a boat; she's old and cranky, while seas are rough and winds high."

"Well, if we go, we go; but if Kitty can't be mine, she shan't be another man's."

"Sure of that?"

"Sure as death!"

"Hope you're right, my boy! Hope you're right—but—I have my doubts."

"Of Kitty?" queried Michael fiercely.

"I don't know! Let's change the subject. Come down to my cabin and have a tot—there's no one about."

Never one to harbour malice or hard thoughts, Michael assented, and the two men went below to the mate's cabin.

Up above the roaring of the elements; down below, the doing of devil's work.

Michael's lips were no sooner put to the glass of spirits and water, than he was conscious of something uncanny about it.

There was no delay in its effect. Seeming to madden and burn like vitrol, it produced an instant sense of suffocation, but fortunately not of blank unconsciousness.

Except the "look-out" in the bows, and the man at the wheel, aft, there was not a soul to see Dick Corbett stagger on to the poop deck with the inert body of Michael over his shoulders.

The crazy steamer rolled and pitched in the swell, so that more than once, man and burden were in danger of falling in a heap to leeward. Arrived at the lee quarter boat, Corbett, using all his strength, tried to heave the insensible man into the stern sheets.

Michael, however, roused back to a sense of his position by reason of the motion during his journey on deck on Corbett's shoulders, managed to shake himself free of his intended murderer, grasping him resolutely by the throat.

Corbett, alive to the fact that the easy accomplishment of his design was now impossible, fought with the desperation of a madman.

Then, Michael, gathering himself together for one big effort, dealt his opponent a terrific blow between the eyes, and felled him senseless to the deck.

Knowing that he was within five miles at most of the Portuguese coast, he sprang to the davits, let go the tackles of the lee quarter boat, jumped into her, and when the rail kissed the water, let the boat down with a run into the boiling sea.

* * * * *

At Tat's Corner Kitty Hazell sits, under the lee of some rocks on the beach, wearily mending her nets.

There are half a score of other women, young and old, working around her, but she speaks to no one; and, with the sympathy of their kind, they leave her severely alone.

By and by, the old man who performs the duties of letter-carrier and general postal official in Tat's Corner, and its neighbourhood, is seen to be hobbling towards the beach.

"What be owd Maartin a doin' 'ere now, I wunner?" said an old dame sitting close by Kitty.

The remark was sufficient to make the girl raise her head.

As she did so, the old postman saw her looking at him, and waved something above his head.

"Kitty Hazzell, it's a message for 'ee," he said, putting the orange-coloured envelope into her trembling hand.

With feverish eagerness she tore it open.

It was from the house-surgeon of a large Liverpool hospital.

"Michael Fenwick brought here on landing from Braga, Portugal. Is seriously ill. Wishes to see you."

* * * * *

"Kit," said Michael, sobbing, in his weakness like a child, "you will never forgive me for not keeping my promise."

"Yes, dear, I forgive you, for you have suffered most."

"One more question, Kit."

"Well, Michael?"

"Dick Corbett—what of him?"

He tried to raise himself in the bed to listen to her answer.

"Tell me," he said again, excitedly. "Is that fiend, who tried to drop me over a ship's side, on a dark and stormy night—is he to escape justice?"

"What do you consider justice, Michael?"

"Death!—nothing short of death!"

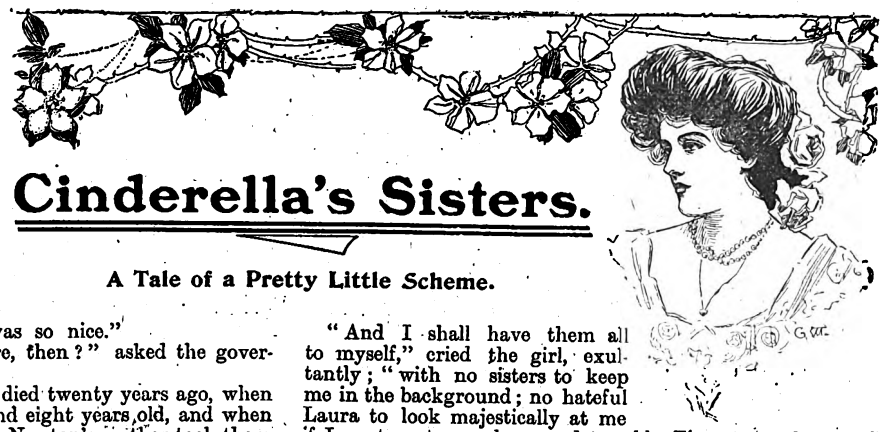
"Well, dear, the doctor has just told me, that the Erl King, with all hands, is reported as having foundered on the same night that you drifted in that small boat to the Portuguese port. Dick Corbett, therefore, has received justice, and you and I have no more to say."

Michael Fenwick went no more to sea, for his case, having enlisted public sympathy, a few wealthy gentlemen in Liverpool, subscribed to buy him a fishing boat of his own, which he works by deputy.

A little while after the new vessel arrived round at Tat's Corner, he and Kitty were married, and so far as report has it, with the happiest results.

Ralph Enderby.

Digitized by Google



Cinderella's Sisters.

A Tale of a Pretty Little Scheme.

"If ever there were two disagreeable, hateful, tyrannical old maids on earth, those two are my step-sisters, and you know it, Miss Reade."

Miss Reade looked uncomfortable.

"As your governess, you know, Ella, I ought not to listen to your remarks on your sisters——" she began, nervously.

"Step-sisters, please," snapped Ella. "Oh, Miss Reade, if you had only been here before they came. It was so nice."

"Didn't they always live here, then?" asked the governess.

"Oh, dear, no. Their father died twenty years ago, when Laura and Theodora were six and eight years old, and when mother married a year later, Mr. Newton's mother took them to live with her. Then mother died two years ago, and father said I wasn't old enough to take charge, though I was fifteen. So as old Mrs. Newton had died a year or so before, and Laura and Theo were staying with their father's sister, father wrote and asked them to come here. They've done nothing but interfere with me ever since they came. You haven't been long enough here to find it out yet, but you will soon. The idea of taking that book away from me!"

"Well, you know, Ella, dear, it is not quite a book for young girls; but hush—I hear Miss Newton's voice. Do go on practising."

The door opened, and a tall, graceful girl entered. She looked as much younger than her real age as Ella looked older, and no one would have guessed her to be more than twenty-three or four. She looked very pale, and there were tears in her eyes and a quiver in her voice as she addressed the governess.

"Miss Reade, I have just had a telegram to tell me that my aunt has had a paralytic stroke. My sister and I are going to her with the next train. Will you kindly take charge here? I will give you all directions if you will come to my room. Ella, you will explain to father, dear, and be kind to the little ones."

All was bustle and confusion for the next two hours, and then the sisters drove off to catch their train from the junction.

"It's too annoying," cried Major Leigh, when he arrived later in the afternoon, and was met in the hall by Ella, eager to tell him the news. "Just exactly my luck. Why couldn't their aunt take ill at some other time? What on earth shall I do? Write and put them off, I suppose."

"Put who off? Have you asked anybody down?" asked Ella, who was accustomed to her parent's incoherent style of conversation.

"I met two friends in town to-day," explained her father, "whom I haven't seen for six or seven years, and I asked them down for some shooting. I suppose I must put them off."

"No need for that," answered Ella, with a toss of her head. "There are plenty of good servants, and Miss Reade can order dinner, and chaperon me. Who are your friends, father? I suppose they are quite old."

"They don't think so," said the Major with a grin, "though no doubt you will. They are some years younger than myself, both on the sunny side of forty. It's too bad of the girls," went on the major, absently, and half forgetting his auditor. "I always thought there was something between Dot and Ashby, and it would do very well now that he has come into his uncle's property. And Courtenay's always talking about his ideal woman. I wonder what he'd think of Laura. Run away, Ella; I wasn't talking to you. Go and tell Miss Reade I want her."

Miss Reade was a weak and foolish woman, who, being incapable of exercising any control over her strong-willed pupil, managed her by means of gross flattery and unlimited indulgence. She was writing in her own room when Ella ran in to tell her of the expected visitors.

"And I shall have them all to myself," cried the girl, exultantly; "with no sisters to keep me in the background; no hateful Laura to look majestically at me if I venture to speak; no detestable Theo to snub me. I look quite grown up, don't I, Miss Reade?"

"You are grown up, dear," replied the judicious governess. "You look quite twenty. And seventeen is a marriageable age, you know. Wouldn't it be fun to steal a march on your sisters, and get married to one of these gentlemen?"

"Wouldn't it? And the point is, Miss Reade, that I believe father asked these men down to meet Laura and Theodora—I won't call her Dot; so absurd to keep up baby names when she is so old. I mean to have some fun with these men. Wouldn't it be jolly if I were to marry one?"

"It would indeed," Miss Reade assented.

"It is a distinct leading of Providence that the sisters are away," laughed Ella. "If they were at home I shouldn't have a chance. I should be kept in the background; and besides Laura is handsome, and Theo really lovely."

"But you have the charm of youth, and your artless ways are more winning than the finished manners of older women."

Ella did not answer. She stood looking absently at the window.

"What is my Cinderella thinking of?" asked Miss Reade, after a pause.

"Of—Cinderella," answered the girl, with a little gleeful laugh. "I have a plan, Miss Reade, and if you help me, I'll take you to live with me when I am married. I'm going to act a little comedy. I am Cinderella; ill-treated by my step-sisters, who are old, ugly, and jealous, but I am too noble to complain; I am resigned, gentle, ever obliging."

"I see. 'Pity is akin to love,' and you think you can interest these men by playing Cinderella. Well, it is not a bad idea. But how can I help you?"

"I'll tell you later. Meantime you had better go to father. I quite forgot to tell you he wants to see you."

Colonel Ashby arrived next evening. Sir George Courtenay was not expected for a day or two, and Ella felt rather relieved. One man was enough to begin with. The Major mentioned casually at dinner that his elder daughters were from home, and Ernest Ashby felt a pang of disappointment. He had hoped to meet Dot, for he had heard of the death of her mother and of the sisters having gone to live with their step-father. His brief love-story had been played out one autumn in a country house where Dot had been visiting alone. Ashby had fallen violently in love with Dot, but although she had returned his affection, their engagement was never announced, for they had quarrelled almost at once, and Ashby had gone abroad in a fit of temper.

As soon as the Major had fallen asleep over his wine, Ashby made his way to the drawing-room, where he found Miss Reade at the piano, and Ella prettily posed in a window recess. He quickly joined the latter, and began to make conversation.

"You have sisters, haven't you?" he asked, after a time.

"Step-sisters, and three darling little brothers."

"Your sisters are from home just now?"

"Oh, yes," with an arch smile, "or I shouldn't be here."

"Shouldn't you? Why not?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, well"—a pause. "You see, I am rather young, and my sisters keep me in the schoolroom. They are very good and kind, but being quite old, they think me a child."

"Quite old!" he exclaimed. "Why, they cannot be. At least the one I knew cannot be much over twenty."

Ella bit her lip in annoyance at her blunder. She had forgotten that Ashby had known Dot.

"Well, they seem rather old to me," she said, with sweet innocence. "Laura is thirty-five, and Theo is only a year younger."

"Theo!" he repeated. "Then there must be a third very much younger. Dot must be about twenty-four or twenty-five. When I knew her, she looked about eighteen. Where is Dot?"

Ella hesitated a moment, then risked a daring step.

"Darling Dot," she murmured. "Ah, Colonel Ashby, did you not know? Dot died two years ago."

"Dot dead!" he cried, in a voice of anguish. It was over then; his dream of reconciliation. He could never ask forgiveness now; never explain away his harsh words, never hear her dear voice whisper pardon. "I am sorry to have distressed you," he said, wearily, after a pause. "I had not heard of—of your sister's death."

Ella smiled through her tears like an April morn.

"I can't quite talk of darling Dot yet," she said, unsteadily. "We were so much to each other, and I am so lonely now she's gone."

"You must be," he answered, almost tenderly. "You must miss her terribly."

"Oh, I do," cried Ella, pressing her handkerchief to her eyes, and there was a long silence. At last Ella looked up. "I must say good-night now, Colonel Ashby," she said with a sad little smile.

"Already?" he remonstrated. "Why, it's very early. Don't go yet."

"Oh but I have such a lot to do to-night," she answered simply.

"Do you still do lessons, then?"

"Oh, no," cried Ella, earnestly. "I am going to the nursery. Baby Bertie won't let anybody else put him to bed. And then, my sisters have left me things to do."

"Tasks?" asked Ashby.

"Mending, and things like that. They have taken their maid with them, you see."

"Rather hard lines on you. Don't they ever take you out with them?"

"Oh, they are very kind," said Ella, "and they have promised to take me somewhere some day, when the boys are old enough to be at school, and I am not so much needed at home."

"Rather a distant prospect," remarked Ashby. "I'm afraid it's a case of Cinderella and the cruel step-sisters."

"Oh, don't say that," cried the girl, with sweet eagerness. "My sisters are very kind and good to me, and I love them. Good-night, Colonel Ashby."

And she ran off to her room to eat sweets and read a novel lent her by Miss Reade. That lady, meantime, took advantage of the major's prolonged slumbers to nobly second her pupil, representing her to Colonel Ashby as a second Cinderella in very deed, a patient, gentle, loving, little drudge.

Ella rather forgot her part next day. Her father was laid up with a sudden fit of gout, and Miss Reade was kept busy looking after household affairs, and subduing a mutiny in the nursery. Ella sauntered round the grounds with the Colonel, chatting gaily, and then insisted on rowing about on the pond, as unlike a household drudge as possible. This occurring to her very forcibly, she made an effort to resume her rôle.

"What a nice holiday I'm having!" she remarked, accordingly, resting on her oars, and fixing gleeful eyes on him. "That dear Miss Reade has undertaken all my duties this week that I may have a complete rest. Isn't it sweet of her?"

"Very," assented Ashby, thinking what a pretty picture she made in her white frock, with the sunlight flickering through the trees upon her.

"I daresay I do want a rest," she went on plaintively. "I'm not very strong." She looked very fragile in her girlish slenderness, and Ashby looked tenderly at her.

"Poor little woman," he rejoined—they were on quite familiar terms now—"it's a shame you should be so overworked, and I shall tell your father so."

"Oh, no, you mustn't," cried Ella, in quick alarm. "I can't have dear father worried, especially now he is ill. You mustn't think I'm complaining. My sisters are very good to me. Promise me you won't say anything; please promise me."

"I promise, I promise," he soothed her. "I won't say a word, you loyal little soul. It's hard lines just now, Cinderella, but remember how the fairy-tale ends, and this may end sooner than you think."

"How? What do you mean?" asked the child, with wide, innocent eyes, and Ashby hastily changed the subject, resolving to say nothing more to disturb her "Heavenly innocence."

The days went on. The major was confined to his room, and Cinderella, mistress of the field, was making the most of her time, and a very complete fool of Colonel Ashby. Her only trouble was that he persisted in talking of Dot, and dwelling fondly on the bygone days when he had been engaged to the sister whom Ella had so dearly loved.

"I may as well own it to you, little one," he said, one afternoon, as they strolled on the lawn, "I was engaged to your sister. It was rather a hopeless affair, for I was wretchedly poor, so we kept it to ourselves. But a secret engagement is an awfully trying thing, and I was a jealous fool. We quarrelled, and parted, and so—and so—I lost her."

Ella was silent.

"I was too proud to make any advances," went on Ashby, "and now that things are different and I would gladly beg her forgiveness, she is gone. I need not fear to bore you, Ella, by talking of her, for you loved her too. You would never have been Cinderella had she lived. You have a look of her too, at times." And he looked kindly at her.

Ella had to turn her head aside in pretended emotion, for a laugh quivered on her mouth as a vision of her extremely alive and energetic sister came before her.

As soon as Sir George Courtenay arrived, Ella turned her attention to him. He, at least, could not bore her about the defunct Dot. Ella really was a clever girl, and she knew that simple pathos becomes wearisome in time, so without abandoning her rôle of Cinderella, she kept it rather in the background, and prattled so happily and even wittily that both men were amused and fascinated by her. So skilfully did she play her part (developing histrionic talent in a way that quite dazzled Miss Reade) that by the end of a week her success had far outstripped her wildest hopes. Both men had resolved to propose for her. Ella had determined to accept Courtenay. If she chose Ashby, he must inevitably discover her deception about Dot, but Courtenay had never met her sisters and could not hold her responsible for any discrepancies he might notice between her description of them and reality.

It was evening, and tea had been brought out on the lawn. Ella's pretty fingers were busy with the cups, while she prattled merrily to the guests. Miss Reade cut cake, and put in a judicious word now and then.

"Well, you do a lot for those sisters of yours," Courtenay remarked, as Ella concluded an amusing little fancy sketch of the difficulties of getting her sisters up for a ball. "It's a regular shame."

"Oh, I like it," cried the child prettily. "And then, think how sad it must be to be getting old and—and not pretty. It's no wonder they are sometimes just a little bit cross."

"Are they very ugly then?"

"Oh, no; Laura is quite nice-looking—for thirty-five," answered the young lady, forgetting in her excitement her resolve to avoid dangerous details. "Only she has grown dreadfully stout. She has a lovely complexion, though; far better than mine," said Miss Ella, conscious that both gentlemen involuntarily glanced at the blush-rose face before them. "But that brilliant complexion generally goes with red hair."

Digitized by Google

"And the other sister?" pursued Courtenay.

"Theo is painfully thin, and she—well—laces too tightly. It makes her nose red, poor dear. Now I must go, and see how father is, and if he'll take some tea."

When she was gone, Courtenay fell into conversation with Miss Reade, and Ashby went indoors. Running upstairs, he stumbled over a bundle which, on investigation, turned out to be a sobbing child of tender years.

"What's wrong, little one?" he asked, picking it up carefully.

"Ella slapped baby," sobbed the child.

"Ella did? Where is Ella, then?"

"Don't want Ella," wailed the baby so heartbrokenly that Ashby felt quite touched. He was trying to console it when to his relief the nurse appeared with a flood of apologies."

"I'm so sorry, sir, but I had to go downstairs for something, and Master Bertie ran after me. We're all at sixes and sevens just now, sir, for the young ladies being away makes such a difference."

Baby burst into renewed sobs, wailing, "me no want nursie; me want Dot. Oh, me do so want Dot."

"Ah, poor little man! I too 'do so want Dot,'" sighed Ashby.

That evening the major received a letter from Laura, informing him that her aunt was better, and she and Dot would return the following afternoon. He kept this to himself, intending a pleasant surprise, and had himself established on the lawn next day at tea-time. Ella made such a pretty picture of filial love as she hung about her father's chair, that Courtenay made up his mind to delay no longer, but to ask her at once to submit to be trained—after marriage—into his ideal woman. So he presently asked her to come for a stroll round the lawn, and Ella, reading his purpose in his face, rose with alacrity. But, alas! in the very act of raising the costly cup to her lips it was dashed to the ground. At this very moment there appeared two ladies, hastening from the house across the lawn to join the party round the tea-table. Ella turned white. Her father held out welcoming hands.

"The girls!" he exclaimed joyously. "Welcome home, dears."

At this moment—whence, no one could tell—three children dashed across the lawn, and up to the new-comers, uttering shouts of welcome.

"Oh, sisters, we're so glad you're back," cried the eldest. "Ella's been horrid. She's made us live in the nursery, and never come downstairs."

The two guests had been looking on, mystified, but as the ladies came nearer, Ashby fairly gasped for breath. For the lady round whose neck baby was clinging was no other than his lost Dot. As for Courtenay, he was stricken speechless by Laura's calm loveliness. Here—at least in appearance—was his ideal woman.

"Don't you know my daughter, Ashby?" asked the major. "Dot, I mean."

"It can't be," gasped Ashby hoarsely. "It isn't possible. Dot is dead. Ella told me she died two years ago."

"Dot dead?" repeated the major, stupefied. "What—on—earth do you mean?"

"But—there must be—some awful mistake. Ella told me," faltered Ashby, and then Dot raised her eyes to his, and said: "Ernest!" and he had no more doubts.

Ella, meantime, had most judiciously disappeared, and her mystified father postponed inquiries till next day. Then, however, her little brothers, who had hung about the gardens many an evening and been unsuspected witnesses to tender scenes and pathetic plaints, told enough to reveal to the astonished and wrathful major Cinderella's little plot.

Some months later, a double wedding took place in the village church. The bridegrooms were Colonel Ashby and Sir George Courtenay, and the brides were Cinderella's sisters.

Vera Serkoff.

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

October 28.—Those whose birthday occurs to-day will have an unsettled year; opposition in business concerns; not a good time to make changes.

Girls will receive attentions from married men, and those not free to marry.

The day is not good for travelling, dealing with foreigners, or buying property.

A child born here will be rather ambitious, active, and fond of the opposite sex. Should keep in the employ of others.

October 29.—A year of change and travel is indicated for those who celebrate their birthdays to-day. Business, health, and general concerns are favoured. Make use of friends.

Young girls will find love matters quiet and slow.

The day is good to speculate, buy, sell, and make changes.

A child born to-day will be fortunate in life. The mind will be very quick, clever and inventive. Would make a successful stockbroker.

October 30.—Not favourable for business for to-day's children; some sickness and anxiety. Landlords and farmers meet with misfortune.

Girls will find love affairs run smooth; those born near four p.m. become engaged and marry.

The day is not good for buying in the early morning, better from ten a.m. to four p.m.; good for visiting and pleasure then.

A child born here will be unfortunate; should keep in employ. In disposition cautious, but cheerful and kind.

October 31.—A doubtful time is shown. Do not speculate, and be cautious with friends. More fortunate for those in employ.

Girls born between nine and ten p.m. find love affairs interesting, but need some caution and prudence.

The day is good for dealing with doctors, military men, and shipping agents. Ask favours near five p.m.

A child born this day will be proud, active and daring; not very fortunate.

November 1.—A quiet and steady year for business. More favourable for elderly people.

Love affairs go much as usual.

The day is good for dealing with property, land, and coal merchants. Travel and write letters here.

A child born to-day will be steady and plodding. More fortunate in the employ of others than for itself.

November 2.—Go steady this year or some loss is promised. Insure against fires and have a care of mishap and law.

Girls will receive attentions and marry if now engaged.

A child born here will be improvident, rash, and headstrong. Of a cheerful disposition and fond of the opposite sex.

November 3.—A year of change and travel. Avoid intrigues and go quietly.

Girls will have many strange experiences in love affairs and need some extra caution.

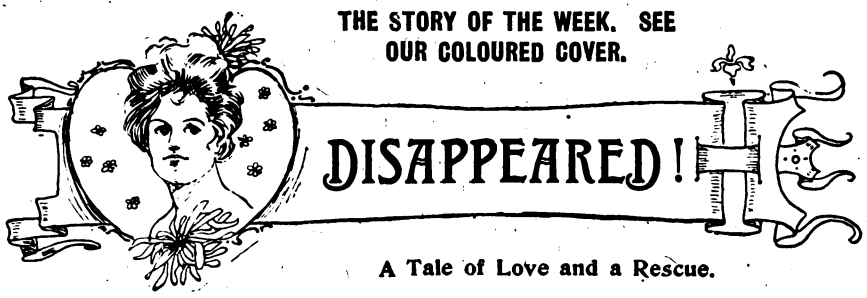
The day is not good for new ventures, marriage, or visiting. Defer travelling and making changes.

A child born here will be of an unsettled disposition.

Asturel

Digitized by Google

THE STORY OF THE WEEK. SEE OUR COLOURED COVER.



DISAPPEARED!

A Tale of Love and a Rescue.

A GIRL went singing down a Surrey lane, her hat swung from her hand, her face was uplifted to the blue of the June sky; the sunlight, falling across the tall hedgerows, turned her hair into a halo of golden glory about her shapely head.

"He is coming home to-day," she sang, and at the moment, unseen by her, a woman's face peered down at her between the interlaced boughs of the hawthorns on the steep bank, and a voice murmured softly, but in accents of passionate bitterness:

"Ah! he is coming home to-day, is he! And he might have been mine—mine—mine, but for yonder white-faced fool! Surely Reginald will help me to baffle them both!" And whilst the girl's clear voice died away in the distance, and her form turned round a bend in the lane and disappeared, the watching woman stole from her place amongst the hawthorns and made her way rapidly across the meadows to a big white house that stood back from the lane, and quite concealed from its surrounding trees.

"Reginald is wild about her; surely he and I can find a way!" the woman murmured once more as she hastened up the drive that led to the white house, and vanished within the open front door. Meanwhile, the girl who had gone singing down the lane paused at last beside a tiny wicket gate leading into a copse, where the ground was a carpet of bluebells, and the hazels hung out yellow flowers amongst which the bees hummed softly.

A man stood beside the gate; a man who, at sight of the girl with her happy face and shining hair, made two quick steps forward and caught her in his arms with an eager exclamation of love.

"At last, my darling, at last!" he cried, kissing her tenderly on lips and cheek and brow, and softly caressing the luxuriant masses of her hair. "The minutes have seemed like hours, and the days I have been away like months and years! It is good to see you again, sweetheart."

She nestled closer into his arms and lifted her radiant, blushing face to his.

"If it has seemed long to you, what has it seemed to me, waiting here without you? Ah, Maurice, the one who is left behind always feels the waiting most!"

"Yes, I know," and again he smoothed back her soft hair, as they paced the hazel copse side by side; "but, Doris, it will not be long now before I can claim you for my own. In a few weeks, my darling, the little house will be ready—the house which is to be yours and mine—our home together! Shall you loathe grimy old London after this?" And he waved his hand towards the budding hazels over their heads, the carpet of blue at their feet.

"I shall love the home I share with you, wherever that home is," she answered simply; "what does the place matter so long as we are there together?"

"We shall not be rich," he said slowly. "I wonder if you realise, Doris, that I am only a struggling artist, and that you are doing badly, very badly for yourself, from a worldly point of view; you would do better——"

"If I married that horrible Mr. Reginald Dunbar?, Aunt Clara is for ever telling me I am a fool to have rejected him. Are you telling me the same thing?"

She uttered a happy little laugh, but a dark frown crossed her lover's face. "Dunbar is a beast!" he said, with more force than elegance. "I cannot bear to hear you speak of him!" he shuddered slightly, "his sister, Miss Dunbar, is pleasant enough, but——"

"I don't know why it is," Doris answered, "but Miss Dunbar always gives me the same kind of feeling that a snake does, and yet—she is very civil to me. Both she and her brother are most kind to aunt Clara and me. Aunt Clara's cottage is close to their park gates——"

"I wish it were miles away!" another frown puckered the young man's brow. "I hate that fellow Dunbar, with his handsome, evil face and his wealth and villainous ways."

"Why do you speak of him so bitterly?"

"Because I hate him! If his sister gives you a feeling of repulsion, he gives me the same sensation. He is a reptile—I feel it, I know it! He would stop at nothing to gain his vile ends."

"Don't let us talk of the Dunbars any more," the girl whispered. "What are they to us? And I hear so much of them from Aunt Clara, who adores them both, that I don't want even to speak of them myself. Tell me of our little house—of the studio and the future that is to make your name."

They wandered on through the soft June weather of the radiant afternoon, talking of the cloudless future that awaited them, of their love and their happiness, until at last Doris said with a sigh:

"I must go home now. Aunt Clara will be vexed with me for meeting you here, and will ask me why I do not bring you to the cottage. But I never feel we are alone there. Aunt Clara seems to spy upon us; and I don't know why, but I feel that she is too friendly with the Dunbars. I—I wish our wedding was over, Maurice. I have a strange presentiment that——"

"Nonsense, my darling, nonsense!" he said lightly; "you are over-wrought, tired. I love our meeting-place here! It is far better than the cottage and your aunt's coldness and evident dislike of me. I must return to town to-night. Wright expects me, and to-morrow I have a hard day before me. A millionaire is coming to have his portrait painted. There! Sweetheart, a successful portrait of a rich man may be the beginning of our fortune."

"Come again soon," she said wistfully looking up at him with troubled eyes. "I am frightened when you are not near; when I am with you all is well."

By this time they had left the copse and were strolling up the lane down which Doris had come, in the direction of the cottage where she and her aunt lived together.

Just at the bend in the lane where, three hours before, the woman's face had watched Doris through the hedge the lovers now parted, in a long, clinging farewell, and then Maurice Ransome walked quickly in the direction of the railway station, whilst Doris walked slowly home, the song no longer on her lips, her face downbent and troubled.

She could not account, even to herself, for the strange feeling of desolation and misery that haunted her as she passed up the lane down which she had gone so gaily only such a little time before. A weight lay upon her heart, yet she could not discover any reason for its presence. To be sure, her aunt—Miss Clara Browne, with whom she lived—did not approve of her marriage with the rising young artist, Maurice Ransome. But the disapproval was based only on worldly grounds, and now that the wedding was actually fixed to take place three weeks hence, Doris felt that her forebodings were ridiculous and unreasonable.

She and Maurice had met for the first time only a few months before, when he had been staying in the neighbourhood, and their love had sprung into being on that very first occasion.

In spite of Miss Browne's strenuous opposition the young people had not allowed the grass to grow under their feet;

Digitized by Google

their engagement was soon announced, and now Doris's busy fingers had already made many of the gowns that she would wear as Maurice's wife. She entered her aunt's cottage on that June evening with lagging steps, and her heart beat in odd, frightened beats when from the drawing-room she caught the sound of a voice that always had a strange power of stirring her to an incomprehensible fear and repulsion. The voice was a little raised, Doris plainly heard the words, "My brother is a very determined man. He is mad about your niece—quite mad; he intends——"

The speech did not end, for Doris flung open the door and walked into the drawing-room with head uplifted and eyes blazing brilliantly. Her aunt, a small, mean-looking woman with close-set eyes and a hard mouth, sat by the window; and opposite to her was a tall woman whose dark, handsome face might have compelled reluctant admiration, but whose sparkling eyes and thin lips gave one also a dim feeling of repulsion.

"Good evening, Miss Dunbar," Doris said coldly, "I am afraid I am interrupting an interesting discussion?" and she looked with a little smile from the visitor's handsome, evil face to her aunt's embarrassed countenance.

"Not at all, Miss Maitland," Miss Dunbar answered smoothly. "I was having a friendly chat with your aunt. You have been rambling in the lanes, no doubt?" Her keen eyes looked sharply into Doris's indignant ones.

"I have been with my betrothed, Mr. Ransome," the girl said quietly, "he comes down from town every now and then to see me."

Miss Dunbar's eyes flashed, an evil smile showed on her thin lips. "Your wedding day is fixed, I suppose?" she said.

"Yes, it is fixed for the 14th of July."

"And will Mr. Ransome still work in the studio of his friend, Mr. Wright? They are both friends of ours, you know."

The visitor's eyes seemed as though they were trying to penetrate to the very thoughts in Doris' brain, but the girl's face and voice were calm.

"Yes, I fancy that your friend Maurice and Mr. Wright have found a house with a studio; he will only be with Mr. Wright until we are married."

At the last words a kind of spasm swept over the elder woman's face; a look of such jealous anger shot into her dark eyes as made Doris recoil a step, all her sick repulsion to this woman rising up afresh. At that moment the visitor rose to go, but in spite of her suave manner, Doris instinctively realised that for some reason she could not divine, Marian Dunbar hated her, and would do her an injury if it were possible. "But it is not possible!" her heart cried out, "Maurice and I love each other; we shall soon be together for always, no one can harm us now; and yet why did I hear that hateful woman telling my aunt of her brother's mad infatuation for me—why?"

* * * * *

"With me you shall have all that your heart can desire; with him you will be in poverty and want!"

"But I love him! we are betrothed—our wedding day is fixed—how dare——"

"I dare do a great deal—for your sake. Listen to me, Doris, listen and heed."

"I will not hear another word—not another word!" and the girl tried to tear her hands from the rough grasp of the man who held them; a man with a dark, handsome face and gleaming eyes. "Why do you torment me?" A low laugh broke from the man who stood beside Doris in the lane beyond her aunt's cottage; a low laugh full of meaning.

"Look in your glass and you will understand," he said; "and remember—when you look—that the love of a man like Reginald Dunbar is resistless as a flood. Nothing can stay it, nothing shall get in its way. I shall win you yet!" And, flinging her hand from him, the man who had spoken turned away and strode down the lane.

* * * * *

"Do you know Ransome's whereabouts, he has disappeared from the Studio for two days—missing several appointments?" "WRIGHT."

The above telegram was put into Doris Maitland's hand a week before her wedding-day, and she read it through several times, her face grown white and rigid before its full meaning broke upon her.

Then, with a wild look in her eyes she looked at her aunt, who sat in the corner of the drawing-room, knitting and watching Doris furtively.

"Read that!" the girl cried hoarsely, "I must go to look for him at once—at once! My God! What can have happened to him?" And she wrung her hands together in frenzied misery.

"What should have happened?" answered her aunt, folding up the telegram, and glancing coldly at her niece, "You are absurdly agitated over nothing, Doris. Mr. Ransome is no doubt making the most of his last days of bachelordom. Why should Mr. Wright expect him at the Studio?"

"Why?—Because it is Maurice's working place. Because he is there regularly, he makes his appointments there, he paints his sitters there! Cannot you see that he has missed appointments by remaining away? What can it mean? Ah, what can it mean?"

And Doris paced the room with hurried, uneven steps.

"Bless my soul, what a fuss you make over a most ordinary occurrence!" Miss Browne said snappishly. "Surely a man may stay away from work for two days when he is going to be married. I always considered Mr. Ransome a very doubtful character—as you know. My suspicions are verified; it is perfectly plain that he is forgetting work and duty in a whirl of dissipation and excess. It——"

"Be silent!" Doris exclaimed passionately, "Maurice is the soul of goodness and honour. Duty is ever his first thought! His heart was in his work, his work was for me and for our home, he would never neglect it for dissipation or—— I shall go to town at once," she broke off suddenly.

"And pray why?"

"To look for Maurice," the girl cried, "I cannot rest here, when he may be in danger—in difficulty. I shall go at once."

"My dear Doris—it is impossible—the proprieties——"

"The proprieties!" Doris's voice rang with scorn, "What do I care for Mrs. Grundy if the man I love is in danger? I must go and find Maurice—I tell you I must go and find Maurice, for without him my life is a howling wilderness!"

A few hours later Doris stood in the big studio shared by her lover and his friend Mr. Wright, and the latter, whilst telling his story, was wishing from the bottom of his heart that he could find any girl so beautiful and strong and single-minded as this one, to love him as Doris loved Maurice.

"I am fairly puzzled," he was saying, as his respectfully admiring glance fell on the girl's lovely troubled face, "Two nights ago Ransome went out to see our mutual friend Digby. He was coming back here to share my diggings, as he has been doing lately, till his house is ready. When by midnight he was not in, I concluded he was stopping at Digby's, but when the next day came and went and there was no sign or word from Ransome, I grew uneasy, more especially so because he had two good appointments for that morning—two important sitters, both of whom went away very annoyed. That night Ransome never came back, nor did I hear word of or from him yesterday, and at last, growing thoroughly alarmed, I telegraphed to you this morning. You have heard nothing either?"

"Nothing!" Doris' voice shook with anxiety. "I had not expected a letter, knowing he was busy. My last news of him was three days ago, when he wrote a full account of his work, of his prospective sitters, and of our future."

"He had no anxiety or worry?"

"HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA" COMMENCES NEXT WEEK.

Digitized by Google

"None that I know of. Oh, I am sure he had none—we were so happy!" She said the words with such pathos that Wright gulped down a lump in his throat.

"I've been round to the police," he said, presently, "and they laugh at me and declare he will turn up, that he is having a lark, and so on. But you and I know Ransome better than that, Miss Maitland."

"Yes—we know him better than that," she repeated slowly, "I am sure some harm has befallen him. There is foul play somewhere."

"I have thought so myself," said Wright, with some hesitation, "but then—why—who——"

"I do not know," Doris replied, her brows drawn together in earnest thought, "I cannot explain to you, while I feel so certain of what I say, but I say it again—there is foul play somewhere, and—I will never rest till I have found Maurice—I know he is good and true; I know he is in danger, I feel it, I am positive of it." Her eyes glowed with a strange fire, and Wright watched her in awestruck silence till she spoke again.

"I shall remain in London," she said, "I have a friend with whom I can stay, and I will leave no stone unturned to find the man I love," and her eyes looked straight into those of the young man with a glance of such high courage as made him say in his heart—"Ransome is the luckiest chap I know."

Despite many protesting letters from Miss Browne, Doris carried out her intention of remaining in London, and her boxes were sent to her there with a frigid note from her aunt assuring her that she was wasting both time and strength in looking for "a dissipated wretch who ardently wished to remain hidden."

Doris smiled sadly but proudly, because her faith in Maurice remained as ever firm and unshaken, even though the long days as they dragged by brought no news of the missing man. The police, alert at last, declared themselves baffled and puzzled, so entirely had Maurice Ransome disappeared as it seemed, from the very face of the earth, leaving no shadow or trace behind him, and each day Doris' face grew more lined and white with misery, whilst her eyes that had been so blue and radiant had grown dim with much watching and many tears.

The day that should have been her wedding-day came and went, and yet there were no tidings of Maurice. It was as though the earth had opened and swallowed him up, so completely was every trace of him wiped away.

It was on the 16th of July that Mrs. Court, the lady with whom Doris was staying, urged the girl to go with her that evening to a big reception at the house of a friend, and though Doris at first entirely refused, saying that she had neither the heart nor the courage to go to such entertainments just now, her natural unselfishness at length made her yield to Mrs. Court's pleading. "Do come, Doris," that lady said earnestly, "my husband cannot go, and it is so lonely to go by myself. Do come."

Thus it was that Doris that night found herself walking into a brilliantly lighted room in Mrs. Court's wake, feeling in no mood for gaiety, starting intently when she caught sight in the glass of a tall girl in a red gown whose face wore so haggard a look that for a moment she could hardly believe it was her own reflection.

DON'T MISS THE CRAMOPHONE COMPETITION ON PAGE 584.

At the same instant a voice beside her said smoothly—

"What an unexpected pleasure, Miss Maitland," and turning, she found herself face to face with the man she hated, Reginald Dunbar. He pressed her hand, and whispered in the caressing voice that always made her shiver:

"You are in sore trouble, I hear. My heart has ached for you."

Was it fancy, Doris wondered, or was there really a gleam of triumphant malice in his dark eyes?

"I am in terrible trouble," she answered with quivering lips, "please do not speak of it I——"

"You have my deep sympathy," he replied, and again his eyes gleamed oddly. "I fear there is little hope——"

"Little hope?" she spoke fiercely, "I will never give up hoping—never, never."

Then she turned from him, and, with a swish of her scarlet gown, mingled in the crowd.

It was nearly an hour later when, seated at one of the tables with the stranger who had brought her down to supper, she saw this man fire his eyes suddenly on Dunbar, who sat a few tables away.

"Queer chap that," the stranger said, "I heard a queer story about him to-day. A friend of mine lives next door to him, and says he keeps a sort of lunatic in his house, in an upper room, and that the poor fellow is always out on the balcony at the back, declaring it's all a mistake or something, and that his wedding is waiting—the way the lunatics always——"

"Hush!" Doris exclaimed, an extraordinary conviction suddenly seizing her, "don't say anything, don't seem to notice what I am going to do. I—it's all right—I am not mad too, only tell me—tell me quickly, what is Mr. Dunbar's address?"

The young man stammered out the street and number, watching the girl with fascinated eyes as she rose from the table, and whispered—"Don't move, don't attract attention, but—Oh, God, give time!" and before the astonished man could speak or move, she had glided softly from the room.

Not even waiting to put on her cloak, she bade the servant summon a cab, and ordered it to drive from the door in the direction of the Park. She had forgotten Mrs. Court, she could think of nothing but the strange, overwhelming certainty with which her mind was filled, that she was on the way to find her lover.

After going a short distance she bade the cabman drive her to Mr. Dunbar's house, and having reached it, she descended from the vehicle, and bade the cabman do the same.

"What I am doing seems strange to you," she said, noting the surprise in the man's face, "but I have reason to think a gentleman is being wrongfully detained in this house. I am going in—will you come with me and help me, you shall be liberally paid—it may be a matter of life and death."

Her earnest pleading, her beautiful face, influenced the driver to accede to what seemed a very strange request, and summoning a passing man to hold his horse, he followed the young lady in her trailing scarlet gown up the steps.

The pealing notes of the bell she pulled clanged noisily through the house, and it was many minutes before shuffling feet sounded in the hall, and the door was cautiously opened. The man who looked out had a singularly repellant face, but Doris instantly saw that he was light and small, and that the cabman was large and burly—she stepped into the hall without a word, brushing the man haughtily aside.

"I have come to fetch the mad gentleman," she said, "I have just seen Mr. Dunbar."

"Mad gentleman? There ain't no mad gentleman here," the man answered blusteringly, but Doris saw by his face that he was lying.

"Yes there is," she said sternly, "upstairs, and I have come to fetch him away."

"Hoity toity, we'll see about that," the man began insolently, but Doris turned to her cabman friend.

"Lock him in the dining-room," she said, "and follow me upstairs." And without another word she ran swiftly up the broad staircase, followed in a very few seconds by the sturdy cabman, and by the oaths and cries of the man immured in the dining-room.

The house was a luxurious one, on the soft carpets their footsteps made no sound, and the top of the house was reached in safety. On this top landing three doors faced Doris and her faithful attendant, and Doris paused to listen for any sounds from within either room. In two of them all was silent, but from the third came sounds of heavy, stertorous breathing, and Doris heard a woman's voice say, in tones of agony—

Digitized by Google

"Reginald is a devil—a devil! I never intended that he should be injured, I——"

Without a second's delay, Doris flung open the door, and surveyed a strange scene. In the dim light she could make out that the room was a large bedroom, and as the door opened a woman sprang from a kneeling position beside an armchair in the corner and confronted the two intruders.

Her face was pale as ashes, but her eyes blazed fiercely.

"You, Miss Maitland, and here? How dare you come into my brother's house uninvited, unannounced? How dare——"

Doris did not speak. Pushing the other woman aside with a strength born of desperation, she rushed to the armchair in which lay the inanimate form of Maurice Ransome, his eyes closed, his face of a deathly pallor, terrible stertorous breathing issuing from his lips.

"Maurice, my dear, my dear," the girl cried in anguish. "Oh, what have they done to you?" And covering his unconscious face with kisses, she sank down by his side for a moment in despairing misery.

"You cannot stay here," Miss Dunbar's voice snarled in her ear, "you——"

"I shall go at once, and I shall take with me the man you have injured—perhaps murdered," Doris cried. "Take that woman," she went on, addressing the cabman, who by this time was thoroughly enjoying himself, "lock her in one of these rooms, then come and help me."

Marian Dunbar was helpless in the hands of the burly gentleman, who with exceeding promptitude stuffed a handkerchief into her mouth, deposited her in an empty room next door, and locked her in, returning instantly to Doris's assistance.

Her efforts to restore Maurice to consciousness were unavailing, but she implored the cabman so earnestly to help her get her lover from the house that the good man realised the importance of immediate action. He and Doris, with the utmost difficulty pulled Maurice to his feet, but he was a dead weight upon them, and it was only by dint of dragging him along as though he were a log of wood, that they drew him to the head of the stairs.

The descent of the staircase was a matter of difficulty, not unaccompanied by danger, and had it not been for the cabman's unusual height and strength, that descent never could have been made. But at last, after what seemed to Doris interminable ages, they reached the hall, where by now, two female servants stood amazed and appalled by the loud cries of the man locked in the dining-room. They did not dare offer any resistance to the cabman, who scowled at them ferociously, and also by dint of alternately dragging and pulling, and greatly assisted by Doris' strong, loving arms, at length succeeded in getting Maurice to the pavement outside the house.

With the help of the loafer who held the horse, the still unconscious man was hoisted into the cab, and Doris turned to speak to her friend, and a sight met her eyes that drove the blood from her cheeks.

At the far end of the street, clearly outlined under a gas lamp, she saw Dunbar, hatless, and in his evening clothes, racing along the pavement at top speed, calling and gesticulating to the little party at his door.

"Stop him, stop him, for God's sake!" the girl cried to the cabman; "keep him away, do not let him catch us. Ah, God help me, he must not catch us!" And uttering the words, she dashed like lightning towards the cab, and before the astonished owner could remonstrate or protest, she had climbed to the driver's seat, seized the reins, whipped up the horse, and driven off at a pace calculated to upset the equanimity of any constable in the kingdom.

The cabman gasped, and then broke into a laugh and a loud exclamation:

"She's a good plucked 'un, if ever there was one," he cried, "and now for the gentleman."

Dunbar at that very instant drew near to the doorsteps. His face was convulsed with rage, his eyes glared, he swore roundly at the cabman, who made a dash in his direction; but though his strength had enabled the latter to be of use to Doris before, his agility was not equal to Dunbar's. In the twinkling of an eye the latter had raced past him, still reviling hideously, and vanished round the corner in the direction taken by the cab.

On and on tore the vehicle with the inanimate man inside it, and the girl in her scarlet gown on the box, whilst behind it a man in evening dress raced as though a fiend were at his heels.

Well was it for Doris that from her earliest childhood to drive a horse had been as easy to her as to walk or run, and she threaded her way with a dexterity little short of marvellous considering the pace at which she drove.

On and on they flew, unheeding of protesting policemen, unstopped even in the more crowded thoroughfare. On and on through the night, till the man in pursuit, panting, breathless, with beating heart and starting eyes, was perforce obliged to surrender the chase.

"Doin' it for a wager, I suppose?" asked a policeman. "'Taint usual to see ladies in evenin' dress drivin' a cab."

"A wager? No, confound her!" panted the luckless Dunbar. "I vowed I would conquer her and she has conquered me."

"Somethin' like a wager, after all," mused the policeman, as he went his way, inwardly thinking that the gentleman speaking to him looked as pretty a villain as he had seen in many a long day.

Somewhere after midnight, Mr. Wright was roused from meditation at his open window by the astounding sight of a a cab driven by a lady in evening dress, stopping at the studio door, and his amazement on discovering the identity, both of the driver and occupant of that cab, may be better imagined than described.

Kindly hands speedily carried Maurice indoors. A doctor and two policemen were sent for, and one of the latter was dispatched to Dunbar's house, whilst the other took charge of the empty cab. In the doctor's hands, after a while, Maurice recovered consciousness, but it was many days before he was well enough to give an account of all that had happened to him.

It then transpired that on the very evening he was first missed, as he was leaving his friend's house, a man came up to him, giving him an urgent note from Miss Dunbar, who begged him to come and see her at once on business. He had always been on friendly terms with the lady, though totally unaware of her mad passion for him, and he instantly obeyed the summons.

On arriving at the Dunbars' dwelling, he had, to his great surprise, been shown into a room at the very top of the house, where Miss Dunbar greeted him pleasantly, begged him to be seated, and began to tell him a long, somewhat incoherent story of a picture she wished him to paint.

She then left the room for a moment, and no sooner was she gone than Maurice heard a stealthy step behind him, felt something wet and cold upon his face, and sank into unconsciousness. When he awoke from this, he found himself a prisoner, and totally unable to escape from the hands of Dunbar, who taunted him with being a lunatic kept him as a rule chained to a chair or to a railing in the balcony, and when he became too violent, drugged him heavily.

Maurice said that the wretched man had sworn over and over again that he would keep him in durance vile until Doris consented to be his wife, or until death set the prisoner free.

Dunbar suffered the due penalty of his deeds, and his sister discreetly vanished from polite society; but Maurice and his wife are radiantly happy and prosperous, and no one is more popular than the distinguished artist who, for those short and fateful days of anguish and terror—disappeared.

L. G. Moberly.

"HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA" COMMENCES NEXT WEEK.

Digitized by Google

Frances Norton: Adventuress.

THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA.

Revelations in High Life by a Lady's Companion.

The writer of this series of true stories acted for many years in the capacity of lady's companion to a Society adventuress who lived by robbing her unsuspecting guests. Names have, for obvious reasons, been altered, but the facts are correct.

Cynthia Hamilton: Her companion.

THE CURTAIN FALLS.

For a moment my cousin made no answer. Then, with a quick breath, she stooped over me, bringing her face close to mine.

"And if I did," she said, "what then? No," as I tried to interrupt. "You shall hear me out before you speak. You know what difficulties I have had to overcome, the plots and schemes I have had to combat to bring about this marriage. You know just what is at stake, what it will mean to me if Kinross should take fright and throw me over. I have let nothing stand in my way, nothing! Is it likely that at the last moment I should let Fluffy's jealousy defeat me? I've feared him all along in my heart of hearts, and when I read his threats on board the yacht I was horribly frightened.

But after the first shock I took courage, and when he suddenly appeared in Guernsey I resolved to fight him to the last. I went to meet him this morning determined that, come what might, I would ensure his silence. I would appeal to him, plead with all the force of fascination I could summon. But my words left him untouched; nothing that I could say would move him. He stood there silent, still, listening with a smile on his smooth lips—a smile that maddened me. And at the thought of what this sleek, smooth coward could do, at the thought that he could keep from me all that would make my life worth living, fierce, unreasoning passion gripped me. The world grew dizzy; the sea, the sky were blurred before my eyes, the ground rocked beneath my feet, a voice louder and louder yet cried within me, saying, 'Kill!' He stood before me close to the brink and the smile never left his face, not even when I threw myself upon him. He was strong, so strong that I dreaded he would escape me. I panted, straining, struggling with every nerve, every muscle of my body. Of a sudden he stumbled, slipped, lost his footing, and——"

She paused. "When next I looked," she said in a hoarse whisper, "he was lying halfway down the shaft on a ledge in the stone. His face, his sneering, smiling face was white and still, and his wide eyes stared unseeing at the sky. And yet, and yet he was not dead. Child"—she caught me by the arm—"why do you look at me like that? Do you think I should be on my knees weeping with joy that he is still alive? He, the man who wishes to ruin me? You can't understand a woman such as I am. For me and those like me there can be no looking back; our only chance is to go on without regret, without remorse, fighting until the last."

"But he," I stammered, heedless of anything but Fluffy's danger, "have you heard how he is?"

"Not yet," she answered.

"Then I must find out," I cried, "now, at once! I will not say a word of what you have told me, Frankie, but I must know how he is. His face, white and still, haunts me. He is alone with nobody to help him, nobody to do him a kindness; and it is you—you that he loved so much—who has done this thing. Don't try to stop me, to hinder me. I will not listen to you. I must go!"

My cousin smiled contemptuously. "Where?" she said. "You forget we are at sea."

I fell back on the pillows with a sob. Whenever I set my will against my cousin, whenever I strove imperfectly and weakly but sincerely to combat her decision, circumstances always seemed against me.

"Don't cry, Cynthia, you won't have long to wait. We shall put into Weymouth by the afternoon. Three hours will see us on shore. Then you can run with all speed both to the post office and the police station. At one you can send a wire inquiring about Fluffy, at the other you can lodge information against me."

My cousin spoke bitterly. Time had been when at her words, her tone, I should have given way, and, anxious only for her, have put all other considerations from me. But now—and for the first time—I put another before Frankie. I loved her always, I was fond of her, proud of her; in my eyes circumstances and not my cousin had always been to blame.

But now with the remembrance of poor Fluffy strong upon me, I could not forgive, could not excuse her.

She read my thoughts, and, kneeling by my side, laid her head next to mine upon the pillow.

"You're going to give me away, Cynthia," she whispered. "I'm a heartless, wicked woman, you think, who doesn't deserve the least consideration. All true, my dear. All true, and yet I haven't been so bad to you. I've loved my little cousin very dearly. If I've been unkind or cross, I never meant it. I——" She paused, her voice shook, there were tears in her eyes. Tears from Frankie!

Digitized by Google

"No, no!" I cried in a passion of grief. "You've never been unkind, and you're not wicked, only—only——" She drew my head on to her shoulder and smoothed my hair.

"I'm not quite the paragon you thought me, eh?" she said; "and you're disappointed. Never mind, dearie, you'll meet a woman after your own heart some day. But you won't love her, and she'll bore you to death! Be patient just a little longer, Cynthia, until I'm married, and then I promise I won't puzzle or perplex you any more—I'll be good, good as gold."

"What do you want me to do?" I asked sadly.

"Nothing very much. Be silent as to Fluffy, that is all. Don't mention his name, if you can help it, and if you're asked any questions, say you don't know anything about him. As for his sufferings, I don't suppose he's much hurt. He's sure to have plenty of money, so you may be sure he'll be treated with all kindness and consideration. You shall wire to the Hotel Poolin directly we get to Weymouth, if it will make your mind easier. But whatever the answer may be promise you will say nothing?"

"Even——" I paused. I could not put into words the awful thought, if he were dead!

Frankie looked at me long and fixedly. "No matter what the answer, you must promise to say nothing. Promise!" Her eyes upon mine, her hands clasping mine, her will strong and implacable, beat down my resistance.

"I promise!" I said, and as the words left my lips a dead weight seemed to settle on my heart.

Frankie kissed me, patted my cheek, and seemed to think the matter ended.

"It's just on twelve," she said. "We're due at Weymouth about three. If you feel well enough I think you'd better try and dress."

"Frankie," I cried, my mind suddenly recalled from Fluffy to myself, "who pulled me out of the water?"

"Need you ask? Do you suppose Chesterton would have allowed anyone to do it but himself? It's the special prerogative of a lover to rescue his lady from a watery grave. You were pretty bad when he fished you out, Cynthia—white as a sheet and quite unconscious. Chesterton's been knocking at your door a hundred times at least in the last half hour. Shall I tell him you're better?"

"Please," I answered.

As a matter of fact I felt horribly bad; the fright and the anxiety had given me a shock from which it was not easy to rally. Somehow or other I dressed myself and got on deck. Chesterton regarded me with much concern. I tried to thank him for his courage, but the words would not come. I was within an ace of breaking down, when Mrs. Venables appeared upon the scene.

"She's not fit to be spoken to," said the kindly little woman, "or even looked at. Come and sit here, Cynthia, by me. Nobody shall disturb you."

She placed me in a comfortable deck-chair, and there, sheltered from the sun by an awning, I closed my eyes and tried to seem at peace—peace that I was so far from feeling. My heart beat, my pulses throbbed, the swish of the waters made me catch my breath in terror. Each wave that we surmounted, each landmark that we passed shortened our journey, shortened the time of my respite, hastened the hour when I should know, must know, the full extent of Frankie's guilt. Perhaps the news would be good, perhaps I should hear he was better? The wash of the waves seemed to echo my words, the swish of the water against the yacht seemed to reply to them. I could almost hear the words, "Dead; he is dead!"

The sunshine glinted on the waters, gleaming like gold; but my eyes were blind, I could only see my cousin and poor Fluffy.

Frankie stood by Lord Kinross, her smile brilliant, her laugh sweet, as calm and as controlled as though the events of the morning had never been. Could she not feel, this beautiful, cold-hearted woman? Did she know no fear, no pity, no remorse? Was she callous or a marvel of self-command, feeling yet hiding all she felt?

The yacht raced home the last few miles, the coast came nearer and nearer, my anxiety and my apprehension grew to fever height.

I barely waited to be safely set on shore, but started off, trembling, for the post office.

"She's not got over her accident yet, poor child!" I heard my cousin say. "She feels weak and hysterical, and is afraid of breaking down before you all. Leave her to me, Lord Chesterton, she'll be all right directly. I'll take her to a chemist and get a draught. We'll come on after to the hotel—perhaps get there as soon as you."

Frankie linked her arm in mine and guided me through devious streets and thoroughfares until I grew quieter, more composed.

"Will you have some brandy?" she asked me, as we reached the post office. "There's an hotel close by, if you like. No? Well, then we'll come and send the wire. But remember," her fingers closed tightly on my arm—"remember whatever happens, you have promised to keep silence."

"I promised," I said, with dry lips, "and I will keep my word."

I watched my cousin rapidly fill up the form asking for particulars as to Fluffy's condition. She directed it to the manager of the hotel, and signed it "Cynthia Hamilton."

"Now," she said quietly, "there will be just an hour or more to wait. You had better come and have something to eat."

I shook my head. "I can do nothing, nothing till we get the answer." I leant wearily against the desk and listened to the tap-tap of the instrument, spelling out the message. I would wait till the same instrument clicked forth its sentence of life or death.

"You'll faint in a minute," said Frankie anxiously. "Come, like a good girl, and have some dinner; you shall be back in time, I promise you."

But for once I was obstinate. I insisted on remaining. Frankie managed to get a chair for me, and placed it near the door. I watched the people—holiday-makers for the most part—and envied their bright smiles, their happy faces. Frankie stood by me, tall and slim, in a nautical costume of pale blue and cream serge. I counted the buttons on her coat and studied their pattern—an arabesque of pearls and gold—so intently that I could draw one from memory even now. I noticed how white and delicate her skin gleamed against her frock, and the sun shone on her hair tingeing it with gold.

And then from momentary oblivion the click of the telegraph aroused me to sudden and sickening remembrance. It beat into my brain, it kept time with my heart. When—when would the answer come?

At last one of the clerks held up an envelope to Frankie. "Yours, I think," she said, "addressed to 'Cynthia Hamilton.'"

My cousin smiled and took the wire. Her hands never trembled, the colour did not leave her cheeks. Quietly, deliberately she drew out the slip of paper—that thin pink slip that has spelt defeat or victory, sorrow or gladness to how many?

With beating heart I started to my feet, and looking over her shoulder eagerly read. And as I read the tears streamed from my eyes, tears of relief—I was so glad, so thankful!

"Frankie," I cried, and clasped her hand.

She made no answer; she did not, I think, hear me. Her face was white, her mouth was drawn; with eyes wide with fear, dark with terror, she stared before her.

Thus ran the telegram, it was from Fluffy's doctor:

"Patient has recovered consciousness. Sprained ankle, but no serious injury. Doing well."

Doing well! And there were yet three days to pass before my cousin's wedding day.

* * * * * * *

We arrived at Cromer late that evening. Frankie went straight to her room, and sent word to Lady Fairbain—Hartland's aunt—that she was too tired to reappear. Kinross went over to the hotel where he and Chesterton were going to put up. I took refuge with my old friend Lady Paula.

Early the next morning Frankie came to my room. She looked ill, almost haggard; there were dark shadows under her eyes, which were feverishly bright. As she sat there in the grey light of the early morning I realised what yesterday in my joy for Fluffy's safety I had overlooked. If Fluffy were able to travel before Frankie's wedding day that wedding would not take place. As for writing or wiring—I sat up wide awake at the thought.

Digitized by Google

"HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA." NEXT WEEK.

"Suppose Fluffy wires to Hartland and tells him what has happened," I stammered.

"He will never say what took place at the quarry," said Frankie. "I know him well enough to be sure of that, and of the other things he has to tell Lord Kinross he would not wire."

"But he may send a letter?"

"Yes, I must guard against that. Hartland must not, shall not have a letter from him."

"How can you prevent it, Frankie?"

"Leave that to me, it will not be so very difficult. Fluffy will have his letter addressed here to Kinross, not knowing he is at the hotel. You will help me, Cynthia?"

"Yes," I answered, with a shiver, "I will help you."

"Very well, do as I tell you, and——" She paused, the words familiar to her lips at every crisis of her life, her favourite and defiant phrase, "I shall get through," seemed difficult to speak. She was playing her last game, and the stakes were heavy. For the last time she set her teeth and clenched her hands, for the last time she threw out her challenge bold and defiant, "That which I will—I do."

She was fighting against time; could she hold her own for the matter of two days and the half of a third, she would win a title, an income, a dazzling position, an assured future. Did she lose, she would leave the gaming table of Society, bankrupt of honour, of love, of happiness, of fair repute. Brilliant and beautiful, she would fall from the height of her proud ambitions to the depths of failure, bitter, irretrievable.

"I want you to dress quickly, Cynthia, and go into the garden," she explained. "When you see the postman coming down the drive go and meet him a little distance from the house. If there are any letters for Hartland slip them into your pocket until you can hand them to me. Don't make a mistake, and——" she broke off with a short, sharp sigh, "I can't stand much more of this; I wish it were over one way or the other," she said wearily.

It was yet early when I took up my station in the garden. Lady Fairbain's place was a beautiful house, set in a frame of leafy oaks, the same tall trees skirted the drive on either side.

Lady Paula saw me from her bedroom window and called out a cheery greeting. She found me some few minutes later, and commenced an elaborate description of our bridesmaids' dresses, Clairette's last creation. They had arrived the previous day with various huge chests containing Frankie's trousseau.

I did not pay much attention to her, my thoughts were fixed on the white drive down which the mail must come.

"There's the postman," Lady Paula cried at last. "I'll go and meet him."

She was off before I had time to start. I flew after her, and panting, suggested we should race to meet the man.

"Bet you a pair of gloves I'm there before you," she cried.

"All right," I gasped, and then raced for my very life, leaving Paula far behind.

"Letters—give them me, please, for the Hall." I stretched out my hands, and grasped the pile, and ran them over, hoping to complete my scrutiny before Paula reached me. Letters for Lady Fairbain, Frankie, Paula—but nothing for Lord Kinross.

In triumph I returned upstairs to my cousin.

"Thank goodness, I can take breathing time," she said. "The next post from Guernsey comes in the evening. Until then I am safe."

The evening mail, cleverly intercepted by my cousin, brought no word from Fluffy, nor was there any letter the following morning, Wednesday, the day before the wedding. That afternoon Frankie wired to the doctor at Guernsey for news of Fluffy. She sent a telegram from London, through Clairette, who was used to manipulating her clients' correspondence. There was no chance of a reply till late that evening. Meantime my cousin smiled and talked, and made herself more popular than ever with the men and women staying at the Hall.

Lady Fairbain had invited ever so many people for her nephew's wedding. It was to be a very notable function, and the Hall was filled to overflowing.

Frankie's presents were magnificent; she had sufficient plate to supply two dinner parties at the same time, and her jewellery was exquisite. Mary Vernon wrote a beautiful letter, accompanied by a pair of diamond earrings. My cousin threw them on the table with a little shudder.

"I wish she hadn't sent them," she muttered. "It's like an omen." Then with a shrug she swept the jewels into her case, and asked me angrily if I could not look a little more cheerful. "Your face literally haunts me, Cynthia. People will think that I ill-treat you."

I made no answer, but avoided my cousin until after dinner, when she sent for me.

"The post's in," she said, "no letter from Guernsey. And——" she paused, "I've heard from Clairette; she wired the doctor's answer on to me. Fluffy's had a relapse, he's delirious. Well," as I stood silent and trembling before her, "have you nothing to say? Is that man's safety more to you than mine? He will get well, sure enough. But not, thank Heaven, till I am married. At last, at last I am safe!" She laughed joyously, clasping her arms above her head she swayed to and fro in a ecstasy of triumph.

That night she was more beautiful, more irresistible than I had seen her. Everybody was enchanted with the fascinating Mrs. Norton. Late in the evening Pettigrew, quite unexpectedly, turned up. He was very smiling, but I thought a little strange.

"I do congratulate you, Mrs. Norton," he remarked. "You've had a hard fight, but you deserve to win, upon my word you do."

Frankie flashed a look of inquiry, his remark called for explanation. He gave none, however, but handed her a string of pearls, his wedding gift.

"Your secretary, will he be here?" asked Frankie, when she had thanked him for his present.

Hiram, however, made no answer, apparently he did not hear.

Everyone sat up late that night, Kinross did not leave till past one in the morning. He drew Frankie out into the garden to say good-bye. I watched them from the porch."

"Good-night, my love," he whispered. "To-morrow——" he stooped and took her in his arms.

She stood and watched him out of sight, a tall figure in the moonlight.

"To-morrow," she said, and caught her breath, "to-morrow!"

* * * * * * *

The morning dawned fair and fresh, the morning of Frankie's wedding day! I dressed myself early, and went to see if I could help my cousin. The marriage was to take place at two o'clock. Frankie would have liked it earlier, eleven, ten, or nine, if it could have been managed. Lady Fairbain, however, decreed against such unfashionable hours, two was the earliest time she would allow.

By one Frankie was dressed. They said she looked very beautiful in her satin gown, veiled with rich lace and picture hat of plumes, but for myself I do not know. From the earliest dawn my eyes had turned towards the clock, hoping, praying that the hour of her marriage would pass in safety. I could think of nothing else. My fear for Fluffy was lost in sudden apprehension that even now he would contrive to stop my cousin's wedding. And yet, stretched on a bed of sickness, delirious with pain—what could he do?

Digitized by Google

Again and yet again I told myself there was no cause for fear. And yet, and yet I feared.

When she was dressed Frankie dismissed her maid. Together we watched the hands of the timepiece drawing nearer, and yet nearer to the hour. Her lips were dry, her eyes hard and bright. Her agitation and excitement terrible to see.

Half-past one! Kinross would just be leaving the hotel for the church. In another quarter of an hour Frankie herself would start. And then——

Just as the clock chimed the half hour a maid rushed breathlessly upstairs.

"Lord Kinross, ma'am," she exclaimed, "he says he must see you for a moment."

"I will come," said Frankie quietly. She closed the door, and leant against the mantelpiece, panting for breath.

"My God!" she gasped, "has it come at last." She put her handkerchief to her mouth, her strong, white teeth bit at the lace and tore it. But the next minute she was herself again. Calmly, proudly, she swept downstairs, across the hall into the drawing-room where Hartland waited. She signed to me to follow.

"My darling, I was bound to come to you," were his first words. "I wanted to give you your bouquet myself. Dearest," he kissed her passionately—over his shoulder her dark eyes watched the clock.

"You will be late, Hartland; it is ridiculous of you to come here now. Go at once, you should be at the church by this time."

She pushed him from her playfully but firmly. Yet he still lingered, lingered with the boyish disregard of custom and conventionality that occasionally distinguished him.

Laughing, she drew him to the door. For a moment they stood together on the threshold. Then, as he bent to take another, and a last kiss from her lips, there came the sound of wheels, and the sharp gallop of a horse along the drive.

"Some one's in a hurry," said Kinross laughing, "it's a case of haste to the wedding. Who is it, I wonder?"

I knew intuitively who it was. Nearer the wheels came, and nearer, they grew slower, gradually stopped.

"Don't wait," I screamed, "Hartland, don't wait."

Even as I spoke there was a slight commotion in the hall. And then a figure, limping, bandaged, his face white as death, but set in a look of grim determination, passed through the guests and on to where Lord Kinross and my cousin stood.

Frankie gave a sharp cry. All her scheming and her plots, all her intrigues and her selfishness had come to naught. The telegram we had received had been a false one. Fluffy had come himself.

"I have come here, Lord Kinross," he said quietly, "to stop your marriage with Mrs. Norton. Am I in time?"

As he spoke he entered the room; Kinross, dazed and bewildered, followed, with Frankie at his side. And the door shut behind them.

Instantly there was a hubbub of comment. Women discussed the situation with shrill voices and unkind intent, and the men gathered in groups and whispered gloomily. Throughout the stir I crouched against the door, my heart torn with the thought of Frankie. I could hear no word of what was happening, yet I stayed; I did not seem to have the strength to move.

"Come away, Cynthia, come away, little girl," said Pettigrew softly. "I've cleared off the women; look, the hall is quite empty. No one will see or speak to you. Run upstairs, you can do no good. No one can help your cousin—now."

At that my courage came back to me.

"I can help her," I answered, "and I will." I opened the door—the scene rises before me now.

Kinross was sitting in a chair, his head buried in his hands. Facing him stood Fluffy, gazing with cold, calm eyes at the woman who stood between them—a woman whose fierce determination and high spirit cowed before the power in the plain face of the man she had played with, the man she had mocked and derided, the man she called Fluffy!

"I can't take it in," said Kinross, raising his head. "I can't understand or comprehend it. Either you lie, or she"—he pointed with an eloquent gesture to my cousin—"she is—Oh, God, it can't be true!"

Fluffy leant forward and touched him on the arm.

"Listen," he said, in his cold and pitiless tone. "Mrs. Norton stole Mary Vernon's diamonds. Partly for the sake of the jewels, partly to prejudice you against Mary in her favour. Proof?" He smiled. "Here," he pointed to my cousin, "look at these pins!" With a deft movement he drew the pins swiftly from her hat. "These are Miss Vernon's earrings differently set. I know it because I arranged the affair. I got the earrings copied in paste, from a photograph, as your cousin, Percival Hope, surmised. A photograph Mrs. Norton stole, as she stole the notes from Hiram Pettigrew's pocket-book, which she placed in her cousin's box. See, here it is, Cynthia herself gave it me," and he drew out the memorable book of silver and green leather. "Proofs? What, have you not heard enough? Look then at this letter, in which Mrs. Norton tells me she has managed to get rid of some of Pettigrew's notes; and this, in which she says she has successfully changed the diamonds; and this, warning me that Hope has traced some of the missing securities. More? Certainly if you wish." He paused.

Kinross, with an attempt, perhaps, to parry the attack, asked in a high-pitched voice, "Why Fluffy told him these things?"

"You're incriminating yourself," he said. "If what you say is true, you are as guilty as the woman you accuse." Kinross drew himself up as he spoke, the dazed look left him, the import of what was happening struck home to him at last.

"Why do I tell you?" answered Fluffy. "To stop you marrying her. Why, again to that?" He paused, a heavy flush stole over his white, pasty-looking skin, and his eyes were brilliant. "She shall not marry you," he said, "nor any other man, because she's mine. Mine, I tell you, mine, though she deny me, and defy me to the end. Rather than see her your wife I am ready to proclaim her and myself guilty of theft, of swindling, of——"

Frankie suddenly interrupted.

"Don't listen to him, Hartland. He's mad, mad with jealousy. He does not know what he's saying"—she broke off suddenly.

With a grim smile Fluffy had handed Kinross the pile of letters.

"Don't look at them, dear, don't read them," she pleaded. "They don't count—nothing counts, but that I love you, Hartland!" She sprang to him and put her arms about his neck. But with a gesture of contempt, a look almost of revulsion, he stepped back.

"No," he said hoarsely, "not that."

Then he took up the letters Fluffy had given him, and read them one by one. His face grew cold, and hard, and set, until all trace of softness and of boyishness had gone. When he had finished reading he turned towards my cousin.

"Have you anything to say?" he asked coldly.

With the forlorn hope of softening him, Frankie clung to his arm. He shook her off, not roughly, but with a contempt that stung. She gave a low cry and staggered, then, catching her foot in her long draperies, with a crash she fell, striking her head against the corner of the fender. And as I saw her lying there, her fair head bowed, her pride for ever shattered, as I saw her lying at the feet of the man who, but a little while ago had vowed to love her, to protect her always, something seemed to snap at my heart. I gave a great cry of agony.

The room seemed suddenly full of people. Lady Fairbain, Paula, and a crowd of women, and at the last Pettigrew, and, yes, Percival Hope!

And then darkness, and the whole world blank.

* * * *

Some days elapsed before I woke again to life. My first question was of her, but the nurse sighed and shook her head.

"HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA." NEXT WEEK.

Digitized by Google

Fluffy, I learnt, had left after a stormy scene. I have never seen nor heard of him since. I asked for Paula, but she and her brother, I was told, had gone from the Hall. Lady Fairbain did not wish to see me. Pettigrew had also gone. There were left only Lord Chesterton and Percival Hope. Percival wished earnestly to see me, but I felt I could not. He had not been kind to Frankie—my poor Frankie, who had sinned so greatly, who had suffered so sorely.

I dressed myself with difficulty and sent for Chesterton. He was kind and good—how good I can never forget.

"Your cousin's gone away, dear," he said softly. "None of us know where. She was taken to her room, she had hurt her head, you know, and it was thought she was asleep. Late in the evening her room was found to be empty, she had gone, leaving no trace behind."

"No message for me, no note?"

He hesitated.

"She left a letter for me," he commenced softly, "about you. She said what I knew without any telling, that you were good and sweet as a woman could be, and that she left you to my care. So," he put his arm tenderly about my shoulders, "you belong to me now, Cynthia."

I shook my head,

"Not now," I answered, "I can never marry you now."

He tried hard to combat my decision, but at last consented to abide by it, for a time at least.

"I'll leave you alone for a bit, little girl. Then I shall make you change your mind. Meanwhile, I shall send you to stay with my sister."

I did not dispute further, but wished him "good night." He had arranged for me to leave the Hall next day, but late that night when all were sleeping, I stole out of the house. As my cousin had gone, so I went also, friendless and alone, into the world. I had said good-bye for ever to the Smart Set.

My struggles since then I will not enter into—they form no part of these "Confessions." I had a bad time, but at last I have reached some degree of comfort, mainly through the publication of these articles.

I am told that several of those who have read this series, have asked kindly after me, and have wanted to know what I am doing in the present, hope to do in the future.

To these I say that I am waiting for my cousin, waiting for the time—and it will surely come—when she will turn to me. The door of my heart is ever open for her. Though all the world should be against her, my arms should shield her, my hands work for her. I long for her, my beautiful Frankie! I long to take her head upon my shoulder and whisper that I love her, that I sorrow for her. Some day she will come back, some day she will put away from her the evil that has spoilt her life. And then, when like a tired child, she comes home—home to me, may the love I bear her blot out the remembrances of her sufferings and her sorrow and her shame.

Some day she will surely come, and until then I work, and watch and wait.

And if of your kindness you would do me some slight service, I would ask this—Think with regret, if you will, and sorrow, but not with harshness, of the woman I love so dearly, my cousin Frankie.

And so farewell! To the Confessions of Cynthia I needs must write

THE END.

[TO READERS.—If you have enjoyed this series of articles, I am sure that you will like the new series that starts next week. It has been written by a titled lady whose nom de plume is Lady Peggy Carstairs, and she tells of the way in which she endeavoured to "marry off" Belinda North (the daughter of an Australian millionaire) to some man with a title. The descriptions of life in high Society circles on the Continent are particularly vivid, and will tell you something you did not know before. May I ask you to buy one extra copy of next week's SHORT STORIES and give it to a friend who is likely to become a new reader. If so, I would thank you very much.—Ed. S S.]

TEN MORE GRAMOPHONES WAITING FOR CLAIMANTS.

HERE is a new competition by which ten more readers of Short Stories will each become the possessors of a handsome Gramophone.

The Gramophones are beautifully made instruments, fit to grace any drawing-room, and with every one will be given two records. The gramophone and the records would cost you £2 17s. in any shop. You could not get them for less.

All you have to do is to fix on one of the record discs, and you can hear the song or the instrumental piece as loudly as it was originally sung or played.

You can hear the finest bands in the world play the finest music.

You can hear the funniest comedians on the music-hall stage singing the funniest songs.

You can hear banjo champions playing solos, and other champions playing on the cornet or flute.

In fact, there is no limit to the number of songs and instrumental pieces you can hear.

Now that the long winter evenings are upon us, it is difficult to imagine a more enjoyable form of fireside entertainment than to sit in your armchair and listen to the voices of our best singers or to the musical performances of the best orchestras on the Gramophone. And this enjoyment may be yours continually by constructing for us one sentence.

The sentence you have to construct must be composed of words, the initial letters of which, in their proper order, make up the word "CHAPERONED"—a word selected from the title of the new series of articles "How I Chaperoned Belinda."

Here is a sample sentence: "Cynthia, Hartland And Percival Ever Regret Obdurate Norton's Endless Designs"

Make up a good sentence and write it down in ink in the spaces provided below, using the initial letters given as the first letters of your words. Then post the coupon on to the Gramophone Editor of Short Stories, 17, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.

All attempts must reach us by first post, Tuesday, November 4th. A handsome Gramophone will be awarded to each of the ten readers from whom we receive what we consider to be the best sentences.

CUT OUT THE COUPON FROM HERE.

C ..... R.....

H ..... O.....

A ..... N.....

P ..... E.....

E ..... D.....

Name .....

Address .....

Each competitor may send in any number of attempts, provided each is written upon a separate coupon.

Digitized by Google

NANCY BROWN.

A GIRL WITH TWO NAMES.

"I WANT a big bunch of flowers; roses, carnations, lilies, and that sort, with plenty of green stuff."

"Yes, sir; take them, sir?"

"Yes."

In five minutes Raymond Morris, laden with a fragrant burden, was rattling away in a hansom towards 80, Mandeville Street, where his little chum, Kitty Marsden lived.

"How she will love them," he thought, and then his face beamed, as he pictured her happiness at the good news he was bringing. To be retained as counsel in "Buller versus Coke," was indeed a piece of luck; he might now safely consider that his feet were firmly set on Ambition's steep ladder, and if it lay in his power they should never slip off. "Dear little Kitty!" Times should brighten for her also. What a hard life they had experienced the previous two years, she perhaps, more than he, for of how poor she had really been Raymond Morris had no conception. "Hard-up" meant to him a chop instead of a decent half crown dinner, but to Kitty it meant a roll and a cup of cocoa, instead of the chop.

They had first met at a second-rate boarding house in Pimlico; she was a clerk, and he, at that time had been qualifying for the Bar, living in the meantime on journalistic work. What made them chum so, he never quite knew; her intensely sympathetic face, voice and manner had appealed to him, and when later, their homes diverged, he taking some unpretentious chambers West, and she a big studio, where she might feel one little corner of the world was her own, they still remained firm chums, and rarely did a Saturday pass without their meeting, or a Sunday, when he did not go to tea, and afterwards smoke his pipe and talk over his big plans with his enthusiastic little hostess.

He often wondered what she got paid, but a sort of delicacy prevented his asking, as though they were the closest of friends, she had never given him the slightest encouragement to help her in any way, and never would, except on the rarest of festivals, allow him to take her out, either to dine or to a play, so in man-like fashion, he concluded she had enough on which to manage comfortably. That thought was to cost him many a pang later on, but he knew nothing of it, as he drove to her, his heart longing for her warm appreciation of his well-deserved success.

"She must come somewhere with me to-night," he muttered, "she has been looking very pale and tired lately, not a bit like her old merry self; she never laughs now, and Kitty's merry laughter is the best tonic in the world, why, it must be ten days since I've seen her, ah! here we are."

"Miss Marsden in?"

"Miss Marsden, sir, she's gone!" said the slavey, with a sad smile, for she saw Miss Marsden's sweetheart (as they had all christened him), was going to, as she put it later, "take on awful."

"Gone? Gone out, my good girl, I suppose, well, I will wait for her."

"No, sir; she's gone away. She sold all her things 'cos missus said she lost her place and couldn't live here any longer."

"Sold her things!" What in the dickens did the stupid girl mean? Just then the landlady appeared and handed him a note.

"Miss Marsden asked me to give this to you, sir, when you called. You see, sir, it were this way. A month ago, she lost her place, and, poor thing, she tried hard but she couldn't get another, and so she comes to me, and says as how she were a-going to try her luck elsewhere, and would I buy her things, which I did, though sorry enough I were to do it, for I liked her, sir; she wor the quietest, nicest lodger I'll ever have. You see, sir, it had been a bad time of year, August, and though I told her, she wor quite welcome to stay and the rent could go on until it wor convenient, she wouldn't, she wor that independent; but, come in, sir, a minute, and rest and read your letter, for you look mortal bad."

Morris stepped into the dark hall, and depositing the flowers, sat down and read the note.

"DEAR BIG CHUM.—Your little pal has had the mouldiest luck possible this last month. Hurst sold the business and the new man brought a daughter to do the books, so I was not wanted, and I haven't been able to get anything else. I've tried till I'm pretty nearly desperate, but you know I can't type nor write shorthand, and so I've just come to the end of my resources, and for the present, dear, big, man, our trails are going to divide; maybe they'll meet again, if not, your little pal will always thank you for the two happiest years she has ever had. If I get on, I'll write you, but I can't be under the stream and you afloat in a gay steamer, so it's best to say 'good-bye,' just for the present.

"Don't worry about me, dear chum. I won't forget our motto, 'Here's to a brave to-morrow, that's born from a brave to-day.'

"Dear big comrade, your little pal wishes you all the good luck obtainable."

Raymond at first felt very savage with Kitty. Why, in the name of all the gods, couldn't she have told him her troubles? He had poured out enough of his to her, but it was just like a woman, they never had any sense. And now how could he find her? Where and what was she doing in this vast Babylon? And then he grew remorseful, as he remembered his last visit. It had been wet and cold, and he had made up a big fire and they had had a jolly tea, poor little girl, he had helped to consume the very little she had—no wonder she had looked ill and worn and seemed quiet. He could have struck himself in his anger.

He left the flowers with the landlady, and slowly retraced his steps, all the pleasure and excitement gone, but, he would find her, and scold her well for being such a stupid little girl with no real conception of the word "Comrade."

* * * * *

Two years later in his comfortable bachelor quarters Raymond Morris sat smoking his after dinner pipe with his firm friend Dr. Bruton. Already he was becoming known as the "rising barrister," but somehow all his successes failed to give him the joy he had fancied they would.

"Morris, why don't you marry?"

"Suppose, I've not met my other half—my—what do you call it—Affinity, old man."

"Have you never cared for anyone?"

"Not in the way you mean. I once had the dearest little girl as a pal, but—well, I lost her—and I've never found her. Somehow I don't fancy I'll ever marry."

"Don't you think Madge and I are a good enough example?"

"Yes. Your wife is perfect. By the way, how's the little one, quite strong now?"

"Joyce? Yes, she and her governess, Nancy Brown—pretty name that—have come back looking like two rosy apples, it does my heart good to hear them laugh. That's the result of letting them run wild at Hayling Island for four months. They were a sorry looking pair when I sent them off.

Digitized by Google

"What was the matter with Miss—Nancy Brown?"

"Insufficient food, fresh air, and everything else. Trying to live—no, not live—exist respectably on about ten shillings a week. Heaps of girls are trying the same game, poor creatures. The result in her case was general weakness, debility—bad cold, acute attack of pleurisy—and then—thorough collapse. Young Staines—you know him, brought her to the hospital one night; she was coughing and the exertion made her faint. The conductor of the 'bus in which they were, called a policeman, and then Staines volunteered to bring her to us, and there she stayed. The wife heard all about her from me, and when we were at our wits' end to know what to do with her, for the poor thing had no friends, she proposed sending her away with Joyce, and well, you should see her now. Staines would hardly believe she was the same girl. But you'll see her to-morrow, you're dining with us?"

"Yes. But had she no relations—Miss Nancy Brown?"

"She was insensible for days, and raved about Nancy Brown and her work, and for a long time she was too ill to be questioned. We just asked if that was her name and she nodded, and eventually we found out she had no one belonging to her, and was just earning bread and butter by addressing envelopes."

"Poor thing!"

"Well, good night, old chap, I must be off."

Left to himself Raymond Morris began to think, and his thoughts were not pleasant. He reviewed that weary search for Kitty; perhaps she, too, was like this Nancy Brown, oh! why had she not trusted him?

* * * * *

"Please ma'am, what can we do? Prior's just fallen upstairs and twisted her ankle awful, and can't move, and there's master and his friend coming in for dinner in an hour."

"Can't move! Poor thing! What have you done for her, cook?" asked pretty little Mrs. Bruton, her face puckered as she tried to think how they could manage, and she had wanted the dinner to be especially nice for Raymond Morris.

"She's gone to bed, ma'am, perhaps when the doctor comes in, he'll have a look at her, but what can we do, who's to lay the table and bring up the things?" wailed the cook in a most dismal voice.

"Why I will, cook, if you won't look quite so tragic," and Nancy Brown danced into the room with the pet of the house—three-year-old Joyce, in her arms. "Don't worry, dear Mrs. Bruton, Prior is more frightened than hurt, she's going to lend me a cap and apron and I'll make the smartest parlourmaid in the world."

"Nancy! You——"

"Yes, why not? Why, dear Mrs. Bruton, think what you've done for me, please do let me help you out of this little difficulty," pleaded Nancy.

"But, my dear, I wanted you to look your prettiest for our friend, and now——"

"I don't think Mr. Raymond Morris will mind," replied Nancy, in rather a cold tone. "A rich, successful barrister isn't likely to take much notice of a nursery governess."

"Don't be silly, child. You don't know him or you would not talk like that. Well, dear, I suppose I must let you, but I shall tell them all about it, and you will come in after, won't you?"

"Perhaps."

In ten minutes Nancy was dressed, the pretty head was crowned with one of Prior's coquettish caps, and her fingers soon had the table laid, even to Mrs. Bruton's requirements.

"I wonder if he—oh! no, he won't—I expect he's quite forgotten"—and resolutely banishing a tear, Nancy ran off to help cook dish up.

As the soup was being handed to him Morris endeavoured to get a look at Miss Nancy Brown, whom his hostess had told him had come to the rescue so nobly, and the face appeared strangely familiar, but it was not until the gentle voice said demurely, "Sherry, sir?" that he traced the absurd likeness to Kitty. Nancy Brown was Kitty! why, he must be dreaming, and he pulled himself together and talked to his hostess, though not one movement of the amateur parlourmaid escaped his keen eyes. It was—it was Kitty. But why call herself Nancy Brown?

"Are you sure that girl's name is Nancy Brown?" he asked his friend, when later Mrs. Bruton had left them and gone to Joyce.

"Why, yes. She says so. Do you think you have discovered some famous criminal in her?" laughed the doctor.

"No, but wait till your wife joins us and then I'll tell you what I do think."

In the doctor's cosy sanctum Morris told his story, and of his fruitless attempts to find Kitty. "And often and often, Mrs. Bruton, that last month, I don't believe she had enough to eat. I remember one night calling to see her, and grumbling like a selfish idiot, because I had not had time to have a regular dinner, and her quiet remark, "Did you have no lunch, big man?" And when I said "Oh, yes," she replied gently, 'Then, I don't think you will hurt, but you shall have a cup of cocoa directly.'"

"She has refused to come down, but suppose you go to her, she is in the nursery, the second door to the left, and see if you can persuade her, and try to find out if she is Kitty," said Mrs. Bruton.

He thanked her and went.

"May I come in?"

Nancy looked very startled and grew extremely red, as she answered:

"What can I do for you, sir?"

"You can tell me, if you have a sister or any near relation named Kitty Marsden?"

"I had—once—why—why do you want to know?" and she faced him bravely.

"Because the one object of my life is to find her. I have been looking for her now for two years, and I've almost lost heart."

"Why do you want to see her so much?"

"Ah! that I must tell to her. Won't you give me her address—Miss Nancy Brown?"

"I—I cannot—she died—long ago," but as she uttered these words her face crimsoned, and she bent to the fire to hide her confusion.

"Pardon my flatly contradicting you, but"—bending towards her, Morris endeavoured to take her hand, "tell me, why is my little pal masquerading as Nancy Brown?"

"Don't, please don't," and, wrenching her hand away, the girl sank on the floor by Joyce's cot and Raymond saw the little form was shaken with tremulous sobbing.

Kneeling down by her, he endeavoured to take her in his arms. "Little girl, big man's little chum, don't cry, see, your comrade won't bother you any more, you shall be a dozen Nancy Browns if you like. See, was it this, you ran away from me because you were not getting on, and things got worse, and you couldn't trust big man, and so you were afraid he would find you, and you—silly child, you thought he might pity you, so you changed your name and that was why he could never trace his dear little chum—Kitty."

There was no answer, but he fancied the sobs were less.

"Sweet one, don't you see big man is crying too. Won't Kitty look up and smile at her comrade, she's hurting him awful."

At this Nancy, or rather, Kitty, raised her head, but her eyes fell again as they encountered Morris' ardent gaze.

"Don't you understand, little one, though things have gone so smoothly and well with big comrade, he's not enjoyed anything through the loss of his little pal. He has missed her tender sympathy so, and he wants her to come and share his good luck and look after him for—ever, will she?" and he gently stroked the little face. "We must go down and tell them that I am contemplating bigamy."

"Bigamy?"

"Yes, sweet one, don't you see, I'm going to marry Kitty Marsden and Nancy Brown."

Robert Murray.

Digitized by Google

Never Contracted Any.

GLADYS: "I hope, dearest, that you will never contract any debts." Jack: "Never." Gladys: "Jack, are you sure?" Jack: "Positive. I always expand my debts."

A Dear Girl.

"SHE is such a dear girl, and she loves flowers devotedly." "Yes," responded his unsympathetic listener, "most girls who love flowers devotedly are dear girls."

A Timely Warning.

FORTUNE-TELLER (to gaily-dressed girl): "Your husband will be a poor man—unless——" Maiden (eagerly): "Unless what?" "You dress more economically after marriage than you do now."

Excusable Sometimes.

HELEN HYLER: "Don't you think it is very bad form for a man who is calling on a young lady to sit down before she does?" Jack Lever: "Certainly; but under some circumstances he has to."

Unsentimental.

MR. POETICUS (entering cheerfully): "My love is like the red, red rose!" Mrs. Poeticus (looking up from the stove): "You'd look red, too, you lazy scribbler, if you'd been bending over a frying-pan for twenty minutes."

Poor Father.

CUSTOMER: "Some children's shoes, please." Dealer: "Yes, sir. Now there is an excellent make of shoe. How old is the child?" Customer (with a sigh): "Child! I have nine of them. Show me the wholesale department."

Only One of Many.

MAID: "Gentleman wishes to see you, mum. Here's his card." Miss Flirtie: "Um—I don't remember that name." "He said, mum, that you was to see him, or else give him something of his you had." "It must be someone I met at the seaside in the summer. Take that box of rings, and tell him to pick out his."

The Bridegroom Objected.

A WORKING man was being united to the lady of his choice at a certain church, and just before the moment for the production of the ring, the officiating clergyman leant toward the bride, and whispered: "Please take off your glove." To his intense dismay, the bridegroom resented the action, and cried: "Here, mister, no whispering to my gal."

What She Really Wanted.

JUDGE (to prosecuting witness): "Have you any real cause of complaint against your husband?" Wife: "Yes, sir. He refuses to buy me a new bonnet, and I haven't had a new silk dress for two years." Judge: "But I thought he came home tipsy and beat you over the head with a chair." Wife: "Well, he did; but I wouldn't count that if I could get the dress and bonnet."

Method in her Madness.

SWEET GIRL: "Papa, I wish you'd lock up your money and pretend to fail; there's a good old dear. It needn't last more than a week or two, and there are so many failures now no one will find fault." Father: "Of all things! Wha——" Sweet Girl: "Oh, it's all right. You see, I'm engaged to nine young men, and I've got to get rid of at least eight of them, somehow."

Made him an Example.

BRIGGS: "Does your wife object to you smoking cigarettes in the house?" Braggs: "No. She uses me as a horrible example to our boy."

A Cheap Threat.

OFFICER (to young lady at the ball): "If you do not reciprocate my love, I shall throw myself out of the window this very day." Lady: "You live on the ground floor, I presume?"

Two's Company.

CLARA: "My friend, Mr. Spooner, who caught a glimpse of you yesterday, said he would give anything to kiss you. Shall I bring him round to-night?" Maud: "No; send him round."

Distantly Related.

LIVINGSTON: "I didn't know that you and Miss Featherspray were so well acquainted." Nina: "Oh, yes; we are distantly related." Livingston: "How?" Nina: "We have both promised to be sisters to the same young man."

Wouldn't Look Well.

YOUNG LADY: "How much?" Telegraph Clerk: "Sixpence, miss." Young Lady: "What, for that one word, 'Yes'?" Telegraph Clerk: "You can repeat it half a dozen times for the same money if you like." Young Lady: "No, that wouldn't look well. It's an answer to a proposal of marriage."

Had his Reasons.

SCENE.—House of a recently-married pair. Loving Husband: "What are you smiling at, dear?" Sarcastic Wife: "I was recalling how you used to sit and hold my hand for an hour at a time before we were married. How silly you were." Loving Husband: "I wasn't silly at all. I held your hand to keep you away from the piano."

Wild Times.

"YOU make me think," John Williams said, dropping upon the sofa beside a pretty girl, "of a bank whereon the wild thyme grows." "Do I?" she murmured; "it's so nice; but that is pa's step in the hall, and unless you can drop out of the front window before I cease speaking, you'll have a wild time with him, my own, for he loves you not." He drops.

Willing to Oblige.

OLD BRAMBLE: "Want to marry my daughter, do you? Let me say, sir, that you are not exactly the sort of man I would like for a son-in-law." Young Gentleman: "Well, you are not the sort of man I would like for a father-in-law; but then, you know, we needn't be chummy unless we want to."

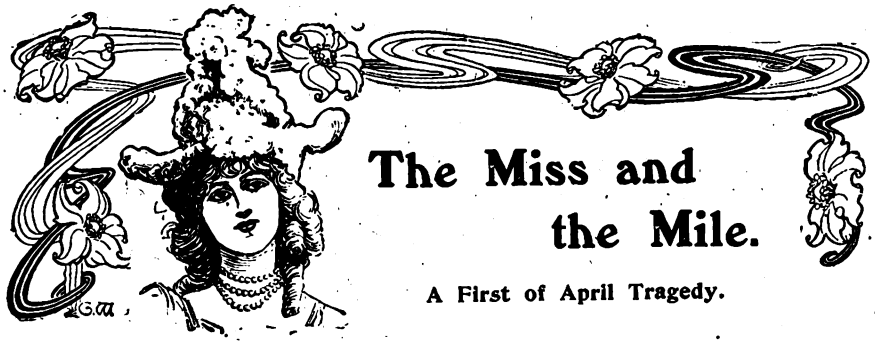
What he Wanted.

THE young man's face was flushed, and his manner was strangely agitated. "Miss Blanche," he said, "I hesitated about coming to you, but my feelings have overpowered me at last. Will it be too much for me to ask——" "Pray go on," said the maiden, with heart wildly beating, as his voice faltered. Yes, they were coming, the words that she and her dear mamma had so long waited for. "I came to ask you, Miss Blanche——" "Yes," she smiled encouragingly. "If it would be too much trouble for you to write down that recipe which you said you had for warding off indigestion. Doctors always charge so for a prescription."

He Acknowledged the Softness.

"YOU mustn't touch the top of the baby's head," said a mother to her four-year-old; "she has a soft spot there that is very tender." The youngster gazed at it curiously for a moment, and then asked: "Do all babies have soft spots on their heads?" "Yes." "Did papa have a soft spot on the top of his head when he was a baby?" "Yes," replied the mother, with a sigh, "and he has got it yet." And the old man, who had heard the conversation from an adjoining room, said: "Yes, indeed he has, my dear boy, or he would be a single man to-day."

Digitized by Google



The Miss and the Mile.

A First of April Tragedy.

SEPTIMUS SMITH was a man who lived in a world of his own. He was one of the best-hearted fellows breathing, but somehow he could not get the girls of his acquaintance to acknowledge this fact. He absolutely yearned for domestic felicity, but at thirty-eight he was still a bachelor, still in vain pursuit of the princess of his dreams.

Now, it was perfectly clear that the one thing above all others which stood in the way of his settlement in life, was his painful shyness—shyness which always seemed to afflict him most when, as had happened some dozen times or more, he had screwed his courage up to the particular point of interviewing the current lady of his choice, with a view to a proposal.

As a matter of fact, it never came to that; the proposal never, by any chance, got farther than the intention; the three blondes, two brunettes, and seven other young ladies who were a little of each, being left in that unsatisfactory state of ignorance which is not bliss. He had an exasperating way of veiling his meaning, so that even the Sphinx would have been puzzled to solve the riddle.

Still, in spite of all this, he had a certain sort of attraction for ladies generally. He was rich, fairly personable, and—which was a great point in his favour—he was of a romantic turn of mind.

Now, romance is all very well, but it doesn't appeal to everybody; and, therefore, while women of the younger sort admired Septimus Smith for the imagination that was in him, his own sex, to a man, wrote him down as being something very much like an ass.

For some months prior to the date of this chronicle, he had been an object of solicitude to one of his lady friends. Delia Spence did not deceive herself into the belief that she loved the bashful Septimus, being so far candid as to acknowledge to herself that a picturesque and up-to-date Kensington flat, together with plenty of money to keep it up—and a little over—were the things most to be desired in connection with her dilatory suitor's anticipated declaration.

Every reasonable opportunity was given Mr. Smith when he paid a visit to—as Delia's terrible young brother called it—"come up to the scratch," but surely no bird was ever so difficult to approach with the salt-box. Times out of number, Mrs. Spence, with all a mother's anxiety for her daughter's matrimonial future, found something to do elsewhere, so that the consequent tête-à-tête might have every chance.

Delia's younger sister Connie, also, was not a whit less considerate than her mother, and invariably vanished at the sound of Septimus Smith's hesitating knock and ring.

But it was all thrown away, and poor Septimus, much as he desired to declare himself, never succeeded in getting to the—"Will you be mine?"

Then he came to a resolution.

It was the last day of March, and he felt that, for him, there was only one way to take the plunge.

"It's no use," he said to himself; "if I wait 'till doomsday' I'll never be able to do it. Somehow the words seem to freeze on my lips just when I am going to speak. I'll write to her! That's what I'll do. It will be easier for me; and have precisely the same effect."

There was no hesitation now. A coward in the presence of beauty, Septimus Smith was a veritable hero on paper. The letter was a triumph of the epistolary art, the writer's hand and heart being offered for his lady-love's acceptance in terms at once splendid and convincing.

With the fateful missive in his pocket, he set out for Chiswick, in the spirit of the man who has greatly dared, and conscientiously looks for his reward.

But the fair Delia had also, herself, on that same last day of March, come to a resolution. She was what people style "getting on"—being sensible, she knew it—and felt that if much more time were "wasted," she stood a very good—or bad—chance of attaining to the "shelf."

She was determined if Septimus Smith really meant anything, he should be made to say it, or give place to another and a better man, in the person of Lieut. Treen, R.N., who, though not so well-off as Septimus, was younger and better looking.

To give her hesitant swain no shadow of an excuse for longer delaying his declaration, Delia had concocted a scheme which certainly did credit to her ingenuity.

Procuring, through a friend, tickets for a Kubelik recital at St. James's Hall for that evening, she had asked the gallant lieutenant, to his great delight, to escort Connie and herself.

At the last moment a toothache or a headache compelled her, she said, to remain at home, but that Mrs. Spence could take her place.

It was astonishing how rapid was her recovery, for when, ten minutes after the departure of the concert party, Septimus Smith's knock sounded at the door, the "ache" had vanished, and Delia was warbling "In Old Madrid."

"Mamma and Connie have gone to hear Kubelik," she said, by way of first shot. "I expect they'll be late."

They talked in whispers, and sat with their chairs very close to each other, but Septimus Smith only uttered a string of unmeaning generalities; he did not so much as attempt to pop the question.

All in vain were Delia's modest efforts to elicit the words which would make her prospective mistress of the Kensington flat, and the comfortable income.

Had she but known that the housemaid who had opened the door to Septimus had in her possession, for deposit in Delia's room, that hero's written proposal of marriage, she might, perhaps, have acted differently.

Vexed beyond bounds, she saw her visitor depart, with almost savage satisfaction—if such a state of mind can be imputed to a lady.

"I'll write to Arthur Treen to-morrow, and if he asks me to marry him, which I know he will, I'll accept him, just to show Mr. Septimus Smith what I think of his contemptible conduct."

Of course she cried, women mostly do in such circumstances, and went to bed in the dark. Thus she never saw Septimus Smith's letter, which the housemaid had laid in the top of her dressing-case, and which was there still when the first of April dawned.

The Spences were great people for practical jokes, especially those of the "April fool" order. On the first of the month, therefore, everybody in the house kept well on the alert, to circumvent any attempt upon his or her credulity.

Connie Spence was a perfect little demon in this particular, and it was owing only to the absorbing nature of Delia's affair that she had failed on this occasion to prepare something specially "fool-making."

The two sisters slept together, and it so happened that on the morning of the historic "first" Connie awoke before Delia.

There was sufficient light to enable her to see her sister's dressing-case. It was open, and on the top of its contents lay—a letter.

"It's a trick," she at once said to herself, "but they won't catch me!"

Creeping softly towards it, she saw that it was addressed to "Miss Delia Spence."

"Poor as poor!" she went on. "Delia will easily see through it, unless she forgets what the day is."

Then she was seized with an inspiration.

Hurriedly dressing herself, she sought out the housemaid, who regarded the note in her hand with anything but satisfaction.

"Jane," she said, "bring this letter upstairs, and tell Delia that Mr. Smith brought it this morning."

"Now to see the fun," she laughed, as she tripped back to her sister's room.

Delia was awake, and was on her guard.

"She won't fool me, if I know it," she said to herself.

"Mr. Smith asked me to give you this, miss."

It was Jane, the housemaid.

"Jane, I'm surprised at you! Miss Connie gave it to you."

"Miss Delia, as sure as I'm standing here, Mr. Smith gave it to me for you last night."

"Last night?" cried Connie, winking her eye at Jane, as a sign that she had forgotten her lesson.

"No, this morning, I mean."

There was nothing for it. Delia demanded the letter, which she proceeded to tear into half-a-dozen pieces, and throw on to the floor.

Lieut. Arthur Treen soon responded to Delia's invitation, and bore her off to the Winter Exhibition at Prince's Hall.

Then it was that Connie confessed to her mother, who, interviewing Jane the housemaid, elicited the fact that Mr. Smith had undoubtedly given her the letter the night before to place in Miss Delia's room.

Mrs. Spence now suspected that a miss had been made, which, for anything that could be done to rectify it, might just as well have been a mile.

The dust-bin was turned out, and after a lot of searching and soiling of hands, the half-dozen pieces of paper were rescued, joined together— and revealed Mr. Septimus Smith's proposal of marriage.

Delia was furious, when she was told on her return. Through being too clever she had really been made an April fool of.

To think that, after all, the tardy Septimus had proposed, and—too late. Yes, too late, for, instead of inspecting the pictures, she had had, in accepting Lieut. Treen, quite enough to occupy her while at Prince's Hall.

There is every reason to believe that Septimus Smith has not only never ventured upon another proposal, but has eschewed the society of the fair sex altogether.

E. Ralph.

A MARRIED lady, who is in the habit of spending most of her time in the society of her neighbours, happened to be taken ill, and sent her husband in great haste for a physician. The husband ran a short distance and then returned, exclaiming: "My dear, where shall I find you when I come back?"

"Is your papa in, Mary?" "Yes, but you may come in." "I don't think he likes me, and he might——" "There is no need of being afraid; he is engaged." "Engaged, is he?" "Yes; he stayed out till after twelve last night, and went off this morning without giving ma a chance to talk to him. She is talking to him now, and he won't be in this part the house for the next three hours. Come in!"

Your Editor Chats.

"Buy two copies of next week's 'Short Stories' and give one to a friend."

This suggestion I sincerely trust you will be kind enough to follow. It is one which, if carried out by you personally, will benefit your favourite little story paper in such a way as to justify the expense to which it has been put to secure the remarkable series of articles by Lady Peggy Carstairs which will start in next Tuesday's issue.

If you have enjoyed "THE CONFESSIONS OF CYNTHIA" (as I hope you have), then you will certainly enjoy "HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA"; and you will be doing your little favourite a good turn (as well as doing your friend a good turn) if you just for once spend an extra penny in getting an extra copy of next week's Short Stories and handing it to someone who is not at present a reader.

OUR GRAMOPHONES.

The result of the first Gramophone Competition will appear next week. I had hoped to publish it in this issue, but the attempts have been so numerous that it has been impossible for our large checking staff to get through the work in time. Meanwhile, there are other competitions going on every week, and it would be well for you to have a try for one of these splendid instruments. There is no reason why you should not go in for every one of the competitions, is there?

OUR NEW SERIAL.

I shall be very pleased indeed if readers would send me a line to tell me what they think of "A FOE IN THE FAMILY." Personally, I think it is one of the brightest and most entrancing stories that we have had in Short Stories for a long time. It will not take you long to scribble down on the back of a post-card your candid opinion of it, and the little trouble you take will be greatly appreciated by

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Substance and Shadow;

or, LOVE THE HELPER.

"So that is how the wind blows, eh?" laughed her grandfather, with a good-humoured shake of the head. "Well, Edie, I guessed as much! I quite expected that Rob Miller would come here soon and ask to have a confidential talk with me, and now you tell me that he would like to see me!"

Edith Fulton blushed deeply. It seemed to her that he must be very keen-sighted to have detected "how the wind blew," as he phrased it; she had not learnt that lovers usually betray the state of their feelings to other people.

"Yes, grandad," she responded, laying her head against his capacious waistcoat to hide the blushes. "Rob and I are very fond of each other. He never said a word to me till the day when he saved me from being hurt when my pony ran away, but he always longed for the opportunity to say something. You see, he is not so well off as I—that is, as we are, and when he saw the others always waiting on me, he felt that he hadn't a chance against them."

"And you?" queried her grandfather, patting the head of his son's child. "What of yourself?"

"I saw him frequently as I went about, but I never spoke to him, although I was attracted by his straightforward, manly look!" said Edie, speaking more boldly, now that she felt called upon to give an explanation of the fact that she had fallen in love with one whose station in life was not equal to her own. "But after his gallant deed in saving me from serious injury, wounding his arm severely in the act, I began to love him, and now I consider him superior to any! He is coming to see you, to know——"

Edie paused; she was in some doubt whether her grandfather would look with favour on the young suitor or not.

"Oh, I'll see him!" said old Mr. Fulton. "If you love him, Edie, then he has my consent. I am concerned only for your happiness, and I would do nothing to mar it! Perhaps I have appeared harsh occasionally, but my actions have been dictated by a knowledge of life and it was all for your good!"

"I know it! I am sure of it!" cried Edie warmly, jumping up and kissing him affectionately. "Oh, we shall be so happy, Rob and I!"

Rob Miller came and was cordially received by old Mr. Fulton. Rob was an orphan and was working on a neighbouring farm. It seemed like impudence for him to aspire to the hand of Edith Fulton, but he was a manly young fellow, with every promise of becoming a good farmer. He was possessed of just enough ambition, in the opinion of Fulton, to make him get on in that calling, and that was sufficient to qualify him for candidature as Edie's husband.

The old man was very fond of his granddaughter, the only relation he had in the world, and he was ready to make any sacrifice for her; but he was not foolish and had enough determination to make him put his foot down firmly when occasion required.

The engagement was announced and the wedding day was fixed within a short time after the engagement was made known. Rob and Edie grew more fond of each other, if that were possible, and grandfather beamed with contentment while disappointed suitors made unkind remarks behind Edie's back. The question of ways and means for the future bride and bridegroom was settled by Mr. Fulton. Everyone expected that Edie would be provided for by the old gentleman, and their surmises proved well founded.

"Now, young people," he cried with a benevolent smile, "I have a wedding present for you. Here, Edie, is a deed of gift in connection with The Elms, the next farm to this, which I have had cultivated by a steward for the last three years in anticipation of something of this sort. That's why I didn't let it. It will belong to you and your husband as long as you live in it and cultivate it; if you leave it to live elsewhere, it will revert to me. And here, Rob, is a cheque for £250, which will come useful in setting up housekeeping and the remainder will serve as a nest egg; you will find a little money handy till you get your harvest in and also afterwards!"

Edie and Rob were loud in their expressions of gratitude and nearly overwhelmed the old man, who gazed at them with tear-moistened eyes and a look that seemed to ask: "Will you always be so grateful?"

The wedding was a grand affair for the village and the happy pair went off for a short honeymoon at a southern seaside resort; then they settled down to married life on The Elms farm.

It was the end of October when they actually took possession, and the labour on the land was practically beginning for the year. Rob and Edie were quite happy and contented, and full of high hopes. Old Fulton looked in now and then to see them and went over the land with his new grandson, but he said nothing; Rob was full of assurance and the old man admitted to himself that he had said he would let them manage their own affairs. On the whole, the farm was doing well and, although there were one or two points on which he was not entirely satisfied, it was not fair to complain.

Rob and Edie developed grander ideas as the months wore on; they were in good circumstances, they thought, and they ought to do as others did. The money given to them by Fulton had been considerably decreased, but the harvest would come in due time and all would be well!

They took advantage of various inducements by railway companies to take short trips to London and to cities nearer to The Elms, and just before the hay crop was due they spent a fortnight in the Metropolis. When they returned, Rob found that the hay had suffered; he had left his cutting a few days too long, taking advantage of the fine weather to prolong his stay in London, with the result that a rainy time set in immediately on his return and the value of his hay crop was reduced to a very low figure. The wheat harvest, too, proved bad; insufficient attention during the last four months had had the usual result, and Michaelmas saw Rob and Edie with lengthened faces and a sentiment of unrest and dissatisfaction in their hearts.

When Mr. Fulton came over next time, they were full of their trouble and Rob complained of the disappointing character of the soil.

Digitized by Google

"The land is bad; it's very poor," said Rob in a vexed tone. "After all the time and labour and money spent on it, the return is runious."

Old Fulton's eyes glittered at this implied reproach of his conduct in saddling such bad land on them.

"The land is all right, my boy!" he answered grimly. "There has been too much time, labour and money spent on holidays; had that been put on the land, your harvest would have been as good as other people's!"

"Oh, grandfather!" exclaimed Edie reproachfully.

"I have done my best!" Rob cried, when Fulton had left them. "Edie, I am tired of farming! I never really liked it," he added, "for I believe it is not my true calling. I never had a chance of seeking my proper vocation in life. I wish—"

"What, Rob?" she asked as he stopped.

"I wish I could give up this place and go to London, Edie! I believe I am fitted for something better than the drudgery of ploughing! I'm sure I could do better."

"Yes, Rob! Let us go to London and get out of this!" cried Edie.

And so it was arranged.

For a little while longer they thought it over, and then old Fulton was informed of their intention.

"Very good!" he remarked quietly. "You must please yourselves. I hope that you will find your proper vocation. The Elms reverts to me, as you know."

They did know and they were prepared to hear him say it, although they had secretly hoped that he would allow them to let it and take the rent. They had to wait a few weeks longer, owing to the arrival of a daughter, but as soon as they could, they bade farewell to The Elms.

It was a glorious day when they left and, notwithstanding her unfailing devotion to her husband, Edie felt a pang as she took a last look at the old place. Rob saw the expression in her eyes; he himself felt saddened by the parting, but he reassured himself by saying that he would do ever so much better and he tried to drive away his wife's temporary gloom.

"It's not pleasant to say good-bye to anything, Edie, I know," he said lovingly, "but we have the great consolation of knowing that we are going to better things, dear."

Edie turned to him with a bright smile.

"In a little while we shall wonder how we endured it, Rob!" she cried. "Your capabilities were simply being wasted there!"

They took furnished lodgings at first, until they could get a

(Continued on next page.)

Indigestion

"SIX MONTHS AGO MY HEALTH BEGAN TO FAIL."

The foregoing statement was made by Mrs. Hake, 61 Lower Barton Hill Road, Bristol, to a Bristol Times and Mirror reporter. In continuing her story, she said:—"My appetite which had been excellent, fell off, and after the lightest meal, indigestion afflicted me, and bile began to rise in my throat. I was quite prostrated, and what with acute pains in my head, restless sleep, and severe fainting fits, it can easily be imagined that I became languid and 'fagged out' with the least exertion, and utterly miserable. I consulted a doctor, but my biliousness continued, and seemed to be incurable. Then my husband, seeing an account of a Bile Bean Cure in a case like mine, persuaded me to give them a trial. I commenced taking them, and soon noticed a decided improvement. The sickness became less frequent and severe, and my appetite gradually improved. Eating better, I gradually regained my strength, the headaches departed, and I began to obtain refreshing sleep. I continued taking the Beans, and finally not a trace of my ailments remained, and I am quite cured."

Bile Beans

Bile Beans for Biliousness are a certain cure for Headache, Influenza, Constipation, Piles, Liver Trouble, Bad Breath, Rheumatism, Colds, Liver Chill, Indigestion, Flatulence, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Debility, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Mfg. Co., 119 London Wall, London, E.C., on receipt of price, 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per box.

SAMPLE BOX FREE.

The Proprietors have so much faith in the efficacy of Bile Beans that they will forward a Sample Box Free, and a Book on Liver and Digestive Ailments, if you send your name and address, and a penny stamp (to cover return postage), along with Coupon, to the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co.'s Central Distributing Depot, Greek Street, Leeds.

FREE SAMPLE COUPON.

Short Stories, Nov. 1, 1902

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

BY ROYAL WARRANT

BOVRIL

house and furnish it with the money that remained to them. They had to take a larger house than they needed, as small houses were not easy to get in a good locality, but they decided that they would let two or even three rooms furnished if that should prove necessary.

Rob set about finding a position in real earnest. He had had no exact notion of what he would do, but he was well educated and wrote a good hand, so he concluded that it would be an easy matter for him to obtain a manager's place in a firm dealing in machinery or other agricultural requisites, if the worst came to the worst. His pet idea, however, was to try the stage or the concert hall (for he had been told that he had a good voice and believed it), but he was vaguely conscious that he might not get a chance immediately; in the meantime, however, there were other directions in which he would doubtless be able to make a mark.

The young couple were soon to discover the mistake into which they had fallen. Rob did not find the position suitable to his talent; in fact, his talent did not appear to be recognised by anyone in any direction. Week after week passed; the money was going out, but none came in. They decided to let two rooms and, after nearly a fortnight, they secured lodgers in the persons of a man and wife of small independent means—very nice elderly people who gave excellent references and wanted board as well as lodgings. They paid a month in advance to show their genuineness, for—as the man said—"references are nothing much to go by and money is worth more than anything in these matters."

Before the month was up, Rob obtained a situation as a warehouseman; it was a bitter fall, but he resolutely refused to take it as a defeat and regarded it as a stop-gap only. Edie supported him in this view.

"Everybody has his trials, Rob," she said confidently, "and we have ours, but we must persevere and all is sure to come out well in the end. You will find your vocation in time, and we shall be all the better for the trials; they will draw us together—keep us together, I mean."

She kissed him and they were happy.

Mr. and Mrs. Cornish were the pleasantest persons imaginable; not a bit of "side," although they were clearly in good circumstances. Mr. Cornish smoked a pipe with Rob very often in the evening, and Mrs. Cornish was more like a sister or a mother, to Edie. She was ready "to eat the baby," to use Edie's own words, and the two women became so friendly that they sometimes wore one another's jacket or skirt.

The first month passed. Mr. Cornish did not attempt to continue the advance payments, and Bob and Edie decided, after serious consultation, that it was not fair to ask. The second month passed, and the third was nearly up, but still no payment was forthcoming from the Cornishes.

"We must draw the remainder of our money for the rent and the taxes," said Rob gravely. "Including the gas and the water, I fancy we owe about thirty pounds and that is really more than we have got left in the savings bank. I think we might ask them for a little money now, Edie: it's best part of two months they owe, and it runs into a good deal to keep them."

"There was a note from the doctor this morning," said Edie, just as gravely. "He would like his account settled. We have had him here quite a lot for baby and me; I suppose it is the change from the country to the town, for we have not been well, either of us, since we came into stuffy London. But we shall get used to it!" she continued hastily. "And when you succeed, we shall be able to live out a little way."

"The little girl does not get used to it," rejoined Rob anxiously. "She is worse, Edie, than she was at first. She always seems to be ailing now!"

Edie was silent and cast an anxious look at the cradle. It was true; she hardly liked to admit it to herself, but she wished above all things not to discourage her husband. Yet she could not deny the truth of his remark.

DON'T FORGET THAT "HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA" COMMENCES NEXT WEEK.

The little stock of money was deposited in a savings bank that paid on demand, so the gold was brought home by Rob on the following evening.

"I have asked Mrs. Cornish to let us have something on account," said Edie, "and she has promised that Mr. Cornish shall give me a cheque to-morrow for the two months—perhaps for three. I explained that our expenses were heavy, and she seemed so sorry that they had been so neglectful. I told her just how things stood, so far as money matters were concerned. What a nice woman she is!"

They would have gone to bed perfectly happy had it not been for the baby; little Daisy was not nearly so well and the medical man had to be called in again.

On the following morning Rob went off to work with a heavy heart, for the little one was much worse. Edie called in the assistance of Mrs. Cornish, who helped the young mother to attend to Daisy.

"I should call in the doctor," advised Mrs. Cornish, meditatively.

"He promised to come when on his rounds," responded Edie, striving to speak calmly.

"I would not wait till then, my dear," counselled Mrs. Cornish. "Go now. I will look after the little one and you won't be long."

Edie accepted the advice and went in search of the medical gentleman who kindly informed her that he would be there almost as soon as she was. On Edie's return, Mrs. Cornish decided to go upstairs and make some improvement in her toilette, so that she might be presentable when the doctor arrived.

Dr. Matthews reassured the distracted mother to a slight extent; he stayed quite a long time, and left with the assertion that the child, although very ill, was not in the immediate danger imagined by its mother and Mrs. Cornish.

"She wants light nourishment," he decided. "Can you get the special preparation I recommended yesterday?"

Edie said that it should be obtained at once and, when the doctor had gone, she called to Mrs. Cornish.

No reply. It was strange that the lodger had not reappeared. Edie ran upstairs and knocked at the door. Not receiving any answer, she ventured to open it, and she started back, in surprise. The room was in disorder and it was clear that many things had been taken out of it.

With an unknown fear oppressing her, Edie went to the other room, and a similar scene of disorder met her eyes. Then the truth appeared to stare her in the face and another horrible thought flashed across her mind. Running downstairs to her own bedroom, where little Daisy lay, she opened the drawer in which she had left the money drawn from the bank! It was gone.

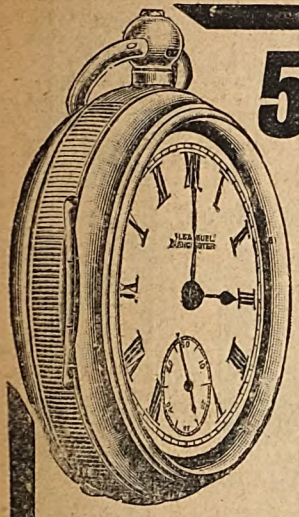
"They were thieves! They have lived on us and robbed us in the midst of our trouble. I told her of the money yesterday, when she was inquiring so kindly about us!" wailed Edie. "They have contrived to go away with all that they could get out of the house easily, in a portmanteau—he did that while she kept me engaged yesterday, and perhaps this morning—and she has finished up by robbing us!"

Edie did what she could for the little one till Rob came home in the evening, and then they tried bravely to face the bitter trouble, strong in the love they bore to each other.

"The easiest way to raise money is by a bill of sale on the furniture," said Rob, "and I'll arrange for that to-morrow. It's better than pawning a few things; people know nothing about it and we can pull round when I get my chance!"

A strange feeling went through him, and he gazed at Edie. The sympathy between these loving hearts caused the same sentiment to arise in both at the same time. His chance! His vocation! Had they made a mistake? They gazed steadfastly in each other's eyes

Digitized by Google



5/- ONLY

SENT TO-DAY will bring you by return of post

H. SAMUEL'S FAMOUS

"ACME"

SILVER LEVER.

Test it for a week. If satisfied, remit balance, 20s.

Solid Silver Case, fine 3 plate movement, jewelled, dust and damp proof cap, and the latest patented improvements. Price 25/-. Full amount returned if any dissatisfaction.

Written Warranty for Seven Years.

A SILVER ALBERT FREE!

To all sending full amount 25/- with order.

Send a Post-card Now for the . . .

FREE BARGAIN GUIDE,

260 Pages, 3,000 Engravings of Watches, Clocks, Rings, Cutlery, Plate, etc.

FREE BY RETURN MAIL.

H. SAMUEL, Dept. 29, Market St., MANCHESTER.

KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR. KSR.

KAPUTINE

THE SAFE REMEDY

for HEADACHE & NEURALGIA.

Cures in ten minutes. Kaputine is not a single dangerous crude drug, but is composed of several ingredients having the confidence and recommendation of many eminent Medical Men.

The safe remedy. Ask for KAPUTINE and see that you get it.

Packets of 18 doses 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

KAPUTINE LTD., HUDDERSFIELD.

KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR . KSR .

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back, Puts the hair right, Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALŒLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account.—Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.—

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trowbridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find the renewer excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

Colonel PERRY—

"My Dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER.

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

Mrs. BROWN POTTER—

"I use only 'Tatcho.'"

A 4/6 full size bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho," Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the world, in bottles at 1/-, 2/9 and 5/-

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 459.)

PAPER PATTERN of this

CHILD'S COAT

(Age 6 to 8.)

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

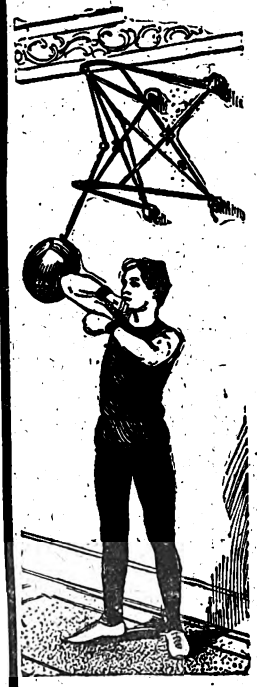
BY ROYAL WARRANT

BOVRIL

Digitized by Google

INTELLIGENT MEN AND WOMEN

have discovered the wonderful reward secured by a few minutes' daily practice of physical exercise. Our finest men and most beautiful women never neglect this exercise for health. Why should you, when you can improve your health, strength and beauty from 50 to 100 per cent? We supply "everything for health and strength," and publish a monthly magazine you should read. Its title is "Health & Strength," and it contains reading and illustrations which cannot fail to help you in the important matter of your health and strength. Sample copy free for 3d. stamps, or price 2d. at all bookstalls and booksellers.



NEW PUNCHING BALL.

Can be easily and quickly fixed up anywhere. Provides simply magnificent exercise. Instructions free.
Price £2 10s. complete.

EXERCISERS OF ALL KINDS.

Sandow's Developer	12/6
Whitely Exerciser
" " Ladies'	4/6
" " Men's	5/6
" " Athletes'	6/6
Ryan Combination	10/6
Travellers' Exerciser	3/6
1 Strand Chest Expander	1/6
3 " " "	3/6
5 " " "	6/6
5 " Athletes'	7/6

BALL MASSAGE CHAIN

With Instructions.

Non-stretching	3/6
Stretching	8/6
" (strong)	10 6
" (ex. strong)	12/6

GRIP MACHINES.

For developing strength in hand, wrist, and forearm, with chart of exercises:

	Pair.
Rubberoid pattern	2/6
Cork "	4/6
Spencer "	4/6
Sandow Grip Dumb-bells	7/6, 10/6, 12/6
Hendrickson pattern	4/6

HEALTH & STRENGTH BOOKS.

Sandow's	2/6
Apollo's	2/6
Milo's	2/6
Miles'	7/6

40/- FOR 17/6

If you send your Order now.

2 Big Volumes. Weight 6½lbs.

1539 Pages. Hundreds of Pictures (Coloured, &c.) Numerous Superimposed (layer upon layer) Charts, showing various organs.

The Best Physiological and Health Guide ever produced.

No one will be able to buy this magnificent work after this small lot disposed of. Books cost more than above price to produce. Tells how to prevent and cure every known disease and ailment.

HEALTH & STRENGTH MAGAZINE,

29 Stonecutter Street, Ludgate Circus, London, E.C.
Call if you can. No obligation to buy.

HEALTH & STRENGTH MAGAZINE is sold at all bookstalls and booksellers.

A PAIR OF GOOD LEGS

FOR EVERY ATHLETE.

The Trainer of several well-known Cycling Champions tells in the form of a small illustrated book how everyone may become possessed of a pair of well-developed legs with big calves. The advice if followed will transform the worst pair of "spindle shanks" into symmetrical and strong legs. No medicines, food, or anything costing money required. Send P.O. and stamps for 1/1 and book will be sent under cover and post free. CYCL. CHAMPION TRAIN. R, Hazelwood. Leigh-on-Sea, Essex.

A SCIENTIFIC WONDER.

PRICE 1/1 Post Free.

With this scientific instrument you can see bones whilst moving as well as still.

WHO TO MARRY. WHEN

SHOULD

PLAIN TALK by the most celebrated American Medical Author and Specialist, Dr. Foote. A wonderful book. Nearly 1,200 pages. 200 anatomical illustrations. 26 true-to-life coloured illustrations. Over a million copies sold. Ours is the genuine unabridged American Edition with coloured plates, exceedingly valuable recipes, health advice, etc. Post free, 8/6.

TO MARRY MARRY

THE "KAISER" MOUSTACHE TRAINER AND PATENT COMB.

Invented by German Imperial Barber. Used by the German Emperor. Cures a straggling, ragged, etc., moustache, and quickly forces it to assume any desired style of arrangement. Worn at night. Sent per return post and free from observation, post free, for 2/6, or (finer quality) 3/6 only. Money back if not satisfactory.

THE STUDENT'S MICROSCOPE.

8d. Post Free, with full instructions. This illustration shows one drop of water as magnified 200 times by above marvellously effective student's microscope. The animalculæ can be seen moving about, fighting and eating each other, etc. This microscope also shows the insects that live in cheese as large as fleas.

LONDON NOVELTY CO., SEA VIEW ROAD, LEIGH-ON-SEA.

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps I have," said Rob slowly, as if in reply to a question from her.

"Perhaps we have, Rob," she corrected gently. "If there is any blame we bear it together, for I have done as much as you. Were we wrong to leave the old place? Was our vocation there, after all?"

"We must face it now, dear," said he gently. "I have a little money left, to buy what Daisy requires, and the bill of sale will relieve us."

The matter was quickly arranged, and all bills paid, but that left them with scarcely anything to go on with, for they had raised only sufficient to cover pressing needs and they had sharks to deal with. Daisy recovered, but she remained very weak and the doctor nearly broke their hearts by telling them that she ought to be taken to the country.

The time went swiftly; expenses were running up, no fresh lodgers came and the prospect they had to face was black.

"If we go on like this much longer, Edie," said Rob desperately, one evening, "we shall be sold up. We can't meet the rent and other expenses, I can't get any more money out of those people for the furniture—they even talk of selling us up, and I fancy that our firm are going to reduce the staff. There hasn't been much to do lately. Edie, I think—I feel—that I—made a mistake! My vocation is not here, but on the farm. Can you ever forgive me, dearest, for bringing you to this?"

"My dear husband, I share it all with you. We were wrong, both of us. Now, for dear Daisy's sake, we must confess our error and try to remedy it. Perhaps grandfather will not be too hard on us! Our little Daisy will fade away if we stay here and—oh, Rob!—that would be too dreadful!"

Her strength failed and she burst into hysterical weeping. Rob comforted her and together they planned the way of the penitent.

"No, it is not fair that you should go to grandfather alone and bear the brunt of it!" declared Edie. "I'll write and ask him to come here if he still loves me, and then ——"

The letter was dispatched and Fulton answered it in person.

"Grandfather," said Edie contritely, "we have seen our fault and we——"

Old Fulton's keen glance had taken in the situation, and he stopped her with a hearty kiss.

"It's rather hard work for an old man to look after two farms, and I shall be quite thankful to have someone at The Elms again," he remarked, trying to appear unconcerned. "Rob, my boy,"—turning to him—"I've managed to get that other field added to The Elms land, so you'll have plenty to do!"

Rob wrung the old man's hand, unable to speak. Old Fulton created a diversion by going to the cradle and trying to make the baby laugh by snapping his fingers.

"You had better come with me straight away," said Fulton, a little later. "Let the sharks have the furniture, and I'll see to the rent and all that. Let us get out of it at once and begin again!"

They did so. Years have slipped by since then and old Fulton lies at rest in the village churchyard. Rob knows what his vocation is, and Edie and he wonder how they could have been so deluded in the early days. Daisy and other children are there to make them happy, and they are thankful.

"What could be better than this?" asked Rob, as he surveyed the fields and the children romping in the distance. "We had a rough time up there, dear, but it might have been a great deal worse. We learnt a lesson that we ought never to have needed, and the cost of it was not so heavy as we deserved it to be!"

"Love softened it, as love always does lighten trouble!" said Edie, and he clasped her in a warm embrace.

George Day.

MABEL: "I had a handsome young man at my feet yesterday." AMY: "Yes, I noticed you had bought a pair of new shoes."

LADY (on leaving crowded carriage): "Well, I'm glad to get out of the crowd. I've had to stand on one foot all the way." Voice from the corner: "Yes, and that foot was mine."

YOUNG LADY: "I should like to embroider a nice pair of slippers as a Christmas present for my aunt." Shopman: "We happen to be quite out of new patterns just now. Wouldn't something else do as well?" Young Lady: "Perhaps a cigar-case."

HOW and what TO DANCE.

By WILLIAM LAMB.

(President of the British Association of Teachers of Dancing

Contains complete instructions in the Art of Dancing, including all the latest and fashionable Square Dances and Skirt Dancing.

Price 1s. Post Free 1s. 2d.

THE LOVER'S GUIDE to COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE.

By G. R. M. Devereux.

A volume containing sensible advice to all lovers, from the first dawn of love, leading through the various stages, and thereafter.

Price 1s. Post free 1s. 2d.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send "How and What to Dance." I inclose 1s. 2d.
" " "The Lover's Guide." " " 1s. 2d.

Name .....

Address .....

Please cross out book not required.

SHE: "Read me something from your paper." HE: "Certainly, my love. Here's something that will interest you. 'Rumoured engagement.'" SHE: "How lovely. Wonder if I know them?" HE (continuing): "Fourteen killed on the Bulgarian frontier." SHE: "Wretch!"

Two young London ladies in the country were standing by the side of a wide ditch, which they did not know how to cross. They appealed for help to a boy who was coming along the road, whereupon he pointed behind them with a startled air, and yelled: "Snakes!" The young ladies each crossed the ditch at a single bound.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Melting an Iceberg.

"ALEC" sees his sweetheart three times a week. Very often, however, she is quite cold to him, and appears to take very little interest in his visit, while at other times she is warmth itself. What should "ALEC" do on the former occasions?

* * * * * *

"ALEC" should visit her less often, say only twice a week. Let him miss a visit or two, and see if this does not remove the occasional coldness. A little judicious neglect is the best way to make a girl appreciative of the attentions of her lover. Too much devotion makes many girls capricious and petulant.

Too Much Housework.

"CAN you give me a cure for fat hands and arms?" writes "L. M. D." "I have to do all the housework at home, and my friends make fun of my red and ugly hands. Please help me."

* * * * *

I am afraid you cannot get over your difficulty unless by a change of work. So long as you have to do all the housework, your hands must continue to be coarse. Had you taken proper precautions at first, you might have avoided it. By handling things in a careless way, constantly lifting heavy weights, and having the hands frequently in water and in contact with soap, they swell and grow inflated. There is nothing for it, "L. M. D.," so long as your present work continues. But still, I do not doubt that when the young man arrives, he will readily forgive this defect, when he remembers what a useful little woman it is that suffers from it.

Should He Put it Out?

A QUESTION of etiquette comes from "JOHN H.' It is, "Should a gentleman put out his cigar when a lady meets him in the street?" That depends on the quality of the cigar, and how far he has smoked it. If it is one of those given him by a kind friend who is not a judge of cigars, and the lady is one whom he wishes to impress favourably, I should advise him to throw it away. The same rule might be observed if the cigar were more than half smoked, as to cling longingly to a stump suggests to her mind that a cigar is a luxury he longs to linger over. But if he has just lighted it and it is a good cigar, likely to impress the lady, he should say, "Do you mind my smoking, Miss C.?" To which she will reply, if she has caught a wayward fume from a good Havana, "Of course not, I like it." In which case, "JOHN H." should continue for a few minutes talking, and resume his walk.

* * * *

I might add, however, that unless a lady has something very important to say to a gentleman, it would be rather better form for her not to stop him in the street, and put him under the possible obligation of extinguishing even a bad cigar.

Kissing in Public.

"ENA" was recently accused of the heinous crime of kissing her sweetheart in public. They were riding in a railway carriage at the time, and were caught in the act by a lady friend, who upbraided "ENA" for her conduct. "Surely, if we are engaged," writes she, "we may kiss when and where we like?"

* * * *

No, "ENA." No doubt you and your lover are very lucky in each other's possession, but to parade one's good fortune is the act of vulgarity. In public, you should disguise your feelings towards each other so far as possible, as displays of them only annoy other people, perhaps less fortunate. Wait till you are alone and unobserved next time, and the enjoyment should be ever so much greater. Everybody feels kindly towards the loving couple, but nobody wants to see their love too much in evidence in public.

A Point of Etiquette.

"SMIKE" wishes to know if a gentleman should assist a lady to get over a stile, or should he walk on a few yards and wait?

* * * *

Having got over the stile himself, he might say, "Can you manage?" And if she agrees—which she will unless an invalid or cripple—he should walk on and interest himself in the vegetation.

The Acquaintanceship Problem.

"I HAVE fallen in love," writes "GEORGE F.," "with a young lady whom I meet every day. How can I become acquainted with her. I don't know whether she cares for me or no. She is in business at a West End florist's."

* * * *

I select this particular letter asking this question from a bunch of similar ones, because I am better able to answer it. "GEORGE F." is much better off than his fellow inquirers, as the girl is at a florist's. Now, "GEORGE," just go in every morning, or evening, or at lunch time, or whenever you can, and buy yourself a nice buttonhole. In time, perhaps, she will have got to pin it in for you so nicely that you will be positively compelled to say pretty things to her, after which, don't you know, all is a matter of good fortune. Certainly where there is a flower, there's a way.

Deception—Its Cure.

"I HAVE always been a flirt," writes "DELIRIOUS," "but now I have met a man whom I love dearly. I think he returns my love. When I first met him, I told him I lived with my people. Instead of that I am only a companion to a lady. Now I am afraid to tell him the truth."

* * * *

This is a difficult problem. It was very silly of you to tell him a falsehood, especially one which was so unnecessary. If you think he is fond of you, tell him the truth now, and don't prevaricate any longer. Admit that you deceived him, and if he is fond of you he will probably forgive you.

Curiosity.

I TAKE the opportunity of telling the two correspondents who write to inquire whether the gentleman referred to in my answer to "VEILCHEN," is either of them, that they have not that honour. At the same time, if they find themselves in similar positions to this individual, such advice as I have been able to give in the affair in question is at their disposal if they care to use it. Briefly it is that if a man is really attracted to a girl, he can never hope to carry matters further unless he makes some effort to become acquainted with her. Obviously it is no part of a girl's duty to manœuvre an acquaintanceship, and unless the man takes the initiative, things can go no further.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

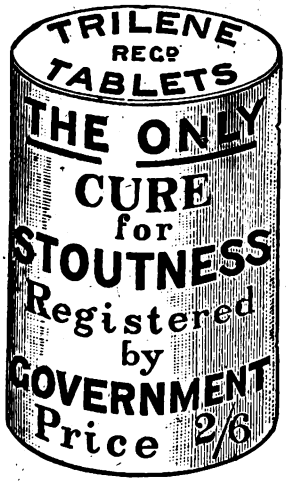
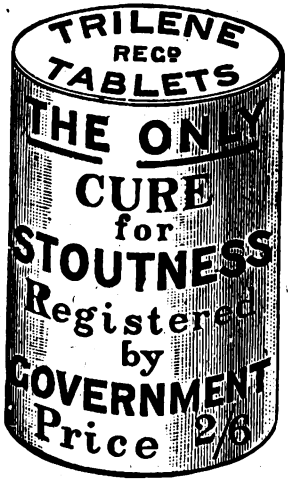
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"67 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

Miss CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful 'Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. McLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 3lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18.b. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 28. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 3lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

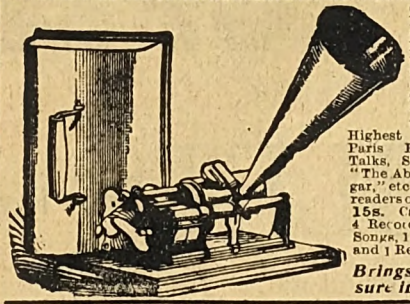
THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

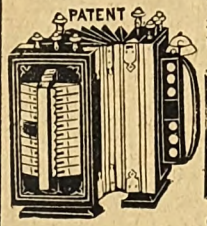


CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount

Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1902, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.

Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

The PRINCE OF WALES says:

"WAKE UP, ENGLAND."

DON'T PURCHASE FOREIGN POLISHES.

"MATCHLESS"

METAL

POLISH.

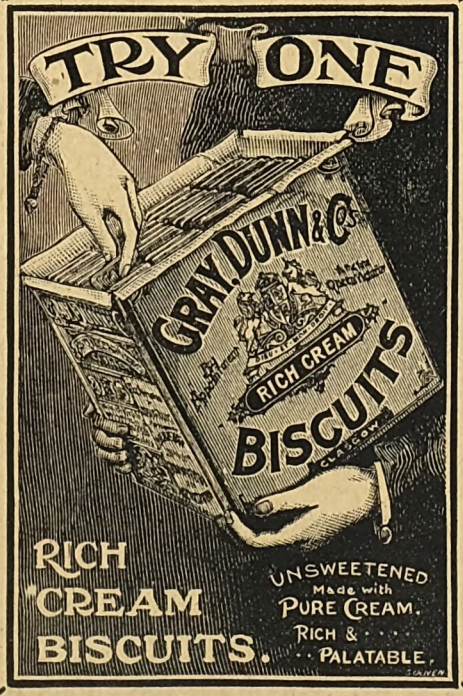
POLISH, TINS & BOXES ARE ALL MADE AT OUR OWN WORKS IN LIVERPOOL.

By PURCHASING this POLISH you are Supporting BRITISH TRADE.

Should you have any difficulty in obtaining supplies, two 6½d. Tins will be sent Post Free (with address of nearest Dealer) on receipt of 1/-

MANUFACTURERS:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.



MACKINTOSH'S

Is DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS! DELICIOUS!

FURFST OF THE FURE. Sold Everywhere.

A very large Sample Packet sent post free for eight-penny stamps. J. MACKINTOSH Ltd., The Toffee Mills, HALIFAX. Wholesale dealers should stock this Toffee as it sells at sight.

EXTRA CREAM TOFFEE

Ladies Say

"The MENE" SANITARY TOWELS

Are Superior to all makes for Cleanliness, Comfort and Economy

Two dozen No. 1, at 1/-.
One dozen No. 2, at 1/-.
One dozen No. 3 at 1/6.
POST FREE.

May be obtained from all Underclothing Houses and Chemists

A FREE SAMPLE

To any lady naming this paper to

MISS HAYNES,

55 FANN STREET, LONDON, E.C.

SHORT STORIES 1D.

No. 723. Week ending November 8th, 1902.

THE WOMAN WHO CHAPERONED BELINDA

Splendid New Series of Articles Revealing Secrets of Life in High Society

(SEE FIRST PAGE)

LADY PEGGY CARSTAIRS

BELINDA

Digitized by Google

KSR · KSR · KSR ·

Short Stories.

No. 723. For the Week Ending November 8th, 1902. One Penny.

A FASCINATING NEW SERIES. BEGINS HERE.

HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA

Real life in High Society vividly portrayed.

By Lady Peggy Carstairs.

A keen sense of honour, we are told, is the watchword of the aristocracy. The forthcoming series of revelations—the actual experiences, remember, of a member of this aristocracy—tell a very different tale. The young girl whom Lady Peggy Carstairs—the pseudonym of the writer of the articles—chaperons, is the victim of as cruel and as crafty a series of plots as can be imagined. The heiress to great wealth, men of title, of old and honourable names, do not scruple to use the basest means to force her into marriage.

Everywhere the girl is a victim of intrigue, and to all her dangers and mischances she can only oppose her love and faith in the man of her choice, a man without title or wealth.

Many and various are the dangers to which she is subjected; her liberty, her very life is threatened. On one occasion her persecutor threatens to mar her beauty if she persists in refusing him.

With her chaperon she visits the Riviera, Paris, Rome, St. Petersburg, Vienna, all the centres of fashionable life. Everywhere attempts are made to trick her into marriage.

The revelations are startling, almost painfully so. They unmask the shams and the frauds practised in daily life in smart society. Above all, they cast a strong and searching light upon its dark places, its family secrets, strange mysteries, its extravagances and vices. All are truthfully and vividly portrayed by Lady Peggy Carstairs.

I Lose a Fortune and Find Belinda.

In the opinion of all young people, youth is the appointed time for romance, delightful happenings—fascinating, unexpected. Not till we come to middle age, say forty-five, which nowadays looks thirty-three, do we realise our mistake. At any rate I realised it, for at that age, and a little later, I met with the strangest and most exciting experiences of my life.

I had lived, as I say, some forty odd years in the world—though you wouldn't have thought it to look at me—the world of fashion that people call "Society." As a young girl, the daughter of the Earl of Darisbrook, I had been a social success. As a young woman, the wife of Sir Evelyn Carstairs, a man of great wealth, I had enjoyed distinction.

Those were pleasant years, the days that followed were far different.

Sir Evelyn died suddenly, leaving me a widow at twenty-eight with three young children. Heart disease ran in his family, so his death was not wholly unexpected. What was unexpected, and severely so, was the fact that he died penniless, all his money having gone in copper mines that held no copper.

All rights reserved.]

Imagine my position! A widow with a title, but without a penny, and with three girls on her hands.

What was I to do? Bring up my daughters on charity disguised as patronage? Impossible. My pride revolted at the thought. And yet what other course was open to me? How could I earn a living for my children and myself?

My old friend Crawley Drummond solved the difficulty. He told me of an American millionaire, illiterate but ambitious, who wanted his daughter launched into Society. I saw the man and agreed to chaperon his daughter on my own terms. Not only did he pay me to act as chaperon, but agreed to give me a large sum if I procured a titled husband for his daughter.

Within six months she was a duchess. I took my cheque and invested it to great advantage. Next came two sisters, pretty girls, who went off without much trouble. For them also I received a handsome sum. I invested my money under Crawley's advice in a bank of great repute—no mines for me—and with the aid of a little judicious speculation my income crept up to a respectable figure. I had no need to act as chaperon again, I had enough to live in comfort and bring out my girls.

Digitized by Google

My life from that time on was that of most mothers in Society. I looked after my daughters, studied their complexions and designed their frocks. Later I found them suitable husbands—they all married well—and I arranged their settlements.

By the time the youngest was off my hands, I felt, having married all my daughters, I had done my duty, and that it was time to—well, to consider myself. And nowhere is it possible to pay oneself more charming consideration than in Cairo.

I had had a very trying time the previous year. Millicent's marriage, tiresome to arrange, had been very difficult to carry out. She was the youngest of my children, and somewhat self-willed. She talked a lot of rubbish about love—true her husband's neither young nor handsome—but then he has £15,000 a year. However, the wedding had come off at last, and now, having need of rest, I decided, as I say, to visit the city of the Caliphs.

A lovely afternoon in January found me on the Piazza of the Continental Hotel—Shepheard's is getting quite too general nowadays—in utter and complete content. Satisfied with myself and all the world.

Cairo is a wonderful place, the luxury, the refinement of the West, side by side with the immemorial customs of the East. The Ezbekiya or modern quarter of the town presents no unusual features. It might as easily be a part of Cannes, or Mentone, as Cairo. Its hotels are sumptuously decorated, their appointments as luxurious as those on the opposite side of the Mediterranean. Its roads are well drained, and lit with electric light, while down the principal thoroughfares run the electric tramcars.

The native quarter, where the Bazaars are to be found, is very different. There the East and the West shake hands. All the peoples of the earth are to be seen down the Mooski, or main street. On either side of the road are native shops or stalls, gay with bright colours, round which a constant bargaining goes on. In the roadway itself passes a never-ending procession of all races and nationalities.

The keen-faced Yankee from the States jostles a solemn and impassive-looking Turk who ambles past on a gaily caparisoned mule. Melancholy-looking fellahs—Egypt's hewers of wood and drawers of water—clad in scanty blue kaftans, mingle with green-turbaned shereefs and picturesque Bedouins, who in flowing bernouses stalk proudly by.

Here, a Moor of venerable aspect, turbaned and sandalled, salaams at the door of his shop to a young Oxford undergrad. A melon-seller lifts his tray, heaped high with the golden fruit, to a middy, spick and span in regulation uniform; near by a water carrier, with picturesque goatskin filled with water from the Nile, utters his plaintive cry. A Zouave, brave in scarlet and gold, forces his way through a knot of fierce-looking Albanians, whose many-coloured sashes bristle with weapons. Jewesses, gorgeous in purple and fine linen, brilliant with flashing jewels, brush skirts with a slim English girl, severely tailor-made. An ever-moving, many-coloured crowd.

Through the throng, forcing their way to left and right, comes a troop of donkeys—in Cairo everyone rides a donkey—the shrill cry of their drivers mingling with the steady tramp of a battalion of our khaki warriors marching to the desert, the babble of the market-place, the strains of a passing band.

A medley of sound and sight, a vivid sense of life and motion. The quickness, the vigour of the West, side by side with the quiescence, the langour of the East. And over all the glorious sun, the wonderful blue sky, against which the minarets and domes of the innumerable mosques gleam white as ivory.

It was at that very moment, just when I was thinking of the mosques, that Crawley Drummond, who was wintering in Egypt, came on to the Piazza. And from that moment dates the commencement of that astonishing chapter in my life, a chapter that includes the strangest, the most exciting incidents. I refer to the time when I chaperoned Belinda.

"Lady Peggy," said Crawley, "just observe that man. He has been standing opposite the hotel for the past ten minutes, staring at you all the time. Is he an unknown or an accredited admirer?"

"Unknown—to me at any rate," I answered. "What is he do you think?"

"The ugliest man in Cairo, I should say, if the information's any good to you."

I leant forward, studying the stranger with attention. He was ugly, no doubt of that, with a massive, determined face and heavy jaw, but his figure, square-shouldered, broad-chested, lean flanked, and a certain carriage of his head, went far to redeem his plainness. I judged him to be about fifty years of age.

He puzzled me, there was no placing him. I could not determine his position in Society.

For quite three minutes after he had moved away, a tall figure in an easy fitting linen suit, I thought of him. One has time to think in Cairo. After the hurry and rush of the London season, the worry of giving and going to functions, the trouble of trying on frocks and marrying one's daughters, a winter in Egypt is rest indeed.

As I say, one has time to think, yet not a moment hangs heavy on your hands. Life in the hotels is very varied. Strange and familiar faces greet you every day. You smile a welcome to a man or woman whom you last met at Hurlingham, quiz an Eastern potentate, greet a rising politician, a distinguished general, a well-known author or a famous artist. You can know everyone, and yet be intimate with nobody but your own set.

The "ugliest man in Cairo" was not included in the latter, and his appearance that evening at table d'hôte so surprised me that I allowed a salmi of prawns to go untasted!

That idiot Crawley Drummond noticed my absence of mind, and giggled in a fashion quite unbefitting his years. Crawley and I are contemporaries, as I take care to remind him when he is annoying.

"Your admirer's name is Hardy North, dear Peggy," he whispered. "I gather that he is an Australian of much wealth but little family. In the frozen meat trade, I believe—he looks a sheepish person."

I was too annoyed about the prawns to care much about the Australian or his sheep. Still, I noticed his clothes were well-cut, and that he wore the right sort of collars. He was seated next the Duchess of Eastacres. Her Grace had entered into conversation with him. He had evidently been introduced.

"Wants him for her daughter," murmured Crawley. "She's an awful lean woman, is Lady Honoria. She won't have a look in with you, Peggy."

Crawley is, at times, positively irreverent. To speak in such a way of the dear Duchess' daughter is, indeed, indecent.

Her Grace seemed very favourably disposed to North, and introduced him to Honoria with a gracious wave of her hand.

The Australian's voice was louder than one cares to hear indoors, but his conversation must have been worth listening to, for Lady Honoria laughed several times. Generally speaking, the poor thing has not much sense of humour.

Now I don't deny for an instant that the Duchess has great perception, and doubtless she recognised Hardy as a man of worth. I must confess, however, I was surprised to see her quite so gracious.

There was a conversational lull at the table, and the Duchess' high-pitched voice was very audible.

"Ilderim's a delightful old person," she cried. "You must see his bazaar, Mr. North. A sheik I think he calls himself. He has the most wonderful collection of treasures you can imagine. Gorgeous tapestries, wonderful shawls, the sort of things one reads of in the 'Arabian Nights,' and finds in Cairo. Ilderim's a great favourite of mine, and will show you his most costly wares at my request."

Digitized by Google

"I should like to go," said the Australian calmly. "Can it not be this evening? I may have to leave Cairo shortly; I should like to see what I can of the place while I am here."

Her Grace hesitated, but her daughter displayed such unwonted pleasure at the idea that she consented.

"It will be lovely in the moonlight!" said Honoria; "quite too delightful!"

I thought her enthusiasm strange, and so did Crawley. Lady Honoria was a thin, anæmic looking girl who rarely showed enthusiasm for anything. Undeniably plain, her lack of looks and want of money—the Eastacres were horribly poor—found her well on in the twenties without a husband or a sign of one.

"They're making all the running, Peggy," whispered Crawley; "you'll have to hurry up or you'll get left."

Before I could answer him an unexpected, but by no means an unusual thing occurred.

The electric light went out!

Lamps were placed upon the table in readiness for this event, and the attendants made haste to light them. In the confusion of the darkness, however, somebody knocked over an epergne, which, in its turn, sent a lamp crashing on the table. The next moment the oil had caught alight, the table seemed ablaze. Before I knew what had happened my dress—a thin muslin, was in flames. I started to my feet with a shriek of terror. Instantly I felt myself clasped in two strong arms, a heavy rug was deftly thrown over me, covering my head and face and arms.

It was all over in a moment; what might have been a terrible accident was averted by quick thought, and prompt action. I emerged from the rug unhurt, only my sleeve and the lace on my bodice slightly scorched.

"A narrow escape," said a grave voice. I looked up and met the eyes of the ugliest man in Cairo!

"How can I thank you?"—much agitated—"you have saved my life."

"Not quite that, I think; I've saved you a few burns, no more," and, with a quiet bow, he left me. The danger was over, both I and the lamp were "out." But, and I could not forget it, had it not been for Hardy North, I should have been most horribly disfigured!

I hastily sought my room to repair damages. While I was curling my hair Lady Honoria appeared in a state of suppressed excitement. She was wearing a white gown quite decently made, and she had a pink colour in her cheeks.

"Dear Lady Peggy," she said, "are you better? We are all so distressed about you."

"I'm all right now, my dear," I answered briskly.

"You're coming with us to Ilderim's bazaar, aren't you?" she said. "Please say you will. I want you to come particularly."

I stared at her in astonishment. If, as Crawley suggested, Honoria had designs upon the Australian, I was the last person she should have asked to accompany her!

She seemed to read my thoughts, and came quite close to me with an awkward attempt to be caressing.

"I don't want to talk to Mr. North," she said. "And—you understand, dear Lady Peggy, don't you?"

As a matter of fact I was considerably mystified. If the millionaire was not the attraction, why should Lady Honoria so greatly desire the expedition. It wasn't as if she were young or romantic; a moonlight walk could not possibly appeal to her.

I felt suspicious. All the same there was no reason why I should not join the party. Hardy North would take pleasure in my society, and I owed him some consideration for his bravery. I decided to oblige Honoria and go to Ilderim's.

Ilderim's bazaar was some distance from our hotel. The Continental is in a quiet part of the Ezbekiya quarter, near the English church. Ilderim's bazaar lies at the other side of the town in the native quarter off the Mooski road.

As a rule, in Cairo, as in other Oriental cities, each bazaar is confined to the sale of one class of goods. Ilderim's, however, was an exception. His trade was principally with Europeans, and he catered for the taste of his customers. The Duchess was one of his chief patrons, and introduced all her friends to the venerable sheik. Crawley declared her Grace exacted a sort of percentage from the old man, and that a fresh customer meant a Cashmere shawl or a Tunis rug. But, as I say, Crawley is at times irreverent.

We found Ilderim seated cross-legged at his threshold. The hour was an unusual one for customers, most bazaars closing at sunset; but Ilderim was an unusual person, bland as an ambassador, or impassive as the Pyramids, according to occasion.

The interior of the bazaar or shop, as we should call it, was lit by soft-shaded lamps. Before us were revealed the secrets of his treasure-house. Cashmeres and broidered stuffs of peerless texture hung above our heads, round us were things of silver, of gold, of ivory, of amber, of feathers, of bronze, of emeralds, of ruby, of beryl, their rich colours glowing through the dim light.

Marvellous caskets of mother-of-pearl, carpets soft as down, and every brilliant hue melting one within the other. Coffee equipages of inimitable metal, silver statuettes exquisitely chased and wrought. Feather fans and screens of every beauty of device were spread before us. And the air was heavy with the odour of spice.

The Duchess, as usual, was in ecstasies, and directed North's attention to the most expensive articles. The Australian listened to her recommendations, which Crawley supplemented with whispered asides.

"What is the price of this?" said North, lifting a necklace of amber and gold.

Ilderim stated the amount, naming, in true Oriental fashion, just double what he intended to accept.

North realised he was being cheated, but seemed too careless or indifferent to mind.

"I'll take it," he said, pulling out his purse. "It would just suit my daughter."

His daughter! So the man was married.

The Duchess dropped the silver coffee pot she was inspecting with a clatter, and gazed at North in the stony Eastacres fashion. Nothing abashed, the Australian pocketed the necklace and resumed his observations.

"She's only seventeen," he went on, "though she looks more, being tall. I'm very proud of my girl." His face flushed beneath the Duchess' stare, and he turned to me.

"You see," he said softly, "she's no mother. My wife died when Belinda was a baby!"

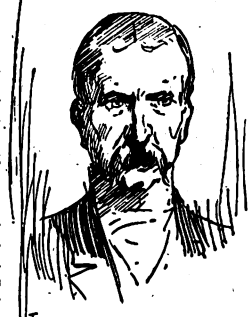
"Belinda! What a delightful name!" said the Duchess. A wife was a fatal obstacle, but a daughter might only be a drawback to her Grace's plans.

"It's a nice name," said North. His manner of speech was very simple and singularly direct. Different, very, from the tone of our set.

Crawley Drummond bargained for a set of chessmen, and I secured a dainty fan for Millicent. The Duchess contented herself with admiring our purchases. We were just about to leave when my attention was attracted by a curious and very lovely lamp hanging in the entry. It was very singular, a mingling of coloured glass, silver, gold, and ivory being wrought with much beauty in its formation.

"Isn't it gorgeous!" I cried; "just like Aladdin's wonderful lamp."

Ilderim salaamed and mentioned the cost—far more than I could dream of paying. One can't afford to buy things for art's sake nowadays. In a moment Hardy North signed to Ilderim to reach t down. He murmured a few



THE DUKE OF EASTACRES

Digitized by Google

words in the sheik's ears, and then, the bargaining over, we left the bazaar.

"I've told the old man to send the lamp to you at the Continental, Lady Peggy," said the Australian, in a matter-of-fact way. Really, he had no business to address me so familiarly.

"I know you're going to tell me that you won't accept it; that it's against the usages of Society, and so forth," he went on. "But, you see, I'm not in Society, so it doesn't matter. Where I come from we say right out when we want to make a friend of a man or a woman. I want you to be my friend."

"And so you give me a lamp? That sounds like bribery, Mr. North."

"May be. All the same I want you to take it. Come, you said I saved your life, you can't refuse me a small thing like a lamp?"

Considered in that light it was difficult to say no. In fact it was impossible. North was persistent and the lamp simply perfect.

I don't know exactly how it came about, but soon after the Australian and I found ourselves alone. We decided to extend our walk towards the Citadel, that grim fortress that frowns over the city of the Caliphs. Now the Citadel lies to the south-east of Cairo, and the Boulevard Mehemet Ali, the great modern highway, stretches straight as the crow flies, from the modern quarter to the gates of the Citadel itself. An electric tram runs the whole length of the Boulevard which is lit by electric lamps. A child could not mistake its bearings, much less a grown woman. Judge then, of my surprise when we reached the walls of the fortress and paused to gaze at its grim battlements; judge, I say, of my surprise when the Duchess in a state of great anxiety announced that Honoria had lost her way.

"It's impossible!" I said. "When did you miss her?"

"She was here not five minutes since," said her Grace. "Crawley and I were talking, and Honoria said she would go and meet you. She's not been back since, and what with camel-drivers and Bedouins, it's not safe for anyone to venture out alone."

"My dear Duchess, no one could come to any harm down the Boulevard," I said reassuringly. "It's as safe as the Brixton Road, and quite as well lighted."

Her Grace, however, was not so easily to be consoled. Finally, it was arranged that she and Crawley should walk along the Boulevard, while North and I searched in the neighbourhood of the Citadel.

It was quite silly, Lady Honoria being old enough, and in all conscience plain enough, to look after herself. Still it was a glorious night, and North was not altogether a dull companion, so I made no fuss, but set off to find, or rather look for, Lady Honoria.

I remember that night very distinctly, and for many reasons. Cairo lay before me, a wonderful, a glorious picture in the moonshine. Shadowy forms flitted through the deserted streets, quaint buildings in the native quarter, relics of Moorish palaces and ancient mosques, the frowning Citade flanked by the Mokattan Hills, in the distance, beyond the city walls, the mysterious, far-reaching desert, with its billows of sand, its fair islets of palm trees and fresh water all steeped in that wonderful light.

In our search for Honoria we drew near the gardens of an old Moorish palace now in ruins. The bitter-sweet of the mimosa, the heavy scent of the damask rose which grows in wild luxuriance throughout the East, made the night fragrant. Lofty trees cast a thick shadow on the earth, only the rustling of the leaves broke the stillness. It was a paradise for lovers!

"Look!" Hardy North grasped my arm, "under the trees there, through the break in the wall." I followed his eyes. A youth, tall and lithe, with the brown beauty of the East, a turban on his head and sandals on his feet, was clasping a woman in his arms. And she! Even now I cannot write the name with calmness, she was Honoria, daughter of the Duchess of Eastacres!

I could not speak to her, I merely waved my parasol and signed to North to shout. He didn't, but all the same Honoria came towards us. When she saw me she grew quite pale.

"Don't tell mother," she gasped. "I don't know what will become of me if you do."

Neither did I for that matter. The idea of the Duchess' despair at the thought of such a thing appalled me. Honoria, an aristocrat, an Englishwoman, embracing an Egyptian in a garden!

"Don't speak to me, please," I said, "I'm too shocked to listen to you."

We overtook Crawley and the Duchess half way towards the hotel, and I am glad to say her Grace scolded Honoria severely for what she called her carelessness. The rest of us walked home in silence.

"Are you going to report the girl?" whispered North in the vestibule.

"Of course," I answered. "I should be doing very wrong if I concealed it."

He nodded in a satisfied sort of way that surprised me.

As I passed up the stairs to my room later on that evening I turned in to the lounge to have a chat. The Continental boasts the nicest lounge of any hotel I know. It is a spacious place filled with hot-house plants, comfortable chairs, soft cushions, and pink-shaded lamps.

I sat down by Mrs. Murchison-Lee, a lively little American, and commenced to laugh and talk. I look back to that evening and wonder if ever again I can feel so happy, so lighthearted. Satisfied with myself and all the world, one moment. The next——!

Crawley Drummond, the centre of a group of men, was reading his mail, throwing out bits of gossip as he went along. Of a sudden he turned quite grave.

"Any of you fellows got money in Hammond's Bank?" he asked.

"Why?" said a chorus.

"Because"—Crawley's voice was very solemn—"they've gone smash. I shall lose a pretty penny, and poor Lady Peggy, Carstairs' widow, don't you know——"

I interrupted passionately.

"It isn't true," I cried. "Crawley, say it isn't true." I rose to my feet and staggered blindly towards him. "My money, the money I have earned so hardly, so cruelly, gone from me. My money!" I couldn't breathe, the room swam before me. I put out my hands to save myself from falling. Somebody grasped them firmly, and led me gently through the crowd.

Once again Hardy North had intervened to save me.

I don't know how I got to my room. I remember North putting me into the lift and bringing me some brandy, but after that there came a blank, until I found myself lying on the bed, cold and shivering.

I am no coward, I have been through scenes that would have wrung most women's hearts, and never faltered. I have borne trouble the thought of which would make most women shrink and made no sign. But, as I sat there with the consciousness that I must start life afresh, my heart failed me. I turned sick and faint.

What could I do, what could I do? I had nothing to turn to, nowhere to go. I had married my daughters brilliantly, but they were not so grateful as they should have been. I could not make my home with one, not even Millicent. And yet I had nothing, nothing.

I caught my breath and stared blankly before me. What should I do, what would become of me? Through the long night I sat, until the dawn broke over the city, lighting the East as with a golden torch.

Digitized by Google

About half-past seven my maid brought my tea. There was a note on the tray in a writing that I did not know. I opened it with curiosity.

"Please see me this morning," ran the missive, "if possible by eight o'clock. I shall call at your sitting-room at that hour. I have something of importance to say to you, important to you and me. HARDY NORTH."

Important to you and me!

Could it be, was it possible, had Crawley been right after all? Indescribably flustered I hurried on a pale pink peignoir, and bade Marie dress my hair becomingly.

Then, with palpitating heart, I hurried to my sitting-room. Hardy North was there already.

"I'm glad to see you're better, Lady Carstairs," he said. "It's very kind of you to see me at such an early hour, even before you've breakfasted. I appreciate it, I assure you."

I motioned him to take a seat; he placed himself beside me.

"Lady Carstairs," he said abruptly, "you've lost all your money, I understand?"

"Yes—all!" I said piteously.

He nodded sympathetically. Then—

"What are you going to do?" he asked.

"Really, Mr. North——"

"Please don't be offended," he interrupted quickly. "I'm very sorry for you, Lady Carstairs. It's dreadful for a woman of your position to be placed like this. I merely wanted to know if you had formed any plans as to your future. If not, you may be inclined to consider a suggestion I have to make to you."

"I've no plans—at present," I said.

"Well, then, you may consent to what I propose. It will strike you as sudden, not to say strange, Lady Carstairs, but I am used to think and to act quickly." He paused, and I felt horribly agitated.

"I want you, Lady Carstairs, to——" he paused again and looked long and earnestly at me. "To chaperon my daughter," he said slowly.

I gasped, I couldn't help it, the proposition was so very unexpected. Then with an effort I pulled myself together.

"Pray explain yourself, Mr. North," I said stiffly.

"It's like this," he answered. "I've set my heart on my girl making a success in Society. I'm no good at that sort of thing myself, I'm too rough and ready. But under the care of a lady like yourself Belinda would have every chance. I want her to marry well—not money, I've enough of that; but a title, a man of standing and of family. I want you to take her over here and now. I'll allow you ten thousand pounds for your expenses, and Belinda can have what she wants besides. If she marries as I wish her, on her wedding day I'll hand you a cheque for twenty thousand pounds. But"—he looked at me keenly, "Belinda mustn't know a word of it. Say, do you accept?"

For a moment I could not answer; the interview had turned out so differently from what I had expected. Still, twenty thousand pounds was not to be despised. I determined then and there to win it.

"I want you to travel about, to let the girl see the world. I don't mind where you go, I'll leave the route to you."

"Tell me, Mr. North," I said, "are your daughter's affections free—that is to say, has she had any love affairs? Girls at that age are apt to be romantic."

"I understand you," he said quickly. "As a matter of fact, I believe Belinda was rather taken with an Englishman she met on board the steamer, a civil engineer come over here to accept a Government appointment. Mere girlish frivolity. Nothing serious. You understand?"

"Yes," I answered quietly, "I quite understand. Your daughter is seventeen, I think you told me, Mr. North?"

"Eighteen in July."

I smiled, the twenty thousand pounds was as good as mine already. A girl of seventeen would be as putty in my hands!

"And where is your daughter, Mr. North?"

He glanced round, a sudden light in his face. "Look," he said, pointing across the room.

I turned, and there in the doorway stood — Belinda!

Belinda was a beauty.

No matter what she did, or what she wore, the fact remained the same. Beautiful with the unconscious loveliness born of the forest, the hillside, the wild, free places of the earth. More than common tall, her head set proudly on her shoulders, she stood before me like a young Greek goddess.

When I recovered my astonishment—Belinda always took people's breath away—I gathered the details of her appearance. She was very fair and slightly freckled, with wonderful blue eyes, large, wide open, fearless as a child's. Her nose was small and delicately shaped, and her mouth—the feature which spoils most faces—was perfect. Not a rosebud by any means, but with fine flexible lips that revealed a dazzling row of teeth. For the rest her hair, which hung in a thick plait below her waist, was brown, with curling, golden ends.

But her costume! When I tell you that her skirt was what the women's papers call "home-made," and that her blouse bagged horribly at the waist, you will realise the condition of her wardrobe.

That a girl could wear such terrible garments and yet remain a beauty speaks volumes.

"Belinda," said her father, "come here and speak to Lady Carstairs."

The girl stepped forward and surveyed me with a calm, critical gaze.

"How do you do?" she said. Then, "Have you and father been quarrelling? You seem to have been crying."

I gasped. How on earth could I teach this goddess in a badly-fitting skirt what her father described as "the usages of polite Society!"

Hardy North quickly intervened.

"Lady Carstairs has promised to take you under her wing, Belinda. She is going to show you the world, and introduce you into Society."

"What about you, father?" she remarked. "Where do you come in?"

I frowned at the atrocious slang. Young married women are allowed a certain latitude in language, young girls never.

North hesitated. Then laying his hand on his daughter's shoulder he looked fixedly in her eyes.

"I'm going back to Australia," he said. "I intend to leave you in Lady Carstairs' hands from now until"—he paused—"until you're married. I've thought the matter carefully out, Belinda, and I've decided that's the best thing I can do. I've great hopes and great ambitions for you. While you are with me there's no possibility of these ambitions being realised. I'm a man of the people; a rich man, but one to whom the customs of another and higher class feel strange. I want you to belong to this other class, to live in it, to feel at home in it. And so, for a time, I'm going to give you up."

Belinda listened attentively, then, with a shrug, she seated herself upon the corner of the table. "I'm quite satisfied with you, father, and your class too," she said.

North frowned. "I'm not going to argue the matter," he said firmly; "it's for me to order, for you to obey. I'm giving you a chance—the chance of your life. Later, you will understand and be grateful."

"Well," said the girl slowly, "tell me exactly what this chance is."

"You're to travel with Lady Carstairs. You'll see all the cities of Europe, meet all that is distinguished, clever, great in Society. Know everybody, learn everything, go everywhere, under the guidance of a woman who knows it all."

"It sounds nice," said Belinda, taking a piece of chocolate from her pocket and nibbling it with relish. "Anything else?"

"Yes. It is my great hope that you will marry well."

"You mean a clever and a good man, father?"

"Something besides that, Belinda. A man with an old and an ennobled name. A man who comes of a family known and reverenced for generations."

"You mean a title, don't you?" said Belinda. "Well, I can't exactly promise to marry a title. Even for your sake I wouldn't have a husband that I didn't care the world for."

"My dear, for the type of man I speak of you would surely care?"

"Perhaps. But suppose I met someone who hadn't a title, and yet was clever and noble just the same. What then, father?"

"Are you referring to anyone in particular?" said Mr. North.

"N-no." Belinda seemed confused.

"Then the question doesn't arise. It will give me the greatest happiness in life if you marry as I wish, Belinda. Lady Carstairs understands my wishes and will do her best to carry them out. You will not oppose me? You will not see, nor meet, nor write to any man of whom I should disapprove?"

"If you mean David Carr, father—and I suppose you do—I'll give my word not to see or write to him without telling Lady Carstairs first. I can't promise more."

North gave me a troubled glance, but I signed to him to leave the matter as it was. Belinda was not likely to meet a detrimental while I had the care of her!

"I think you are making a mistake, you know, Dad," the girl continued; "but if your heart is set on sending me away I won't offer any opposition."

"That's my good girl. And now," he took out his watch, "I must be going. The boat leaves at noon, and I have much to do."

"I'll go on to Shepheard's and pack up," she said, and, with a nod to me, Belinda slid gracefully from the table and sauntered from the room.

"We put up at Shepheard's," Hardy North explained. "I left Belinda there when I came here last night."

"Mr. North," I said abruptly, "what made you come to the Continental?"

He paused; then, with a laugh and a flush, he took my hand.

"You mustn't be angry, Lady Peggy," he said softly. "When I passed the hotel yesterday and saw you in the sunshine on the piazza, I felt you were the one woman with whom I could trust my daughter. It was horribly presumptuous of me, I know, but I decided then and there to try and persuade you to be Belinda's friend and chaperon."

"And then," I said, "the bank smashed and I was ruined. Fortune played into your hands, Mr. North."

"It did, indeed!" he said gently. "And now to business. Here," he took out his pocket-book, "you will find notes for £500. The balance of the sum we agreed upon, £9,500, I will pay into the bank here on your account. Spend what is necessary for Belinda, Lady Carstairs, I shall grudge no expense, and send me on the bills. Good-bye and many thanks." He pressed my hand, and with a smile and bow departed.

I looked at my notes and thought of the balance at the bank. Decidedly the interview had brought its compensations!

I told Crawley what had happened, and he was much impressed and very pleased. We decided that he should inform the Duchess and our set in general that a considerable portion of my fortune had been saved from the wreck. Belinda, we agreed, should be regarded as an adjunct to my income.

The Duchess was deeply disappointed at North's abrupt departure, but revived somewhat at the intelligence that Belinda was a considerable heiress. I was quite prepared, and by no means displeased to learn the next morning that her Grace's son, the Duke of Eastacres, was expected shortly at the Continental.

"Dear Lawson's chest is so delicate," explained the Duchess. "He's suffered terribly of late. I'm hoping wonders from a winter in Cairo, however."

I murmured my sympathy, and we exchanged glances of understanding. Glances are quite as explanatory and much less compromising than words. It was as good as settled between us that the Duke should propose to Belinda. And, unless I was very much mistaken, Belinda would accept him.

The Duke was about five-and-thirty. A slight figure, just about the middle height; he had a fair skin, fair hair and pale grey eyes. High-bred from the crown of his well-shaped head to the tips of his aristocratic fingers. A little cold, perhaps, and decidedly reserved in manner. But in these days of demonstration reserve is a relief if not a virtue.

The Duke's title was old, but his income was small. The Eastacres had the gaming fever in their blood, and his Grace had long since gambled away his own and his sister's fortune. Rumour said he was as near to ruin as a Duke could be. Now Belinda's millions would reinstate his family's glory, pay his debts and dower Honoria. It would be in every way a most desirable match. I decided that it should take place.

My first act in connection with Belinda was to make away with her entire wardrobe. There are plenty of modistes in Cairo, and in a very short time I had fitted her out. She grumbled somewhat at the length of her skirts, complaining that she could neither walk nor run, nor climb trees with any degree of comfort! I managed to soothe her, however, with the promise of a tailor-made gown, and she finally consented to put on a dainty chiffon frock trimmed with lace for her first appearance.

I must confess I felt proud of my charge. With her plentiful brown hair coiled about her slender head, her slim white throat clasped with a necklet of pearls, she looked not only lovely but distinguished.

The Duke was immensely taken. He was extremely fastidious, and I had feared Belinda's girlishness might jar his mature taste. I was mistaken, however, he stared at her in evident surprise and admiration.

"The Duke admires you, dear," I said to her in confidence. "You ought to feel very proud."

"Why?" she asked, with wide blue eyes.

"My dear child, he has seen the most beautiful, the most charming women in the world. And yet he cares to notice you, a little girl from the wilds of Australia."

"He didn't say much worth listening to," Belinda answered. "And he's very little to look at. I never did admire small men. Now, David Carr," Belinda's voice grew a touch rebellious, "is six foot if he's an inch."

"Where is Mr. Carr now, my dear?" I asked.

"I'm not sure. He told me he was stopping in Cairo for the next week or two, but as he's not come to see me I suppose he's left. Gone up the Nile to the irrigation works perhaps."

"Perhaps," I returned, with a smile.

As a matter of fact I had seen David Carr the day before. He had called on Belinda; I as her chaperon had interviewed him. I explained to the young man how matters stood and intimated that I should prohibit any further intercourse between him and my charge. He departed much depressed but convinced of the impossibility of his suit. Of this, however, I did not inform Belinda.

That evening was the occasion of a religious festival in Cairo, and we decided to go out and see the town. The

Digitized by Google

Duke met us in the vestibule with his mother and Lady Honoria. After due consideration I had decided not to tell the Duchess of Honoria's misconduct; at any rate not yet. Crawley Drummond was also of the party; he knew Cairo well, and generally dispensed with the services of a dragoman or guide. On this occasion, however, as the streets were likely to be very crowded, I suggested he should engage the services of one. He selected a tall, fine-looking Bedouin, who promised safe conduct through the streets. He was a civil fellow and spoke English well.

Cairo that evening was a brilliant scene. The Mooski was thronged, and we had difficulty to force our way among the people. Mousma, however, our good-looking dragoman, cleared a path for us. We turned into one of the narrow lanes of the great Khan—or large, covered market-place. The picture before us was like a scene from the Arabian Nights.

The long bazaar was lighted with innumerable chandeliers and coloured lamps and candles, and covered by awnings of rich shawls and stuffs. The shops had changed their character. Each was turned into a tasteful reception room. Seated in a richly-hung recess one could watch the crowd go by, while the sound of drums and fifes, the low chant of a story-teller recanting some favourite tale, the cries of a band of passing dervishes filled the air.

Mousma called our attention to a band of these same dervishes. They were about to enter a mosque, and he suggested we should follow and witness their performance. It seemed a risky thing to do, we were infidels and the passions of the Moslems might easily be turned against us. Mousma, however, reassured us. We made our way into the mosque.

The performance of the twirling dervishes is a weird and fascinating one. They stand in a circle, their eyes fixed on their sheik who remains in the centre of the group to direct and control their movements like the leader of an orchestra. At a given signal they commenced to dance and twirl round and round at the rate of sixty to a thousand times a minute. To keep this up for nearly half an hour without a single stop is a fearful and wonderful accomplishment.

We bent forward eagerly watching the countenances of the dancers. It was curious to contrast the strange quietude of their faces with the ceaseless movement of their bodies, the swaying motions of their arms. Round and round they went till one's brain grew dizzy at the sight.

It was horrible, yet fascinating to see. We were all more or less affected by it. The dear Duchess shook her head, tapped her feet, and for a moment showed a decided disposition to join the throng. Crawley gazed with flushed face and strained eyes, even the Duke lost something of his nonchalance. Honoria had already dissolved in tears—excitement always affected her in that way, and Belinda!

Heavens, that mad, that infatuated girl had become so absorbed with the performance that she had approached the dancers, and with a grave face and determined air, was commencing to emulate the antics of a dervish.

"It's not so difficult," she cried in her fresh young voice.

As she spoke she swung round, her arms extended, coming into contact with one of the dancers. Considerably astonished, the dervishes stopped their gyrations, and gazed solemnly at Belinda. They did not appear at all angry, only astonished. Possibly they thought she was overcome with religious enthusiasm, possibly the fact of her exceeding fairness had something to do with their amiability.

Anyway, their attitude was quite friendly, and there was no cause at all for apprehension. Certainly there was no reason for the surprising conduct of the Duchess. Seized apparently with the fear that the entirely well-intentioned dervishes had designs upon her life, she gave a wild, though somewhat high-pitched scream, and fled as if for dear life—I never thought the Duchess could have run so fast—until she gained the shelter of a friendly bazaar.

There was nothing for us to do but to follow her, Mousma clearing a way through the astonished populace. I noticed he laid tight hold of Belinda, fearing, perhaps, that she would do something rash if not restrained.

I thanked him for his care. He released Belinda and politely bowed.

"It is nothing," he said, "it is——"

Belinda interrupted him. She did more. She launched herself into his arms.

"It is you—you!" she screamed. "Lady Peggy, Lady Peggy! He's not a dragoman at all. He's David—David Carr!"

(Interesting developments will be recorded next Tuesday.)

Christopher Creighton's Crime.

A Tale of Kippers, Bloaters, and Haddocks.

It was the most exciting episode in the calm of Miss Thornton's existence.

She stood on the busy north pavement of the Strand. It was a foggy afternoon in November. The clocks had just struck five. She kept quite still amid all the bustle of the great London thoroughfare, her eyes fixed on a bank on the opposite side of the road. Sometimes a string of vehicles or foot-passengers obstructed her view of the door which she watched as a cat watches a mouse's hole. At such times she craned her neck in all directions, so anxious was she not to lose sight of the bank.

It was evident from the fact that she stood so far away and did not cross the road to a spot whence she would have had a less obstructed view, that she did not wish to be seen by the person or persons whom she waited to see.

Sometimes she consulted her small gold watch by the aid of the light which emanated from the shop windows and the street lamps and made the fog visible. The person or persons for whom she was waiting must have been late.

Presently she darted along the pavement towards Charing Cross. A young man had come out of the bank door and gone in that direction. With feline discretion she tracked him, keeping ever to her own side of the road. He turned up by St. Martin's Church and went along Charing Cross Road, across Oxford Street, and on through Tottenham Court Road, holding ever a northward course. He walked quickly and it was only with difficulty that she could maintain his pace. When she passed under the street lamps, her pale, eager face showed how tired she was.

On and on he strode, until he reached a somewhat disreputable-looking street, pretty far north. Here he suddenly disappeared into a little shop which had red blinds aglow with the interior illumination. She stood on the pavement, panting, hesitating, questioning. What could he be doing here? It could not be for any good purpose that he had come to this suspicious-looking place, whose ruddy blinds hid its contents and its business. She stayed there hesitating for several minutes. Then she resolutely opened the door, also red with an illuminated blind, and entered.

She was quite taken aback by the scene and the odour. It was an eating-house. In wooden boxes or compartments, like old-fashioned church pews on an exaggerated scale, sat perhaps a dozen people, some of them evidently not belonging to the aristocracy, eating with undisguised appetites. A quick glance around showed her that the person whom she had been following was not there. She went up to the counter, behind which stood, staring at her with inquisitive eyes, a pert-looking young lady who, to any more appreciative taste than Miss Thornton's might have appeared not altogether ill-looking.

Digitized by Google

"Hasn't a young gentleman just come in here?" she asked.

"There are a number of young gentlemen here," replied the girl, with a comprehensive sweep of the hand.

"I mean a gentleman," reiterated Miss Thornton, with a very marked emphasis on the word, and a quick glance of scorn at the shady creatures in the pews.

"Perhaps you mean Mr. Creighton?"

"I do."

"You wish to see him?"

"Yes. But before I see him I should like to speak with some responsible person. Can I see your master or mistress?"

"The manageress has pricked her finger, ma'am, and can't be seen. Perhaps I shall do."

Miss Thornton was too agitated to notice very particularly the girl's rudeness.

"Perhaps so. I only want to ask a few questions."

"All right, ma'am. I'm ready."

"Please tell me exactly why Mr. Creighton comes here. I am responsible for him and must know the truth. If you will reveal all I will reward you."

The maid's eyes had a new glitter in them. Here was a chance not often thrown in her way.

"Wait a minute, ma'am, and I'll see what I can do."

She went into a neighbouring room—the kitchen evidently—where her voice was indistinctly heard playing a low-toned duet with that of another maiden. In about two minutes she returned.

"Now, ma'am," she said, "I'll tell you all I know. Mr. Creighton comes here every evening except Sunday, and has tea in a private room."

"Yes?"

"That's all."

"Nonsense. Why should he have tea here? He can get all he wants at home."

"I don't know anything about that, ma'am. He comes, and he has his teas, and he pays for 'em."

"And does he take tea quite alone?"

"Well, ma'am——"

She hesitated.

"Mind, I want you to tell me everything, and I promise you shall not be the loser by it."

"Well, ma'am, I suppose he is always alone—except for——for——"

"Except what?"

"Except for the——"

"Go on. Quick!"

"The girl who——"

"The girl?"

"Well, ma'am, just you come with me and peep."

"No. I don't want to see anything. You must tell me all, and——"

Here, in a significant way, she took out her purse.

"But, ma'am, it's difficult to explain, and if you'd only just take a look at them."

"Them?" exclaimed Miss Thornton, in her most scornful tone.

"Yes, ma'am, just one little peep," and, going to a place screened off from the counter, the girl pushed back a thick curtain from a square window, showing a little room, in which the young gentleman sat at the table, while close beside him was a rather pretty girl with a bush of frizzy brown hair, and neatly dressed in black with a dainty white apron. Just at the moment when the curtain was pulled back the girl seemed to be patting the young gentleman on the cheek, laughing meanwhile with a shrill ripple that seemed to Miss Thornton to be an audible quintessence of the minx's forwardness.

Miss Thornton almost screamed.

"I don't want to see any more," she said, and, dropping a sovereign into the delighted girl's hand, she fled the unholy place.

* * * * *

In her cosy drawing-room Miss Thornton awaited with palpitating eagerness the arrival of her nephew. His parents who were in India, had put him in a London bank and left him for Miss Thornton to look after. She had rejoiced in having him; for she was a woman with well-developed views concerning the training of youths and their safe conduct through the muddy waters of degenerate day. And it is not every spinster who has an opportunity of experimenting. Old-maidish to the finger-tips, she tried to be a kind of breakwater to this youth, keeping from him all the troubled and bitter waters of the sea of life that would otherwise have beaten upon him. But after he had been only a few months with her, she felt that her power over him was lessening, and that there were corners of his life to which she did not penetrate. His recent habit of coming home late for dinner worried her a good deal. There was no excuse for it. Between the closing of the bank and dinner-time four hours elapsed. What did he do with himself in this interval? She had failed to find out. He maintained a stubborn reticence. And so it was that the lady braced herself to the quest upon which we have seen her.

Christopher was later than usual to-night. When she heard him coming she trembled all over.

"Well, aunt," he said, "you have the best of it here. It's miserably foggy in the streets."

She knew it only too well. She said:

"Chris, I know all."

Her tone was almost comically solemn.

He smiled.

"Yes? And so do I. Here's your sovereign back again."

Miss Thornton sank into a chair, staring at the shining coin he held out to her.

Assuming, in his turn, a look of solemnity, Christopher continued:

"I am sorry, aunt, that you did not trust me more. You would have been saved from being the victim of a practical joke. The thing was just arranged on the spot by the two waitress girls. I tell you I was pretty considerably taken aback by the creature's impudence; but I am afraid that if I'd known you were looking on I should have laughed. The girls were frank enough to tell me all about it afterwards. I rowed them well, of course, made them give back the sovereign, and foreswore the place altogether."

"Then you won't see her again—you promise me?"

"See her again? What do you mean?"

"I mean you won't go anywhere else to see her?"

"What! Do you think I go there to see that minx of a waitress? Haven't I told you that the scene was improvised for your benefit and your bribe?"

"But what do you go there for?"

"Why, for the kippers, of course."

"The kip——"

"Yes; the kippers, the bloaters and the haddocks."

Miss Thornton sat with open mouth.

"You know, aunt, that I asked you often, months ago, to let me have cured fish. You told me that such things were vulgar, plebeian, and all that kind of thing, and would not let me have them. Well, that made me want them all the more. I felt I could not drag through the day without a bloater or a kipper with my afternoon tea; so, as you would not let me have them at home, I went out for them. That's all. And, I say, aunt, that shop's the best in London for fish teas and suppers. But I'm not going there again. Perhaps you'll let me have my afternoon kipper at home now?"

"Well, yes, my boy, if you are so set on it."

"Thank you, aunt."

"But I think you'd better have it in the breakfast room. It wouldn't be so noticeable when we have visitors."

And on these terms the pact was made.

W. G. Locket.

Digitized by Google

A FISHERMAN'S DAUGHTER.

The Sequel to a Seaside Meeting.

Ned Singleton put his hands on the sides of his skiff, and, leisurely raising himself into a sitting posture, looked around. While he had been lying at the bottom of the boat absorbed in thought, and dandled by the gentle swell, the tide had carried him at least a couple of miles below the town. Dipping his sculls into the water, Ned began to pull slowly back to his starting point. As he neared the town again most of the passing boats were gay with brightly-coloured sun-shades under which reclined girls dressed in cool-looking cream and white. A few of the fair visions were rowing, but the majority seemed quite content to occupy the stern of the craft, where they could display their latest confections for the admiration of their escorts and criticise at their ease the toilets of the other ladies.

On the right, the sea, sparkling under the sunbeams, stretched away, a sheet of molten silver, till it reached the horizon, while a thin line of smoke, hardly visible to the eye of a landsman, betrayed the presence of some outward bound steamer. On the left, beach and parade were gay with bright dresses; while the stirring strains of the "Soldier's Chorus," played by the military band, sounded pleasantly across the water.

Ned's serious face was rather a contrast to all the gaiety around him. For some time he had been trying to decide upon making a proposal of marriage. Though he preferred to think that there was little doubt of his suit being favourably received, the lady of his choice being of humble birth, whereas his father was a high dignitary of the Established Church, there were several circumstances in connection with the affair which caused him anxiety.

Their first meeting occurred during the summer. Picturing it to himself for the hundredth time, he again marvelled at its strangeness. Early one morning, as he was strolling through some of the narrow streets of the older part of the town, he had lighted upon the fish market. It was a queer little place, consisting of four or five stone slabs upon which the fish were exposed for sale. Noticing some fine soles, he had gone closer to look at them, when a young girl came out of a sort of little cupboard behind the stone counter. Her face was not exactly beautiful; she had no classic regularity of feature; but her keen, intellectual eyes, her dignified carriage, and the refined tones in which she asked him what he wanted, immediately struck Ned as being curiously out of place in such a situation. Upon hearing what he required, she called out "Dad," but receiving no reply said: "He'll come and serve you in a minute," and was retreating into the cupboard again, when Ned, prompted by some mediæval reminiscence out of an old French book he had been reading, doffed his cap, and, bowing low, exclaimed: "The fish were worth four times the price, fair maid, if 'twere served by thy own fair hands."

She looked at him sharply, hesitated a moment, then, catching his humour, replied in the same strain: "In sooth, good sir, thou valuest my hands right royally. To quadruple the price of the fish were well worth a washing, yet will I charge you but another moiety for your compliment." Taking up those he selected, she spoke a few words to a weatherbeaten old fisherman who came up just then, and smilingly handed the fish to Ned.

Undaunted by his expensive experience, he found himself strolling in the same direction on the following morning, and, indeed, for many mornings afterwards. She was not always there, but the old salt who took her place, seemed benevolently disposed towards Ned, and quite willing to talk about the virtues of his daughter. When he got to know her a little better, Ned found his first impression had been correct. She was far better educated than he had thought and seemed a lady in every respect. Glancing from the rough, coarse-featured old man, whose speech and manners were those of his class, to the refined, neatly-dressed girl beside him, it seemed incredible that he could be the father of such a daughter. Whether influenced by Ned's lavish presents of tobacco, or his extensive orders for fish, which the young fellow had a good deal of trouble to dispose of, the old man began to grow increasingly friendly towards him, and afforded him every opportunity of making himself agreeable to the young lady—a privilege of which Ned was not slow to take advantage.

During the rest of his holiday he saw her almost every day. Soon she seemed to expect him, and they went about a good deal together. The more he had of her company, the more he admired her; and, by the time his holiday was over, he was as much in love as a man could be.

All through the winter Ned took great care to keep in touch with his new friends, sending the old man tobacco, and the girl little knick-knacks; while he got them more orders for fish than they were able to fulfil. He had asked Ella for her address, but the most he could obtain from her had been a promise to meet him next summer. Summer had come again; she had kept her promise, and, in his eyes, she seemed more beautiful and desirable than ever. He had made up his mind that to-morrow he would ask her to become his wife. Hitherto she had fenced with him, and in some way or other prevented him coming to the point whenever he broached the subject; but this time he was determined not to be put off.

"I'm sure she loves me," he said to himself, and the thought sent the blood coursing through every vein, while the vigorous strokes of his sculls drove the little skiff through the water like a torpedo boat.

* * * * *

Ned had carried out his resolution. The two were sitting on a grassy bank shaded by stately elms. At intervals the fresh morning breeze, laden with the perfume of clover and hay, made a gentle rustling overhead.

"And you are sure—quite sure, Ned, that you will never regret marrying a common fisher-girl," she asked.

"You are not a common fisher-girl," he replied warmly. "And if you were—if you were a beggarmaid, it would be all the same; for I love you, Ella."

"But think of your parents. What will they say when they hear of it? Cottage folk are apt to be awkward and out of place in the drawing-room."

"You would not be out of place in a palace. Besides, what does it matter to them? You are not going to marry my relations, or I yours. Don't let silly social distinctions stand in the way of our love."

And he seized her hand, and poured out a torrent of passionate pleading.

She let him keep it for a few seconds, looking straight in front of her with a curious smile in her liquid brown eyes Then she softly drew it away.

"Listen, my dear," she began. "In the olden days before a knight gained the hand of his mistress, he performed some gallant feat of arms, killed a dragon or some other unfortunate beast in order to prove his love for her. I like to think that there is still some romance left in the world, and I want my knight to do something for me. Will he do it?"

Digitized by Google

"My lady has but to name the task," he said.

She laughed. "Well, as the dragons are all dead, you will have to be content with smaller game. What I want you to do is something quite different, but perhaps more difficult.

"You have only to say what, and it is done."

"Bravely spoken, noble sir. Now you shall come and give me a taste of your quality. There are three things I want you to do—that is the proper, mediæval number, isn't it?—the first this morning, the second and third this afternoon; and then——

"No, not yet," she exclaimed, pushing him away. "You must do your duty first. She got up from her seat, and walked briskly in the direction of the town. Ned followed her, wondering what was going to happen. She did not speak until they reached the fish market. Then she said: "You are ready to prove your words? You are quite sure of yourself?"

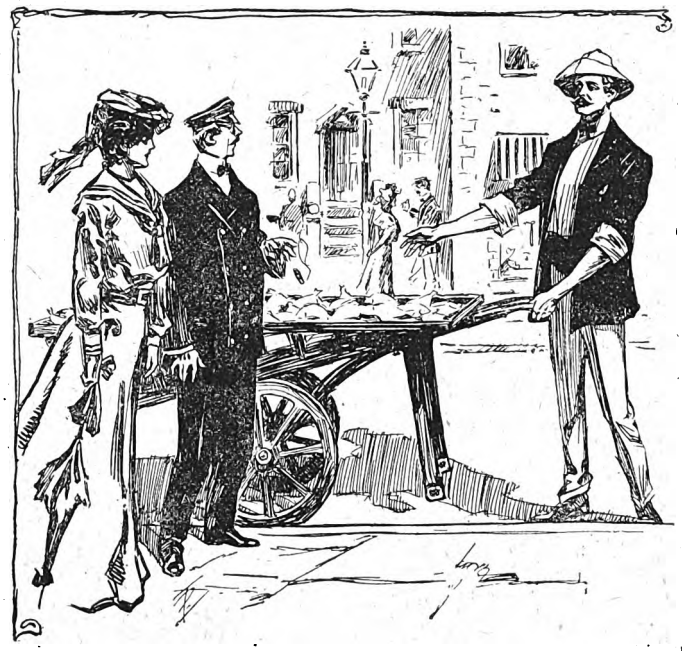
"Try me," he replied.

She pointed to the fisherman's barrow covered with some freshly caught plaice. "That is your first task. Take that barrow, and cry those fish for me along the parade. Then shall I know that you do not despise the calling of my father."

The family pride of the Singletons drove the warm blood into Ned's face till it was as scarlet as a cardinal's hat, and, for a few seconds he stood still and said nothing.

She watched him attentively. "Well, my gallant dragon-slayer, is the task too hard for you?"

At the sound of her mocking words he recovered himself. "In sooth, my lady," he replied, "'tis the easiness of it that has disappointed me. I had hoped for a foe more worthy of my steel."



"How are you, old chap? Want some fish? You can have the lot for a couple of bob."

"'Tis one that will test your pride, and he that is faithful in a few things—so, if you are not ashamed——"

He pushed the barrow into the street. "Since my father is a servant of St. Peter, 'twould ill become his family to be ashamed of the calling of the apostle," he said. But he thought otherwise. He pictured the look upon the face of his father, the bishop; the horror-stricken expression of his respectable mother, and the scornful grief of his superior sisters could they see him now. And, as he thought of their consternation, his feeling of mortification changed to one of amusement, and he laughed merrily to himself as he turned on to the parade.

At first his appearance created a good deal of attention. A well-set-up young man in panama hat, spotless flannels, and light-brown boots, pushing a barrow of plaice, was rather a change from the usual mahogany-faced, blue-jerseyed, sea-booted boatman. But he buckled himself to it, and soon a crowd of gaily dressed people, ready to welcome any distraction, however trivial, stood still and watched him as he passed, listening with an amused expression on their faces to the customary fisherman's cry of "Rye Bay plaice, Rye Bay plaice," rendered in a light, musical baritone.

Ignoring the bands of children who gathered at his heels and the general interest he was creating, Ned went doggedly on with his task, and, before he reached the south end of the parade, succeeded in disposing of most of his goods. Ella had not stipulated that he should sell the fish at any particular price, and he took advantage of her omission to ask a considerably lower figure than that usually charged. But his ordeal was not quite over.

"They look nice fish," said a lady accompanied by a cavalier, arrayed in an eyeglass and a most glorious yachting suit perfumed with the odours of Araby. The amateur fisherman looked up. There was no mistaking Harold Mortimer, the biggest dandy in the Temple. Their eyes met, and the latter stood dumfounded with amazement.

"How are you, old chap?" Ned exclaimed, mischievously holding out a hand which bore unsavoury traces of his lately adopted occupation. "Want some fish? You can have the lot for a couple of bob."

Mr. Mortimer reddened and hesitated. "Yes, send them along to that address," he said, pretending not to see Ned's extended hand, but depositing a card and a couple of shillings on the barrow hurriedly walked on. For a moment Ned felt inclined to hurl his money after him; but after a few seconds he smiled to himself and dropped the coins into his pocket. Then he delivered the remainder of his fish at the proper address, and, with a feeling of relief, wheeled his empty barrow in the direction of the market.

On the way he met Ella. She was in a hurry, and just stopping to say "This afternoon at four," passed on. Giving a boy a shilling to take the barrow to its destination, Ned went to his lodgings wondering what the afternoon had in store for him; but feeling that after his morning's experience he was capable of anything.

At the appointed time he walked towards the pier. A little knot of people were standing near the water admiring a tiny yacht, which was apparently a new arrival. As he walked down the steps on to the beach he saw Ella coming along the parade.

"I'm dying to know what my second task is to be," he said, looking admiringly at her rosy cheeks and bright eyes sparkling with suppressed excitement. "I hope it's nothing else in the fish line."

She laughed. "You haven't forgiven me then. No, I'm going to test your seamanship this afternoon, and see if it is worthy of the husband of a fisherman's daughter. What do you think of her?" and she proudly pointed to the little craft before them, at the same time tossing her mackintosh and several other parcels into the stern of the boat.

"But how?—where?—whose?" he began.

"Now, sir, no questions, please."

A dozen willing hands assisted them to launch the boat,

Digitized by Google

and in a few minutes they were running past the head of the pier.

"Which way is the wind?" said Ella.

"Nor' west," said Ned, who was steering.

"Good; now I want you to steer south-east. That ought to take us straight to Calais, oughtn't it?"

"Yes," he replied, "but I hope you don't expect to get there to-day with this tide."

"Will you please cease your objections, sir, and remember your vow of obedience."

"I'll lay her course for the North Pole if you like," he said, looking fondly at her.

As they were running before the wind, and the sea was comparatively smooth, the boat wanted little attention, and Ned's eyes continually rested upon the smart little figure in front of him. She had always dressed neatly, but to-day she had taken special pains with her toilet, and her dark blue yachting costume, faced with white braid, suited her lithe, slender figure admirably. As soon as they got away from the shelter of the land, and felt the full force of the breeze, their craft flew along at a pace which delighted them both. "Doesn't she go beautifully?" said Ella, and taking up a long pair of field-glasses, she swept the horizon in front of them. Then she began to chat vivaciously about general subjects. Ned had never seen her so excited. Presently she suggested refreshments, and, taking the helm, made Ned open a bottle of champagne, and regaled him upon cold fowl and ham, and strawberries and cream. He opened his eyes in surprise, but she placed her finger warningly on her lips, and he said nothing.

They had been running in a south easterly direction for about three hours, and the light was beginning to fail. Behind them, a little to the left, the Southsand's Head beacon showed the receding Goodwins; and in front, away to the right, the Gris Nez light flashed out like a great white fire with ever increasing distinctness. Several times Ned had hinted upon the advisability of returning, but had been immediately checked by his imperious mistress. So he ceased to care what was going to happen, and gave himself up to the delight of being alone with the woman he loved. But, presently, when he found the wind freshening so that he was obliged to take in a couple of reefs, and the sea running so high that he had to steer very carefully, he began to get rather anxious. But Ella would not listen to his remonstrances, and refused to let him alter their course. It was not until a sea broke over the stern and nearly swamped them that she seemed to realise the situation.

"I told you so," he said, as they bailed out the water.

"Well," she replied, "try and keep on five minutes longer, and if I can't find what I want then, we'll try another tack." She again took out her glasses and carefully scanned the horizon. After a few second's search she uttered an exclamation of delight, and pointed out the mast white and port red light of a steamer about a mile off. "Lend me a match, Ned, and bring to if you can," she said, opening one of the boat's lockers. With some difficulty she lit a blue light, and then a red one, waved them round her head and threw them into the air one after another. They had scarcely reached the water when a couple of answering lights flashed over the bows of the steamer. Then a searchlight was turned upon the boat, and the vessel came rapidly down upon them.

"Your second task is finished," said Ella, with a slight tremor in her voice. "When we have boarded that yacht there is one thing that I want you to do for me."

"Hearkening and obedience," he replied, muttering to himself: "Was there ever anything out of the Arabian Nights to beat this?"

The steamer soon drew alongside, and in a few minutes they were standing on her deck, while the boat was rapidly hoisted up to the davits.

A smartly-dressed officer received them. "Well, Captain Meriton, how are you?" said Ella. "You see I've come aboard at last."

"Yes, miss, I'm glad you have," he replied. "I was getting anxious. We're going to have some dirty weather, and the wind's blowing up a bit too fresh for that little craft to be comfortable."

"Allow me to introduce you to Mr. Singleton, Captain. I suppose his berth is ready?"

"Everything as you ordered, miss," replied the officer.

"That's all right then. Now, Ned, we may as well go and have some dinner. Captain Meriton, I hope you'll join us."

So saying she tripped down the companion into the saloon. It was artistically and neatly decorated, though there was none of the useless luxury often found on board the modern yacht. Comfort seemed to be its prevailing characteristic.

"One minute, Ned," and beckoning him to follow her, she led the way across the passage and opened the door of another room, which looked like a library. Motioning him to sit down, she stood up facing him.

"My last request, Ned, is that you will forgive me."

"Forgive you? What for?" he said.

She took up a copy of a New York journal which was lying upon one of the tables, and pointed to a paragraph among the items of fashionable intelligence. It read as follows:

"By the death of Mr. McKinton, his daughter becomes one of the richest heiresses in the States. We understand Miss McKinton is very unconventional and independent. She will shortly sail for Europe in her own yacht, etc., etc."

Ned looked up. "But I don't quite understand," he began.

"I have deceived you," said Ella. "My name is Ruth McKinton. Mrs. Dixon is only my foster mother. I have been accustomed to spend a week or two with them every year, for rest and quiet. When I met you I told them not to say anything about my real position, for I wanted a man who would love me for myself alone; and when one is rich—— Will you forgive me, Ned, or shall I tell Captain Meriton to steam back to Eastholme?"

Ned immediately replied in the most emphatic manner possible.

"Ned, Ned, don't," she pleaded. "You really must let me go. My maid is waiting for me, and Captain Meriton will be wondering where we have got to. Please tell him I won't be long."

* * * * *

"Well, I'm hanged," said Harold Mortimer, as he glanced through his paper at breakfast time. "What a blithering idiot!"

"What's the matter?" inquired his wife. "And who is the idiot?"

"I am," he replied. "You know that chap selling fish we met at Eastholme last summer—I should have spoken to him if you hadn't been with me. I told you that was Ned Singleton, the Bishop of St. A——'s son, didn't I?"

"Yes, you did, and a good many other people as well; but what about him?"

"Why, he's married the daughter of McKinton, one of the richest heiresses in America. He's a multi-millionaire. They've just arrived in London. And to think that I cut him!"

"Well, I must say I agree with you Harold. You were an idiot."

And the pleasure of finding that his wife did not disagree with him on at least one subject was all the satisfaction Mr. Harold Mortimer ever got out of the affair.

J. B. Beer.

What she Cried For.

Toto was crying very hard. "What is the matter?" asked one of her father's friends. "I have lost two pennies that mamma gave me." "That is not a difficult loss to repair," replied the friend; "here are two pennies." An instant later Toto was crying harder than ever. "What are you crying for now?" asked the gentleman. "I am crying," said the artful baby, "because if I had not lost two pennies I should now have four."

Digitized by Google

THE STORY OF A PARTING.

AND OF AN UNEXPECTED REUNION.

"Well, dear, what do you think of it?" said Jack Trever joyfully, as with shining eyes he threw a letter on to the table. His pretty wife laid down her sewing, a flimsy bit of lace work, and crept close to his side.

"It will separate us, Jack," was all she said with quivering lip.

The flickering firelight seemed to cast a shadow on the lovely upturned face, and glint in and out of the waves of her chestnut hair.

"But, Alice, look what it will mean to us,"—to me he had almost said. "Here have I been slaving for a mere pittance, and now this piece of good luck comes at last; it is simply glorious!" Then casting a look at the sorrowful face at his side, he said, in a soothing tone, "It will only be for two years at most, love, and then I will send for you, and we will be as happy as the day is long. You will be patient, dear," he added, putting his arm round her, but still glancing at the letter on the table.

"Yes, Jack, I know it is for your good, dear, but it is so hard to bear;" and then scarce able to repress her tears, she crept from the room.

Left to himself, Jack paced restlessly to and fro.

"Poor Alice," he said, and then his thoughts flew away to the quaint little fishing village on the west coast of Ireland, where he had met her two years ago. Being attracted by her wondrous beauty, fell in love, and well—had married her, and been promptly disinherited for his pains. And such a struggle as it had been for him since then! He heaved a sigh at the thought. Now he would be able to enter his own sphere again, and mix with the people of the highest class—which was as it should be. Had he not been brought up in one of the best families in England? And Alice—she had sometimes worried and retarded him; her lack of education had vexed and annoyed his high-strung temperament. What would he do with her now since he had got this lucrative appointment in far away India? How would she pass herself among his well-bred friends?

"Ah, well, poor little Alice," he said aloud. "I will have plenty of money now, and maybe I can manage to send her to school on the Continent after awhile." But deep down in his inmost heart there throbbed a thought that sent the hot blood flaming to his forehead; and still it came, crush it as he might, persistent and recurring—"I shall be free, I shall be free for two long years, I shall be free!"

And away up in her own little room Alice was weeping as if her heart would break.

* * * * * * * *

He had gone—and oh, the desolation that had crept into one loving, lonely heart. For three months she had scarcely left the house, dark rings showed about the lustrous eyes; she wandered listlessly to and fro, looking at any little memento that might remind her of him, her husband, her darling; wondering why the sun shone and looked at hearts so sorrowful as hers. But one day, with his familiar rat-a-tat, the postman left a letter. It was from him, her idol; she could scarce see it for blinding tears, yet all at once the world had turned into a bright and joyous place. Then after a blissful half hour spent in deciphering it, she rushed for pen and ink to answer. But now the sweet face clouded.

"I cannot do it—I cannot do it properly," she murmured, a slight pout on her red lips. "They would laugh at him when they saw my letter," and hot tears gathered in the brown eyes and fell one by one like little jewels upon the unoffending paper.

She bent her head upon her hands in dejection; a sunbeam stole through the window and kissed her rippling hair, and as if it had lent an inspiration to her troubled thoughts, her face suddenly cleared, she sprang up, the glad light once more in her eyes.

"I'll do it!" she cried. "I was always good at lace work. Miss Crickmay shall teach me. I'll educate myself on the money Jack sends me, and keep myself by my lace. Lady Severn always bought it, and maybe in a year I can save enough to take me out to Jack, my Jack, and it will be such a surprise to him." And all the time with trembling fingers and fast beating heart she arranged her hat, preparatory to going to the select School for Young Ladies, over which Miss Crickmay presided.

Far away in India a young man was bending over his desk, just signing a flourishing "Jack" to a letter commencing "My dear wife."

"She must never come here," he said sadly. "It would break her heart to be slighted. What would Lady Winton say to her, I wonder? Not that she isn't far more beautiful," he ended up.

* * * * * * *

"You are marvellous, your progress is great, madam. My friend, Miss Crickmay, she is delighted!"

The girl addressed bowed gracefully, and closed her French book just as a lady entered the room.

"You are coming now, Alice, I suppose?"

"Yes, Miss Crickmay."

And side by side they left the room. On the pavement they stood for several minutes. People turned to look at this beauteous type of womanhood, who was talking so confidingly to the elderly lady.

"Yes, I know Lady Winton slightly, and I can give you a letter of introduction to her; but it is a mad venture, child. If I were you I would inform my husband of this intended journey; he might not approve." And so saying the elder lady hailed a hansom. "Come with me to lunch, dear," she said, "and we will talk it over." And very soon they were both lost in the maze of London's streets.

* * * * *

In his private apartments in one of Calcutta's largest hotels, Jack Trever sat smoking, his eyes on the cheque-book he held in his hand; the little wreaths of smoke curled round and round, the clock ticked ominously in the silence; presently he closed the book and sprang to his feet.

"I cannot do it, it is a harder battle than I thought; but I promised her in two years, she will die of disappointment. Oh, for a bit of time!" he cried, as wringing his hands he walked up and down, the book lying forgotten on the floor.

"In a month Lady Winton's ball will take place. Alice could never face it. I will wait until then, and maybe they will send me farther inland—they would snub her so, poor child." And self was whispering—"What of me? How could I stand it ?Oh, no, I'll have to wait, I could not do it," he added aloud.

Digitized by Google

Out on the blue Mediterranean a great steamer pulsed and panted onward, ever onward, bearing its freight of human lives, and in a cosy nook on the deck Alice Trever sat and thought of Jack. It would not be long now, and how surprised he would be.

* * * * *

Lady Winton's ball-room had never been surpassed; soft lights, glorious exotic plants, beautiful women. Jack felt the spell as he stood apart for a moment, listening to the sweet strains of the opening valse. Suddenly he turned pale and almost staggered, clutching a chair for support. A beautiful woman had just entered, and was being presented by Lady Winton to a few select friends. Gentlemen crowded round, anxious for introductions and dances, to all of whom she was gracious as a queen; but ever and anon an anxious look came into the glorious eyes, as if there was a someone or a something missing.

Jack soon regained his composure.

"So like," he said, "yet so unlike. Why, Alice is thousands of miles away; besides she never could act like that even if she were here," he added bitterly.

In the course of the evening Jack contrived to get within the charmed circle that surrounded this queen, and was content to linger on the fringe of her admirers and listen to the brilliant conversation. But her fascination was too much for him. Oh, if only he had never met Alice, this woman would have been his ideal—beautiful, educated, graceful, and yet so like his absent wife.

She had turned and looked at him, he stifled with a cruel hand a certain sweet wildness that had sprung up in his heart at that look. He moved a little nearer—he would, he must have a dance; he need not deny himself that. Only to hold her in his arms once, even though it would be short.

A sudden boldness seemed to take possession of him. He pushed Lieutenant Faversham slightly aside, bowed, and with his heart thumping against his side, inquired if she was engaged for the next dance. A colour soft as roses spread over cheek and neck, she handed him her card without speaking, and he had scarcely written his name when the music began.

Rising with a smile she laid her hand upon his arm. "I do not wish to dance, let us sit it out in the conservatory," she said softly.

He glanced at her quickly, a faint glimmering of the truth dawning upon him.

"Alice," he almost gasped, as they reached a quiet spot, "is it you!"

But two soft pleading eyes were all his answer, and then two lovely arms went round his neck, with, "Jack, my love, my darling, see what love can make me do."

Amy M. Knight.

"So you are going to marry? Have you anything laid up?" "Yes, I've got a rich uncle laid up with a paralytic stroke, an' I'm his only surviving relative."

WIFE (displaying her new bonnet): "This is the very latest fashion, John." Husband (sighing): "I wish it were, but I know it isn't. There'll be another one out next month."

SCHOOL-TEACHER (trying to explain what a brother-in-law is): "Now, look here, my boy, have you a sister?" Tommy: "Ah, sir, it's no good, she has three young men already. You wouldn't be in it."

SMALL BROTHER: "I should think sister would a good deal rather have you call to see her than Mr. Getthere." New Adorer (delighted): "Would you? Why?" Small Brother: "'Cause he always messes her hair so."

LITTLE MISS: "I'm going to have a birthday party next week." Mr. Nicefellow: "The members of your family always celebrate their birthdays, I believe?" Little Miss: "Yes, all but sister. She's got so careless, she's beginnin' to skip hers."

Is Your Birthday This Week?

We have recently secured the services of a well-known astrologer, and below will be found his information for this week's birthdays.

November 4.—Those having their birthdays to-day will have an active year; some danger of law; not a good year for speculation.

Girls will find love affairs very quiet.

The day is not good for signing papers, buying or selling. Do not make new friends, nor ask favours here.

A child born to-day will be thoughtful, suspicious, and cautious. Will do best in the employ of others.

November 5.—A favourable birthday for business, health, and general concerns.

Young girls will receive attentions; if engaged they marry.

The day is good to make new friends, and travel. Deal with jewellers, surgeons, dentists, and those in authority.

A child born here will be generous, cheerful and active. Will rise in life and will be successful.

November 6.—The birthday indications for to-day are bad, bringing much worry and anxiety over the next twelve months.

Girls born near 3 or 9 p.m. experience disappointment in love.

The day is evil for most things; have a care against chill and mishap from 3 to 4 p.m.

A child born to-day will be unfortunate and fond of pleasure. Will be crafty and perhaps malicious.

November 7.—An expensive year over home affairs. Go quietly or business will suffer.

Young girls need some care with married men.

The day is one on which to remain quiet and defer all important undertakings.

A child born here will be extravagant, fond of change and travel.

November 8.—A mixed year may be expected by those whose birthdays occur to-day Some expense over home, and through sickness.

Love affairs cause girls anxiety; third parties interfere.

The day is good for buying and selling; evil for pleasure, visiting, marriage, and dealing with superiors.

A child born this day will be unfortunate in the employ of others. Fond of pleasure, change and society.

November 9.—A good birthday, and the year will be one of progress; make changes and sign agreements; deal with land and property.

Girls will find the opposite sex friendly.

A child born here will be active, clever, and skilful. If a male, would do well as a designer, draughtsman, or in a shipping office.

November 10.—A year of activity; have a care against law and accidents. Insure against fire, and see you are not robbed by servants. Some benefit through a death, or a friend.

Girls become engaged or marry, but need some caution with letters.

The day is good for pleasure and marriage, but some extra care should be taken near horses, and against mishap.

A child born to-day will be cheerful, active, witty and free. The temper will be hot when roused and the speech bitter and sarcastic.

Asturel.

Digitized by Google

TOM'S FLIRTATION.

Things Are Not Always What They Seem.

"And so you positively refuse to give up this intimacy?"

"Really, you ask too much, Aunty. What else can I do in this stupid place? I am devoted to yachting, you know, and besides, Mr. Trevor is the only man here who has a motor car."

"But, my child, you are engaged to be married! What would Tom say if he should hear of it? And what would you do if he followed your example?"

"Oh, I wish he would! His devotion wearies me sometimes. He used to be quite a tease, but since our engagement he seems to have foresworn everything exciting."

Flossie tossed her pretty head until her blonde curls fell over her eyes from which gleamed a spirit of mischief.

The first speaker was Miss Treadway, the girl's aunt, a wealthy woman of forty years, who had adopted her after the death of her parents. Flossie's fiancé, a young doctor of good family and some means, was completing a medical course in Germany, and they were to be married as soon as he received his foreign diploma.

The girl loved him, but she was very young—only nineteen—and she was a wilful maid, having always had her own way. Her besetting sin was love of admiration, and she deemed it essential to her happiness to have a man in her toils. So, being for the time bereft of her lover, she had drifted into a serious flirtation with a rich bachelor who lived near the seaside resort where they were staying.

Mr. Trevor's summer home, a fine stone mansion overlooking the harbour, was the scene of many festivities. He had already given two dinners in Flossie's honour, at which functions Miss Treadway had served as an unwilling chaperon, for she realised that the brilliant company invited to meet them regarded her niece as the future Mrs. Trevor. Now we find her reproving her young relative, with indifferent success.

"Flossie," said Miss Treadway. "I think you ought to consider Mr. Trevor's feelings. It is not fair to him; he does not know about Tom. Perhaps you had better tell him?"

"And spoil all my fun? Why, aunty, what a fuss you are making about a trifle! I cannot mope here without men's society, Tom is in Germany, the sea divides us, and he is welcome to enjoy himself in like manner. However, there is no prospect of his doing anything so sensible. Why, I verily believe he spends all his leisure time writing to me. I get so many letters that I don't read half of them. And that reminds me, one came yesterday when I was getting ready to go out in the yacht. I haven't read it yet; really, I had forgotten it."

"Flossie, you are incorrigible!" exclaimed Miss Treadway with as much severity of tone as she was capable of. "I give you up, wash my hands of the whole affair. But if you lose Tom do not blame any one but yourself. I will leave you to your own thoughts, as I am due at a meeting at the Rectory this afternoon."

When she was alone Flossie curled her dainty self in a large easy chair and laughed softly as she recalled her aunt's words.

"Lose Tom," she repeated. "No danger of that, couldn't get rid of him even if I wanted to." Then she fell to musing, and a tender look came into her deep blue eyes. "Dear Tom," she murmured, "I do love him. I wouldn't give him up for twenty Mr. Trevors!" She went to her desk, found the letter, and having a fine sense of personal comfort, sank back into the soft depths of the chair and with a box of chocolates in one hand, the letter in the other, began to munch sweets and read.

At first her expression was slightly bored, then astonished, and finally she threw the sweets and the letter on the floor, flung herself face down on a couch and commenced weeping. The portion of Tom's letter which had produced such dire results ran as follows:

"I had such a strange and exciting adventure that I feel it my duty to tell you all about it. You know that my hotel is in one of the best streets here, and that from my windows I can see much of the beauty and fashion of Berlin. However, I never dreamt of such a vision of loveliness as the piece of femininity whose acquaintance I made yesterday."

At this Flossie's blue eyes opened wide, she sat up, loosed her hold on the chocolates, and read on:

"The object of my admiration sat in her carriage alone and unattended just below my window. Suddenly I heard the rush of a runaway horse from the opposite direction, and seeing her alarm, I hastened down the steps and assisted her to the pavement. She smiled sweetly and was about to speak when her attendant returned and she re-entered the carriage and was rapidly driven away; not forgetting to throw me a kiss just as she was lost to view.

"The world seemed a blank without her" (here Flossie's expression became indignant); "I found on inquiry that she was staying at my hotel, and so had grounds for hope of a speedy meeting. That night for the first time in years my dreams were not of you alone, the beautiful blonde appeared to me more than once, always with that charming smile!"

"Fancy!" exclaimed Flossie.

"To-day the plot has thickened, and however painful it may be for you to hear it, I feel it only honourable that you should know all particulars, and then judge for yourself if I am to blame. This morning I was seated near the front window reading. Keeping one eye on the street—you can easily imagine why—when there came a gentle tap at my door.

"Thinking it was the waiter, I shouted 'Come in!' The door opened, and, to my utter amazement, there stood the beautiful blonde all smiles and blushes. After I had recovered from the delicious shock, which thrilled me from head to foot, I invited her to a seat on the sofa, and then endeavoured to entertain this fairy guest to the best of my ability. You must not be shocked, dear, when I confess to you that we soon became great friends, and that she came of her own accord and sat on my lap——"

It was here that Flossie flung the obnoxious letter away from her and began to weep wildly, and she was so absorbed in her grief that Miss Treadway entered unobserved.

Digitized by Google

"Why, what is this?" exclaimed her aunt. She bent over the prostrate form and said: "Flossie, dear; tell aunty."

The girl only cried the more, but at last wailed, "That man; that wicked, false man!"

"Who do you mean?" asked the bewildered woman.

"Tom! See, the letter on the floor!"

Mrs. Treadway picked up the letter, put on her glasses and began to read; at first she looked puzzled, then amused, and finally she laughed outright.

Flossie raised her head and gazed at her reproachfully with tear-stained eyes which looked like wet violets, and said:

"Oh, aunty, how can you laugh? The false villain! To let a strange woman sit on his lap! And I loved him so!"

"Why don't you finish the letter?" asked her aunt, with a quizzical expression in her kindly eyes.

"Because I won't!" cried Flossie, springing to her feet. "Never mention that man to me again. Where are my hat and my jacket? I am going to ride with Mr. Trevor at five, and if he asks me to marry him I will say 'yes.'"

At this Miss Treadway only smiled.

"There, there! Sit down and listen to your old aunty. Nay, I insist. If I am not mistaken you left off just when she sat on his lap?"

"Yes!" cried Flossie. "How can you bear to speak of it?"

"Listen," interrupted Miss Treadway. Flossie, awed by the unaccustomed severity of tone, obeyed.

"She came down of her own accord and sat on my lap. Fortunately I had a box of sweets and I was offering her some when there came another tap at the door. Putting her hastily down, for I did not wish to be caught with a young lady in my arms, I opened the door and there stood a stout French nurse, with a high white cap and apron, who asked anxiously if "la petite Mademoiselle Hélène" was within. And, Flossie, she sternly reprimanded my charmer for entering a strange gentleman's apartments uninvited, and she led the beautiful blonde away in tears, who, by the way, was just three years old, and it was from a baby carriage that I assisted her the day before!"

By this time Flossie had ceased to weep, and, though much abashed, she could not refrain from joining in her aunt's laugh.

"Flossie," said Miss Treadway later on, "how do you like the idea of Tom's flirting? And I believe I heard a maiden say not long ago that she wished he would tease her as he used to do. How do you enjoy it?"

"Spare me!" cried Flossie. "You know I don't like it. Oh, I wish we could go away from here. Mr. Trevor's attentions are so marked, and the worst of it is I now realise that I am to blame."

"What do you say to a trip to Germany, for instance?" said Miss Treadway.

"The very thing!" cried Flossie, all smiles.

And the next week found them bound for the Fatherland.

L. K. Fulton.

"Does he write to you regularly since you became engaged?" "No; sometimes I only get one letter a day."

Mrs. Prim: "Do you think his love for you is unselfish my dear child?" Daughter: "Oh, quite! The other evening he let me sit so long on his knee that he walked lame for ten minutes. Fancy that, ma!"

"What kind of a clock is that, Jawkins? It doesn't seem to be right." "Sh—sh! It's called the married man's delight, my boy. The hands stop at ten o'clock every evening, but the ticking goes on as loud as ever. See?"

Husband (the father of six daughters): "Come, Rosa, there is a gentleman in the drawing-room who wants to marry one of our daughters. He is a wine merchant." Wife: "A wine merchant? Thank goodness! Then he will be sure to select one of the older brands."

Your Editor Chats.

This week I am able to present to my readers the first article of the remarkable series by Lady Peggy Carstairs, about which so much has already been said. One or two inquiries have been made in regard to this and the preceding series with which it may be interesting to deal.

For example, two or three readers have wanted to know why in a story paper like Short Stories I should publish articles containing plain facts. In reply to this I would say that although the statements made in the series are perfectly true, they still come under the heading of stories, and are therefore suitable for a place in Short Stories. It does not necessarily follow that all stories are fiction; there are true stories as well as fiction stories, and both "The Confessions of Cynthia" and "How I Chaperoned Belinda" come under the former heading.

Again, a certain similarity in the method of writing the stories will be observed between the two series. This is not accidental. The style in which the first series was written was so much appreciated that I took particular care to arrange for Lady Peggy to write her series in the same bright, conversational style. This condition, I am sure, will be generally appreciated by my readers.

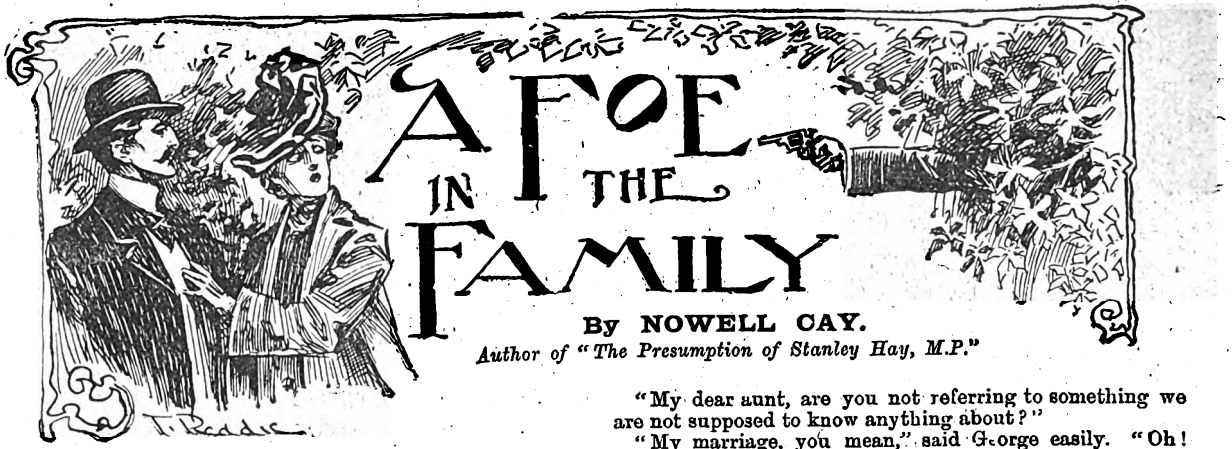
When you have read the first article would you mind sending me a postcard and telling me what you think of it? All I want is your genuine, candid opinion, whether it be favourable or otherwise.

On another page of this issue you will find an announcement regarding Miss Madge Morris, who is shortly to be married. Of course, we can scarcely expect Miss Morris to devote so much time to journalism after the happy event takes place, as she has other duties to attend to, but she has kindly consented to continue to conduct the "In Confidence" page for some time to come. This will be good news for those who have benefited by her advice in the past and for those who may have reason to consult her in the future. Miss Morris' services in connection with the "In Confidence" page have been invaluable to hundreds of readers, and I am sure that all of you will join with me in wishing her every happiness in her married life.

Since finishing her series of articles, Miss Cynthia Hamilton has been writing fiction in the shape of short stories. Some of those she has submitted to me have been quite good, and I hope to be able to publish them shortly.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google



A FOE IN THE FAMILY

By NOWELL CAY.

Author of "The Presumption of Stanley Hay, M.P."

A Plot to be Frustrated.

GEORGE ILDEN, Baron, of Ilden Castle, while staying with his uncle Jasper, at Pennybrook Hall, suddenly discovers that several suspicious events which have taken place during his stay at the Hall, point to the existence of a plot against his life. He has been shot at, poison has been placed in his pocket-flask, and other attempts, fortunately futile, have been made on his life. He confides in Cathie Hay, his cousin, and they agree that as many members of his own family would materially benefit by his death, the attempts must have their origin in that direction. They suspect Percival, Ilden's cousin. Ilden asks Cathie to marry him, as a means of circumventing his enemies' designs, but she has to refuse.

At about this time he meets Florence Courthorpe, the sister of an old college chum who was drowned while boating. She is very poor, and has taken a situation as governess at Witterby, a village not far from Pennybrook. In seeking to escape his foe, Ilden inadvertently settles down just opposite Florence's temporary home.

Late one night Florence sees a man attempt to enter Ilden's bedroom window with evident criminal designs. She leaves the house clad only in dressing-gown and warns Ilden of his danger. For this exploit her employer dismisses her.

She now has no home, so next day leaves Witterby to stay with some friends at Lallerton. Ilden accompanies her. Arrived at Lallerton, however, they discover that Florence's friends, the Despards, have left suddenly, and no trace of them can be found. Florence, of course, is greatly distressed.

Ilden, however, feeling that he is responsible for her position, and desiring to baulk his enemy, proposes to her, is accepted, and marries her secretly. An announcement in the papers informs his family of the wedding.

Shortly after their marriage Ilden receives a message urging him to return to Pennybrook, his uncle Rupert being dangerously ill. Leaving his wife at the apartments he has taken in London, Ilden leaves for Pennybrook. He is met at the Hall by Cathie, who informs him that his uncle is dead, and that he is again exposing his life to danger.

(The above is a short synopsis of the opening chapters.)

Ilden and Cathie Have a Chat

"You will of course come down to Mordenhale for the funeral?" said Percival, as Ilden was retiring.

His reception at the hall had been, as he expected, a cool one, except from Catherine, whose affectionate solicitude rendered him a little uncomfortable. He liked Catherine, but he was very relieved to think that she had not accepted his offer of marriage. He wondered that he had made it.

Mrs. Jasper had greeted him with the air of a person who had been personally injured.

"It is kind of you to give your relatives an opportunity of congratulating you," she said in her high-pitched voice, "although they are rather late, the fault is not ours."

Jane Barton interrupted her.

"My dear aunt, are you not referring to something we are not supposed to know anything about?"

"My marriage, you mean," said George easily. "Oh! no, it is not supposed to be a secret, Cousin Jane, after its publication in the Times. I ventured to take your congratulations, dear aunt, for granted."

Percival had made no reference to the fact of his cousin's marriage, and, indeed, had barely exchanged words with him, until now that he called him into the dining-room as he was passing to make his enquiry about the funeral. Ilden hesitated.

His uncle's death had been an unforseen calamity, complicating his plans. He had left Sydenham intending only to see him and return the next morning.

To postpone his return would be to break a tacit promise to his wife, or rather a promise which he had made to himself to satisfy certain twinges of conscience that he had felt for leaving her at all. And yet the social duty seemed one which he could not decently avoid now that he had actually shown himself among his relatives.

"Yes, I shall be present, of course," he said reluctantly. He was full of impatience to get back to his girl wife, and put an end to her anxiety, an anxiety which must be all the greater because they had agreed to run no risk of her discovery by the exchange of messages while he was away.

He could, of course, return to Sydenham in the morning, and still get back to Mordenhale for the funeral on the next day, but he resisted the temptation of the plan. He would not give his enemies an opportunity of following him and discovering the whereabouts of his hostage only to leave her again alone and unprotected.

"You will accompany us then, when we go down to-morrow?" said Percival, and it seemed to his cousin that the uncertainty as well as the eagerness in his tone were both suspicious. But he could not allow personal apprehension to make him neglect a plain social duty.

"No, I shall be at Mordenhale to see the last of poor Uncle," he said quietly. "But I do not suppose that I shall travel down with the others or be with you for more than the actual ceremony. You see, I left instantly when I got Uncle Rupert's letter, and I have a good many things to arrange."

"You mean that you will have to return to Lady Ilden. By the way, you have not told us where you are staying for your honeymoon, or how far the poor governor's letter brought you."

Ilden smiled curiously.

"No, I have not told anybody."

His cousin was not discouraged by the tone.

"You have an object in keeping it secret?"

"A very weighty one," said George, and closed the conversation by walking out of the room.

It was just as well for his cousin to know, if he were guilty, that he suspected him.

In the hall he met Catherine, her face full of anxiety.

"It made me horribly nervous to think of your being alone even for a moment with him," she said in a concerned

Digitized by Google

whisper. "If it was Percival who has been attemptin your life, he must be more eager than ever now that only one life—a failing one—besides yours, stands between him and his ambition."

"Well, I do not think that you need be nervous for a couple of days," said George with assurance. "Cousin Percy, whom, for all we know, we may be misjudging horribly, is not the man to risk his own skin rashly, and, if he is laying plans, I think that he will wait till we are at Mordenhale before he tries to carry them into execution. He knows his ground so well there."

"Then surely you will not go there," she cried.

"I must—for the funeral. I should think it cowardly to shirk a social duty because of my apprehension; but I shall make the risk as small as possible by going there only for the actual interment. After that I shall have done my duty to the family, and can look after myself—and my wife, again."

They had been climbing the stairs together, and reached the drawing-room now, to find it empty.

It was the first time that he had even alluded with her to his marriage, and Cathie's face took an immediate expression of reserve. It seemed as though she had taken it for granted that on this subject she could no longer expect her cousin's old frank confidence; but she could not neglect the opportunity he had given her by mentioning his wife—an opportunity for which she had been waiting.

"Oh! yes, your wife must be in danger too," she said, her voice constrained. "Is she aware of the fact?"

Ilden stared at her.

"Aware of it? Of course. You do not think that I should let any lady marry me in unconsciousness of her danger."

Cathie flushed a little at the tone.

"I never doubted that you would act fairly," she said, thinking that the advantages which the Rectory governess would receive from the marriage must more than compensate her for its dangers, whether she was aware of them or not.

"I thought I was acting fairly—but one never knows," he answered thoughtfully.

His tone unintentionally deceived her into the belief that he was ready for confidences about his wife.

"What, has Lady Ilden been complaining already?" she asked, seating herself. It had occurred to her that "the adventuress," once married, would soon kick against the life of seclusion which robbed her new position of its glories, and she flushed again when her cousin retorted warmly—

"Complaining! Good gracious, no. My wife is much too content, considering how little I am able to give her."

"I have no doubt," said Catherine, coldly, "that Lady Ilden calculated the advantages which she would receive from her marriage, and found them satisfactory."

The tone of prejudice was undeniable, and George was conscious of an unreasonable anger against his cousin. What right had she to imagine that Florence had married him for the sake of the advantages she would derive from the match? For a moment he felt quite indignant with her; then, as he realised with his usual sense of fairness how much justification he had given her for her belief, his anger and indignation were turned against himself. He realised for the first time that his own action and attitude had tended to prejudice Catherine especially, against his wife. He was anxious to make amends.

"My wife married me only because she loved me and wanted to take half my danger," he said stoutly, and hated the expression of scepticism on her face.

She had not expected her cousin, of all people in the world, to be so easily deceived by a cunning adventuress.

"A case of love at first sight," she said, almost with a sneer.

Ilden's eyes flashed dangerously, but his voice was deliberate enough as he answered:

"Practically. But Miss Courthorpe had already heard a great deal about me when we met, from her brother. He was a chum of mine at Rugby, and was drowned while boating at Oxford about four years ago."

Catherine still answered coldly—

"I am glad that you knew something about her before your marriage. It is a great risk to marry anybody of whom you know so little. I do hope that you will not regret it."

"Oh, no! I shall not regret it," he said smiling, although the tone had made him angry.

Cathie ignored the confidence of the assertion.

"You see, I cannot help feeling a certain amount of responsibility," she went on without a trace of self-consciousness. "If I had given you a different answer a fortnight ago, it would at least have saved you from this necessity. I did not know that you were determined to marry at all costs, although if I had known, it could scarcely have made any difference. But I have been a little troubled in my conscience after what has happened."

"Oh, I am sure that you took the right course," he said quickly. To hear her speak as though it were a matter beyond dispute that his happiness would have been safer in her hands than in those of the girl-wife he had left at Sydenham amused him, even while it tried his patience. His cousin had never seemed less attractive to him. He was almost afraid of being rude in his indignant desire to champion Florence, and tried to change the subject.

"I will wait for your verdict on my choice until you have met my wife. I wonder when it will be possible. At present I am not a bit nearer to solving the problem than I was when I saw you last. I suppose you have seen or heard nothing to help me since I left Pennybrook so precipitately."

The mention of his departure reminded her that she had something to tell.

"You remember the man in black whom we overtook on our way to the station?"

Her tone had become impressive, and George smiled.

"Yes, I have often thought with amusement of the excitement into which he threw us. He is a Mr. Despard, a friend or rather an acquaintance of my wife's. What is the matter?"

Cathie had uttered an exclamation of dismay. Her face was perceptibly pa'er.

"Your wife's," she repeated. "Oh, don't say that, George."

"And why not?"

"Because I am sure that he is in the plot against your life."

He stared at her tragically troubled face, incredulously, although he did not follow the connection in her mind which had taken the colour from her cheeks.

"This Despard in the plot. It is impossible," he said. "What makes you think it?"

"I only know that the arrival of Despard, as you call him, in Pennybrook frightened your cousin Percival away. You remember how hurriedly he left the night before you went. Well, Grant tells me that it was because he caught sight of that man skulking in one of the lanes."

And she told her story, as Grant had given it.

Ilden still looked sceptical as he listened.

"But this only shows that Percy has an enemy on his track as well as me," he said when she had finished.

"If it were so, what is more probable than that his enemy is yours, George. For one man to threaten both your lives is possible.

For two distinct men to threaten two different members of the family without any connection in their designs would be a coincidence too remarkable for credence. But my own view is that he and your cousin are in league. Of course, as you say, we may be misjudging Percival horribly, but we agreed at the outset to spare nobody in our suspicions, did we not?"

She looked up as if anxious for his concurrence.

"Of course," he agreed. "We must say what we think. But if Percy brought the man here why should he show so much fear when he saw him?"

"Can't you understand it? To arrange a crime is one thing. To watch it being accomplished is another. Besides, prudence would make your cousin anxious to be out of the neighbourhood while the crime was actually committed. I cannot help thinking that the story points suspicion against your cousin Percival. Against the man in black I had my suspicion, as you know, immediately that we met him. And you say that he is a friend of the woman you have married."

Ilden did not like the tone.

"Lady Ilden's greatest friend is Mr. Despard's sister. She has known them both since her girlhood. What she has told me about the brother makes it impossible for me to suspect him—at any rate of being a paid assassin, and unless we imagine Percival paying him to pop me off, what possible object could he have in molesting me? Oh! no, it is out of the question. Mr. Despard is a gentleman, an artist, devoted to a country life of seclusion and his sister."

Cathie interrupted him.

"According to Lady Ilden's account?"

Her cousin turned upon her.

"What do you mean?"

Catherine burst into tears.

"Oh! George, dear, you know that we agreed to speak openly to each other, whoever it might be that we suspected. And I cannot help thinking that in trying to defeat the plot against you by marrying, you have only entangled yourself more in its designs. How long have you known the woman you have made your wife? What do you really know about her? Nothing except what she has told you herself. All that I know is that at the Rectory she gained for herself the reputation of a schemer and tried to inveigle young Haydon into a clandestine love-affair. And she confesses herself the friend of the one man whom we have most cause for suspecting to be the man who is attempting, or pretending to attempt, to take your life. You must let me speak out,"—as for the second time he tried to interrupt her broken and excited argument. "Of course, I know that she has made herself very charming, and pretended to love you. Women are such good actresses. I admit it, although I am a woman myself. And the wicked women make the best actresses of all, because they are troubled by no compunction. Do you think that any good woman could really know, love and trust you sufficiently in the little while that this one has done to confide her whole life to your care? It is impossible."

The young man's face had grown stern and set as he listened; but his voice, when she allowed him to break in at last upon her half-hysterical outburst, was almost painfully under control.

"And you suggest that Lady Ilden became my wife in order to give her friends fuller opportunities of taking my life?" he asked.

Catherine was not to be suppressed by the tone.

"I do not know whether the marriage was part of the plot, or the plot intended only to bring about the marriage," she said excitedly. "You know yourself that you would not have married her if it had not been for these supposed attempts on your life. And not one of them ever injured you. If they had really intended to kill you, do you think that the shot would have missed you every time?"

For a single moment Ilden did not answer. Mechanically and without his volition, his mind summoned up for review all the incidents which had led to his marriage to be considered in the light of his cousin's theory. Every step in his connection with Florence had been associated with the intrigue against his life. Their first meeting had come dramatically with the most determined attempt to shoot him. It was the poison in his flask which had driven him from the Hall and led to his travelling by the same train as his future wife.

Of the next attempt at Witterby he had no proof at all beyond her word. And it was this story with its alleged consequences at Minerva House which had led directly to Florence's complete dependence upon him. He remembered that on their way to Lallerton together, she had seemed to anticipate and almost prepare him for the fact of the Despards' departure.

Was it possible that Despard could really have travelled with her on the previous day without mentioning that he and his sister had left their home? His naturally fair and judicious mind busied itself for a moment in presenting proofs that Catherine's theory was a true one. How easy it would be for a prejudiced person to believe that the whole intrigue had been, not a plot against his life, but a cunning device to entrap him into matrimony.

He realised that Catherine would be absolutely convinced of the truth of her theory if he gave her all the additional facts which crowded to his mind, and even without which she had formed her suspicion. Percival's fear of Despard explained itself easily in the light of the theory. Percival had been at the Hall longer than he, and although he was not such a good catch as himself, he was certainly desirable prey for a penniless governess.

Perhaps his cousin had been subjected to exactly the same experience as himself, and had become nervous of lurking strangers, or perhaps of Despard particularly, before the intrigue was directed against higher game.

In the moment of silence he allowed himself to look at what had happened from his companion's point of view. Then the thought of his wife came back to dispel the theory and bring back reality. He was not troubled by a shade of uneasiness.

"You do not know my wife," he said severely, "it is the only excuse that I can make for you Catherine. Till you do, and see for yourself how absurd your suspicions are we had better not discuss the affair—or else we shall quarrel. I will go now and ask Percy what he knows of Despard. That scene in the lane—unless Grant has invented it—certainly calls for explanation."

She was too disturbed by his attitude even to resent the implied suspicion against Grant.

"But George, if your faith is misplaced," she pleaded laying her hand on his arm. "Men have been deceived before now, and it is terrible to think of you putting all your faith in an enemy. If I was sure that the intrigue was only to make you marry her, I should not be so anxious. The thing is done, and you would find out soon enough how you have been deceived. I should say nothing. But if it is really intended to take your life, and the marriage was meant to make it more easy—oh; it is awful to think of you trusting the woman who is only betraying you."

She was crying again, but Catherine's tears gave him no impulse of tenderness as another woman's had done. He was only conscious that crying made his cousin's nose red, and rendered her even plainer than usual. He felt very impatient with her, but his unfailing sense of fairness enabled him to remember that Catherine was thinking only of his welfare.

Digitized by Google

"It would be," he said with less severity," but there is not the least need for you to distress yourself in this way, Cathie. My wife is not betraying me. Even if she were, the abnormal young person whom, for some reason, you choose to imagine her—and I assure you that she is not—she would scarcely assist a plot that could only lessen her income and her dignity."

But Catherine's mind had already met the objection.

"If she is really your wife, George!" she interrupted. "You are not even sure that the marriage is not a deception."

Her obstinacy made it more than ever difficult for him to keep his temper. But he still made the effort.

"You may assure yourself that the marriage is as valid as it could be made," he said, smiling.

"But it would mean nothing if the woman were married already. For all you know she may be the wife of this man Despard, or even of Percival himself. Grant has just heard a report that he was married secretly this summer to some girl in the country."

Ilden was too angry to take any interest in it.

"Don't you think that you are going a little too far, Catherine," he said, frigidly. "You seem to forget that you are talking about my wife. I have let you say much more than I ought to have done; but that is only because this ends the matter. Lady Ilden's name must not cross your lips again until you can speak of her as you ought to speak before her husband."

Catherine was answering with spirit, as Grant strolled unconsciously through the open doorway.

"You talk as though it were a real, ordinary marriage. You cannot pretend that you care for her," were the words that caught his ear, before the sight of Catherine's tears made him retire with an apology.

George overtook him in the hall, but made no reference to the scene. He was on his way to the room where he had left Percival, determined to ask him point blank what he knew of Guy Despard.

Who is Mr. Guy Despard?

From the first moment when Ilden had begun to suspect the existence of a plot against his life, and after due consideration had come involuntarily to the conclusion that Percival was the most likely person to have originated it, he had been very anxious for a straightforward talk with his cousin. But so far he had found it impossible to make any tangible charge against him.

Here, however, was a field for cross-examination which was not ostensibly connected with the attempts at all. His wife was anxious to ascertain the whereabouts of her friends, the Despards. Percival had shown some acquaintance with the man. He had an excuse for questioning him closely, and if Catherine's theory that the two were in league against him were correct, he might hope to gain something from his admissions.

He entered the room where he had left his cousin feeling that their interview might be an important one for him, and was disappointed to find it in darkness. Evidently, Percival had quitted it, turning out the lamp as he went, and George was turning to go when his cousin's voice, sharp and startled, surprised him from the darkness.

"Who's there? Who is it?"

Ilden laughed as he struck a match. He had no inclination to be left in the dark with Percival.

"Nobody very terrible," he said easily, as he re-lighted the lamp. "Whom did you expect! A ghost?"

His cousin was standing by the window with his hand still on the curtain slightly drawn as if he had been looking out into the dark grounds, and his face suggested the question. He looked pallid and nervous.

"You startled me. I was just coming out," he said.

"Then I wish you would give me a moment first. There is something I wanted to ask you, Percy."

"Fire ahead, then. I was just going to turn in."

There was a cigarette between his lips, but it had ceased to burn, and he was relighting it over the lamp. As he spoke Ilden lounged against the mantelshelf.

"I want to know whether you can tell me anything about Mr. Guy Despard?"

Percival's cigarette dropped on the table. His face that had been pale before became even more ghastly, and for a moment he stared at the speaker, too startled to speak.

Then, picking up his fallen cigarette, he made an evident effort to recover his self-control.

"Mr. Guy Despard? Who may he be?" he asked with attempted indifference.

"I imagined that you knew. If you can tell me anything about the man, I wish you would let me know it. His sister is a great friend of my wife's, and she has lost count of her whereabouts and is anxious to find her. I understood that you knew Despard."

Percival cast at him a quick glance of suspicion.

"His sister is a friend of your wife's?" he repeated incredulously.

"Yes, but the fact can scarcely interest you if you know nothing whatever about the Despards. Come, you met the brother here in Pennybrook a fortnight ago, or rather went out of your way to avoid meeting him."

Percival stared at him blankly.

"I don't know what you are talking about. I tell you I know nothing about the man."

"Or rather, to judge from your manner, that you know something which you do not care to tell me," said Ilden. "That is what I wanted to ascertain. I can form my own conjecture as to the nature of your acquaintance."

He was turning away as he spoke, satisfied that Catherine's theory was correct, when she made Despard an agent of his cousin's, but Percival stopped him.

"Wait a minute, Ilden. There is no need for us to quarrel over such a trumpery matter. On my honour I am not acquainted with Despard. I have never spoken to him in my life. All I know is that he stayed at the Ilden Arms a week or two ago, and seemed to be following me about. I imagined that he was a dun sent by some creditor or other of mine. Heaven knows I have plenty. So I thought it best to give him a wide berth. If he is a friend of Lady Ilden's, I suppose I was wrong. Has he said anything to you or Lady Ilden about me?"

His eyes watched Ilden's face keenly, as if anxious to read there a reliable answer to his question. There was no doubting that it was one he was eager to have answered.

"Come, I have told you all that I know," he said impatiently as Ilden hesitated, "why don't you treat me with equal candour?"

Ilden laughed.

"Candour, you call it. If you want to be candid, tell me where Despard is now."

"And what should you do then?"

"Write and ask him the address of his sister, for Lady Ilden's benefit."

Percival lighted himself another cigarette with hands that trembled visibly. He seemed to be deliberating.

"If I tell you where Despard is, will you in return tell me all that has passed between you."

"Certainly," said Ilden, "although there is nothing to tell. I have never exchanged words with the man."

"Any more than I have. But I happened to see him this evening. So I take it that he is at P——brook again.'

Digitized by Google

"At Pennybrook?"

The announcement gave George a curious sensation.

"Staying at the Ilden Arms again?" he asked.

Percival answered irritably.

"I know nothing about his movements. I saw him here. That is all. If you want to know any more you must ask the man himself."

"As I intend to do," said Ilden shortly, and walked out of the room.

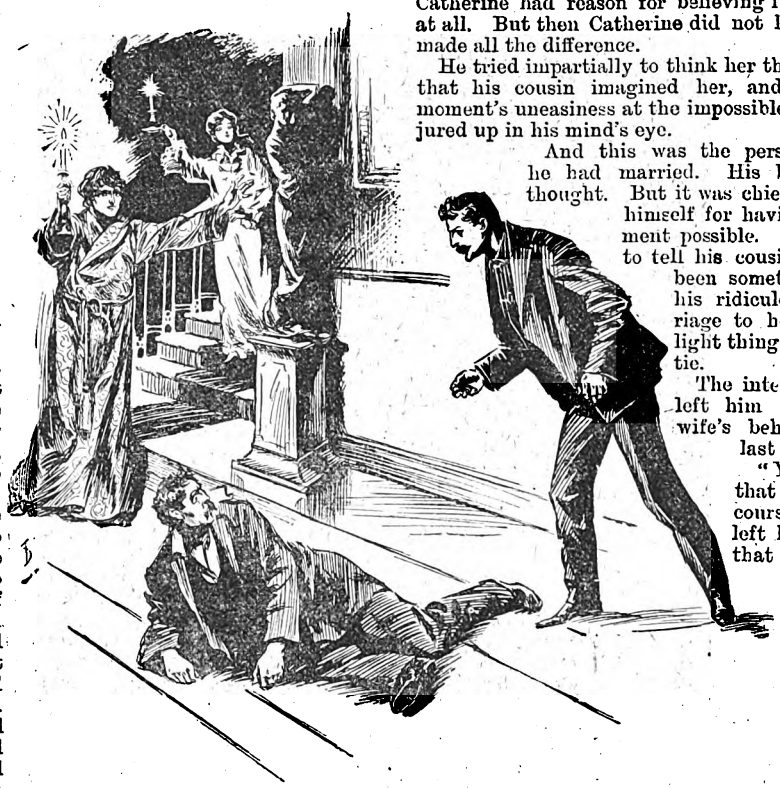
Percival's face was more ghastly than ever as he listened to his retreating steps. With an impatient gesture he threw away the cigarette that he had been trying in vain to smoke. Then he turned to the sideboard and helped himself to a glass of neat brandy.

The colour came back to his face when it was gulped down, and he gave a little laugh.

"Go, my Lord Ilden, by all means," he said aloud. "You will find Despard quite as eager to meet you as you are to meet him. If he is watching the house to any purpose, I think he will save you the trouble of a walk."

Another Attempt on Ilden's Life.

As Ilden left his cousin, he saw that Catherine had once more been waiting outside the room, nervous of the two being alone together. But this time she did not stop to speak to him. She was slipping into the library as if anxious to avoid his notice, and George was not sorry to be spared another tête-à-tête. If Catherine should hear what had passed, she would certainly see in it a confirmation of her suspicion against Florence.



Ilden half expected it, and yet was conscious of a shock to find he had been grappling with his cousin Percival.

It was proved at least that there was some connection between his wife's friend, this Guy Despard, and Percival, a connection which the latter had some reason for disowning.

Ilden had no doubt at all about it in his mind, and he put down the evident fear which his cousin had shown when Despard's name was mentioned to a nervous dread lest his ally should have betrayed him.

Yes, incredible as it appeared after the account which Florence had given him of her friend's brother, the quiet artist, content with a country life and indifferent to society, must for some reason have become Percival's tool. It was he, no doubt, who had fired the shot in the coppice and put poison in his pocket flask. He had really been pursuing him when he left Pennybrook, and although he had been thrown off the track at Rickerby Junction, he had probably returned when he discovered his mistake and found the clue again in time to menace his life at Witterby. It was Despard, of course, with his slouch hat, who had watched, revolver in hand, outside the Black Bull. And in going to Lallerton he had been approaching danger, a danger which sufficiently explained the warning he had received there. It had been given, if not by Despard's sister, by somebody who had enjoyed her confidence. For he no longer doubted it was Despard's sister who had written the intercepted letter to warn him of her brother's designs. Florence's identification of the handwriting on the envelope had not been a mistaken one.

It was a remarkable—indeed a marvellous—coincidence that he should discover his actual assailant to find him an acquaintance of his wife's whose disappearance with his sister from Lallerton had in a way necessitated their marriage.

Ilden did not disguise from himself the fact that Catherine had reason for believing it to be no coincidence at all. But then Catherine did not know his wife. That made all the difference.

He tried impartially to think her the creature of intrigue that his cousin imagined her, and smiled without a moment's uneasiness at the impossible person he had conjured up in his mind's eye.

And this was the person Catherine thought he had married. His blood boiled at the thought. But it was chiefly with anger against himself for having made her misjudgment possible. He had been a fool to tell his cousin anything. He had been something worse to make his ridiculous proposal of marriage to her, and show what a light thing he had thought the tie.

The interview with her had left him very jealous on his wife's behalf, and his cousin's last retort stung.

"You cannot pretend that you care for her. Of course you could not have left her like this believing that she was in danger if you did," she had said, and the words worried his conscience. If he did not care for his girl-wife as she believed that he did, it was unfair to her to let the fact be recognised.

Had he been cruel? Had he ignored her claims in considering those of his family? He was keenly conscious of the anxiety she must be feeling on his behalf, and he rebelled against the prudence which had made it seem impolitic for him to give his enemies the least chance of tracing her by sending her a letter or a telegram.

He had been putting on his coat with the intention of going at once to the inn and confronting Despard. Now that his actual assailant was presumably discovered, he was very anxious indeed for a talk with him. If the fellow's only motive was pecuniary gain—as it must be—it would be interesting to discover whether he could not be bribed to betray his employers. His heart had beat high at the thought that another hour might see the whole plot exploded and brought to nothing.

It was the thought of Florence which dissuaded him from the task he had set himself. His life was no longer his own to risk as he pleased on a foolhardy enterprise; and his previous acquaintance with Despard at Pennybrook in the dark had warned him that it would be foolhardy, even while his zest for adventure inclined him to ignore the fact. Mr. Guy Despard was not likely to leave the village while he remained there, and, for Florence's sake, he must run no unnecessary risks. It was not enough that he had provided for her future in the way of money. He must remain at her side to champion her against the prejudice and unjust suspicion which his own action and attitude had done something to rouse against her.

Digitized by Google

Percival, listening intently for the opening of the hall-door, was disappointed to find that his cousin was going upstairs instead of out into the night, where, ten minutes earlier, he had seen the stealthy figure of Despard lurking in the grounds.

"Curse him, I wonder how much he knows," he said to himself, and helped himself to another glass of brandy.

Meanwhile Ilden was going to his room for the night. The Honourable Jasper and his wife had already retired, the former in a more helpless state than usual, on account of the efforts he had been making to drown the uneasiness caused by his brother's death, and George had no desire to see Cathie again.

But upstairs in his room, he became conscious that he was feeling restless and lonely. He seemed to have so much to tell Florence, and he could not even write to her until after the funeral. He was surprised to find how necessary her sympathy had become to him. The few days in which he must remain away from her seemed intolerably dull to him in prospect.

It had been foolish of him to come, and a strong impulse came over him to ignore his social obligations and return to Sydenham by the first train in the morning.

But in the morning he was to confront Despard. He solaced himself with the thought that the result of the meeting might justify him in leaving Florence and coming to Pennybrook at all.

He felt in need of justification, for the white, strained face which his girl-wife had worn at their parting haunted him more than ever.

How brave she had been. He lay down thinking of her with a pleasant sense of satisfaction at the thought that he possessed her, until a disturbing thought came to mar his complacency.

The fact that Florence knew the Despards would make it more likely for them to discover her whereabouts. His wife and he had indeed made some slight effort to trace Miss Despard. If Florence heard of her friend while he was away she would communicate with her naturally without a single scruple, and—if his suspicion was well-founded against Despard—betray herself to the enemy.

The impulse to return to Sydenham became greater than ever, and he satisfied himself only by deciding on a compromise with his resolve. In the morning he would go on to Ilden Castle, and send a telegram from the post-office there to Sydenham. Experience had shown that the dispatch of letters from the castle had not been attended by danger. Despard would no doubt follow him, but he was counting upon his ability to make the man change sides.

His mind was more at ease when he had decided it all, but it was some hours before he could lose his uneasiness in sleep.

And sleep only brought dreams more disturbing than his waking thoughts. His wife was in danger, and he could not get to her. Trains kept starting for London, but he was always on the wrong platform, and people kept him talking so that he could not cross. He could hear the bell jangling as a sign that the train was starting, and woke with a start to find that he was bathed in a profuse perspiration.

A strange feeling of dread was upon him, and it was some moments before he could remember where he was. Then as he became fully awake he realised that the bell which he had heard in his dream was still jangling loudly. Somebody was ringing the alarm bell fixed in the turret, which a provident builder had placed there to summon the neighbourhood in case the Hall caught fire, but which had never been used in Ilden's memory of the place.

His first idea was that the place was on fire now; his second that it had been set on fire by his enemies with a view to his own destruction.

The idea coming to him as he was half-way to the door suggested caution. He had to remember that he had an enemy inside the house as well as one outside. The alarm itself might simply be intended to make him leave his room, which he had made as inaccessible as locks and bolts could render it, and expose himself in a house full of confusion.

He turned back, therefore, to throw on his coat and make sure that his revolver was safe in the pocket. The feeling of nervous dread, physical, no doubt, with which he had wakened from his dream, still oppressed him and made him more than usually careful. For all he knew an enemy might be lurking in the dark corridor outside, only waiting for him to open his door, and he was anxious to give his opponent no warning. Fumbling for the bolts in the dark he drew them as noiselessly as possible, and turning the key with the same care, pushed the door open warily, to find all his precaution justified.

As the door opened there was a swift movement in the darkness of the corridor before him, an arm descending towards him with something in the hand that caught a gleam from the window behind him. He stepped back, slamming the door to before him, and felt the quiver of a knife struck into the woodwork that but for his wariness would no doubt have entered his heart.

His blood rose at the sound. Here was another attempt, plain and unmasked, on his life. This time he would not let his assailant escape him, and as the stab of the knife sounded on the wood he flung open the door again and sprang upon the indistinct figure in the corridor.

At last he had a tangible foe to deal with, man to man, and a fierce exultation possessed him as he threw himself into the struggle.

The man had gone down before his onslaught, and he had his knee on the arm that, for all he knew, might still have the knife to wield while he gripped his enemy's throat with merciless fingers.

The man writhed under him without power to speak or free himself, and would in all probability have been actually strangled if the struggle had been permitted to continue without interruption. Ilden felt utterly merciless.

But already people and lights were coming on the scene. The clanging on the alarm bell which still continued was rousing the household and bringing everybody from their rooms.

Grant, who slept at the other end of the corridor, opened his door, carrying a candle, which cast its yellow light on a picturesque figure in an embroidered dressing-gown of sea-green, at the moment when Cathie in her nightdress ran down from the next floor.

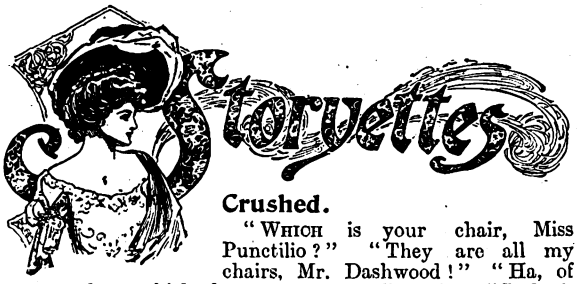
Her first thought had been of danger to George, and she flew past the poet with terror in her eyes at the sight of the two indistinct figures on the ground. Grant advanced more slowly, shading his candle, and as its light fell on the suffused face of his half-strangled antagonist, Ilden's fingers relaxed, and he rose to his feet feeling strangely sick.

He had half expected it, and yet was conscious of a shock to find that he had been grappling with his cousin Percival.

(Percival's explanation of his outrageous attack upon his cousin will be given in next Tuesday's thrilling instalment.)

THE wife of a man who often finds it cheaper to move than pay rent, recently misplaced her thimble, and was considerably annoyed over her unsuccessful search for it. "Never mind, mamma," said her little daughter, reassuringly; "we'll find it when we move."

Digitized by Google



Crushed.

"WHICH is your chair, Miss Punctilio?" "They are all my chairs, Mr. Dashwood!" "Ha, of course; but which do you most affect?" "I don't affect one more than another; do you think I weigh a ton?"

Knew Her of Old.

WIFE: "I've got a splendid dinner ready for you to-night. I was determined to please you." Husband (after complacently viewing the spread): "Ah, yes. What kind of a dress are you thinking of getting?"

He Got Her.

ARDENT SUITOR: "I lay my fortune at your feet." Fair Lady: "Fortune! I did not know you had money." Ardent Suitor: "I haven't much; but it takes a very little to cover those tiny feet." He got her.

Wrong Either Way.

HE: "Only one, just a little one." She: "Oh, no! I have no wish to be added to the list of girls you have kissed." He: "I have never kissed a girl in my life." She: "Oh! Then I'm not going to let you serve your apprenticeship on me."

He had Noticed It.

"WOMEN," she said, "are broad in their ideas and in their methods. They do not exhaust valuable energies in bringing small things to a fine point." "I have noticed it," he answered. "A woman invariably gets a man to sharpen her lead-pencil."

No Need after Marriage.

"EVERY single woman," said the eminent lady lecturer on "How to Find Happiness," "should study her faults and failings." "But why not the married woman as well?" asked one of the audience. "There is no need for her to study her faults. Her husband will attend to that."

Tommy Couldn't Write Nicely.

MISTRESS: "I found in your room a letter of mine that had been taken out of my writing-case. What is the meaning of this?" Cook: "Oh, ma'am, I only wanted to copy it for my sweetheart." Mistress: "What can he want with it?" Cook: "Please, ma'am, he's in the Army, and he doesn't know how to write me a love-letter."

Didn't Want the Tailor to Have It.

"I'VE had a rip in my Sunday coat for a month, but it will be mended when I go home to-night," said Dumsquizzle. "How do you know?" asked Skimgullet. "I bet my wife five shillings I'd find it there. She'll sew it to win the money." "You could have got it sewed at the tailor's for that." "I know, but I wanted to keep the money in the family."

A Hint that was Taken.

MR. AND MRS. JONES were starting for church. "Wait, dear," said the lady. "I've forgotten something; won't you go up and get my goats off the table?" "Your goats?" replied Jones; "what new-fangled thing's that?" "I'll show you," remarked the wife, and she sailed upstairs and down again with a pair of kid gloves on her hands. "Why I call those things kids," said the surprised husband. "Oh, do you?" snapped the wife. "Well, so did I once, but they are so old now I'm ashamed to call them anything but goats." Then they went on to church. The next day Jones' wife had a half-dozen pairs of new gloves.

Wo—man!

IT is justly said of woman that she divides our sorrows and doubles our joys. Pity she quadruples our expenses.

She Would Dispose.

HE: "I—I would propose to—to you if I knew what to say." She: "You wouldn't if you knew what I'd say."

Both Took Pains.

YOUNG WIFE: "I took great pains with that cucumber salad, John, and I hope you enjoyed it." Husband (anxiously): "I'm afraid, my dear, that I'm taking great pains with it, too."

His Share of the Work.

JAGGS: "It's a shame to make your wife work so hard. Why don't you help her?" Baggs: "Why, I do! I make the fire every morning." Jaggs: "But who carries the coal upstairs?" Baggs: "We use a gas stove!"

A Distant Prospect.

HE: "How many bridesmaids are you going to have, dearest?" She: "None." He: "Why, I thought you'd set your heart on it." She: "I had; but, from present indications, the girls I want will all be married first."

She had Saved.

WIFE: "John, dear, you know how I have been skimping and stinting myself to be able to get a sealskin jacket. Now I wish you would help me." John: "How much do you need?" Wife: "The jacket is £20, and I have it all but £19."

A Terrible Error.

GIFKINS: "What's the matter, M'Curdie?" M'Curdie: "Matter enough! You know some time ago I assigned all my property to my wife, to—to keep it out of the hands of—of people I owe money to, you know?" Gifkins: "Yes." M'Curdie: "Well, she's taken the money and gone off—says she won't live with me because I swindled my creditors."

Why He Gave it Up.

MAN (to acquaintance): "Hello, Grinsley, how are you getting on?" Grinsley: "So, so, only." Man: "Are you still running that woman's rights paper?" Grinsley: "No; I have given that up." Man: "Didn't pay, eh!" Grimsley: "Oh, yes; it paid very well." Man: "Why didn't you continue to run it?" Grinsley: "I got married."

A Silenced Girl.

"YOU need not deny it, I know that he kissed you while you were sitting on the steps last night." "Yes, mamma, eight or ten times, I fancy." "Eight or ten times! Why—I—you——" "Yes, mamma, dear, I told him the first time if he did it again I wouldn't speak to him, and after that I could not tell him to stop without breaking my word. And I knew you would not want your daughter to tell a fib."

He Preferred Riches Himself.

JACK: "I have a chance to marry a poor girl whom I love, or a rich woman whom I do not love. What would you advise?" George: "Love is the salt of life, my friend. Without it all else is naught. Love, pure love, makes poverty wealth, pain a joy, earth a heaven." Jack: "Enough. I will marry the poor girl whom I love." George: "Bravely spoken. By the way, would you—er—mind introducing me to the rich woman whom you do not love?"

Wasting Time.

THEY were dining off fowl in a restaurant. "You see," he explained, as he showed her the wishbone, "you take hold here, and I'll take hold here. Then we must both make a wish and pull." "But I don't know what to wish for," she protested. "Oh, you can think of something," he said. "No I can't," she replied; "I can't think of anything I want very much." "Well, I'll wish for you," he exclaimed. "Will you really?" she asked. "Yes." "Well, then, there's no use fooling with the old wishbone," she interrupted with a glad smile, "you can have me."

Digitized by Google

THE AWAKENING;

or, the End and the Means.

MADGE DAWSON laid a restraining hand on her husband's arm, and they stopped behind a sheltering hedge through which they could see the speakers whose voices had fallen on their ears.

"That's the worst of coming by the train previous to that by which you are expected," whispered Tom Dawson. "You come unexpectedly on a scene not intended for you to witness." "Oh, well! It's nothing!" responded Madge. "I should have gone straight through upon them, but I wanted you to have a look at my friend Felice before you spoke to her. There she is, and the man, about four years older, is her affianced husband, Llewyn Graham. He is her cousin. What do you think of her?"

"I should say that she didn't care a fig for him, or she wouldn't show him a cross face like that!" pronounced Tom decisively. "Let us go forward; I don't like to be accused of eavesdropping."

But the intention was frustrated by the words uttered by Felice, which came to them just loudly enough to be perfectly audible. The conversation was wafted to them on the breeze, for the engaged couple were now talking in a high tone.

"I don't believe in these child engagements, Llewyn!" said the girl, petulantly. "Two children are destined by fond parents for each other, they grow up together always with that one idea, they become engaged—formally, I mean—at a specified time, and they marry at the appointed time! Then you write "Finis!" and the thing is done! That is how it has been with us so far, and there is no excitement about the thing at all; it's the same always. Now, when you don't know to whom you are going to be married, it's different. It must be, of course!"

"I am sorry that there is so little excitement in our courtship, Felice," said the young man gravely. He might have said it with a smile half a dozen months previously, but he had heard a similar remark several times since then. "What can I do to make it more exciting for you? I have taken you to balls——"

"Oh, no, that isn't at all what I mean! And I can't explain, if you don't understand!" cried the girl irritably. "But, of course, it's all right and just as it should be! It is the best thing from all points of view that we should marry, and if it is all so commonplace, it can't be helped. Still, I should like a little more romance!"

"Romance generally means sorrow!" retorted the young fellow.

"That would be a change!" remarked the girl flippantly.

The watchers noticed the look of mingled love and compassion on his face as he gazed at her for a moment before replying, but Felice was blind to it.

"If it is so very irksome," he said slowly, "perhaps the arrangement can be altered."

"Probably you want it altered! Do you?" she interposed with slight sarcasm. "It happens like that, I should say, in early engagements. You grow up with the idea, as I said before, and when it is too late you look round and find there are others in the world! Perhaps it is so with you, and you wish to make an alteration?"

She looked at him defiantly. He stood motionless for a few seconds.

"You will not make me quarrel with you, Felice," he said at length, "although you always appear to be trying to do so! Let us dismiss the subject! I must go now!"

"Silence gives consent—you did not answer the question!" mocked Felice.

She turned on her heel and ran towards the house, a ripple of laughter coming from the flying figure. Llewyn strode away in another direction, much to the relief of the Dawsons, who thought he was about to surprise them.

Madge Dawson had been a friend of Felice till the former had removed from the neighbourhood of the Grange to Manchester. She was three years older than Felice, and less fortunately circumstanced. Her engagement with Tom Dawson had been prolonged owing to the fact that he had not been successful in his efforts to gain a position such as he desired to offer to his wife, but finally Madge had broken down that barrier, and had thrown in her lot with his.

"A woman's influence, so the great men say, is valuable to a man, and a wife can often help her husband by encouraging him and in many ways. Two heads are better than one, Tom! Let us take the present position and try to improve it together. Why should we wait and wait?"

So they were married quietly, and Felice had extended them an invitation to The Grange on behalf of her father. In her eagerness to see her friend, Madge had insisted on taking an earlier train.

"It will be a surprise for her!" she laughed. "We can walk up from the station, and the dog-cart can fetch our trunks."

As a result, they had arrived in time to witness the foregoing incident.

"Your friend does not impress me, Madge!" declared Tom. "She wants a touch of sorrow to awaken her. She has everything in her favour—money, a good fellow for a future husband. She doesn't know the happiness that is within her reach. I wish that things had been as smooth for us, dear!"

"I cannot understand the way she treats him," observed Madge sorrowfully. "He is a thoroughly good, patient fellow. She is good at heart, yet she is quarrelling with her happiness! Why?"

"She doesn't love him!" pronounced Tom.

"I believe she really does!" declared Madge energetically. "But she always kept him aloof. I know that he tried to kiss her and make love when they were engaged, but she was scarcely old enough to understand, and she laughed at him. Naturally, that put him off, and he thought she did not like his demonstrations of affection."

"She is pretty," mused Tom. "No, I incline to my belief that she doesn't care for him."

"I'm certain she does!" asserted Madge, although she hardly knew why she spoke so warmly, and the next instant there came a little misgiving into her heart.

Tom was watching her out of the corner of his eye, and an amused expression began to spread over his face, but was instantly checked.

"If she really loves him," he observed quietly, "she requires to be awakened to the fact. Do you think we could manage it while we are here?"

"How? What?" demanded Madge eagerly.

"We must show ourselves now, or we shall be caught," replied Tom, evading the question.

They walked forward to the house and were met at the door by Felice, who had seen them just in time to welcome them at the threshold. The two young ladies greeted each other affectionately. Tom was shyly introduced as "My husband!" and then Felice was all activity in her arrangements to make them feel at home.

Mr. Graham, the owner of The Grange, was suffering from an internal malady that might take him off at short notice, but might permit him to live many years. He was desirous that his brother's only son should marry his only child and daughter; otherwise the estate might pass into other hands.

Digitized by Google

and he wished to see a Graham continue the line of owners of The Grange. There was no question of money, as there was enough on both sides to make one independent of the other.

Mr. James Graham left the young people very much to themselves, contenting himself with a quiet life in the midst of books. Llewyn was living at The Grange, managing the property.

Llewyn Graham took to Tom Dawson from the first, and the four young people promised themselves some very happy excursions and good times generally during the stay of the Dawsons.

"What did you mean by saying that we might awaken Felice during our stay here, Tom?" asked Madge on the second day.

"By our example, Madge," replied Tom, with just the least hesitation. "You seem to be very thick with her, so she might gather from you—well, you know!"

"Ye-es," said Madge, doubtfully. She was rather disappointed; she had scented a plot and wished to be in it, and now there was nothing at all mysterious in Tom's idea.

Felice Graham did not appear to learn much from the example of Mr. and Mrs. Dawson; there was no mistake about the affection existing between them, and quite unconsciously they showed it clearly, without intruding it on others, notwithstanding. She continued to treat Llewyn in the same off hand, discontented style, and nearly drove the poor fellow into saying something harsh.

"I don't understand why you ratified an engagement with me, when you have seen others whom you apparently adore so much," she said to him once, when they chanced to be alone, and the conversation had drifted round to his last visit to Portsmouth, he having mentioned one or two ladies whom he had seen. Unthinkingly, he had spoken of their charming and attractive manners. "I can't expect to be brilliant."

"I was not making any comparison, Felice," he said deprecatingly. "They are not to be compared with you; no comparison is possible!"

"Oh, I know I am not a match for those or any other of your acquaintances!" she remarked with exasperating assurance, purposely misinterpreting his words. "Hadn't you better consider before it is too late?

His face paled. She was trying him beyond endurance. He had an angry retort on his lips, his heart was rebelling against this petulance, but he checked it. Feeling that it was necessary to say something, yet unable to trust himself to say more than a word or two, Llewyn turned on his heel with—

"It may be worth considering!"

He made his way hastily to his own room, where he sat in moody reflection.

"It would be a sad blow to Uncle James, but I am beginning to think that it must come to it!" he muttered. "It may be all very well to keep the name of Graham at the Grange, but I don't wish to spoil her life. I am passionately fond of her, and it would be well to unite the two branches of the family at the old home, but that is only sentiment, after all! Uncle could make it a stipulation that her husband should take the name of Graham, or that, if she sold the place, I should have the first chance of acquiring it at a fair price—not that I think she would sell it! I'll think it over a little longer before I mention it, but I feel that it will have to come!"

It was the last day of the visit of her friend, and Felice was struck with the worried look on Madge's face.

"What is wrong, Madge?" she asked, half earnestly, half banteringly. "Are you not looking forward to having your husband all to yourself?"

"Well, no, it—— That is——"

"So it isn't all happiness to have him all to yourself!" cried Felice, picking her up quickly, and laughing at her own smartness. "Well, if it is like that with you two, how will it be with Llewyn and me in another six months? You have had a little romance and I haven't!"

"I'm worried, Felice," said Madge, with unusual earnestness. "It isn't about myself, but—— You brought him into the conversation, so I shall not hesitate to mention him. Llewyn, I mean. I'm worried about you, though, more than him! Tom told me this morning, you see!"

"I don't see, so please explain!" Felice felt a strange something at her heart; her cheek was a trifle paler and her breath came less freely.

"Well," said Madge in desperation, "he told me something about your cousin that worried me, for your sake. I don't know how Tom got hold of it, and I suppose I ought not to say anything about it, but I must. I wonder if you would be very sorry if—if you lost him and he married another whom he loved better?"

An impatient gesture from Felice had caused Madge to shorten her rigmarole, and say what she meant in a blunt way. The girl looked strangely at Madge as if unable to comprehend; then she went as pale as death and both hands pressed against her heart. She seated herself in a chair near her friend, and steadied her voice to speak.

"Do you mean that Llewyn is in love with another girl?" she asked, with appalling calmness.

"Tom says he is positive about it!" asserted Madge. "I thought you ought to know. Tom said you wouldn't care a fig; he thought you would be rather pleased to be free, because you did not treat Mr. Graham as you would if you were fond of him. That's true enough, isn't it? You won't care much about losing him, that may be, but it isn't fair of him not to say so straight out."

"Don't say a word against Llewyn!" cried Felice almost fiercely. More calmly she continued—"Are you sure of this?"

"Tom is positive," repeated Madge, "and I must say that Mr. Graham has not seemed so attentive to you during the past three days as before. You must have noticed that yourself. But you don't care, do you, Felice?"

She stopped helplessly, for the girl before her was on the verge of swooning. Madge jumped up in alarm, but her movement had the effect of recalling Felice to her surroundings and she signed to Madge to resume her seat.

Both sat mute for fully two minutes, Madge watching with something akin to fear the varying expressions of her friend's face. At last—

"I must see Llewyn," said Madge, in a hollow voice. "He will tell me the truth."

"I thought you did not care for him, Felice, or I would have left the unpleasant task of telling you to somebody else to perform. I thought—you would be almost glad of your freedom, although annoyed at being——"

"Glad!" echoed Felice, in an expressionless voice. "Glad Madge, if he does not love me I shall die! I have never realised it before. I know now how wicked I have been to trifle with the love of a good man! It all comes to me like a horrid panorama! I must see him and learn the truth from his own lips. And if it is true——"

"Your father would like to see you, Miss Felice," said an old servant at this moment. She had knocked at the door, and, receiving no response, had opened it.

Felice went mechanically to the study, where she found her father in a state of considerable excitement.

"What is this that Llewyn has been telling me?" he asked excitedly. "I can't have this! You must go to him at once and set it right! I—Oh, dear, I can't have it! Go to him and see what you mean, the pair of you!"

"I'll see, father!" said Felice.

She kissed him and went out into the garden, towards a corner which was reserved for the private use of Mr. Graham, his daughter, and Llewyn. She was told that he was there.

"Has anything happened?" asked Llewyn, as his cousin approached him and he observed the extreme pallor of her countenance. "Is your father ill?"

"No, it is nothing!" she replied in the same hard voice as she had spoken the short sentence to her father.

She searched Llewyn's face for signs that would tell her what she expected to hear, but he was all anxiety. Yet it must be true; her father's remarks, coming immediately on Madge's revelation, were proof enough. Llewyn had told her father that he did not care for her, and wished to be released from the engagement.

"Don't trifle, Felice!" said Llewyn sternly. "When you come to me with a face like death, I know that there must be something very serious the matter. Tell me at once!"

Digitized by Google

He spoke sharply, and it caused her some surprise; he was always so gentle.

"I have come to ask you a question, and I wish you to promise me, on your word as a gentleman, that you will give me the truth in answer. Will you?"

"Of course I will!" he replied, staring at her blankly.

"Whatever I ask?"

"Whatever you ask!"

"Llewyn, are you in love with another woman?"

He started in amazement, and answered with some show of bitterness.

"No, I am not! But it would not affect you if I were, would it?"

"Yes, Llewyn," she said clearly, decisively, drawing a long breath, "it would kill me!"

"Felice!" was all he could exclaim.

"Why did you tell my father that you were in love——"

"I said nothing of the kind!" denied Llewyn stoutly. "I could not say it, for it would not be true! I told him that, as you did not love me, it would be better to give up the old arrangement and allow you to marry where marriage would bring happiness with it."

"Then—you thought—that I did not love you, Llewyn?"

"Yes, Felice! You have so often complained that I was forced to believe it."

"It is wrong," said Felice steadily. She was penitent, and determined not to spare herself. "I do love you, but until to-day I never realised how much. I thought I had lost you, and I had an awakening!"

"My love!" cried Llewyn. He held out his arms, still hesitating, lest she should not respond, but she threw herself into them and he pressed her to his breast and kissed her again and again.

"But who told you that I was in love with another woman?" asked Llewyn, when they were wending there way back to the house, his arm round her waist.

She told him all that had passed between Madge and herself laughing guiltily when she repeated her friend's homely truths.

"I did treat you shame——" The rest was smothered by a kiss.

"Tom Dawson must have keen powers of reasoning, if he deduced any conclusion of that kind from what I said!" cried Llewyn sarcastically. "But first we will go and explain to your father, and then you can settle with your friend while I talk to Dawson."

"No, no!" cried Felice hastily. "It was a privileged communication! I will speak to Madge while you talk to father."

Madge was unfeignedly surprised and delighted with the news that Felice had to tell, and promised to rate her husband soundly.

"I wouldn't do that!" said Felice with a happy laugh. "Through his mistake I have found happiness, so I ought to thank him for being a little—too sharp, I mean! I will thank him the first time I see him!"

Madge went off to find Tom in order to rate him soundly. She began as soon as she saw him.

"You have made a nice mess of that about Llewyn and Felice and another woman, haven't you?" she asked with vexation in her voice.

"Then it isn't true?" asked Tom demurely.

"All wrong! But it did good, though, for it awoke her to a sense of her conduct and told her that she really loved him, and so it turned out that your silly mistake did a lot of good and made everybody happy. And Felice is going to thank you for being silly and——"

"It was an odd mistake, wasn't it?" queried Tom drily, so drily that Madge stared and then gasped.

"You made it up, Tom, just to bring about the awakening that she wanted! And you never let me into the secret! That's too bad!"

"I thought you wouldn't act the part properly if I told you!" said Tom contritely. "I won't do it again!"

George Day.

Ten More Gramophones

for

SHORT STORIES' Readers.

HERE is another opportunity for you to win one of our splendid Gramophones.

Now that the long winter evenings are upon us, it is difficult to imagine a more enjoyable form of fireside entertainment than to sit in your armchair and listen to the voices of our best singers or to the musical performances of the best orchestras on the Gramophone.

The Gramophones are beautifully made instruments, fit to grace any drawing-room, and with every one will be given two records. The Gramophone and the records would cost you £2 17s. in any shop. You could not get them for less.

All you have to do is to fix on one of the record discs, and you can hear the song or the instrumental piece as loudly as it was orginally sung or played.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

To win one of these Gramophones, construct a sentence from the letters contained in the words HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA. Each letter must be used, but not oftener than it appears in the words given. Then write it carefully, in ink, on the back of a postcard and post it to the ANAGRAM Editor, SHORT STORIES, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.

To each of the ten competitors whose sentences the Editor considers the best, will be awarded a handsome Gramophone.

All attempts must reach us not later than first post on Tuesday, November 11th.

RESULT OF THE "CUT-PICTURE" COMPETITION.

A SPLENDID Gramophone has been awarded to each of the following competitors, whose attempts in the above competition were the neatest of those which were found to be correct:

D. Pope, 5 Vernon Place, Birkenhead; J. Duxbury, The Central Newsagency, 32 George Street, St. Helens; F. Holt, 29 Rake Street, Bury; H. A. Joyce, 80 Westmorcland Road, Bromley, Kent; P. Smith, 4 Challoner Terrace, East, South Shields; Miss A. Mackenzie, 46 Teulon Street, Walton, Liverpool; Miss Olive Oliver, 21 Lee Road, Harpurhey, Manchester; Miss M. Bredall, 3 Birdhurst Road, South Croydon; Sergt. Jas. McKenzie, 77 St. Vincent Street, Glasgow; Chas. Sobey, 2 North Road, Queenboro; J. Bullers, 100 St. Asaph Road, Brockley, S.E.; B. Beales, 19 Birchin Lane, E.C.; E. Hardy, 46 Mersey Street, Hull; C. Pollard, 35 Heygate Avenue, Southend-on-Sea; W. Anderson, 66, Brunswick Street, Edinburgh; R. W. Vanderben, 47 Henry Nelson Street, South Shields; Miss Scott, Hope Villa, 17 Cann Hall Road, Leytonstone, N.E.; Miss J. Fisher, 125, Mornington Road, Leytonstone; G. W. Weller, Kingston Lodge, Prestonville Terrace, Brighton; J. Barnes, 105 Ruckholt Road, Leyton, E.; B. Nash, 2 Buxton Road, Brighton; W. Vernon, 3 Hull Street, Crumpsall, Manchester; Mrs. Wathen, Draycott, Cheddar; H. Howe, "Rossmoor," Grosvenor Road, Ilford; W. Murray, 11 Church Road, Cadoxton, Barry.

BELOW will be found the key of the numbers of the squares in their correct order.

PICTURE No. 1.

44	39	51	30	8	2	23	43	4
11	49	15	21	28	25	48	33	46
1	52	27	13	37	17	5	26	20
53	19	9	14	41	35	3	16	6
45	54	40	24	18	32	10	34	29
42	36	12	50	47	31	22	7	38

PICTURE No. 2.

11	48	54	30	49	34	10	7	8
22	28	1	52	9	31	29	17	46
36	35	33	27	19	20	12	4	18
26	53	51	37	16	21	13	25	38
32	47	45	6	41	39	3	5	14
23	50	40	43	2	44	42	15	24

PICTURE No. 3.

51	24	14	50	13	42	23	22	12
10	43	39	9	18	35	38	53	48
28	44	41	27	5	30	16	40	3
31	38	54	26	19	17	20	4	46
32	45	21	47	2	11	6	25	29
34	1	52	33	49	37	15	7	36

Digitized by Google

A Mixed Affair.

I Marry Your Sweetheart, You Marry Mine.

"How are you, Jack?" cried Fred Wilmot as he warmly shook hands with his chum Jack Blyth. "I was just coming to your place, old man, and I am so glad I met you."

"What's up?" asked the other; "anything fresh?"

"Nothing beyond this," said Fred, "that I am in a little bit of a fix, and I want you to do me a turn and help me out of it."

"Of course I will," replied Jack; "say the word and I'm your man."

"Well, it's like this. I promised to take Miss Rivers to the theatre to-night and unfortunately I can't. Mother got a wire that Miss Steel will arrive at King's Cross at eight o'clock and of course, I am to go with the mater and meet her, I being the only man of the family."

"Isn't Miss Steel a cousin of yours?" asked Fred.

"Well, she is a kind of half cousin on my mother's side. Now it is rather sneaking on my part to palm the job on to you, but there is no time to warn Miss Rivers, and if she keeps the appointment and I am not there, you know there will be a beastly rumpus."

"Well?"

"Well? well? can't you say well again? don't you see what I am driving at?"

"No, not exactly."

"Would you go and meet her in my place?" blurted out Fred. "I know it is awkward for you, but——"

"You want to go by proxy?" said the other laughing; "all right, old man, I've no engagement on, and will obey your commands. Give me particulars as to where we meet, when we have to be home, how many times we have to laugh, and——"

"Oh, hang it, look here, you don't mind the job, do you, Jack?"

"Not at all, I'll be there."

After getting particulars the two friends parted, the one to see his cousin and the other to see his friend's best and sweetest girl. It was a foregone conclusion that Jack would be best man at the marriage, so there was nothing out of place in acting as substitute in a case of emergency like this. The only point was that Miss Rivers might feel the position, yet if she exercised the common sense with which she was supposed to be so richly endowed, there was no cause for friction.

Arriving at the place indicated by Fred, Jack waited for a cool quarter of an hour, then he saw Miss Rivers approach. She started when she saw who it was waiting for her, and inquired anxiously after Fred.

"Oh, Mr. Blyth, you gave me such a fright," she said; "something must have happened to Fred. Where is he? and why are you here?"

"I will explain matters in less than no time if you will allow me, Miss Rivers," replied Jack laughing. "Fred had to attend to a very important piece of business, and was called suddenly away, so he asked me to meet you as he did not want to disappoint you?"

"It is very considerate of him," and she tossed her pretty head to convey its ironical meaning, "but he might at least have found time to wire me, and not have me coming here for nothing."

"Thanks awfully," replied Jack with a grin. "You know what the poet says——"

"Never mind the poets, Mr. Blyth, you can tell Fred from me that I am very disappointed in not seeing the play."

"All right, Miss Rivers," he replied; "I'll do so with pleasure—that is—I mean I'll let him know that you were so much upset by meeting me, that you declined to go to the theatre," and he heaved such a sigh, that it blew out his cigarette.

"Oh, did Fred ask you to escort me?" she said with a pleased look.

"He appointed me to the dignity of ambassador, and representative of——"

"Now don't say such silly things," she interrupted with a merry pout, "and if we are going to stand here all night, we had better be going, as the Irishman said."

"Then you confess you haven't come for nothing after all."

"Come on, you silly goose," she replied laughing; "if you don't behave yourself better I won't go at all."

For answer Jack Blyth wheeled round and hailed a hansom and they were soon bowling along, and chatting on all the commonplace topics of the day.

Suddenly Miss Rivers said, "You have not told me what the business was that prevented Jack from coming?"

"He will likely tell you himself," was the reply; "you see, probably he did not think it important enough to make a special mention of it."

"But you know?"

"Yes, of course I do, but why so inquisitive?"

"I'm not inquisitive; I only want to know all about it."

"That's a good argument for a woman," said Jack laughing; "would it do you good, and be conducive to your happiness if I told you?"

"Yes; I am dying to know."

"But don't die just yet, or you won't see the play."

"There's no chance of getting anything sensible out of you," she said with an attempt to look angry; "will you tell me where he has gone?"

"To the railway station," he replied.

"Yes?"

"Yes."

"Oh, don't be so provoking or I will get out," she said, stamping her foot on the cab floor. "What did he go to the station for?"

"To meet a train." And he smiled a smile.

There was silence profound as the cab drew up at the theatre door, and not a word was exchanged as they took their seats in the circle.

As the piece proceeded, Jack stared hard at the stage, and when the curtain dropped on the first act, he carefully perused the hideous advertisements displayed to remind the people that they were not allowed to escape the worries of the outside world, and must be reminded even immediately after the hero has died at his post that "Silas Konkus toffee is the best."

The awkward silence could not last for ever, so Miss Rivers condescended to remark, "Aren't the dresses lovely?"

"Where?"

"On the stage, of course."

"I don't see any," he replied, with a provoking smile. "I was admiring the way that man is driving that pantechnicon and four horses. Now don't you think it a shame," he said sadly, "that after listening to the histrionic gifts of clever actors, that you are required to be reminded by that man sitting on his box, that he will remove your furniture by land or sea, at contract prices."

Digitized by Google

"Really, Mr. Blyth, you are getting too awful, I wish I had not come. I——"

"I am so sorry, Miss Rivers, if I have offended you," he replied ruefully; "I'll say no more about the pantechnicon man, if you don't like him. Perhaps you would prefer that cheerful undertaker's advertisement up in the right hand corner, he——"

"Are you going to behave yourself, or shall I leave you?" asked Miss Rivers with as severe a frown as she could muster. "You have spoilt my night's enjoyment, I will never come with you again."

"Have some chocolates, Miss Rivers?" he asked, completely ignoring the young lady's last remark. "I can recommend them. The last young lady I had with me said they were delightful."

"Oh!"

"Yes; will you have some?"

"Certainly not," was the reply, with a great amount of dignity, "you can get them for her the next time you bring her here."

"Oh, but I take some home occasionally, you see, my sister is very fond of chocolates."

"Your sister?" with an inquiring glance.

"Yes, why not? most sisters like chocolates, don't they, Miss Rivers?" he asked, with a provoking smile. "I——"

But the band in the orchestra struck up and closed the debate.

The remainder of the evening passed pleasantly enough. Jack Blyth felt peculiarly happy, as he sat next to Miss Rivers. Why, he could not say, but he was enjoying himself thoroughly, and felt almost boisterous in his mirth.

Miss Rivers could not but admit to herself that Mr. Blyth with all his faults was very pleasant company, and on the return home from the theatre she for some time seemed in deep thought, then suddenly said:

"Has Fred gone to meet his cousin?"

"Which one?" asked Jack with pretended innocence.

"How many has he, Mr. Clever?" replied Miss Rivers laughing. "I only wanted to know, for instance, if it was Miss Steel he went to meet?"

"Do you know her?"

"I have heard of her from Fred. I know she was coming to London on a long visit, but the time had not been definitely fixed. Am I right in my guess?"

"I will explain to you in as few words as possible," replied Jack with a smile. "Fred Wilmot went to King's Cross to meet his cousin, Miss Steel, and——"

"Now do stop that nonsense," cried Miss Rivers, "and talk sensibly. I did expect that Fred would have come to meet us as we came out of the theatre, but I suppose his time has been fully occupied in attending to his cousin," and a slight tone of jealousy showed itself as she spoke. "Not that I care, of course, but if he prefers her company to mine he can please himself in the matter, I will never submit to——"

"Hello!" cried Jack laughing, "you say you don't care?"

"No, not a bit," she replied with emphasis.

"Then why worry?" inquired Jack in mock solemnity; "you will find when you see Fred he will be all right, and as the poet says——"

"Oh, bother the poets, here we are at my place. Won't you come in, Mr. Blyth?" she asked as the cab drove up.

"No, thanks," he replied, "it is much too late, but if I——"

"You can tell Fred when you see him that I am not pleased with him."

"It would be better for you to tell him yourself. Don't you think so, Miss Rivers? The question I am most anxious for you to answer is, have you enjoyed yourself?"

"Very much indeed, Mr. Blyth. I am very pleased to have had your company Now we will say good-night."

(Continued on next page.)

Published in the Interests of The Deaf.

FEW people realise the magnitude of the work undertaken by the late Dr. Drouet in the interests of those who suffer from defective hearing and diseases of the ear. Besides creating large establishments in London, Paris, and Brussels, where aural ailments are treated by the Drouet method, he also founded a medical magazine, "The Journal for the Deaf," intended solely for the benefit of those who suffer from these afflictions. This publication contains in each issue valuable information on the care of the ears, and expressions of opinion by various authorities on the curability of deafness. Interesting instances of the cure of deafness in all its forms are also given each month in the form of a "Supplement" which contains the monthly records of the Drouet Institute. A free copy of the "Journal" and "Supplement" can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W. With the "Journal" is always enclosed a Report Form which enables anyone to receive free advice by correspondence as to the treatment of the ear, nose, and throat. Personal consultations with the medical staff of the Drouet Institute have been arranged for every weekday, between the hours of 2 and 4.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED); absolutely pure: no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

"Good night," and Jack Blyth raised his hat and walked down the street with a light step.

Fred Wilmot duly arrived at King's Cross to meet his cousin. They had met before, when she was of short frocks, and he of the merry knickers and scarlet stockings. He had recollections of a pretty face and laughing eyes, but he was simply dumbfounded with surprise when he beheld one of the loveliest girls he had ever seen step on the platform when the train drew up. Fred's mother and sister were there to give her a warm welcome; and after the first greetings were over, Miss Steel turned to Fred and said, with a merry laugh:

"Why, Fred, you have grown to an awful size; and, I must confess, good-looking too! Don't you think so?"

"I can't say as to that," replied Fred pulling himself up to his full height, and stroking out to its full length what did duty for a moustache. "I don't know much about my looks, cousin Minnie, but you—well, I must compliment you on your dazzling——"

"Come, come!" said Fred's mother, with a smile; "don't begin to flatter each other so violently already, or you will quarrel soon. We will now see to getting home," and putting her arm into that of her niece, she left Fred to follow on with his sister, and a rather disappointed look on his face.

Fred had originally made up his mind to go to the theatre just to put in an appearance at the end to smooth matters over with Miss Rivers and thank his friend Jack; but the time at home passed so cheerily that he delayed and delayed till he found that he was too late to be of any service in that direction, so he told his conscience not to blame him under such extreme circumstances.

Miss Rivers was duly introduced to Fred's cousin, Minnie Steel, so also was Jack, and, strange to say, whenever a proposal was made to go anywhere they always formed a quartette, which arrangement seemed to give satisfaction all round. Of course Fred was in duty bound, so he told himself, to see that his cousin enjoyed herself, and was taken round to see the sights; and Miss Rivers seemed to have no particular objection to the arrangement, so everything went smoothly up to a certain time.

"HOW I CHAPERONED BELINDA" commences this week.
See First Page.

The four friends went into the country for a day's outing; and in the general course of things strolled about at their own sweet will; but Miss Rivers found herself completely in charge of Jack Blyth, while Fred Wilmot disappeared with his cousin, and a search for each other was vigorously proceeded with in a half-hearted manner, as though each party were afraid of succeeding in finding the other.

"I think it is beastly mean of Fred to go and leave us as he has done!" cried Miss Rivers, tossing her head. "I will never come out like this again!"

"But you see, Miss Rivers, this is an exceptional case."

"Oh! of course you men can always find some excuse for yourselves; but I call it simply horrible treatment to be left by myself in this manner!"

"Thanks!" replied Jack with a grin. "Your compliments are like rays of sunshine and balm to a fellow's feelings."

"No nonsense, Mr. Blyth, you must go and look for them."

"That's what we are doing now, aren't we? If you consider me nobody, Miss Rivers, would you kindly allow me to be your shadow?"

"I did not call you a nobody, Mr. Blyth," she replied, looking away from him. "You are trying to make yourself generally disagreeable or fishing for compliments."

"All right, Miss Rivers," he replied, laughing. "As your name applies, I will do some fishing. Anything to catch?"

"You should not be so funny when——"

"When you are angry. Come, Miss Rivers, confess you are angry; but why with me? What have I done to cause you to snub me as you do?"

"I don't snub you."

"Yes you do. If things are as they are, I am not to blame. I know perfectly well I have no right to be so often in your company"—she looked at him—"but it is only a matter of convenience for the time being."

"It is my turn to return thanks for your kind consideration, Mr. Blyth," she replied haughtily. "We had better return to the hotel and see if the others have arrived."

"Of course I am always putting my foot in it," said Jack. "I meant no offence, Miss Rivers."

"I don't care whether you did or not!" was the reply; "it is quite immaterial to me, I can assure you."

"Oh! in that case we had better do as you suggest and return at once. I hope you will not be offended if I propose that this should be our last meeting, as apparently my company always seems to annoy you?"

She would have answered him if she could, but it took her all her power to choke back the tears that were ready to burst out, so they walked amid a silence that was most painful; and Jack Blyth swore he would never more do this sort of thing. It had apparently brought misery and disappointment to Miss Rivers, which upset him very much. As, though he was supposed to be a half careless sort of fellow he was thoroughly genuine at heart, and he did like her very much. The journey home that evening was none of the most enjoyable. Miss Rivers complained of severe headache, and not one of the four seemed particularly sorry when the time arrived to say good night.

Two or three evenings after Fred Wilmot burst into Jack Blyth's rooms with the announcement that a grand excursion had been planned for the next day.

"I say, old chap, you will come, won't you?" cried Fred.

"I rather think not," was the reply. "I have had quite enough outing for the present, and will now take a rest."

"Oh, hang it all, man!" cried the other, "we cannot do without you."

"Is that the reason you ask me?" said the other, with a slight grin.

"What are you grinning at?" asked Fred laughingly. "Is there anything tickling your imagination?"

"There is—slightly."

"Oh! What is it?"

"You have no idea, I suppose?"

"Well no; I can't exactly say that I have."

"Not exactly," said the other. "I quite admit that; but give me half of your idea, and I will give you half of mine."

"Now, don't get up an argument, Jack," cried Fred. "The point is, will you come to-morrow?"

"No!"

"No? Why?"

"Simply because I say no."

"What's wrong, old man? Have I offended you?"

"Not in the least; but you must admit that if I do not wish to come and join you, I am entitled to my opinion?" and he smiled a thoughtful smile.

"Look here, Jack, what am I to do without you? The four of us were going to take a boat and——"

"You require me to pull?" with a laugh.

"But Miss Rivers is going with us."

"Oh!"

"Yes."

"Now look here, Fred—do you hold that out as an inducement?" and he looked his friend straight in the face, and calmly waited his reply.

"I—I—that is, I thought that you enjoyed her company?"

"Well?"

"Why do you look at me like that?" asked Fred. "Are you suspicious of anything?"

"Are you?"

"What is all this fencing about?" asked Fred with an innocent air. "There is something in your mind."

"And yours?"

"Will you come?" asked the other, evading the question.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietors, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Walnall Road, Bucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 2lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Coniston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

CO-OPERATION.

The Editor of Short Stories.

DEAR SIR,—The recent struggle at St. Helens, over the vexed question of Co-operative Stores v. the Shopkeepers, has once more brought before the public the great benefits to be derived from direct trading.

It is, of course, beyond all question that direct trading with manufacturers is more beneficial to the public when the all-important questions of price and quality are taken into consideration.

By this system there are no middlemen's profits to be made (and which the public have to pay), the purchaser obtains his goods direct from the factory, and is thus able to secure the lowest possible prices.

In my own case, I have been established at Blackburn for 25 years, during which time I have had dealings with thousands of customers from all parts of the world. My experience gained during that period has proved conclusively to me that I can supply the public with any article required at a much lower price than could possibly be obtained by purchasing through the middlemen. It is just as easy to purchase direct from the actual factory as to obtain articles in your own town. The method is very simple; the purchaser selects the article required from my catalogue, sending cash with order. If not approved of, he then returns the article and I refund the money.

The present is an opportune time for testing my assertion, as my new lists are now ready, and will be sent free to every applicant. They contain full particulars of many articles indispensable to the home, musical instruments of every description from pianos to mouth organs, phonographs, jewellery, etc. They are veritable buyers' guides, and the public, in dealing direct with me, will find that during the year they will save many pounds

Yours faithfully, J. M. DRAPER.

NORTHERN EMPORIUM, DEPT. 366,
HIGHER AUDLEY STREET, BLACKBURN.

A CELEBRATED

NELSON WATCH & CHAIN

FREE FOR ONE DAY'S WORK.

We send this Genuine 30-Hour Nickel-Plated WATCH, Warranted an ACCURATE TIME-KEEPER, with Chain and Pendant, for Selling Seven Beautiful Articles at 1/- each. Sterling Value. Send your full Name and Address (Post-card will do) by Return of Post, and we will at once forward the box of Handsome Goods, Post Paid, and a large Premium List. No Money Required. WE TRUST YOU. We send the Goods at our own risk. Send us the money that you get for them, and we send you the Watch, Chain and Pendant by Registered Post.

THE NELSON MANUFACTURING CO.,
72, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.

DRUNKENNESS

CURED. This can be done with or without patient's knowledge. Send me a stamp and I will tell you how. (Send no money.) Address, in confidence, Mrs. C. H. (Room 8), 195 Oxford Street, London, W.

EVERY LADY

should BUY AT ONCE for NEXT TO NOTHING from the stock of the latest fashionable COSTUMES and MILLINERY, worn only once or twice, placed for disposal by ladies in the HIGHEST LONDON SOCIETY with Miss Selwyn, The Ladies' Mart, 93 Regent Street, London, W. Or send 2d. in stamps for details.

LADIES ONLY

Need read this and you will afterwards always look smart, and your hair keep beautifully curly and wavy.

WAVINE. A NEW HAIR WAVING AND CURLING FLUID.

Invaluable for keeping the hair in wave or curl, is not affected by damp or wet weather. Unlike other preparations, it imparts a brilliant gloss, is not sticky or greasy, and has a delightfully refreshing perfume, is inexpensive, and acts as a tonic. Can be used on the most delicate hair. Send for full-size sample bottle direct from manufacturers, post free, by sending P.O. for 1/1½. WAVINE CO., 19 Park Street, Highbury, London, N.

Many will tell you that "Tatcho" is the only remedy they have found serviceable after years of trying.

"TATCHO"

Gets the hair back. Puts the hair right. Keeps the hair right.

WHO SAY SO.

The Hon. Mrs. GORDON—

"The Hon. Mrs. Gordon has derived much benefit from 'Tatcho.'—3 Northumberland Street, Edinburgh, August 28th, 1902."

PRINCESS EUGENIE CRISTOFOROS PALŒLOGUE—

"'Tatcho' is invaluable. I would not be without it on any account.—Belvedere Hotel, Kensington."

Major-General KEATE—

"I find 'Tatcho' excellent, and better than anything I have ever tried in the course of a long life. I could not have believed that any preparation could do so much good in so short a time.—High Croft, Winchester."

LADY SYKES—

"I can recommend 'Tatcho.' It has entirely renovated my hair.—Mayfair, W."

Commander T. WOLFE MURRAY, R.N.

"I have found 'Tatcho' of distinct benefit to my hair.—Trobridge, Crediton, June 18th, 1902."

Colonel PERRY—

"My dear Mr. Sims,—'Tatcho' is wonderful, and all to whom I recommend it praise it. I hope others have advised the use of 'Tatcho' as I have.—Royal Hibernian Hotel, Dawson Street, Dublin."

Colonel BAGOT-CHESTER—

"I well know how valuable 'Tatcho' is.—Zetland House, Maidenhead."

"TATCHO" is sold by all Chemists and Stores throughout the World, in Bottles at 1/-, 2/9, and 5/-.

A 4/6 full size Trial Bottle for 1/10

is supplied to enable the public to test the possibilities of "Tatcho." Chemists, Stores, and Hairdressers, or direct, carriage paid, from the "Tatcho" Depot, Lincoln's Inn, London.

"A hair on the Head is worth two in the brush."

Digitized by Google

PHONOGRAPHS FREE

A Practical Up-to-date Sound Reproducing Instrument, which will take any Standard Record and bring forth the Words, Music or other Sounds in a Perfect Manner.

AN ABSOLUTELY FREE GIFT

This is a Genuine Offer. It comes to you from the well-known establishment of Symonds' London Stores. We are the largest Phonograph suppliers directly to the public of any firm in the United Kingdom. When we make a promise we keep it. We now tell you that we mean to give away a limited number of the celebrated Symonds' Premier Phonographs. You can verify our assertion by answering this advertisement. But do not wait and be too late.

THE REASON FOR OUR FREE OFFER

We have set aside a quantity of our Symonds' Premier Phonographs to be distributed for advertising purposes. We offer to give you one of these Phonographs provided that whenever friends ask where you obtained it you will mention that it came from Symonds' London Stores, and also provided that you keep at least half-a-dozen of our Records according to the Award which we will send you (playing selections of band music, songs, &c.), so that your friends may know their quality. You will not be required to pay a penny for the complete Phonograph. We will send the Phonograph, carefully packed, and by the directions you can learn to operate it quickly and easily. We can supply comic songs, sentimental songs, religious selections, or band music. What kind do you prefer? Our catalogue will help your choice.

Bear in mind you are not to send us any money for the Phonograph, but merely write a letter, mentioning having seen this offer in this paper. Give us your full address, being particular to also mention the nearest railway station. Enclose stamp.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

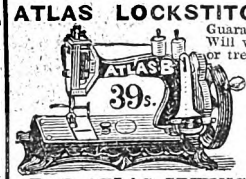
£ SUCCESS

Does it elude you? Why do not brain and industry always win? What does win success and influence? Would you like to know the scientific explanation of the subject? The law of mental currents? The study of the effect of one mind on another? The philosophy of personal magnetism? You need it.

FREE.—Send for the strange and fascinating illustrated booklet, "The Power Within." It is published and given away free by The PSYCHIC RESEARCH CO. (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Av., E.C.

Enclose 1d. stamp for return postage.

ATLAS LOCKSTITCH MACHINE.



Guaranteed 4 years. Will work by hand or treadle. To ensure satisfaction, machine sent on receipt of 5/- P.O. for ONE MONTH'S TRIAL; or, if desired, can be paid 5/- Monthly. Write for terms, Designs, and Samples of work. 39/-

THE ATLAS SEWING MACHINE CO., 184s High St., Camden Town, London, N.W. 63 Seven Sisters Rd., N.; 14 High Rd., Kilburn

NOSE

RAY'S NOSE MACHINES Cure Pug, Snub, Flat, Dumpy, Bottled, Crooked, or Prominent Noses. By H.M. Royal Letters Patent. Particulars for stamp. Pamphlet, "Red Nose, Cause and Cure," 1/-, or medically approved Cure, 3/9, privately. LEES RAY (BT), Specialist, South Castle Street, Liverpool. Ear Machines, &c.

A RARE CHANCE.

SEND us your name and address, and you will receive Free on approval 24 of our Silver Aluminium 1903 Novelty Thimbles. Each one is prettily embossed with the inscription "Remember Me," "Forget-me-not." They are lighter and tougher than silver, never tarnish, and will last a lifetime. One million sold already.

WE TRUST YOU—
NO MONEY REQUIRED.

Sell the thimbles at 2d. each, making 4/- altogether, which forward to us, and we will send you at once the Guaranteed Timekeeper or other Presents of High-class Jewellery you have earned, and which you can select from our list sent with the "Sell-at-Sight" Thimbles, and we will also tell you how you can make a regular income of £2 10s. per week. Write to-day and we send to-morrow.

GOLD & Co., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE
Delamere Crescent, London, W.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

"ALKAN"

CURES IN 1 MINUTE

By Inhalation.

The "FAMILY DOCTOR"

"From investigation the constituents, we have confidence in saying that the good results are not only rapid, but lasting and free from danger."

HEADACHE,
TOOTHACHE,
FACIAL NEURALGIA,
NEURALGIA OF THE EAR.

From all Chemists and Stores.

Price:
1st Size, 2/9; 2nd Size, 4/6 per Bottle.
Sent post paid from Depot to any part of the United Kingdom on receipt of price.

Proprietors: THE ALKAN Ltd.,
General Depot: 150 STRAND LONDON, W.C.

GIVEN AWAY
With this week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 460)
PAPER PATTERN
of this
FLANNEL BLOUSE.
Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

RUN NO RISK

KEATING'S LOZENGES CURE

THE WORST COUGH

Digitized by Google

"I might come on one condition, and that is, that I take Miss Steel for——"

"But," broke in the other eagerly, "you know it would be very awkward for me; you see I have had her company since she came, and she would think it strange to—to——"

"Just so."

"Now, don't interrupt me, Jack. I am only doing a duty, and I am much obliged, sincerely obliged to you for the way you have done. I admit it is hard lines for you, but I—that, I——"

"Are you finished?" asked Jack, with a knowing look. "Is this all you have got to say?"

"Well, you see, it's like this——" And a prolonged pause ensued.

"Like what?" asked Jack teasingly. "You have not explained what like it is, or any other like. But may I ask if you like your cousin?"

"Of course I do; it is only natural one should like ones relations, isn't it?"

"Of course not," drily; "there can be no particular objection to anything of that sort, or liking your fellow-creatures, for that matter. Why, I like Miss Steel very much myself," he said calmly.

"What!" and Fred jumped to his feet.

"Certainly," replied the other. "'Love thy neighbour as thyself.'"

"Come now, Jack, it is time you stopped this nonsense!" said Fred, which was followed by rather a watery laugh.

"Will you come to-morrow and assist me to entertain the ladies?"

"Now, look here, Fred, it is all very well for you to spin a yarn about my assistance, etc., etc., but do you think you are treating Miss Rivers well when you have neglected her to a great extent for some time past? Do you think it fair, I ask you?"

"But then, Jack, you were with her."

"That is begging the question altogether, Fred. You must not forget my dear fellow, that there is still a regiment called the Marines, to whom you had better apply to believe your story of disinterestedness in the matter. The fact is, you are deeply, madly in love with your cousin. Can you deny it?"

No answer.

"Why don't you own up now at once and be done with it?"

"Well, you know I can trust you, Jack. I am hopelessly gone, and what am I to do? I am happy, and yet I am miserable. I know I have not treated Miss Rivers as I ought to have done, but I am sure she will forgive me."

"With what object? Do you intend to be madly in love with Miss Steel and yet marry Miss Rivers? My advice to you is to go home and put a poultice on your head and get that nonsense drawn out. If you are in such a state make a clean breast of it to Miss Rivers."

"I am awfully sorry, Jack!"

"To tell you the truth, Fred, I am not!" and Jack calmly lit a cigarette.

"What do you mean?" asked Fred, as he saw a peculiarly joyful look on his friend's face. "Why do you say that?"

"Because it will enable me to come to your boating trip to-morrow, and I will ask Miss Rivers personally if she has any objection to my coming."

"Jack!"

"What?"

"Do you mean to say that——"

"Same as you, old man, and got it badly. I believe I will be able to relieve you of a terrible——"

"Come on, Jack! Shake hands, old man!" cried Fred. "I am glad it is over, and we understand each other."

The boating expedition duly came off, and when the party returned in the evening, judging from the happy faces and merry laughs, a most enjoyable day had been spent.

Jack Blyth declared he had been promoted to better than the best man at Miss Rivers' marriage; but Fred Wilmot and his cousin were too engrossed in their own happiness to see the joke

Alan MacGregor.

Miss Madge Morris' Marriage.

100 PIECES OF WEDDING-CAKE TO BE GIVEN AWAY.

READERS of Short Stories who were readers six months ago will remember the circumstances under which Miss Madge Morris came to conduct the "In Confidence" page. They will remember that she took up writing in order to make sufficient money to enable her to set up housekeeping. Her fiancé was not in a position to marry at the time, and had poor prospects of any substantial increase, so Miss Madge Morris decided to contribute her portion of the sum which would enable them to marry, by writing for the papers.

For the past six months she has conducted the feature known as "In Confidence" in this paper, and has contributed several articles to the other periodicals issued from the offices of Short Stories. The money which she has received for this work has been carefully saved up, and I am now pleased to be able to tell my readers that

Miss Madge Morris

WILL BE MARRIED ON

Tuesday, the 2nd of December.

She chose Tuesday because it is the day on which Short Stories comes before its readers, and she has to thank this little paper mainly for her success.

And now I have a rather startling offer to make. Miss Madge Morris, in the course of her duties, has frequently had dealings with readers who have seemed to her more like personal friends, and these readers number thousands. It is Miss Morris' wish that she should send a piece of her wedding-cake to all of these friends. But this, of course, is obviously impossible; it would require a cake as big as St. Paul's. We have, however, found a way out of the difficulty in the following manner:

We shall purchase a big wedding-cake for Miss Morris, and after the wedding festivities are over it will be cut up, put into boxes, and sent to certain readers of the paper.

Altogether a hundred delicious pieces of cake will be sent out.

Moreover, the beautiful centre ornament from the top of the cake will also be offered as a prize.

The conditions under which you will be entitled to receive a piece are as follows:

All you have to do is to sit down and write a short congratulatory letter to Miss Morris on the auspicious occasion of her marriage. The reader who sends what Miss Morris considers to be the best letter will receive the beautiful centre ornament from the top, and the senders of each of the next hundred best will receive a piece of the cake.

Send your attempt to Miss Madge Morris, "Short Stories" Office, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., marking the envelope "Wedding" in the top left-hand corner.

Digitized by Google

By Madge Morris.

[I shall be glad to answer, to the best of my ability, any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to me personally, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Lorn Natalian.

A SOUTH AFRICAN correspondent writes me to the same effect as did a Russian client recently. This gentleman, too, wants me to act as an intermediary between him and some English girl who would be inclined to accept an offer of marriage from an unknown suitor. He is in a good position, but has nobody to share it with him. To my friend, who calls himself "INTOMBI," I must answer as I answered the Russian gentleman. Do it through mutual friends. I am afraid I cannot undertake to be the agent in the matter, though my own personal sympathy is certainly with "INTOMBI." But surely there is not such a great absence of girls in Natal and the Cape that he, with a little enterprise, could not meet one likely to be as amenable to his attentions as any strange English girl with whom I might, with the best will in the world, be able to place him in communication?

Four is Company, Three None.

"ADA" is engaged to Frank, who sees her very often. Now "ADA'S" brother has a friend staying in the house, who has been very attentive to "ADA," without, however, becoming too pressing. The other day he suggested her going to a theatre with him, but "ADA" replied that she usually went to such places with Frank, who would not like her to go with anyone else. To which the other man replied, "Oh, do get him to come, too. We will all go." Now, Frank does not want to go to the theatre with the girl and the other man, and yet "ADA" does not want to be discourteous to the latter. How can she arrange the matter amicably for all parties?

* * * *

Certainly it would not be nice for all three of you to go. Why not ask a girl friend to accompany you, and make up a party of four? To this there could be no possible objection on anybody's part, and if your lover objects, he would be acting very much after the manner of the dog in the manger.

Another Photo Question.

I CERTAINLY thought, "M. H.," that I had dealt with your question regarding your friend and his photo, but possibly it was another of the same kind, and I associated it with yours. However, please accept my apology for the confusion. You made the acquaintance of a man on a sea trip, and he was very, very attentive to you. He hinted at love and marriage, but you, thinking it only a chance meeting, did not take him seriously. When you parted he asked you for your photo, which you complied with, and sent to him. He wrote back, promising to send his own as soon as he had it taken. Now two months have elapsed, and you have heard nothing from him. You cannot forget the man, and feel you care for him more than any other. Would it be wise for you to write to him, or do I advise you to wait till Christmas and then send him a memento?

That last is really quite a good idea. Why not wait till Christmas? Choose a card, or memento, which has a suggestion of a hint about those who are quick to promise and slow to perform. It would be a neat way of conveying the sentiment you feel. As he is the guilty party, of course if would look rather undignified for you to appear so anxious to secure his photo as to take the initiative in reminding him of it.

A Probable Flirt.

"FRANKO" suffers from ingratitude and mothers. He is twenty years of age, and for the sake of a girl to whom he has been attached, left his native town and lived in her neighbourhood. Promising to be always true to him, she has lately been accepting attention from another man (please, "FRANKO," don't use the word "gent"). This man has the approval of the girl's mother. When the girl writes to "FRANKO" she says she likes this other man, that "she is going to enjoy herself while young," and so on. To which "FRANKO" has replied, "Do as you like." Do I think, if she really loved him, she would have acted in this way?

* * * *

The girl, "FRANKO," is a flirt. She has behaved in a most ungrateful manner, and is not worth your concerning yourself further. As to her mother's connivance, I do not for one moment think that if a girl were really devoted to a man her mother's opposition could force her to accept the advances of somebody else. The opposition of mothers usually has the result of making a girl more and more fond of her own lover. No, she appears to have grown tired of you, and evidently is looking out for novelty. Let her go her own way. You cannot force her back to you. Perhaps, though, she may in time repent, in which case you should receive her again in a forgiving spirit. Meanwhile allow her to go her own way, as you appear to be doing, and await consequences.

An Anglo-Dutch Complication.

"PERPLEXED SUITOR" lives in Pretoria, where he is a book-keeper. He is twenty-three, and is very much in love with a girl of nineteen, who, however, has, since the beginning of the late war, resided in Holland, where her family went on leaving the Transvaal. In spite of the long period of absence, he still devotedly loves her, and she is aware of the fact. However, he fears she will marry in Europe. There is only a possibility of her coming back to the Cape in a few years' time.

* * * *

You are awkwardly placed. She is many years younger than yourself, and a girl's ideas often undergo great change between sixteen and nineteen. Tell her what your prospects are in Pretoria, whether in a year or so you will be in a position to offer her marriage and a comfortable home. On her answer should depend your course of action. It is useless for you to expect to hold under a bond any girl thousands of miles away from you, and living under entirely different circumstances, unless there is some such understanding between you.

* * * *

The other possible course is your being able at some future time to come back to Europe—even just for a visit—when you might make your proposal in person. Do you see the possibility of this within a year or two? If not, have you a friend who might be likely to see her on your behalf, and talk matters over with her? Meanwhile I advise you to think about making your way in the new colony, until such time as you are able to go to Europe and offer her marriage on your own account, or to establish yourself sufficiently well to ask her to come out to you, trying in the meanwhile to keep a hold on her affections by continuously writing to her and reminding her of your feelings.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

There are Several Talking Machines.

There is only ONE

GRAMOPHONE

Made in various styles, from £3 3s. to £15, by

THE GRAMOPHONE & TYPEWRITER LTD.,

21 CITY ROAD, E.C.

Do you like Grand Opera?

WE HAVE RECORDS SUNG BY MADAME CALVÉ.

„ SUZANNE ADAMS.
„ KIRKBY LUNN.
ETC., ETC.
MM. POL PLANÇON.
„ RENAUD.
„ CARUSO.
„ SCOTTI.
„ VAN ROOY.
ETC., ETC.

Do you go to Concerts?

WE HAVE RECORDS MADE BY

BEN DAVIES.
DAVID BISPHAM.
ANDREW BLACK.
WILLIAM GREEN.
JOSEPH O'MARA.
MAURICE FARKOA.
MISS ALICE GOMEZ.
„ ESTHER PALLISER.
„ PERCIVAL ALLEN.
MADAME C. CHAMINADE.
ETC., ETC.

Do you like the Music Hall?

WE HAVE RECORDS SUNG BY DAN LENO.

GEORGE ROBEY.
HARRY LAUDER.
BURT SHEPARD.

Band Records by the GRENADIERS, COLDSTREAMS, and ROYAL ARTILLERY.

Digitized by Google

IF YOU HAVE

Something good to tell, there is no need to delude the unwary into reading an apparently interesting story, which proves to be a prelude to an advertisement. The startling story and the thrilling "testimonial" do not add to the merit of the article advertised. If you are troubled with

BAD DIGESTION, IMPURE BLOOD, LANGUOR, INACTIVE LIVER, SICK HEADACHE, or other such ailments which arise from a Disordered stomach imperfectly doing its work, you need not experiment with the many medicines so plausibly put before you, take

BEECHAM'S PILLS,

